Councell at Rome, was it not reason he should reape what he had sowne? The Pope A yrged his confederates to send a part of their Sea-forces into the Realme of Naples; which consisted of foure Gallions, and sixtence Gallies for the King, thirteene Gallies for the Venetians, and eleven for the Pope, ouer all the which Peter of Nauarre was appointed Generall at the Kings instance, notwithstanding the Popes pursuite in fauour of Andrew Doria, whom he had entertained. The Colonnes, vnable to resist such forces, did cunningly strike faile, and to busie the Pope vnuill the Vice-royes returne from Spaine with the armie at Sea, they did capitulate with him the two and twentieth of August. To retire their troopes to Naples, with the which they did molest the territories of the Church; and on the other side the Pope should remit all offences past, and renoue the monitory which he had published against Cardinall Colonne. This reconciliation made the Pope in a manner to dismisle all the horie and foot, which he maintained vpon the territories of the Church, against the Colonnes, and to disperse the rest into towas about Rome, growing cold in his designe to invade Naples.

The Colonnes cared not to wrong the Pope with the preiudice of their honour, but hauing no meanes to make open warre against him, they straine all their wits to circumuent him by fraud. Fayning therefore to suppress Agnane, defended by two hundred men in the Popes name, they flic with all speed to Rome the twentieth of September, with eight hundred horie and three thousand foot, they seize vpon three gates, sacke the Popes Palace, and the ornaments of Saint Peters Church. There were present in person Ascanius Colonne, Don Hugues de Moncade, Vispassian, sonne to Prosper Colonne (the mediator of the accord, and who had plighted his faith, for himselfe and the rest.) Cardinall Pompee Colonne, so far transported (saith the Originall) with ambition and fury, as hauing conspired to put the Pope cruelly to death, hee had resolved to force the Cardinals to make choise of himselfe, and to install him in the chaire being vacant. The Pope in the beginning grew resolute, like vnto Boniface the eighth, when he was surprised by Sarre Colonne, but in the end conuired by the Cardinals that were about him, he retired himselfe into the Castle of Saint Angelo, where Don Hugues hauing receiued the Popes oath, and the Cardinals, Gibo and Redolphe his Cousins, for hostages of his safety, capitulating with him in teermes of a Conqueror, he forced the Pope to promise, To retire the army of the League out of the Estate of Milan, and not to give any succours to the Confederates for foure Moneths.

Times for punishments are noted in the Councell of Gods diuine prouidence, who meant to giue two notable strokes with one stone, as wee shall shortly see. This truce was wonderfully commodious for the Emperors affaires. Milan had bene vanquished at length: Genoua oppressed by the Confederates army at Sea, cryed out for bread; and the small store of victuals which came by land, did but keepe them in breath for some few daies. But behold two great effects diuerted by the coming of George Fronsperg, who knowing the extremity of Gasper his sonne, Colonell of the Lansquenets, which were within Milan, hauing stirred the Germans, with hope to enrich themselves with the spoile E of Italy: he led a good number of horie, and foureene thousand Lansquenets, who receiving euery man a crowne, followed him to the succour of Milan. The Marquis of Saluffes, and the Duke of Vibin, aduertised of these succours, abandon the siege of Milan, with an intent to cut off their victuals, and to charge them at the passage of some river. But the Dukes accustomed delaies had giuen Fronsperg leasure to assure himselfe of the field, so as the league could no way annoy him but by light skirmishes: in one of the which John de Medicis hauing his thigh broken with a faucon shot, retired to Mantoua, and there died, within few daies. This death was an absolute victory to the aduerser party, for he was young, wife, and a valiant Captaine. Laude and Cremona did cut off the victuals from Milan, and the Duke of Bourbon being freed from the siege, hauing no more meanes to maintaine his army, after he had by strapadoes and other tortures wrsted some money from the Citizens to pay his Spaniards, he left Anthony de Lena in the Citie, and entred the territories of the Church, with an intent to possesse Placentia. To prevent him the Marquis of Saluffes (leaving the Duke of Vibin in field) put himselfe into it, so as the Duke of Bourbon (seeing the towne well manned, and the Venetian armie to follow him) left Placentia, and by the Duke of Ferrarces aduice (whom the Emperour had won vnto him) being ioyned with Fronsperg, he marched directly towards Rome.

A The Pope (to be requenged of the outrage receiued by the Colonnes) called the Earle of Vaudemont, brother to the Duke of Lorraine, issued from the House of Anjou, (a House greatly desired by the ancient partisans thereof) to the Realme of Naples. The Earle accompanied by Range de Cere, with about ten thousand foot, and some horie, entering into the Realme, had taken Aquila, Salerne, and many other places, chased Don Hugues de Moncade, and raised the siege of Frefelon, which the Imperials had besieged, when as the Vice-roy of Naples required of the Pope in the Emperors name a surcease from armes. The Pope had no money to maintaine so long and heauy a burthen of the warre, then were greater difficulties in the enterprise of Naples then hee expected, the King did not seeme willing to make warre out of Italy, as he had promised in the articles of their Capitulation; neither did he furnish, besides his part of forty thousand crownes a moneth for the common warre, the twenty thousand which he ought euery moneth for the expedition of Naples; the French gallies were so ill furnished both with men and munition, as they remained fruitlesse at Sauonne, not attempting any thing: the succours of the King of England were farre off, and vncertaine; the tedious and variable proceeding of the Duke of Vrbin did vex him, the approach and threats of the Imperiall army at the gates of Rome, did amaze him: All these considerations made him conclude a truce with the Vice-roy for eight moneths, whereby either party called backe his men speedily, deliuered up the places taken, and caused the army at sea to retire. This was another meanes to lull the Pope alleepe a litle before his ruine.

C For threecore thousand ducats which Pope Clement had giuen in regard of this truce, were not sufficient to satistie two payes due to the Duke of Bourbons Lansquenets: the Germanes and Spaniards gaped greedily after the sacke of Rome, which had bene long promised them. The truce did nothing stay them from shewing all acts of hostility, they spoiled the Countries of Bologna and Romagna, and then camped before Rome, the next day, the duke of Bourbon causing a furious assault to be giuen, marching in the head of his troops, with a ladder in his hand, was slaine with a Harquebus shot. Philibert of Chalons, Prince of Orange (who marched besides him) to conceale it from the souldiers, caused his bodie to be couered with a cloake, and following with the charge hotly, he forced the suburbs D and the City. The victors entering, put about foure thousand men to the sword. It is to be beespoffed, the slaughter had bene greater, if the death of their General had bene knowne: they spoile friend and foe indifferently, Prelats, Temples, Monasteries, and reliques. They ransome both secular and religious men. They sacke the Cardinals Palaces (except such as had redeemed their goods, and such as were fled into their houses) with exceeding summes of money. And which is worse, many being spoiled by the Spaniards, were siceced againe by the Lansquenets, being seasoned for the most part with Luthers doctrine, and by consequence passionate enemies to the Sea of Rome. To conclude, Rome is subiect to all the inolenencies of a conquered towne which they meane to ruine.

E The Pope besieged in his Castle of Saint Angelo, sent for the Vice-roy of Naples, hoping that he would make him some better composition. But coming to Rome, he found the Imperials nothing pleased with his government, who had chosen the Prince of Auranques for their General, with whom the Pope (voyd of all hope of succours) agreed the sixt day of Iune: To pay vnto the army foure hundred thousand ducats, a fourth part presently, the rest at sundry termes: to remaine prisoner with thirteene Cardinals that did accompany him, vntill the first hundred and fifty thousand were payd, and then to goe to Naples, or to Caiete, to attend how the Emperour would dispose of them: To giue in hostage for assurance of the money, the Archbishops of Siponte and Pisa, the Bishops of Pistonia and Verona, Iames Saluati, Simon Ricafoli, and Laurence brother to the Cardinall Rodolphe: To deliuer into the Emperours hands (to hold so long as he pleased) the Castle of Saint Angelo, the forts of Ofia, Civita-vecchia, and Civita-Castellana, with the Cities of Placentia, Parma and Modena. The Accord being made, Marcon entred the Castle with three Companies of Spaniards, and three of Lansquenets, lodging the Pope very feardly, and with small libertie.

This insolent and hard proceeding against the Pope, to the scandall of all Christendome, caused the Kings of France and England to make warre in Italy at their common charge, to free the Pope and his Cardinals being besieged both with warre and pestilence, and and to restore him to the possessions of the Church: the King of England contributing A for his part three score thousand Angels a moneth: and to confirme the league betwixt the King and the Venetians, they promised to entertain ten thousand Swisses in common, the Kings furnishing the first pay, and they the second, and so consequently. The Duke of Milan with the Venetians should likewise entertain ten thousand Italians. Odet of Foix Earle of Lautrec was made General of the whole army, and passed the Alpes with a leaue of six thousand horse, six thousand Lanquenets, ten thousand French and Gascons, and ten thousand Swisses. Then Andrew Doria was entertained by the King with eight galleys, giving him thirte thousand crownes pay every moneth.

Before they came to open warre, the two Kings sent ioyntly to the Emperour, to demand the Popes enlargement; the restitution of the children of France, with an offer of two millions of crownes for their ranfome, the preservation of the Estates and Governements of Italy; and finally, a general peace, which the Emperour accepting, the Duke of Orleans should marrie with the daughter of England: but hauing refused the articles, they did sweare and solemnly proclaim their league the eight day of August. The expectation of Lautrecs forces was great, and the confusions of the Imperiall army great, being dispersed by the plague about Rome, and so diminished, as there scarce remained ten thousand men of all the Emperours forces.

Lautrec had no sooner set footing in the marches of Lombardy, but hauing intelligence that the Earle of Lodron had sent two thousand Lanquenets to Bosco, in the territories C of Alexandria, hee beleaguered them, battered it night and day, and the tenth day of the siege forced them to yeeld at his discretion, who keeping the Captaines prisoners, dismissed the souldiers; but vpon condition that the Spaniards should returne into Spaine, through France, and the Lanquenets into Germany, through Suisseerland: but these were afterwards receiued into the Kings seruice, vnder the Earle of Vaudemont. Colonel of the Lanquenets. This small victory was the fore-runner of another of greater importance. Andrew Doria General of the Kings Gallies, made hot warres against the Genouois, so as no ship durst goe to sea along the river of Genoua: and Cesar Fregose aduerted by his friends that were within Genoua, of the great scarcity of victuals which did presse the inhabitants, being sent by Lautrec, With two thousand men by land, hee kept D them so short, as in few dayes there was neither corne nor cattell for the inhabitants. The belly is an importune solicitor, especially when many mouthes cry for meat. The Genouois had no more hope of helpe, but in hazzarding some galleys to sea. They arme some, and send them out by chance to seeke victuals, foure laden with corne were taken by the French galleys, foure returned fraught with corne, and one with other merchandize; and nine were gone forth of Genoua to waite them, when as hauing newes of Fregoses approach, they abandon their galleys to goe to charge him. In the meane time Andrew Doria arriues, he compasseth in these galleys in the port of Genoua, burnes one, and takes all the rest, whilest the Genouois (hauing ouerthrowne the first they encountered) chased them so far, as they being cut off by the French betwixt the towne and them, they were all defeated, and Gabriel Earle of Martineuque their General taken prisoner. This misfortune, with sundry other crosses and losses of money and diuers ships, the famine hauing brought them to the last extremity, reduced the towne to the Kings obedience, whereof Lautrec made Theodore Trinnice Gouvernor.

The losse of the Lanquenets had wonderfully daunted them of Alexandria, so as although Alberic of Bel-iouense had somewhat reuiued them with a supply of a thousand men, yet the rough and continuall battery of Lautrec, forced the Earle of Lodron to enter into composition, whereby the Lanquenets departed with their baggage, taking an oath not to cary armes against the King, nor his allies for six months. The taking hereof brought Vigueu, with all the Country of Lomeline and Biagras to the Kings obedience. Anthony F de Lena had not within Milan about a hundred and fifty horse, and five thousand Lanquenets and Spaniards, being ready to abandon the towne (doubting to bee vnable to defend it, with so few men, and so many difficulties) and to retire to Paui. But Paui was ill victualled; and moreover, his army could not liue there vpon extortion and spoile, as it had done at Milan. He therefore sends Lodowike of Bel-iouense to Paui, and two thousand five hundred men, and resolues himselfe to defend Milan. Lautrec followes him, and besiegeth it on the Castle side, and the Venetians on the other part: he makes a breach, and

Paui taken,

A and takes the towne at the second assault, he leaues it eight dayes in spoile to the souldiers, and leads away Bel-iouense (who lately for a quarrell with Fredericke of Bossole, had forsaken the King) prisoner to Genoua. All which places according to the treaty were restored to Francis Sforza. Milan wauered, the confederates did sollicite the taking thereof. But it was thought good to leaue this thorne in the Venetians feet and Sforzas, for being both freed from feare of the Emperour, (who hauing this passage stoppt, should draw no succours out of Germanie) would haue bene lesse affected to fauour the King in his enterprise of Naples. Moreover, it was a meanes for the King to make a more easie treatie of peace with the Emperour, of whom (leaving the Estate of Milan) he might with more ease obtaine the liberty of his children, according to the treaty with the Emperour, by the Ambassadors of France, England, and Venice. But the King desiring that Sforza should still stand in need of helpe, gaue the Emperour meanes to speake bigger. He was of a great spirit, and neuer daunted in aduersity. He protests, that neither loue nor force shall make him to alter any of the conditions before propounded: and his proud demands make proofe, that he had no inclination to peace. As the Venetians and Sforza laboured to stay the French forces in Lombardy, so the Pope pressed them to driue the Imperiall army out of the territories of the Church. He therefore passeth the riuer of Po, the 18 of October, with an intent to attend the rest of the Lanquenets, commanded by the Earle of Vaudemont, which were not yet arriued, to be in the Swisses place, being for the most part retired.

Lautrec had no sooner turned his backe, but Anthony de Lena came and recouered Biagras, the eighteenth day of the said moneth, and prepared to passe into Lomeline to take Vigueu and Nouarre: but Lautrec aduerted of this attempt, sends backe Peter of Nauarre with six thousand French foot, and some men at armes, who chased the Spaniard into Milan, and seised Sforza in Biagras.

The Lanquenets being arriued, Lautrec tooke the way to Placentia, where the Duke of Ferrara (it may be) well pleased to see the Pope, against whom he had beene long incensed, receiue some disgrace, leauing the Imperials, ioynd in league with the King, and therwas concluded the marriage of Hercules his eldest sonne with René the youngest daughter to King Lewis the twelfth. The Marquis of Mantoua, a friend to the strongest, did likewise ioyne with the confederates.

The Emperour then foreseeing, that the inuasion of the Realme of Naples by Lautrec, would force him to call backe his forces which he had in the territories of the Church, he sent his Commission to let the Pope at liberty, which done, after many treaties he agreed, the last of October, To attempt nothing against the Emperour, neither for the Estate of Milan, nor the Realme of Naples: To pay three hundred and fifty thousand ducats, that is, three score thousand presently to the Lanquenets, and thirty five thousand to the Spaniards, the like summe within fiftene dayes, and the rest three moneths after.

The Pope to free himselfe from prison, fled to those remedies, which he had before his E restraint neglected, he made Cardinals for money, the most of them (saith the History) being unworthy of so great an honour. Necessary it was that the Court of Rome should thus be disgraced, that they might meddle lesse in worldly affaires, and looke to their spiritual duties. The tenth of December was come, when as the Spaniards should conduct the Pope to a place of safety, but knowing the bad affection of the Spaniards, especially of Don Hugues de Moncade, Vice-roy of Naples, by the death of Lanney, and fearing a worse condition, or some other change, he deceived his guards, and the night before (disguised like a Merchant) he went secretly out of the Castle, and saued himselfe in Oruieto: but his hostages payed his ranfome.

A rare example to be noted in the Church, since the time it came to that greatnesse: To see a Pope issued from one of the greatest Families in Italy, fallen from so great a dignity, to loose Rome, to be a prisoner, and to haue all his Estate possessed by the violence of Christian armes; then in few moneths, to be restored to his seat, and by the meanes of the eldest sonne of the Church to recouer his Estate, greatnesse and authority. Without doubt the Emperour, suffering himselfe to be so much preft for the Popes deliuey, shewed that the Councell of Spaine was more gouerned by ambition then deuotion.

The Pope being at liberty, he exhorted the confederates to draw their companies out of the territories of the Church, that by their example the Imperials might make their retreat retreat according to promise, as indeed they did: he gave thanks to Lautrec in particular, for that he had assisted him in his delinquency; adding, That hee was as much bound vnto the King and him, as if he had beene freed by his forces. But the More changed not his hinc. He held (saith the History) his accustomed disposition, hauing not (by his imprisonment) left his craft and couetousnesse. As the Kings of France and England, requir'd him to re-joyne his armes and meanes, with them and their allies: sometimes hee fed them with hope that he would employ himselfe for a generall peace, and the good of all Christendome; sometimes with excuses, that wanting men, money, and authority, his vnion with them would be fruitlesse, and giue the Imperials occasion to wrong him in many respects.

The King of France and England proclaimed war against the Emperor.

Lautrec layd at Bologna, attending directions from the King, either of a full resolution of peace, or to proceed in his course of armes. The Emperor offered to settle Sforza in his Estate, and to compound with the Venetians, Florentines, and other confederates. But the Emperour and the King stood vpon the point of honor, which should trust other. A point which plainly discovered the bitterness of his spleene. The King would not be bound to draw his army out of Italy, where he had recovered his children, yet he offered to put hostages into the King of Englands hands, for performance of whatsoever hee should be bound vnto, if vpon the deliquency of his children he did not presently withdraw his army. The Emperor grew obstinate, saying, that he could not trust him, who had once deceived him. The Ambassadors of France and England tooke their leaues of the Emperour, and according to their Masters Commission proclaimed war against him. The Emperour accepts it cheerfully; but to stay the Ambassadors instantly, to send them fiftene leagues from Bourgos (where then the Court of Spaine remained) to giue them a guard of shot, and halberds, and not to suffer them to conferre, or to write in any fort. Was not this to violate the law of Nations? The fire is now kindled, they drame of nothing but war. Lautrec proceeds in his course, he takes the way to Rimini, Ancona, and Recanate, chafeth the Imperials before him into the Realm of Naples, where we shall soone see the exploits of his armes.

The King aduertised of the detention of the Bishop of Tarbe, his Ambassador, who was afterward made Cardinall of Grandmont, he committed Nicholas Perrenot Lord of Granuelle, the Emperors Ambassador, to the Chastelet at Paris, and stayed all Merchants, subjects to the Emperour. But this was not all. The Emperour had before time at Granado, when as they treated of a peace betwixt them, sayd; That he would willingly end all controuersies with the King by a single combat of his person against the Kings: he now deliueers the same words vnto the Herald that denounceth war vnto him: adding, That the King had basely and treacherously broken his faith with him. The King would not haue refused it, but his Ambassador did then wrong him, in concealing this speech. It may be the Emperour had such an intent. He was a most valiant Prince, but our Francis did yeeld nothing vnto him in courage. He had no sooner intelligence of his challenge, but calling together, the twenty eight of March, all the Princes, all Ambassadors, with the whole Court, into the great hall of the Palace at Paris, sitting in his royall seat, he caused Iohn Robert, one of his Secretaries of State, with a loud voice to reade a cartell signed with his owne hand: that the Emperour, accusing the King to haue falsified his faith, had spoken vtruly, and as often as he did speake it, he did lie. To the end therefore he should not deferre the deciding of their controuersies, hee wished them to appoint the field, and hee would bring the armes, the King protesting, that if afterwards the Emperour should write or speake any thing preiudiciall to his honor, the flame of the delay should redound vpon himselfe, seeing that the combat is the end of all writing. Without doubt, this proceeding had bene more seemly for Knights, then for such Princes; and no enterprises are commendable, but so far forth as they agree with the dignity of their persons and States. And for that Granuelle refused to take vpon him this charge, the King dismissing him, did accompany him with a Herald, to present this writing vnto the Emperour. Within few daies after, Henry King of England sent him the like desce, and did put away Katherine his wife, daughter to Ferdinand and Elizabeth King of Spaine, whom he had married, being widow to Arthur his elder brother. A diuorce which Pope Clement granted, vpon promise, that Henry should, for his safety, maintaine him a guard of foure thousand foot.

In the meane time, Lautrecs forces preuailed in the Realme of Naples, with such applause

King Francis challengeth the Emperour to the combat.

Lautrecs success in the Realme of Naples.

A plaufe of the people, as, whether for affection of the French, or hatred of the Spaniard, almost all the townes, sent to offer their keyes and gates. Peter of Nauarre had chafed the Prince of Melphy out of Aquila, and reduced all Abruzzo to the Kings obedience, the whole Estate of Naples was ready to set vp the banners of France, when as the Prince of Orange hauing assembled within Troye, and thereabouts, fise thousand Germanes, fise thousand Spaniards, and fiteene hundred Italians, hee made Lautrec to vnite his forces, which were disperfed, and to turne head to the enemy, with an intent to fight with him. He wanted the finewes of warre, the Kings assignations failed, so as hee could not long maintaine the burthen of the warre: the aduantage of men, victuals, and the field, did inuite him, he must therefore attempt some great matter. He goes to field with three thousand French, whereof the Lord of Bury was Colonell; foure thousand Gascons, vnder the command of Peter of Nauarre, and the Lord of Candale, eight thousand Germanes commanded by the Earle of Vaudemont, three thousand Suisses vnder the charge of the Earle of Tende, with ten thousand Italians, and approached neere the enemy, but there was no meanes to draw him out of his fort. Many dayes were spent in skirmishes. In one of them, three hundred horses coming out of their battalions, which marched after the artillery, were charged by Morice and Pemprant (it is that faithfull Achates to the Duke of Bourbon, whom the King had drawne to his seruice, and honored with a company of fifty men at armes, for the good seruice hee had done him at his taking at Pouia, hauing freed him from some souldiers that had enuironed him, and not knowne him) were wholly defeated, and their guidons caried away.

Lautrec offered battell, yet well pleased not to fight in the absence of Horatio Baillon, who brought thirteene Ensignes of foot, whom Iohn de Medicis had long before trained in the exercise of armes. But behold, a heauy signe of a farall disaster, the windes were so violent, and the sky so troubled, as all the tents in the French campe were ouerthrowne, and many men slaine.

Baillon arises, the enemy packes vp his baggage, stops the bels of his moyles, and marcheth through the woods directly to Naples, without found of drumme or trumpet. It had bene a goodly thing to pursue these run-awies. The French Capitaines flew after them in their hearts, but Lautrec said, I will haue them at my mercy, and without losse of my men. But the wit of man is ignorant of future destinies. Don Hugues de Moncado and other chiefe seruants to the Emperour, did so hate the Prince of Orange, as without doubt, they had shut the gates of Naples against him, the which had giuen the French a great aduantage, but the soveraigne Iudge of armes had otherwise decreed. The Prince of Orange being dislodged, Lautrec sent some troops of French horse and foot with the blacke bands (which were those of Baillon) to go before Melphy, which might cut off the victuals from the army lying before Naples: the Prince thereof defended it with three thousand men, who by their continuall sallies had much endamaged our troops. They made a small breach with two Cannons, and the Gascons burning with heat, offer themselves to the assault, the black bands follow them, without any commendement or direction from their Capitaines. A volley of shot makes them retire, kils many Gascons, and some threecore of the black bands. At night they renue the battery, and make a second attempt, but with like success, yet at length they carie it.

The next day they haue a supply of artillery, wherewith they make two great batteries. The peasants (which were in great numbers within Melphy) mutine for feare, they are indeed more fit to amaze, then to serue at time of need. The souldiers terrified with this tumult, abandon the defences, and recover the Castle: they enter the towne, spoile it, and kill of souldiers and inhabitants six or seuen thousand: they take the Castle by composition, and the Prince with his wife and children prisoners. Barleta, Trani, Venoufe, Aconit, and all the places thereabouts, except Manfredonia, yeeld to the victors fortune, who prepared a great masse of victuals for the siege of Naples; the Venetians troops hauing fortified the army with about two thousand men. Capoua, Acerre, Nola, Auerfe, and all places thereabouts, hauing voluntarily opened their gates, made the way casie for Lautrec, who campe before the wals of Naples, in the end of April the Imperials were refolued, only to defend Naples, and Caiette. It was a great matter to haue chafed the enemy out of the field, and to keepe them coopt vp within the capital citie.

But alas! what shall become of so great a multitude of men? our French must learne once

Naples besieged.

The difficulties of the siege.

once more, to their cost, that all their strange enterprises attempted farre off, haue bene a mountfull graues vnto them. The issues of death belong to the eternall God.

Lautrec employes all his wits in the siege of Naples: but who can hope for any happy successe? The City was full of men of defence, and the meanes to furnish it very uncertaine: for the gallies of Philippin, Nephew to Andrew Doria, being vnable to stop vpon the ports, some ships fraught with meale flied in: those of Venice came not, the enemies light-horse (which were many) cut off the victuals from our men, the ordinary grossefne of the ayre, the continuall raine, the discomforts of the souldiers, who for the most part lay open, filled the campe full of diseases: the Kings slow prouision, and the negligence of the Treasurers, were the cause that no money could passe the mountains: the Venetians, of two and twenty thousand ducats which they should contribute euery moneth, did owe threecore thousand, and that little which Lautrec did gather of the custome of the cattell of Apulia, was employed for the defraying of his ordinary expences. The number of the defendants was great, their experience in deeds of arms well tried, being 9 or 10000 old souldiers. It was therefore better to besiege, then to assaile Naples, and to provide that they might not be relieved with victuals, neither by land nor sea: Philippin Doria kept the gulfes of Salerne, and the Imperials relying vpon the valour and strength of their men, conceiue a hope to overcome him.

This resolution was necessary for the Spaniards, they make choice of a thousand Spanish shor, and diuide them into fixe Gallies, foure Foists, and two Brigantines. Don Hugues the Vice-roy, Gobbe an old sea-Captaine, and almost all men of command, will bee partakers: and to amaze Doria afarre off, by a shew of a greater number of ships, they make a long traine of Fisher-boats, and send two Gallies before, giuing them charge, to retire at the enemies approach, that they might draw them into the open sea. Doria aduertised of the Imperials counsell, by faithfull spies, makes three of his Gallies to disperse themselves as if they fled, to the end that turning, they might (through fauour of the wind) charge them in flank and in poepe: and followed with fixe gallies, hee marcheth towards the enemy. The greatest stratagems consist in expedition: the first blow is worth two. The Spaniards presumed, that compassing in Doria, with the smooke of their Cannon to take from him his sight and mark. Doria presents them, and for the first check, he caries away D with one Cannon-shot, forty men out of the Admirall, amongst the which was the Captaine and many officers: the other peeces fildy discharged, doe likewise disorder them. On the other side, the Gally of Don Hugues discharging her Cannon, kills the Captaine of *Doria*s gallee, and hurts the Master, with some others. The approaches are made, and a furious charge is giuen with their shot and other armes. These two fight with great courage: three other Imperials presse two Genouoises, and seemed to haue the better, after the death of many men of either side, when as the other three which made heaw to flye (hauing gotten into the open sea) they turne the prow against the enemy, beat in pieces the Admirall, and another called Gobbe, take their Foists, sincke some, burne others, kill their men, breake their armes, and fighting hand to hand, and foot to foot, in the end they get both the advantage of the combat, and the honor of the victory.

Don Hugues de Montedisi Vice-roy of Naples, Fieramosque, with many other Gentlemen and Captaines, and about a thousand men were slaine, and remained as a prey for the fish. Two Spanish Foists sore battered recovered Naples with great difficulty: the Prince of Orange caused the Master of one of them to be hanged, the other went and yielded to Philippin Doria. The Marquis of Guast, Ascanius and Camillo Colonne, the Prince of Salern, Saint Croix, le Riz, Gobbe, Serenou, with a great number of chiefe men, were taken prisoners.

These are goodly beginnings in so famous a siege, which fill the French with great hopes of a happy successe, and the Imperials with a strange amazement. They see the flower of their men buried in the waues, they haue lost the command of the sea, and are blockt vp so neere at land, as they haue no meanes to be relieved with victuals, they haue no meale but by their hand-mills, no money for their souldiers, the plague did daily diminish their numbers. Staby, Saint Germaine, Fondy, and all the Country about, yields to the Conqueror: the Prince of Melphy ioynes to that party, the people of Calabria seeme very willing to come vnder their command; but the point of a total victory consisted either in the conquest or the defence of Naples. Our men were much annoyed for fresh water,

A victory at sea gotten by Philippin Doria.

A fresh-water, diseases encreased, the which did greatly wast the army; the enemy being stronger in light-horse, did cut off their prouisions by their daily sallies.

Lautrec, without doubt a great Captaine, but absolute in his opinions, left most of his horsemen dispersed at Capoua, Auerle and Nola, so as the blacke-bands hauing no horse to second them, came often with disadvantage from their skirmishes. The report was, that they prepared an armie for the sea at Marfilles, but it was onely in imagination. The Venetians more careful of their priuate interest, then of the generall good, fitted themselves of those places which should be their portion of the conquest. The Pope had no other designe, but to recover the authoritie which his house was wont to enjoy at Florence. Thus there appeared many difficulties on either side, yet such as there was an expectation of victory for the French: for in the end there arised two and twenty Venetian Gallies in the gulph of Naples, the tenth of Iune, which deprived the besieged of all commodities at sea, and threatened them with a generall famine. But see what caused the total ruine of our French. The Emperour in the midst of a losse, makes a great gaine. We doe commonly sinke vnder our owne burthens, and are the cause of our owne miseries. The infidelitie of the Genouois is herein detestable: but we may obserue a goodly lesson for Princes, to endure much of a rude seruant, when he is profitable vnto them, and that they must neuer hope to recover him, when hee is chased away or lost. Lautrec aduertised of the fore-said victory, commanded they should send the prisoners into France. Philippin puts them into two Gallies, with that intent. But the boorie was too good, and might easily draw a Genouois soule to dispench with his faith. As they passed by Genoua, Andrew Doria stayed them, couering his secret designs with this pretext: That the King had not satisfied him for the ransom of the Prince of Orange, and other prisoners, which he had taken at Porte-fin during the siege of Paia (the which had bene set at libertie, a peace being concluded at Madril with the Emperour) neither yet for the entertainment of his gallies, without the which hee could no longer maintaine them. That if it pleased his Maiestie to doe him right, and yeeld vnto the Genouois their accustomed commands ouer Saouonne (the King thinking to keepe Genoua in awe, had transported the traffick of merchandize, and the custome of salt to Saouonne) with their ancient liberties, and priuiledges, hee would deale with the people that for assurance of his faith, he should furnish the King with twelue gallies entertained, in the which he might place such Captaines, and Souldiers, as he should thinke good, reseruing onely two gallies, for the guard of the port.

A strange and insolent course for the seruant, to prescribe a law to his Master. But the losse of such a seruant was the losse of Genoua, of the Realme of Naples, and of the army which besieged it. But these demands of Doria, being found unreasonable by the Count, especially by the Chancellor du Prat, a so wren man, and of great authority, the King sent Anthony de la Rochefoucault Lord of Barbezieux, with the office of Admirall into the East-seas, and a Commission to seize as well on his Maiesties gallies, as of those of Andrew Doria, yea and of his person, if hee might finde the meanes. Andrew aduertised of this charge, retired himselfe to his gallies, deliuered vnto the Kings, left his pay, and practised by his Spanish prisoners, he followed the Emperours partie with the freedome of Genoua, vnder the Emperours protection; the subiection of Saouonne to the Genouois: a pardon for himselfe, who had bene so great a persecuter of the Spanish name; entertainment with the Emperour for twelue gallies, and threecore thousand ducats yeerely pay, with many other honourable conditions: during which treatie, his Nephew Philippin not onely kept ill guard, but also priuily relieved the besieged with victuals, and in the end, retired himselfe from Naples with all his gallies. This departure of Philippin, caused the Venetians (who wrought from the sea-shore vntill they met with the French, which Lautrec had made betwixt the towne and Mount Saint Martin, which the enemies had fortified) to leave their worke, and looke to guard the sea. This was the first effect of *Doria*s retreat, to preiudice the Frenchs armie. Behold the second, which followed the ouerthrow of their enterprises, and the losse of their infinit charges. The fifteenth day of Iuly, the Venetian gallies reme into Calabria, to provide biscuit. So the port remaining open, the besieged deuoted a great refreshing at such times as necessity had brought them to *Lautrec*s deuotion, who (notwithstanding the plague) the great constancie of Lautrec, resolving rather to die, then to retire one foot backe from the place, he solicited the King to supply him with money and men in their roomes that had died of the infection. The King lent the Prince of Nauarre, brother to Henry King of Nauarre, but with so small a troop (whereof the greatest part were voluntary young Gentlemen, who marched onely for pleasure, and to win honor) as he was forced to send some out of the army to conduct him safely from Nola to the campe, and to receiue some money which he brought. This charge was giuen to Candelles, Nephew to the Marquis of Salusses, who passing in his returne, before Naples, was charged by the Imperials, who issued forth in great troops, being hurt (his men put to rout, and himselfe taken prisoner and brought to Naples, and then redeemed by exchange for one of theirs that was taken in the fight) he died of his wounds. Hugh Earle of Popoli was likewise exchanged for another, and their troops were diminished about two hundred that were slaine and taken. A hard fore-runner of a fatall checke, which within few dayes shall daunt our warriors.

Now behold a pitifull Catastrophe of these two armies. The Imperials, by their daily sallies, provided them things necessary, and doe often cut off the victuals from the French armie, take their baggage and forage, euen at their forts, and their horses at the watering, their hopes encrease with their aduantages: their Lanquenets mutine no more: euery one esteemes it a glory to haue suffered. Contrariwise, the others decay, both in force and courage, the horse disband, some to refresh themselves, others to avoid the plague: the footmen faint, hauing no horse to second them: the plague beganne to cease at Naples, and encreased amongst our men. The Earle of Vaudemont, Gruffy, with many other Captaines, were already laid in their graues: the Prince of Nauarre, Camille Triunale, and almost all the men of command were sicke: and that which did most import, Laurie stricken with sickness, could not redresse those things, which did hourly tend to ruine, Rance de Gere, whom he had sent towards Abruzzo, to make a leaue of five thousand foot, and six hundred horse, found the Treasurers who payed him with their ordinary answer, I haue not a farthing, the King hath no money in his coffers. The enemies did so betray the wayes, as they could not go to Capoua: euery man almost was sicke. In the army, the footmen were much waisted. Simon Romain, a braue Knight, and of the French partie, had bene defeated in Calabria. Somme had bene slaine with the slaughter of a troop of men at armes, and light-horse. Most commonly there were no victuals in the campe: they wanted water, all the cisterns being dry: and to heape up their miseries, Laurie dying the 13 of August, interred with him all his braue designs.

The head failing, all the members faint and soone decay. Moreover, we obserue in this Nobleman, that no man (how wise and valiant soeuer) is alwayes happy: for vertue and fortune, haue alwayes bene at hatred and mortall warre. The King did honour his funerals at our Ladies Church in Paris, with a mourning pompe fit for one of his children. The Marquis of Salusses tooke vpon him the government of the army. A man of courage, beloued and well followed by men of warre: but it decreased, and disorders increased daily.

The Earle of Sarni with a thousand Spaniards, chased three hundred foot from Sarni which were in garison there: and followed with a greater troop, he tooke Nola from Felice, who being retired into the castle, attended two thousand men which the Marquis lent him, the which being charged in the plaines of Naples, were put to rout. Fabrizio Marano issued out of Naples with foure hundred men, and finding Capoua in manner forsaken, he straight waye entred into it. So the French abandoning Pozzuole, put the garison into Auerse, a place of great importance for the campe.

But Capoua and Nola being lost, they could hardly recover any victuals. So as the armie being no longer able to subsist did rise in the night to recover Auerse. The Imperials disceuer their departure, they pursue them, defeat the battell vpon the way, being led by Peter of Nauarre, and the reere ward commanded by Pomperant, Negrepchiss, and Paul Camille Triunale: they take the Nauarrois, with many other Commanders, and men of quality, and besiege the Marquis in Auerse: who hauing no meanes to defend himselfe, sent Guy of Rangon to parly with the Prince of Aueranges, and did capitulate with him as followeth: That he should leaue Auerse, with the Castle, artillery, and munition: That the Lieutenant General to the King, he should remaine prisoner: That he should employ his authority to cause both French and Venetians to yeld vnto the Emperour all the Realme of Naples: That the men of warre should yeld and deliuer up their Ensignes, Guidons, Banderolles,

A armes, horses and baggage, but such as had command might euery one carry away a horse, or a myle, at their choice: That the strangers should not beare armes against the Emperour for six monthes. So all the companies were defeated, all the Captaines dead, taken or fled: and this accord was a conclusion or scale of the milerie of the French in the Realme of Naples, and a confirmation of the Spaniards greatnesse in Italy.

Things hauing succeeded after this manner, the Marquis was caried sicke in a Litter to Naples, where within few dayes after he died. During the siege and after, there died the Earles of Lautrec and Vaudemont, Charles Prince of Nauarre, Candelles, the Barons of Grandmont, Buzancois, de Conty, the Lord of Tournon, and his brother, Claude of Bistampes Lord of la Ferte Nabert, la Val a Daulphinois, Gruffy, Moriac, d'O, Pomperant, Bisson, Louppé, Cornillon, Grutture, Maunourri, the elder Larnac, Bonini, Hugh Earle of Popoli, Count Wolfe, with so great a number of others, as of so many men at armes there remained not a hundred, and of so many thousand of foot there hardly escaped foure thousand: but let vs see the successe of our forces in the estate of Milan.

The Duke of Brunfwicke, hauing passed the riuer of Adice the tenth of May, with ten thousand Lanquenets, and six hundred horse well armed, hee marched to the succour of Naples. And the King, to crosse his designs, opposed the Earle of Saint Paul, brother to the Duke of Vendosme, with five hundred men at armes, five hundred light horse, vnder the command and government of Boissy: six thousand foot led by Lorges, and three thousand Lanquenets by Monteian. The Earle had commandement from the King, to follow this Germane Duke at the heeles, if he directed his course to Naples, and to engage him betwixt the two armies: but necessary prouisions for his troops causing the Earle to make a fruitlesse stay at Ast, gaue the Duke liberty to take by composition, Pescara, Riuolte, Lunare, & almost all the other places vpon the lake of Garde. This little successe drew him to the siege of Laude, but in vaine; the valour of the besieged, the plague among the besiegers, the policy of Anthony de Lena, (who would haue no companions of the booty, nor so great forces as might prescribe him a law in his government) tooke from them all hope to recover any money, considering the poverty of Milan, and the difficulty of victuals, whereof there was great want in Lombardy: the Lanquenets mutining returned home in disorder the thirteenth of Iuly.

The Earle being thus freed from this thorne, and ioyned with the Dukes of Vrbin and Milan, recovered what the Imperials had seized on, and all that they held betwixt Po and the riuer of Tefin vnto Pavia, which then obeyed the Emperour: for after the passage of Laurie to Naples, Anthony de Lena aduertised that it was carelessly kept by Peter of Luneghe, with foure hundred horse, and a thousand Venetian foot, and by Hannibal Pifinar a Cremonois with three hundred foot, he scaled it in the night, and surprisid it. Biagras and Arone were by the same meanes brought vnder his obedience. The confederates meaning was to assaile Milan suddenly, but a continual raine breakes their way going to the port of Vercell, by the which they should enter, so as they change aduice and went to E cape before Pavia. They battered it with twenty Cannons, and made a reasonable breach, where they disputed who should haue the point of the assault, the French and the Venetians affecting this honor equally. The lor fell to the Venetians, who gaue it: but skirmishing coldly and farre off, Lorges moued with choller and impatience to see them so faintly pursue the aduantage which fortune had giuen them, thrusts himselfe betwixt them and the breach, and takes it by force, before the Venetians could approach. Florimond of Chailly and Graslay (who did second Lorges on either side, if need should bee) were there slaine, and the Ensigne which marched before them, Peter of Birague died, being shot in the thigh. There were slaine within, about seuen hundred, almost all Lanquenets. The towne being taken, the castle yielded by composition.

But this victory is crossed with a notable losse. The plague was great at Genoua, and for this reason the towne was almost desolate. Andrew Doria embraceth this occasion: he approacheth neere the towne with some gallics, enters it with small resistance, ruins the Chastelet speedily, and in the end recoures it by a composition made with Theodore Triunale, being vnsupplied of men and mon-y. The Genouois being restored to their liberty, raze the Chastelet, establish a new forme of government, name a Councell of foure hundred Citizens, by whom all the offices and dignities of the City should bee chosen: they abrogate the law, whereby all Gentlemen were excluded (a good expedient to banish all partialities) they referre in their important affaires, the prehemine which Andrew Doria had deferved in recompence of the liberty which he had purchased for them, who (neither meddling with the election of their Duke, nor any other magistrates, neither yet with the government of the treasure) made his authority lesse hatefull, and this new policy more pleasing. Afterwards they tooke Saunonne, and the better to hold it in subjection, they ruined the fort, and filled vp the haven with stones.

The Earle of Saint Paul, relying on the word of some Citizens, who promised to give him meane to surprize the towne, parted with speed out of the Duchy of Milan, with three thousand foot and some horse to second them: but having no provision of victuals, but for foure and twenty houres, and no artillery with them, all turned to smooke, and retired to Alexandria, to winter the rest of his troops, his Lansequents being already retired, and the French halfe diminished of their numbers for want of pay. The Spring being come, the Earle of Saint Paul goes to field with those small troops he could gather together: he takes Mortare, a strong towne well flanked, and with double ditches full of water: Nouarre abandoned by Comte Philippin Tormel, Vigieu and almost all other places on this side the river of Tefin: yet all this was nothing, seeing the towne and castle of Milan, with other chiefe places were in the Emperours power. The Dukes of Vrbino and Milan aduertised, that the French army kept the field, came and ioyned with them at Marignan: yet all these armies united, were not sufficient to assaile Milan, the Venetians having not the moiety of twelue thousand men, which they should entertaine by the articles of the league. Moreover, Anthony de Leno was newly relieved with three thousand Spaniards, which came from Naples: They resolute therefore, that (to cut off the victuals from the Imperials) the French should march to Biagras, the Venetians to Cassan, and Sforzato Pavia: but the Earle of Saint Paul did wonderfully affect the enterprise of Genoua. Andrew Doria departed the eight of June with his gallies, to guard the Emperor who passed into Italy. This absence put the Earle in good hope, that Cesar Fregose (to whom the King had promised the government of Genoua) would make the towne revolt with some few foot.

Enterprise

This was to take a mighty Wolfe by the eares, which will bite them shrewdly that thinke to lay hold. They had behind them too vigilant an enemy. According to this designe, the Earle in stead of Biagras arises at Landriane, the twentieth of June: but in the night a great raine doth so swell the river, as he had no meane to passe his artillery. Anthony de Leno aduertised of the Earles stay, parts from Milan, overtakes the Earle, (who was busie in pulling downe an old house, to haue some pieces of timber to put vnder the carriage of a peece, that was mired) and chargeth him before he had in a manner discovered him. At the first, the Earle foreeth the Spanish shot to retire into the battalion of their Germanes; and the French Lansequents had repulled those that had passed a little River which diuided the two armies: but pursuing and following them to the banche, they were greatly annoyed by them that were opposite on the other side. Guy Earle of Rangon, had in the morning taken the way to Pavia with the fore-ward, so as hee had no notice of the fight, vntill it was past time to succour them. John Thomas of Galere and the Castellain of Laude, Colonels of the Italian foot, were already well aduanced: and leaving them engaged that were desirous to fight, they retire on the one side and saue themselves likewise in Pavia. John Ierosme of Castillon, and Claude of Rangon, Commanders ouer two thousand Italians, performed wonders. But the Imperiall horsemen hauing passed the river with a great battalion of Germanes, our Italians turne their backs, our Lansequents yeeld to their Country-men, the Earle and Annebaunt, with those few horsemen which remained, made the retreat, alwayes turning their faces to the enemy, vntill they were slayed by a brooke, which the Earle was not able to passe, through the weakness of his horse: whereas he and almost all that followed him, were put to the sword, or taken prisoners, except Annebaunt and some few Lances which leaped ouer the ditch: the footmen were all defeated, the artillery lost, and the baggage taken.

After all these stormes and confusions, after so many fatall sweats, caused by the waight of their armes; was it not now time to take breath? The Alpes and high-pointed Pyrene mountains, be they not sufficient barres to restrain vs within our bounds, and to be content to enioy and defend that which belongs vnto vs? was not so much blood spilt sufficient to make all Italy drunke? Such pitifull spectacles of Frenchmens bones, wherewith the

A the plaines of the Estates of Milan and Naples were made white, had they not force and vertue to take from vs all future desire to beare armes in such mortall conquests? Without doubt they had reason to make this complaint with the ancient Church: All our enemies haue opened their mouthes vpon vs, they haue hissed, gnashed their teeth and said; we haue confounded them, this is the day which we expected: we haue found it, we haue seene it. And with the like repentance to cry, Remember O Lord what hath chanced vnto vs, behold And see their reproaches. Turne vs vnto thee O Lord, and we shall be turned. Behold now the pitifull relikes of our Frenchmen, hatefull to strangers, scorned of all the world, beaten on all sides, returning home with their shirts tyed vpon their shoulders, who hauing scarce B breathed foure yeares, we shall see againe fall to armes.

This vnfortunate successe of our men, hauing caused armes to cease in a manner throughout all Italy, the Emperour and Pope both being bare of money, treated of some articles of peace. The Emperour had no inclination thereunto: yet he could not grant it in a season more beneficiall for himselfe. The King sought it: two notable afflictions drew him therunto; the imprisonment of his children, and the ruine of so many armies, with the waisting of his treasure. But one especiall consideration did moue him. If the confederates had discovered his intent, they might haue preuented him, and by their agreement with the Emperour excluded him from a league with any of them: and by consequence haue brought him to that point, as he should haue bene forced to accept farre lesse tolerable

C conditions of peace. Louise the Kings mother, and Marguerite, Aunt vnto the Emperour by the fathers side, did treat it at Cambray, furnished with authority and counsell from both their Maiesties; where finally they concluded, "That the King should pay two millions of crownes for the enlargement of his Children: that is, twelue hundred thousand crownes when as the said children should be in France and at liberty: He should deliuer the lands which Mary of Luxemburg, mother to the Duke of Vendosme had in Flanders, Arthois, Brabant and Hainault, and those which the Duke of Montpensier, cousin-germane to the said Duke, did possesse in the said Countries, for foure hundred thousand crownes to be redeemed within a certaine time: and for the other foure hundred thousand remaining, he should acquite the Emperour off so much to the King of England, which D he had lent vnto him, and fifty thousand more which the Emperour did owe vnto the English, for the indemnitie of the marriage betwixt the Emperour and Mary, daughter to the said King of England, whom he had left to marry with the daughter of Portugal. Moreover, he should vngage the Flower-de-luce of gold, enriched with pretious stones, and a peece of the Croisse which Philip the Emperours father had engaged to the King of England for fifty thousand crownes. That the King should renounce the sovereignty of Flanders and Arthois. That he should marry with Eleanor the Emperours sister: and if they had a sonne, he should haue the Duchy of Bourgongne. That he should restore whatsoever he possessed in the Duchy of Milan, and the Realme of Naples. That he should annill the Duke of Bourbons proceffe, restore him to his honor, and his children to their inheritance, and generally all others that had bene spoiled by reason of the warres. These articles thus concluded, were read and published in the great Church of Cambray the fifth day of August. But could the King renounce such pretensions, seeing they were inheritances purchased to the Infants of France by the succession of Claude their mother, daughter to Lewis the 12, Duke of Orleans, of whom depended the said succession of Milan?

This treaty did greatly moue the confederates, for that they were not acquainted with it, especially the King of England: notwithstanding, his secret desires made him to temper his choller. He meant to put away Katherine his wife, Aunt to the Emperour, and daughter to Ferdinand King of Spaine, saying, as it was true, that shee had bene before married to his eldest brother, wherewith the Pope could not dispence, belonging to the F law of God: which conclusion he obtained by the meanes of the Lord of Langey, in the Vniuersities of Paris, Pavia, Padoua, Bologna, and others. The Emperour and his ministers crosse him in this desire. This quarrell had neede of a strong support. To make vfe of the Kings fauour at need, he lent him the said sum of foure hundred thousand crownes, to be paid in five yeares: he forgave him the fiftie thousand crownes, & gave the Flower-de-luce to his god-sonne Henry Duke of Orleans.

The tenth of May was come, when as the Deputies should meeete at Bayonne, for the exchange of the Infants of France, with the payment of their ranfome. Montmercy

Ecc3 Lord

1530 Lord Steward and Marshall of France, came for the King; for the Emperour came Velasques Constable of Castile: the Crowne are told and put to the proofe: but being found somewhat altered by the aduice of the Chancellor du Prat, who thought to make it a benefit to the King, forty thousand Crowne more payed the interest of the whole summe. There were about foure moneths spent in the tryall of these Crowne: and in the beginning of Iuly, the Dauphin of France and the Duke of Orleans came to the river which runnes by the walles of Fontarabie, and diuides France from Biscay. A great boate was fastened in the middelt of the streame, with anchors and cables, that the sea which flowes twice a day, raising the boate to the height of the water, might serue as a bridge: and overthwart this great boate, they made a barre, to the end that the boate which carried the Infants of France, and that which brought the money for their ransom, being fastened on either side the great boate, the Frenchmen should passe into that where the Infants were, & the Spaniards where the ransom was. Thus it was performed, & they came accompanied with Queene Eleanor, to meete the King their father betwixt Roquehorth of Marfan, and Capricus, in a little Abbey of Nunnes, where the King and Queene were married an houre before day. Then taking their way by Bourdeaux, Cognac, Amboise and Blois, they came to Saint Germane in Lay, attending the preparations for the Queenes coronation at Saint Denis, and her entrie into Paris.

The Emperour being thus assured of the King, who about all others might crosse his designs, he is now resolved to be Crowned. To this effect, he must winne the Pope (for he must recieve the Crowne from him): and the Pope who desired some notable reuenge of the Florentines, for the injury they had done him during his captiuitie vnder the Imperials (they had spoiled all the goods belonging to the Medici, and chased them and their adherents out of the estate of Florence) was easily drawne to the Emperours will; yea with such extraordinary priuiledges, as the Emperour sitting himselfe to the Popes pallisones, settled the foundation of that admirable greateffe, which his house doth at this present inioy in Italy. The Pope hauing granted the Crowne to the Emperour, which he could neuer obtaine of his predecessour Iulius: vpon condition, that for recompence thereof, he should succour him with an army, to restore them of his name to their ancient authority within Florence, he imbarques at Barcellona, lands at Genoua, passeth to Placentia, and at the Popes request, restores Francis Sforza to the Duchie of Milan: but he reserves in his owne power the Castles of Milan and Cremona: hee marieth the said Sforza with his neece, daughter to the King of Denmarke, a prisoner, and dispossessed of his Realme: and on Saint Matthias day (so famous for his natiuitie, and the taking of the King before Paulia) he recieued the ornaments of the Imperiall dignitie from the Pope.

One scruple with-held the Emperour from resolving against the Florentines. The Turke besieged Vienna in Austria, with two hundred and sixe and twenty thousand fighting men: but the valour of Philip Count Palatine, the Earles of Solme & Rokendolf, and the succours brought by Ferdinand Arch-duke of Austria, and King of Hongarie, hauing forced the Infidels to take their way to Constantinople, with shame and losse, the Emperour gaue the charge of this warre to the Prince of Auranges, who ioyning with Don Ferdinand of Gonzagua, and the Marquis of Guast, takes from the Florentines, Cortone, Arezzo, Lastre, Pistoia, Prato, Volterra, Empoli, camps before Florence, and reduceth the Citizens to extremity: but as he marched to encounter some forces that came to succour the besieged, meaning to winne the horse, or to lose the saddle: hee was slaine in the charge being in the head of his troopes, performing (saith the Originally) rather the office of a man at armes, then of a General.

The succours notwithstanding defeated, the Florentines (after a long and painefull siege of eleuen moneths) fell in the end into the Popes power: who by many and sundry punishments of death and banishment, did so weaken the City, as in the end (the power of the Medici being more free) they haue settled the Soueraigntie in their family. The Duke of Ferrara had in time purchased fauour with the Emperour: and happy was he, for without it they would haue clippt his wings shorter. Wherewith the Pope was so greatly moued, as hee would not ratifie the sentence, by the which the Emperour had condemned the Ferrarois in an hundred thousand Crownes to the Pope: neither would he accept the money, nor the rent, which according to the ancient custome, the said Duke caused to be offered vnto him, at the feast of Saint Peter following: and euen then

A then beganne to studie how hee might secretly oppresse the Duke by ambushes, or find some matter or occasion to wrong him openly, with the ayde of great Princes. But hee did not fore-see, that death would soone cut off the thred of his life, and interre with him the issue of his designs. The present estate of things promised in shew a generall peace betwixt these two great Princes, but their minds had other impressions: That of our Francis, with a wonderfull desire to be reuenged for the rigorous conditions of the treatie of Cambray, being forced to renounce the Soueraignties of Flanders and Arthois, ancient members of the Crowne of France, and to quit his rights to the estates of Milan and Naples, the which had wonderfully discontented him. That of Charles, who feared lest the King or his successors should draw those Prouinces within the bounds of the Realme, and by the recouerie of the Duchie of Milan, molest him continually in the possession of Naples and Sicily. To exclude the King from all hope, the Emperour thought it best to restore Sforza to the Estate of Milan, that he might rule him at his will and pleasure: and for a time giue good contentment to the Potentates and Common-weales of Italy, to sequester them from the allyance of France, and make them enter into a defensiu League for the said Sforza: the first motion or occasion, which within fewe yeares shall transport our armes beyond the mountaines. There were diuers others which touch as neere. Sauoy lies vpon the way or passage from France to Lombardie: therefore to lay a strong barre before the King, if he should reuiue his ancient quarrels and pretensions, the Emperour sold to Charles Duke of Sauoy, the Countie of Aist with the appertences, being the ancient patrimonie of the house of Orleans, to tie him to his command, and to draw him to this League, as hauing now a priuate interest in the warres of Lombardie. Moreouer, hee employed the mediation of the said Duke, to withdraw the Suisses and Grisons from the Kings friendship to his. These were new motiues of new troubles, and for onenemy, he had two: they all had priue perswasers, who desirous of new broyles, anchored the hope of their priuate affaires, vpon the generall troubles of Christendome.

A scarce scratched too hard, breakes forth easily: a noble courage wronged, doth with like facilitie feele an outrage. Here we obseue a publike prejudice done to the Crowne, and a priuate contempt to the Kings person. A notable wrong, cutting off from the Soueraigntie two rich neighbour Prouinces. A contempt, for that we see Sforza issued from a meane stocke, and the sonne of a bastard, (oftentimes termed by the Emperours owne mouth, a traitor and perjured) preferred before the King, brother-in-law to the said Emperour, and his Maiesties children, whom no iust title, but onely force of armes could exclude. Let vs adde hereunto a third sling, sufficient to animate any generous mind: vnder a colour pretended, that they sought to steale the Infants of France secretly out of prison, the Emperour had put most of their Officers into the Gallies: and although he had bene often summoned by the King, by vertue of the treatie of Cambray, yet would he neuer enlarge them. Let the iudicious Reader iudge, which of these two did first infringe the

E Articles of the said Treatie. But the vlcers of precedent warres, being not yet well cured, and the King calling to mind the calamities to come, they disswaded him from taking armes. It was better to trie a friendly course, and seeke to recouer his owne by money, rather then by force. With this designe he sends Rabodenges to the Emperour. The Regent and Queene, assist and labour for an interview betwixt the Emperour and King. The Emperour aduertiseth the Pope, and doth assure him, that whatsoever he treats with the King, hee will conclude nothing with him to bring him into ieaousie. The Pope dares not rely vpon this promise: hee complains of the King, that without his priuety such practices are managed. The King excuseth himselfe, alledging, that they were not so farre forward, as it deserved to be light-ly imparted to his holiness: notwithstanding, hee forceeth the said practices, and the death of Louis the Kings mother and Regent, chancing the 22 of September, did quite dissolue them. There are other matters which shall hereafter impire. The Emperour fought to force the Princes and other estates of the Empire, to recieve Ferdinand his brother for King of Romans, making them to allow of the election made of him, to the prejudice of the golden Bull, and contrary to the ancient orders of the said Empire. A leuaine, which shall cause the ciuill warres, that hereafter shall afflict Germanie. Moreouer, these Princes pretended, that the Emperour failed in the performance of many things promised misfed by him, touching the rights, priuiledges, and liberties of the Empire. So as John A Elektor and Duke of Saxony, John Fredericke his sonne, William and Lewis Dukes of Ba- varia, Philip Landgrau of Hessen, with many other Princes, make a generall league, for the foresaid causes. And now seeing the King discontented, that the Emperor had newly discovered vnto the Pope the treaty of their enterview, mediated by the Ladies, and that the King had many & lawfull occasions to giue care to the perswasions which were made often vnto him, that the Emperor did but seeke to lul him asleep, while that he did fortifie himselfe with men, money, and alliances: they intreat the King to enter into their affociation, by vertue of an ancient league obserued long before betwixt the Emperor and the Crowne of France: they send him an authentick copie of their treaty, that hee might B know their intention was not to make any inuasion, but for the defence of the Empire, the which they did foresee, that Charles the fift did seeke to subuert; and to make it heredita-rie to his House, to the great preiudice of the neighbour Princes, greatly troubled with the Emperours exceeding ambition and inuiolent outrages.

The King, to giue two strokes with one stone, imparts this matter to the King of England his perpetuall Allie: asketh his aduice and counsell, how they two together might enter into this league, without breach of the treaties they had with the Emperor: and in the end, by Pommeray his Ambassador, he doth capitulate; That the King of England being assailed by the Emperor, he should succor him with twelve ships well appointed and victualled, with fise hundred men at armes, French, and three thousand foot. And C in like case, if the King were invaded within his Realme, the King of England was bound to furnish him the like proportion of shipping, and with six thousand Englishmen, both the one and the other to be entertained at his charge that was assailed. That either of them being assailed, they should stay all Merchants that were subiect to him that did assaile, which should be found within the territories of their obedience, and deliver them to him that was assailed, to redeeme such as had beene seized on by the aggressor, in the beginning of the warre. That neither the one nor the other Prince, should hereafter treat or make alliance with any other Prince, Potentate, or Communalitie without the consent and assocation of eiecher of them.

And they treated likewise of the means how they might best vndertake to resist the Turke D
 (if he did persist to invade Christendome): whereupon their Maiesties concluded an interview at Bologne: the 28 of October they made a new treaty: That to giue a more perfect proofe of their zeale and desire to enlarge Christendome, and to summon other Princes by their example, considering that the Turke, notwithstanding his retreat, had left a good part of his forces in Hungary, they should assemble together by their ioynt forces, an army of fourescore thousand men, whereof there should be tenne thousand horse with artillery requisite for the said Campes. And besides this treaty, these two Kings had many causes of discontent: Our King found himselfe grievously wronged, for that the Pope and the Emperor with their partisans, had newly made a League for the defence of Italy, whereof they had declared Anthony de Leua to be Generall.

The King of England had no lesse cause to complaine of the wrong, hee said the Court of Rome did him, touching the matter of his diuorce, seeking to force him, either to goe in person to Rome, or to send with expresse deputation, men of great account that should stand to the Popes iudgement.

An insolent proceeding in like cases, chanced among soueraine Princes: seeing that such a businesse of that importance, and touching the conscience so neere, did well deserve, that (according to the vsuall custome) they should send Iudges to the place: it being reasonable that the persons should speake personally, and not by their Attorneys: and very vnreasonable that a soueraine Prince, leauing the rule and government of his Estates, should goe and plead his cause at Rome. Moreover, he did complaine vnto the King, of the exactions of the Romane Church vpon the Clergy and people of England, and did instantly require, that they two should send their Ambassadors ioyntly together to the Pope, to summon him to appeare at the next Council, to heare of the extorsions hee did vnto Princes and Christian people.

The King propounded like abuses. The Pope had dissembled with him touching certain tithes which he had granted him to leaue vpon the Clergy: and the French Church complained of him, of the vndue and new exactions, which vnder colour of piety they made

A made at Rome for the expedition of Bulls, by means whereof, all the treasure was daily caried out of his Realme, to the preiudice of the Clergie which grew poore: the Churches were not restored, nor the poore clothed nor fed: their yearly rents were excessive, no equality in them: many officers newly created, which were payed vpon the dispatch and expedition of Bulls, ouer and aboue the iust price which they were wont in former times to pay: the Offices which fell void, were sold to the great benefit and profit of Saint Pe- ter, entreating many Groomes, Chamberlaines, Protonotaries, their seruants, Gardi-ners and others: and for the repairing of Saint Peters Church, a great summe of money was leauied, the which they did afterwards imploy to make warre against the King. Yet B the King would neither wholly allow nor disallow of the King of Englands complaints:
 but for that the Pope had sent him a promise, by the Cardinall of Grandmont, of an en-terview at Nice, or Auignon, after the Emperours returne into Spaine, he requested the King of England to attend the issue of their parle. These griefes of the French Church had beene presented vnto the King in the assembly of the Estates of the Countrey and Duchy of Britany, with many other things, farre from that charity which ought to be in the Church. In the said Estates it was concluded; That Francis the Kings eldest sonne, Dauphin of Viennois, should be acknowledged Duke of Britany: That the eldest Sonne of France should hereafter carry the titles of Dauphin of Viennois, and Duke of Britany: and the said Duchie should for euer be incorporate to the Crowne. So the treaty made by the mariage C betwixt King Charles the eight, and Anne Ducheffe of Britany, and others following, were disannulled in regard of the said Duchie.

As these things passed in England, William of Polsay, Lord of Languey, promised the Germane Princes in the Kings name, That for the affection he bore to the preservation of the priuiledges, rights, and customes of the Empire: if the Emperor (with whom he desired to obserue inuiolably the alliances and treaties he had with him) would in that case employ his forces to their oppression, he would succour them with all his power: so as neither his men nor money should bee employed to the offence of any of his confederates, namely, of the Emperour; but onely to defend the rights and priuiledges of the Empire. A great designe is alwaies shadowed with goodly shewes. Hereupon the Em-perour came to Bolognia, to conferre againe with the Pope. The Kings of France and England, well informed of the Emperours bad disposition, and especially the English, of the Popes to him, by reason of his pretended diuorce: they sent the Cardinals of Tournon and Grandmont, the Popes seruants, that vnder colour to accompany him at this enterview, they might employ their authorities, that nothing might be done to the preiudice of their Maiesties: or at the least, they should giue intelligence of their conclusions. And the said Cardinalls had commission to lay open vnto the Pope, the griefes and complaints of the two Kings, and to summon him to make reparation: if not, they would take order for it. So as his Holinesse might well perceiue, that they two together were not to be contented: & to wish him to consider wisely, of the support and profite E might draw from these two Kings; and what disgrace otherwise in discontenting them, especially the King of England, whose cause the King did no lesse affect then his owne.
 For (said the two Princes) if wee come to demand a generall Councell, and his Holi-nesse doth not grant it, or delays it, wee shall take his delay for a deniall; and calling it without him, we will easily iustifie the fact with other Princes, who producing the like, or greater complaints, would in the end forbid their Subiects to lend or carry any money to Rome.

If his Holinesse (for so did our Francis protest) will proceed by censures against mee and my Realme; and that I be forced to goe to Rome for an absolution, I will passe the Alpes so well accompanied, as his Holinesse shall bee glad to grant it mee. The F scandals of Rome haue already withdrawne most part of Germany and the Cantons from the obedience of the Romane Church. It is to bee feared that if these two mightie Kings seuer themselves for want of Iustice, they shall finde many adherents, and these two together with their open and secret allies, may make such an attempt, as it will be hard to resist. That if his holinesse be disposed to moderate things (especially towards the King of England) there is hope, that at the first enterview, all may bee ordered by mildnesse, before they should proceede to greater bitternesse, by a generall summons from both the Kings.

The Cardinalls meant to win
the Pope.

Thus the King spake vnto those Cardinalls whom he sent to Rome. But we haue elsewhere obserued, that men of the Church doe commonly preferre the Popes respect, before the seruice of such as employ them. These men flea the Ecclie by the tayle, and in stead of following their instructions from point to point, beginning with rigour, and ending with mildnesse, they take a contrary course. They feared (said they in their iustificacion) that his Holinesse holding the Wolfe by the eares, pressed on the one side, sometimes with promises, sometimes with threats by the Emperour: and on the other side, in a manner despairing euer to finde grace or fauour with the King, should in the end cast himselfe into the Emperours armes, and run the same fortune with him. To draw him therefore to the French partie, they offer the Pope in the Kings name, to make him Iudge and Arbitrator of such controuersies and quarrells, as hee had with the Genouois, the which his Maiesty pretended were not contained in his renunciation. And the better to draw him, they renewed (without any speciall Commission) the proposition first made by Pope Leo, and after reuiued by Clement, of the mariage of Henry Duke of Orleans, with Katherine daughter to the Duke of Vrbis. This did greatly please Clement, who then began to hold vp his head, and refused to strike whilst the iron was hot. This match was wonderfull honourable and beneficiall for his Holinesse, and helpt much for the ratifying and support of his house, the which he had in singular regard.

The Emperour did presently discouer, that vpon the coming of these Cardinalls, the Popes affection to him was greatly altered. And vpon the first discouery of this treaty of mariage, he imploies the Lords of Cannes and Granuelle, to breake it, in fauour of Francis Sforza, with the said Duchesse of Vrbis; and to perswade the Pope, that this practice was artificially brought in by the King, to entertaine him onely, but not with any intent to conclude it, considering the great disparitie of their degrees and qualities: and seeing these two Cardinalls (said he) had no sufficient authority touching this alliance, it was an euident prooffe of the fraud. But by meanes of this mariage, the King thought to strengthen his house, and to get new footing in Italy; and the Pope did thereby free himselfe from the feare of a Councell, wherewith he was threatned from France, Germany, and England. While the Cardinalls attend a Commission from his Maiesty to conclude this mariage, the Emperour continued his pursuit, for the assurance and declaration of his league, comprehending the estate of Genoua. And the better to vnite it, he required his confederates to make a tax among them, for the pay of such souldiers as should be fit to entertaine in Italy for the peace and quiet thereof: that the first payment should be presently configned into the hands of a Banker of Genoua, and that the Emperour should not be tied to any contribution, in regard of his great charge to resist the Turkes inuasion, and to prevent the attempts of such as would trouble the common quiet of Italy, whereof there was now great likelihood. By the force of his perswasions, the matter was in a manner concluded. But through the liuely reasons of the French Cardinalls, and the Lord of Velly, Ambassadour for the King, shewing, That the Emperour had no other designe, but to entertaine his army vpon the frontiers of Italy at other mens charges, being ready to assaile the King vpon all occasions without any charge to himselfe: and that without doubt the King (having reason to looke to his affaires) would encounter him with another army on the frontiers of Italy, in the Marquisate of Salusse, or in Dauphiné, which would breed no quiet, but troubles and combustions throughout all Italy (for two Armies being neare, they willingly fall to blowes) they concluded, not to make any configuration, but that every one of the confederates should tax himselfe for his portion (any war chancing in Italy) and should giue a caution for his part, the which did amount to an hundred or six-score thousand crownes a moneth. So the Emperour sent three thousand men out of his army into Spaine, as many likewise to Naples; and the rest he dismissed.

Then came authority from the King to the Cardinalls and his Ambassadour, with an expresse clause for the confirmation of the Mariage. And the Emperour seeing himselfe frustrate of his intent (to make the Pope declare himselfe openly against the King) he imbarcked the 8 of Aprill at Genoua, and sayled towards Spaine: the Pope went towards Rome, whither the aboue-named Cardinalls did accompanie him, alwaies insinuating by the Kings importunity, that the troubles of England might be pacified, before the fall of that great storme which threatned the Church.

But the King of England wearied with the Popes dissembling and delays (whom he then

A then called but Bishop of Rome) vpon the matter of his diuorce, he caused it to be decided by the English Church. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of England, being President: where, by sentence of the said Church, his mariage was declared void, and the dispensation void, as giuen in a case that was not dispensable, & which is not in the Popes power, nor in the Churches: according to this sentence, he left his first mariage, and took to wife Anne Bullen, and in her name did publish an ample treaty, against the authority and preheminences of the Church of Rome, resolute to sequester himselfe wholly, if the Court of Rome did him not iustice. These newes being published, the Emperour grows in choller, threatens to raise all the world against England: takes his Aunts cause in hand, summons the Pope to administer the like iustice to her that was put away, as her cause required: if he doth it not, he protests with an oath to be reuenged. The Colledge of Cardinalls stormes, they enuie the Pope, and all with one voyce demand iustice against the attempts of the King of England, and the Archbishops, hauing taken knowledge of a cause, the deciding whereof belonged to Iudges deputed by his Holinesse: his Holinesse desired to temporize, and to make a more quiet end. He did foresee, that proceeding to condemnation, and hauing no means to execute it really, were a fruitlesse enterprife, and would make his Apostolike Authoritie contemptible, hauing no means to put it in execution without the Emperours assistance: besides, they had a great lett, which was the strict alliance of the most Christian King with the English, who ioyning their mutual forces, of offense and defense, might engage all Christendome in more mortall warres then euer. Notwithstanding in the end (as well to gratifie the Emperour, as his Cardinalls) hee pronounced his censures against the King of England, if within a certaine time he made not reparation of the said attempts. Then he prepared for his interview with the King, notwithstanding all the crosses which the Imperials gaue him, transforming themselves into as many shapcs as Proteus, to draw him from this resolution: all which are to be read in the Originalls.

Nice had been appointed for this effect: the Duke of Sauoy had freely offered it at the Popes request, holding himselfe happie (said he) that so holy a worke should be treated of in his country. And in truth it was his best course. The Pope did affect this place, that he might by this meanes reconcile the Duke vnto the King, who for many respects (as wee shall note hereafter) was discontented with him. But the Emperour forgetting nothing which he thought might serue to breake off this interview, gaue him such goodly reasons, as afterwards he let men vnderstand, that this assembly was nothing pleasing vnto him. Marfeilles supplied the defect of Nice. Patience being moued (saith the Prouerbe) turns into fury. If the King to this time had many motives of discontent, now is hee prick to the quicke, which will soone draw him to reuenge. The vnusl death of the Seigneur of Merueille, who was a Gentleman of Milan, bred vp in Court, since King Lewis the 12, one of the Quirries, and now Ambassadour for the King with Sforza Duke of Milan, yet secretly, hauing besides his instructions and letters of credit, a priuate letter directed to the Duke, in recommendation of some businesse for the said Meruelles: to the end, that if the Emperour should grow iealous of the Duke, he might by meanes of the said letters, iustifie his being there, not in quality of an Ambassadour, but onely for his owne priuate affaires. It chanced the first of Iuly, that Meruelles, accompanying the Duke through the Citie, a Gentleman Milanois of the house of Castiglion (hauing either by chance or of purpose pickt a quarrell) demanded of one of Meruelles seruants, to whom hee belonged? He answered, I serue the Lord of Meruelles of France, who is there. Nay (replied Castiglion) Meruelles of the gallows: which was a very ignominious word. Another following his Lord, takes hold of this speech, and in the end reproacheth the Milanois: as hauing spoken ill against such a personage: the Milanois denies it: the lye is giuen often. On the other side, and the French-man offers to maintaine it with his Sword. Castiglion happily disdainig a man of baser quality then himselfe, retires; two of his seruants draw their swords, but they are parted. Afterwards Castiglion gathers together ten or twelue Rustians, with Harquebuzes and Pertuisans: hee passeth and repasseth often before Meruelles lodging: one cuning he meets five or six of his seruants, offers them violence, but they retire: Meruelles complains to the Capitaine of the Iustice, and intreats him to take order, being loth to seeke reuenge of their wrongs, or that they should continue to wrong them.

The

The worthy execution of Merveilles.

The Capitaine makes no account thereof. Castilian continues his course, and sets againe vpon Merveilles servants: but the first feare had made them wise, they defend themselves, kill him, and put his followers to flight. The next day being the fourth of July, the Capitaine goes in the morning, to take an Inuentorie of Merveilles goods, puts him into prison, and all his servants he could finde: gives the strapado to one about foure score yeares old, being deafe for very age, to wrect some confession from him against his master: he suffers not any of his friends to speake with him, or to see him: teares in pieces, disdainfully to reade the iustificacions (which according to the custome of Milan comes of his friends had presented him in writing:) and the Sunday following, after midnight, first informed of the Dukes pleasure, he cuts off his head in prison, and causeth his body to be cast vpon the Merchants meeting place. A horrible and insolent proceeding against so notable a person, being publike, sacred, and inuiolable! If it shall be lawfull so to violate the law of nations, what safety shall Ambassadors find with them to whom they are sent?

The King demands satisfaction of this wrong of the Duke: he writes to the Emperor and to all Princes and Potentates of Christendome; as hauing all a priuate interest in this publike iniurie. The Duke excuseth himselfe by Francis Tauerne his Chancellor, Nephew to the said Merveilles, who alledgeth, that the Duke his master did neuer acknowledge Merveilles to haue the place, nor to hold the ranke of an Ambassadour: but as a priuate man, his vassall and subiect, he had suffered iustice to be done, for the murder committed C on the person of one of the ordinarie Gentlemen of his house. That Merveilles was a man of a vicious conuersion, seditious, scandalous, a concealer of murderers and conspirators against the life of the Duke his Master, who for these causes had often let him vnderstand that his stay at Milan was not pleasing vnto him.

An vnkinde Nephew (he was sonne to Merveilles Sister) and a bad Aduocate in a bad cause. Had not Sforza beloyed himselfe in a letter of his owne, dated the seuenth of December 1532, whereof the King had the Originall, where he did gine him to vnderstand, that his comming from the most Christian King, (to whom he was, and desired to be a most humble seruant) was very pleasing vnto him, and that for many respects, hee should alwayes haue bene welcome to Milan? And could Tauerne be ignorant of Merveilles D qualitie, seeing that he himselfe had procured this charge for his Vncle, being at Fontainebleau, and propounded this meanes of priuate recommendation to the Duke, to seruise a shadow against the Emperours ialousies? Moreouer, he knew his Vncle had letters of credit to the Duke, and his instructions signed with the Kings hand. But the hastie proceeding from Friday to Sunday following, the execution done by night and without the peoples priuitee (who perchance would tumultuously haue opposed, fearing to incur the reuenge, which without doubt the King would take) doe they not plainly discouer, that the fact was not excusable, nor to be iustified?

The Emperour made answer to the Ambassador de Velly that Merveilles had well deserved death, not being acknowledged for an Ambassador, but for a priuate Gentleman, E subiect to the Duke, and following his owne priuate affaires; being nothing moued, when as Velly presented him the Dukes letters vnto the King for his allowance: whereby it appeared what place Merveilles held with the Duke. Thus seeing himselfe more assured of Sforza, he sent into Flanders for his Neece, the yongest daughter of Christienne King of Denmarke, according to the promise which had ben made him at Placentia. About this time the Pope made his entrie at Marfeilles in great pompe, set vpon a yong Assie: he was carried in a high chaire vpon two mens shoulders, followed by his Cardinals, and the Duchesse of Vrbin apart, accompanied with a great number of Ladies and Gentlemen. There was nothing ready for a Councell, which the Princes of Germanie did solicit with great vehemency: neither was there any intent of reformation. But expecting the opportunitie of this generall Conuocation, a Bull was sent forth to stay the course of religion, F which passing from Germanie into Swisserland, and from thence into France, did greatly increase. Then the marriage betwixt the Duke of Orleanes, and Katherine de Medicis Duchesse of Vrbin, was consummated by Clement the 7 her Vncle: who in the end of their parle, at the Kings request, created foure Cardinals; the Cardinal of Veneur, Bishop of Lizeux, and chiefe Almoner to the King, and one of those three Houses, Chastillon, Chambré, and Guiry. This done, the Pope imbarke for Rome the twentieth of November,

A uember, and the King rooke his way to Auignon. Here the King resolved in his priue C Council vpon a petition made vnto him by Christopher, sonne to the Duke of Wirtemberg, both in his owne name, and his fathers, spoiled of their estates seuentene yeares since, by the Emperour Charles, and Ferdinand his brother: as also by Lewis and William Dukes of Bauaria his Vncles. The mother of Christopher, was daughter of a sister to Maximilian, Grandfather to the said Emperour, and King of Romanes, and the consummation of the marriage of Eleanor their sister with his Maiestie gaue the father and the sonne hope, that the King in fauour of this alliance, interposing his authoritie for them that were spoiled, should either procure restitution of Ferdinand for these Dukes, B or refusing Iustice, to purchase him the hatred of all Germanie, which in the end might by open force dispossesse him of the Duchie of Wirtemberg, and of the name of King of Romanes. The King did greatly desire to see these Dukes restored to their estates, and to that end would willingly haue opened his purse, to weaken the Emperours and his brothers forces, and by the same meanes, to confirme the amities which he had purchased in Germanie, and to procure new, requiring the Emperour, who sought by all meanes to take from the King his ancient alliances. But hee fought to colour the protection of these afflicted Princes in such sort, as no man might iustly challenge him to haue broken the treatie of Cambray. He therefore sent the Lord of Langey, with commission to doe for these Dukes whatsoever was in his power, not directly contradicting the conventions: and to conclude, the confiscation of an hundred thousand Crownes, into the hands C of the Dukes of Bauaria, with a sufficient bond to his Maiestie: reseruing now* hindring this clause, That his money should not be employed to the inuasion of any one, but only for the defence of the ancient customes and priuiledges of the Empire. The publike and priuate perswasions of Langey, were of such efficacie, as that ancient and great league of Suene (which had continued threescore and ten yeares, to the benefit of the house of Austria) was disannulled. But for that the re-integration of these Dukes, could not bee made but by armes, they couered it with this expedient: That the Duke of Wirtemberg should sell the County of Montbeliard (whereof he was Lord) vnto the King, for sixscore thousand Crownes, vpon condition that he might redeeme it: which money he might employ to his use, D either in peace or warre, without any breach on the Kings part, to the Articles of Cambray. So the Lantgrau of Hessen, chiefe of this present league, and the dukes of Bauaria and Wirtemberg, with their allies, went suddenly to field with an armie, before the Emperour or his brother could crosse their attempts, restoring them that were spoiled, to the possession of their Duchy: and soone after they repayed the Kings money, within thirty or fortie thousand crownes, for the which the dukes of Bauaria were answerable: and the Countie of Montbeliard was restored vnto them. Let vs now see what Catastrophe the Popes rash E censure, giuen against Henry King of England shall cause. Henry was wonderfully incensed against the Apostolick See, by reason of the iniustice (hee said) was done him: in that they had refused to send him Commissioners to take knowledge of his cause, and of the contempt done to his authority, in that they would disdainfully force him to abandon his Realme, and appeare personally at Rome. Notwithstanding, by the perswasions of John de Bellay Bishop of Paris, (whom the King had sent vnto him, presently after his interview with the Pope) he granted, that in case the Pope would surcease from the said sentence, vntill he had sent Iudges to be heard, that he would likewise surcease from his intention, to withdraw himselfe wholly from the obedience of Rome. The Bishop offers himselfe to go to Rome to that end. Henry intreats him, and assures him, that hauing obtained his demand, he will giue him authoritie presently, to confirme what hee had yielded vnto. The matter was not yet desperate, but the Consistorie of Rome gaue so short a time to haue an answer from the King of England, as the Poste came short two dayes at his returne. The terme expired, they proceed hastily to the confirmation of the curses and censures, notwithstanding the Bishops instance, to obtaine six dayes delay: seeing the King of England had wauered six yeares before he fell. Two dayes were scarce past after the prefixed time; but the Poste arriued with authoritie & declarations from England, the which did greatly amaze those hasty Cardinals, who afterwards could find no meanes to amend that which they had married. The matter (saith the originall) was so basted, as that which could not be finished in three Consistories, was done in one. This indignitie done to the King of England, and the small respect they had to his Maiestie, caused both him and Fff his his Realme to shake off the yooke of the Romane obedience, declaring himselfe immediatly vnder God, supreme head of the Church of England.

In the meane time, the King not able to get by lustice, a reparation of the vnworthy death of his Ambassador at Milan, he studied to haue his reuenge by armes. To this end, following the example of the Romanes, he erected in euery Prouince of his Realme, a Legion of six thousand foot, vnder the command of six Gentlemen, who for euery thousand should haue two Lieutenants, and vnder euery ensigne five hundred men, who in time of peace, should once a yeare make a generall muster, and the captaines should know their names and surnames, with the dwellings of euery one, to haue them ready at all commands. Then he sent William Earle of Furstemburg, into Germany, to make a leaue of twenty ensignes of Lansquenets, and demanded passage of the Duke of Sauoy, through his country, to be reuenged of the wrong done him by the Duke of Milan. The Sauoicene refused it, which causeth our Francis to demand the portion of Louise of Sauoy his mother, sister to the said Duke, children to Philip Duke of Sauoy. Philip had to his first wifes daughter of Bourbon, by whom he had Philibert Duke of Sauoy, and Louise the Kings mother. Then he had to his second wife, a daughter of Ponshieure, by whom he had Charles, who is now in question, and the Earle of Geneva, afterwards duke of Nemours. Philibert was dead without children, and therefore the King challenged a good portion in the succession of Sauoy, his mother comming of the first marriage, and sole heire to the said Philibert. But the Kings deputies not able to draw any reason from Charles, vnder to his Maicestie, he must seeke that by force, which he could not get by a friendly and gentle composition.

The Kings first stratagem, was to bring a part of Rence de Ceres company into Geneva, to succour them against Charles, who besieged it. The second was to stirre vpon the Bernois, allies and neighbours to Geneva, who taking the towne into their protection, went to field with ten or twelue thousand men, made the Duke retire, spoiled him of a good part of the lands that were vnder his obedience, chased away the Bishop of Lansanna, and ioyning it to their iurisdiction, they remaine still in possession thereof. The Emperor returned then from his victory of Tunis against Barbarossa, and seeming desirous to make a more stricker league with the King, hee offered him a pension of a hundred thousand crowns a yeare, out of the Duchie of Milan, for any one of his children, whom he should name: he treated the marriages of the Daulphin with the Infant of Portugall, daughter to Queene Eleonor, and of the duke of Angouleme, with such a one as the King should well like of (it seemed that he meant the Infant of Spaine) to the end that by these new bonds of conjunction, tying their friendships more firmly, they might ioynly participate (said he) in the honour and profit of the mighty conquests, they should make vpon Greece.

All this was but cunning. The Emperor was tired, & his forces were wasted by the toiles of warre, and the great heat they had endured. And the King being ready with a fresh and mighty army, threatened the Duchies of Sauoy & Milan: he must therefore busie him with some bait, and at the least stay the exploits of his forces. The death of Francis Sforza, presents a new occasion. By this death the Emperor pretends to be freed of that bond, & that he might dispose of this Duchy at his pleasure. The captaines promise to hold their places to the Emperor. The Emperor giues hope, not onely to dispose of the said Duchy to the Kings liking, but also to conclude of a generall warre against the Turk: in the which he offered to impart with the King, the good or euill that should grow thereby. & of the faith and reunion of the Church, namely for the reducing of Germany and England, to the generall belief of Christians, and of a generall peace in Christendome. In the meane time he prepared for warre, hee caused Cont Nassau to make a great leauiy in Germany, and called backe Ferdinand Consigiuo into Italy, with his Spaniards which remained in Sicilia.

Thus all the negotiations and practices of these two great Princes, gaue sufficient signes of open warre: there wanted nothing but a iust occasion for either of them to blame his companion, and to lay vpon him the causes of the first inuasion. The Emperor required moreouer, that for the quiet of Italy, the King should desist from the action of Genoua: That excluding the D. of Orleans, from the estate and Duchy of Milan (the which the King demanded for his second sonne, according to the treaty made with the Pope at Marceilles) the duke of Angouleme, for that he was farthest from the crowne, should be inuested.

A That the King should send him the Duke of Orleans, to assist him at the conquest of Alger which he pretended. The King desired greatly to maintaine true friendship with him, and to vnic it by as strong alliances as the Emperour offered, that the greatneesse of the one might not breed any ialousie in the other. As for the action of Genoua, hee was content to surcease that controuersie, vntill it might be decided by good and lawfull means, to renounce for cuer his pretensions to Naples, and to cause the Duke of Orleans to yield vp his quarrell to Florence and Vrbin, with such securitie as the Emperour should require: so as his second sonne might be inuested in Milan. Hee promised the Pope (which was Alexander Farnese, vnder the name of Paul the third, successor of Clement the seuenth) summoning all Princes to that end, to employ his forces, to make Germanie and England obey the sentence and decree of the Church, and to employ himselfe in fauour of the said Emperour, to the States and Princes of the Empire, that they should ioynly receiue his brother Ferdinand, for the true and lawfull King of Romanes. Hee offered to succour the Emperour in his holy warre with a certaine number of gallies, and men entertained, promising to accompanie him the yeere following, in the voyage of Constantinople, with all his forces.

But to exclude the Duke of Orleans from the inheritance of his Ancestors, which his eldest brother did willingly yield vnto him, in fauour of his marriage, to instill his youngest sonne, was it not to sow dissention, and cause warre, betwixt them whom he desired to breed vp in peace and brotherly loue? And to what end did the Emperour demand the Duke of Orleans, but rather to hold him in manner of an hostage, then to make any shew of loue or trust? On the other side, to give hope, that hee would compound with the King touching Milan, and to vrge this claue vehemently, that all should be managed without the Popes priuie, who no doubt would seeke all means to crosse it (said the Emperour) if hee should vnderstand they had treated without imparting it vnto him, and notwithstanding to giue intelligence to the Court of Rome, by Andrew Doria, and to assure him, that although he gaue care to the Kings Ministers, yet would he not conclude any thing without the aduice and consent of his Holinesse: was not this a corrupt proceeding, seeking to breed a ialousie and distrust betwixt the Pope and his Maicestie?

D The King (wearing with these long dissimulations and delays, without effect) sent the Lord of Beauuais vnto Venice, to make a new league with the Senate, and the King of England sent the Bishop of Winchester to the same effect. The Emperour had some intelligence thereof, and to crosse the Kings designs, hee sent Du Prat, a Gentleman of his house, to make a new leaue of Lansquenets, and Andrew Doria to Genoua, to prepare his armie by sea, but vnder colour of his enterprize of Alger. Who would not then iudge, but in stead of a confirmation of peace and loue, all things tended to open warre? Nothing could detain these inuincible warriors, but that the Emperour, after so great a dissipation of his forces, could not so suddenly repaire his armie, and the King making a scruple to be the first assailable, would not incur the blame, to haue broken the treatie of Cambray. But without breach thereof, many motives of discontent, had long incensed him against the Duke of Sauoy. The Jewels which the Duke had engaged, to borrow money for the Duke of Bourbon, and to fauour his rebellion against the King, the Letters of congratulation, he had written for his taking at Pavia, his pursuit to withdraw the Suisses from the alliance of France, the purchase of the county of Asti, his refusal to lend Nice for the enterueiw of Pope Clement and his Maicestie, and to giue him passage against Sforza, the detention of his Mothers inheritance, which the King could not by any gentle means draw his vncle to restore.

F This must be tried by the sword. The King therfore sent Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Saint Paul, who before the Duke could oppose his forces, conquered all Sauoy, except Montmelian, where Francis of Charamont a Neapolitane commanded, who wanting victuals, and without hope of succours, in the end yielded vp the place, to depart with baggage, and afterwards contemned by the Duke, hee followed the victors fortune, and in the end did good seruice to the Crowne. Then the Emperour granted (by the Lord of Cannes and Granuelles) the Duchy of Milan to the Duke of Orleans. But when the securitie and conditions of his instatement came to be demanded, they made answer to the Ambassador of Vellu, that it was sufficient for that time to haue granted the principall, the rest should be treated of with Philip Chabot Earle of Bufançois, Admirall of France, who should presently arise (they supposed hee should first make a voyage without any forces) and that they must keepe this conclusion secret from the knowledge of his Holinesse. All this discovered plainly, that it was a trick of their ordinarie craft and dissembling, to lull the King asleepe in the beginning of his course.

The Emperour
hand.

At the same instant, the King hath newes, sufficient to giue him a certaine impression of the Emperours designs, that the Pope had bene ducely aduertised by the Emperours ministers, of all these practices, which he would haue secretly managed: that the Venetians, at the vrgent request of the Emperour, were entred into a defensue league for the Duchy of Milan, in fauour of any one he should inuest: that he offered great matters to the King of England, to draw him to his deuotion: that Du Prat passing by Milan, had deliuered speeches quite contrarie to the hopes and promises which the Emperour had giuen: and that in Flanders he had made great preparation for warre. That the Emperour tooke vpon him the protection of the Duke of Sauoy. And for the sixth point, the preparations made by Andrew Doris. It was therefore resolved, to proceed in Sauoy and farther, without breaking off (on his part) this negotiation with the Emperour.

armie.

To this end, the King sent (for his Lieutenant generall) the Earle of Bufançois Admirall of France, with 500 Launces: whereof the feuerall Captaines were James Galiat, Master of the horse, and master of the Ordnance of France: Robert Steward Marshall of France, Rene of Montican, Francis, Marquis of Salusses, Claude of Annebault, Anthony C Lord of Montecat, Iohn Eltonneulle Lord of Villebon, Prouost of Paris, Gabriel d'Allegre, Charles Tiercelin Lord of Roche du Maine, and Iohn Paul de Cere. A thousand light-horse, vnder the command of the Lords of Elfe, Terme Aulstin and Verets of Sauoy. Twelue thousand of his Legionary men, that is, 2000 Picards, commanded by Michel of Brabançon Lord of Cany, and Anthony of Mailly Lord of Auchy. Two thousand Normans, vnder the Captaines La Sale, and Saint Aubin the Hermit. Two thousand Champanois, led by Iohn d'Anglere, Lord of Tour, and by the Lord of Quinly. A thousand of Languedoc, vnder their Knight d'Ambres. Four thousand out of Dauphiné, vnder the Lord of Brecheux, and others. And a thousand vnder the Lord of Forges, the Kings ordinarie Cup-bearer, of all which bands Rene of Montican was Colonel: six thousand Lanquenets, led by William Earle of Furstemberg: two thousand French, not Legionaries led by their Captaines Lartigue-Dieu, Blanche, Anguer and Wartis a Nauarrois. Two thousand Italians, vnder the command of Marc Anthony of Cusan, a Gentleman Milanois, and a thousand vnder Captaine Christopher Guaco, eight hundred Pioners, six hundred and fourescore horse for Artillery, and the charge thereof appointed to be vnder the government of Claude of Concis Lord of Bury.

Count Philip Torneil, & Iohn Iagues de Medicis Marquis of Marignan, marched before, to stop the passage of Suze, but Annebault aduancing with the troopes of Dauphiné, prevented them with speed, chased them before him, from lodging to lodging, and at the first summons, puts into the Kings hands the townes of Turin and Chiuaus. Don Laurence Emmanuel, Iohn Iagues de Medicis, and Iohn Baptista Castaldo, camped vpon the Riuer of Douaire. The French and Lanquenets, impatient to attend the making of a bridge, wade through the water euen vnto the breasts, repulse the Imperials, and make them retire towards Verceil. Agallant Legionary (to whom the Historie ought his name) swimming through the Riuer, brought away a boat in despite of the enemies shot, for the building of a bridge. The Admirall, to encourage the rest, according to the Kings command, caused a gold-ring to be giuen him, in view of the whole armie.

The Emperour was vpon termes of his departure from Naples, to make his entry into Rome, when as these happy beginnings made him to renew the treaties of an accord: but with such slow proceeding, as a man might easily iudge, that his onely intent was, to stay the King in his course, labouring to entertaine him with doubts, hopes, and delays. In the meane time, he sollicitates the Pope to declare himselfe on his partie, he assured the Duke of Sauoy, to cause all he had lost to be soone restored to him againe, hee hastened the leauy of his Lanquenets, causeth his horsemen to aduance, drawes Artillery and Munition out of Imperiall townes, makes them to march towards Italy, protests againe to the Pope, that hee would neuer yeeld Milan to the King, nor suffer him to possesse one foot of land in Italy: he solliciteth the Court of Rome, the Senate of Venice, and all other Potentates

A tates of Italy, to oppose against the inuesting of any stranger in the Duchy of Milan. These were vehement presumptions, to shew, that the Emperour meant not to treat but armed, which caused the King to command his Admirall to proceed in his first course, (hee had temporized by his Maiesties commandement, attending the issue of this new parle) and to march against Verceil: and if hee encountered his enemies with equalitye, to fight with them. There were three thousand men to defend Verceil, and foure miles aboue, Anthony de Lena camped with about fixe hundred horse, and twelue thousand foot, not as Lieutenant to the Emperour, but as Capaine General for the league of Italy, cutting off the passage to Caguin, and Hamball Consagua, Guy Earle of B Rangen, and some other pensioners to the King, who had brought for his seruice, fixe hundred light-horse, choise-men, bred vp in the former warres, and six thousand foot. The Admirall therefore, to be assured of Anthony de Lena, demands free passage for the fore-said pensioners. I will (answered Lena) giue them assurance, so as they come for the league of Italy. A sufficient answer to begin the warre, whereof the King would by no means be the first author.

The Emperour
entry into Naples.

During this time, the Emperour made his entrie into Rome. An entry, which by the ruine (amongst other buildings) of that ancient temple of peace, gaue the most curious, occasion to iudge that his entrie was not with an intent to confirme a peace, as hee gaue hope by his speeches; but contrariwise, to deface all memorie thereof. C His actions did afterwards confirme many in this opinion; for after Charles his first parle with the Pope, the Bishop of Malton and Velly, Ambassadors for France, the one to the Pope, the other to the Emperour, learned from the Popes owne mouth (who said hee would remaine a Neuter, as a common father to maintaine Iustice, and yet oppose against the obstinacie of him that would not yeeld to reason) that the Emperour would neuer condescend, to giue Milan to the Duke of Orleance. This was the chiefe point, and either partie growing obstinate vpon the effect of this clause, what accord could be expected? This holy father was little affected to the house of Medicis, and therefore would hardly haue bene pleased, to see a daughter of that house Du-chesse of Milan. To conclude, the Emperour did submit his instalmnt to the Popes liking: and the Pope did promise verbally, to yeeld vnto it, if the Emperour would consent, yet did hee freely shew, that the Emperour encreanted this practice of purpose to abuse the King, whilst that he should fortifie himselfe with alliances, men, and money, and yet (as it were) giuing scope to both parties: I thinke (said the Pope to the French Ambassadors, replying that this condition sayling, the King their Master would neuer come to any conclusion) that things cannot passe, without a breach, for that the Emperour neither will, nor can giue Milan, without the consent of some, who in my opinion will neuer yeeld.

These were the Venetians, whom the Emperour did coldly intreat to like of this clause, but in effect to contradict it: and all in generall, would haue no D. of Milan, who might at any time, vntie this goodly estate to the Crowne of France: for (said they) the duke of Angoulesme being inuested in the Duchy of Milan, although he depends on the King his father: yet marrying one of the Emperours Neeces, (he offered him the widow of Sforza) his wife would be of the Emperours faction, and so matters should remaine in suspense, whereas the Duke of Orleance, besides many other obstacles, must bee onely at the King his fathers deuotion: and as husband to the Nece of Pope Leo, and of Clement, would not cease to pretend an interest in the estates of Florence and Vrbin, and consequently, by new pretended quarrels, trouble the quiet of Italy.

In the end, the Emperour in a speech made to the Pope, in the presence of all the Cardinals, and many Ambassadors, as well to shew (said he) his good meaning, and how much he desired the peace of Christendome, as to be cleared hereafter, before God and men, he offered againe three conditions to the King. The first to giue the Duchy of Milan to one of his children, so as thereby he might confirme a good and durable peace, maintaining notwithstanding that it could not be, so long as the King continued obstinate in fauour of the Duke of Orleance. The second was, to fight with the King, hand to hand with like armes, and hostages, in an Island vpon a bridge or boate, or in any other place of safety, to avoid greater effusion of blood, being reasonable that they, by whom such great combusions did grow, should decide their quarrels in person.

A Spanish
bragge.The Emperours
protestation.

But vpon condition, that the victor should giue his forces to the holy Father, to maintaine the celebration of a Councell, to reduce them that were rebelled and sequestred from the Church, and to the suppression of Infidels; and the vanquished should assist the victor with all his power. Requiring moreover, that this combat being accepted, the King should pwayne the Duchie of Bourgongne, and the Emperour that of Milan, both to be adjudged to the victor. The third was, a protestation neuer to take armes, but forced, foregoing that the warre would be so cruell, as the victory would be of small profit to the victor, and should but open a passage to the common enemy of our faith. And to conclude, he added, that what he had propounded touching a Peace, proceeded not from any feare, hauing neuer sought peace in losse, but could well giue it to them that were vanquished. But contrariwise, three good and iust reasons gaue him an assured hope of victory. That he was not the beginner of this warre. That the King had begunne it in a season of great aduantage for the Emperour. That hee found his Subiects, Captaines, and Souldiers so well disposed, as if the Kings were like vnto them, hee would craue mercy with his hands and feet bound. The second article of the three, and the last, being but bragges, were by the Ambassadors (as shall be noted hereafter) concealed from the King. The Pope requested them, that without prejudice to the King, they should suppress what might incense his Maiestie, adding thereunto the explication; which the Emperour himselfe did afterwards make of his words, at the request of the French Ambassadors (desirous to know if the Emperour had any meaning thereby, to charge the King to haue done C any thing prejudiciall to his honour, or if his intention were to challenge him) he publicly declared: that what he had spoken, was but by way of aduice and proposition, as being more fit, and of lesse inconuenience, than to decide it betwixt them two, by fighting for their quarrels, to the mercy of Armes, to decide it betwixt them two, with the perill of their owne bloods: not meaning in any sort to tax the King, whom hee knew to be a great Prince both in courage and person, much lesse to defie him, and in the presence of his holinesse, without whose permission hee would not attempt such an action. So as the King answering onely to those Articles whereof hee was aduertised, failed in these.

The Emperour hauing thus published his protestation, tooke his leaue of the Pope, who D displeased in shew of the neere breach of Peace, resolved to bee a Neuter, not assisting either party with counsell or fauour concerning the warre. In the meane time the Admirall (hauing expresse commandement from the King, and afterwards re-iterated by John Cardinall of Lorraine (sent by his Maiestie to the Emperour) not to attempt any thing whereby the Imperials might frame any iust complaint) had retired his armie towards Saint Germaine, with an intent to assure himselfe of the towne of Yuree, and of all the valley towards the Suisses, to receiue men for the Kings seruice, if they should come to open warre, and to succour Turin when need should require.

But hauing intelligence of the Emperours care to increase his force, and that Anthony de Leua was resolved to passe into Alsian, to cut off his victuals behinde, he sent Monpe- E sat with two hundred men at Armes, foure thousand French foot, and eight hundred Italians, to seize vpon Fossan, Vignon, Saullian, Cony, Mont-deuis and other townes thereabouts: And to prouide for the fortification of Turin, he sent Stephen Colonne with a hundred men at armes, and foure thousand foot. From words in the end they fall to blowes. The Emperour hitherto sed vs with good words, now he discouers himselfe, and to make an open declaration of warre, he makes three armies to assaile at one instant, the Prouinces of Picardie, Prouence and Champagne. To crosse him, the King dispatcheth foureteen, or fiftene thousand of those men which he had in Piedmont, to fortifie those places which he held beyond the Alpes, and calls backe his Admirall, to the end hee might lay all the blame of this inuasion vpon the Emperour. Considering moreover, that the Admirall (hauing placed his garisons) had bene too weak in field, hee sent Commissions, with great summes of money to Charles of Bourbon, Duke of Vendosme, Gouverneur of Picardie; Grandfather to the most Christian and victorious King last deceased, and to Claude of Lorraine, Duke of Guise, Gouverneur of Champagne, brother-in-law to the said Duke, to leaue sixteene thousand aduenturers, to divide them into frontier townes, and to prouide for the victualing, and fortifications thereof. At Marseils hee placed Anthony of Rocheaucault, Lord of Barbezieu. In Dauphine, John Lord of Humieres. In Gui- enne,

A enne, Henry of Albret King of Nauarre, for his Lieutenants and Gouvernours in the said Prouinces. And himselfe (resolute to oppose against the enemy some fortified places vpon the frontier, to make him to consume time, men, munition, victuals and money, in the siege and battery thereof) assembled the rest of his forces nere to his owne person. The Admirall retiring out of Piedmont, left Claude Lord of Annebault to command within Turin, as the Kings Lieutenant, with an hundred men at armes, and three hundred light-horse, led by the Lords of Auflun, Termes and Esse foure thousand five hundred foot, vnder the Ensignes of the Lords of Auchy, Cony, Sale, Quincy, Lartigue, Dieu, Blanche & Anguar, and two thousand Italians, vnder the charge of Marke Anthony of Cusan, of all which E footmen, Charles of Coucis, Lord of Bury was head and Colonell generall, and the rest of the Army Marquis of Salusses commanded.

This was to giue the purse to keepe to the veriest thiefe, but his trechery was yet couered with a great shew of hypocrisie. He had long determined to reuolt. Feare and hope moued him thereunto; feare, to lose his estate; hope, to be fauoured by the Emperour, in the cause he pretended to the Marquisate of Montferrat. Moreover, he was a man curious to know what was to come, and did superstitiously beleue Soothsayers, who had foretold him, that the Emperour should this yeare dispossesse the King of his Realme. The first act of his treason appeared in this, that the enemy being nere, and strong, he said hee had neither order nor means to fortifie any place in time, or to make it tenable, but that of C Turin, and that to put in more men then those that were, were to lose them wilfully. The second was, when as the Lords of Montferrat, Roche du Maine, Villebon, the Knight of Ambres, Saint Aubin, the Earle of Pontremy, and other Captaines, were resolved to attend the enemy in some place of importance, before he came to Turin, and had concluded to put themselves into Fossan, after they had receiued commandement to hold Fossan or Cony onely for fiftene dayes, to keepe the Imperials occupied; he discouered this designe to Anthony de Leua, aduising him to come thither with speed, promising to deliuer into his hands both the towne and men that were in it: and in stead of sending to Fossan the meale, a Culuerin, three Cannons, powder and bullets, which he had drawne out of Cony, he conueyed thither but one Cannon, a Culuerin, five barrels of powder, and some D bullets, but of another size; he put all the rest into his house at Raul, and retired the night following.

of Salusses.

A horrible treason: he had bene brought vp with the King from his infancy, well maintained during the life of the Marquis Michael Anthony his brother, and honoured with the Order of Saint Michael. And which is more, his Marquisate hauing bene adjudged vnto the King for the treason and rebellion of John Leua, the eldest of the House after the decease of Michael, the King had not onely inuested him, but also giuen him freely out of the conquest of Sauoy, to the number of seuentene townes, the flower of Piedmont, amounting to more in reuennue then the Marquisate, amongst the which, Saullian, Cony, Fossan, Caullimont, Mont-Deuis, and others, which he pretended to be ancient E appurtenances of the said Marquisate.

According to the aduice of Francis of Salusses, Anthony de Leua, leauing at Turin (which he had beleaguered) ten thousand men, to continue the siege, came and camped before Fossan the twelfth day of Iune: makes his approaches, beginnes his trenches, many of the assailants lose their liues, few of the besieged. The third day, the Cannon playes, but slowly. The Marquis assured them, that shewing themselves before one gate, the besieged would goe forth at another: they goe forth indeed, but not like men that fled. The Baron of Castelpers, Lieutenant to Montferrat, led the horse, Warri the foot. The Imperial Lanquenets were lodged somewhat farre from blowes, and therefore their guards were but weak. Warri doth charge them, and at the first giues them a great checke, Castelpers E tries, and re-enforce the alarme. Anthony de Leua sends a good number of Spaniards to cut off our men in their retreat, and they whom hee had appointed to guard the trenches, seeing euery one runne to the alarme, would likewise haue their share in it. Saint Pierre Corse appointed with Villebon to guard the Bastion newly begun, within the towne, perceiving the trenches vnfurnished, issue forth with some Champanois and Normans, kill five and twenty or thirty men, and puts the rest to flight. Anthony de Leua sends the rest of his men which remained, to second them, and himselfe being old and full of the gout, is caried forth of his lodging to saue himselfe, they follow him, but those which carried caried him, set him in the come, where the height of the cares couered him from such as A sought him.

It is a rashnesse, yea in the greatest Capitaines, to contemne an enemy. Anthony de Leua building vpon the hope which the Marquis had giuen them, left the besieged a gate free, thinking they would retire to Cony. But this was a refreshing vnto them, for of seuen Wells which they had in the town, fiue were dried vp in two daies. Anthony therefore perswaded, that the besieged attended some more honest excuse and colour for their retreat, he plants foure Cannons in battery, and makes a breach for twenty men in front. Fossan had no ditchs, so as the Imperials might more easily assaile, then the French could defend the wals. But Anthony would reuerse his Spaniards for some better enterprise: they B were old Souldiers, and the whole hope of his army. The Italians would not march vnlesse they were paid: and the Germanes (who held themselves of no lesse reputation then the Spaniards) would not hazard themselves alone. So the breach continues twelue daies in this sort, giuing them leisure to repaire it, and to make a trench within, and a rampier well flanked.

The time the King had appointed, was now expired: they had no wine nor meale, but some come, and no mils, and the Marquis had maliciously sent away the workmen they had to make any. Moreouer, the King commanded them not to hold it so long, as very necessity should force them to accepta dishonorable composition. But it was a point of honor for the one to demand, and for the other to giue a composition. In the end, the C griefe which Anthony de Leua conceiued, to spend the time before a paltry hens-roost, which might haue bene better employed, and the great desire those within the towne had to doe the King good seruice in affaires of better importance, made them to enter into capitulation: whereby at the end of the month they departed with their armes and Ensignes dispaied, leaving nothing in the towne but the artillery, munition, and their great horses, which were aboue fixtene handfulls and foure fingers high, except twelue, at the choice of the Capitaines, and came to refresh and to horse themselves anew at Marcellles, honored by the King with three months pay, besides that which was due. But the enemy had small profit by their horses, for they had filled them before with new come, so as when they came to water them, most of them burst with drinking.

Let vs here obserue some other Spanish brags, but boldly encountered by a French liberty of speech. Eight daies after the capitulation was signed, the Emperour came to visit Anthony de Leua's campe, accompanied with the Dukes of Sauoy, Alua, Bauaria and Brunswicke, the Princes of Salerne and Bisignan, the Marquis of Guast, and many others: hee caused his army to be put in battell, and finds it goodly and pleasing to his mind: hee calls Roche du Maine, la Palisse (the onely sonne of the Marshall of Chabannes deceased) and After (the onely sonne of the master of the Kings horse) who remained for hostages of the composition: hee embraceth la Roche courteously, whom he had heard reputed to be a gallant Gentleman, causeth him to couer his head, by reason of the heat of the Sunne: and sayes, That to doe him a pleasure, he will shew him his army. My Lord (answered B la Roche) to shew me your goodly army, as you esteeme it, were contrary to all content. I should be better pleased to see it poore, and ruined: vnlesse the King my master and you would agree together, and not bring too such goodly armies to fight, as yours, and that which the King will shortly oppose against you, to the preiudice of all Christendome. If you were both well aduised, you would agree, and hold both the Turke and all others in subiection. But to thinke to overthrow one another, were a more folly. And if the first army the King shall oppose against you, should chance to be vanquished (which God forbid) he will within fixtene daies raise another, yea and at need, would shew you as many Gentlemen on foot, as you haue men here of all sorts. Whereupon the Emperour said, I am not ignorant of the Kings forces, so are mine well knowne vnto him. As for an accord, I will neuer stop mine eares against that motion, so as it might be made F as it ought. This being spoken, hee commanded the Marquis of Guast to conduct them about the army, and to dine with the Princes of Germany: that after dinner hee would see them againe. After dinner the Emperour said: How thinke you of mine army? I finde it very faire (answered la Roche) it is pity you employ it not in some other designe. The Emperour replied, Where thinke you I will employ it? La Roche answered, Into Prouence. The Emperour said, The Prouencals are my subiects: (he did commonly peruse the Mappe of Prouence, and had already deuoured this Prouince in imaginations; but he shall finde the situ-

A tion stronger then in his mappe, and men of firmer mettall then paper) La Roche answered: You shall find very rebellious and disobedient subiects. The Emperour replied, How many daies journey is it from hence to Paris. La Roche answered, If you meane battels, at the least a dozen, if the invader (meaning the Emperour) haue not his head broken at the first. The Emperour smiled, admiring his wit: and some one of the assistants (who knew Teuclen well) sayd, I told you before, my Liege, he could speake well if he list. Then the Emperour taking the word, gaue him assurance that he would giue care to any proposition of peace, so as it might be worthily treated of.

And in truth he doth reuiue it, but this was to haue speedier meanes to send newes to B the Earle of Nassau, and to receive intelligence from him, that both his army, and that which the Earle led vpon the marches of Picardy, might at one instant invade the frontiers of the Realme. Moreouer, attending the yeelding vp of Fossan, hee made at Sauillan, Mont-Denis, Cony and Tende, great prouision of bisket, and beasts of burthen to follow the Campe with this bisket, and other victuals to supply the waste which hee did foresee. Some, and the greatest number, counsell'd him to pursue the recovery of the Country, which the King had wonne from the Duke of Sauoy; by meanes whereof he might plant a strong barre against the French forces, and first to settle a sure peace beyond the Alpes, before hee came to make warre in France. Other men clawed him whereto it did chide, and by a more pleasing then wholsome counsell, perswaded him to take his way to C Prouence.

The Earldome pleased him greatly, gaping wonderfully after it, for the commodity of his passage vpon the Mediterranean sea, hoping that as Italy should take breath and new courage after the ruines and desolations wherewith it hath bene continually shaken these thirty yeares, the spoiles and ruine which hee should draw after him, chasing, destroying, amazing and making desolate the people of France, Paris in the end, and the Crowne of France should be the prize and recompence of his victories. But he reckoned without his hoste, Marcellle in stead of making his entry into the Realme, shall shamefully make him retire into Castile.

Many inticements drew him into France. We haue had (said he) almost for these twenty D yeares a continual victory against the enemy. The Da. hy of Milan which we now possess, is a certain testimony of our triumphs: we haue reason to retain the same resolution in this warre, and the same hope which Conquerors ought to haue: and leaue vnto the French, terror, and despaire, which commonly doth accompany the vanquished. We are superiours in number, men of better constitution, more practised in the art of Warre, and leauing some part of our forces on this side the mountains, we haue sufficient remaining to encounter the enemies power. But that which will giue vs the victory, we march against one that hath broken his faith (the iudicious Reader may consider which of these two Princes had most right, whether the Emperour, taking vpon him the protection of the D. of Sauoy, or the King, seeking his right by force of armes, which he could not obtaine by E reason from his Vncle.) Doubt not but we haue God for vs, he is iust Iudge, and a rigorous reuenger of the breach of faith. Moreouer, let vs not feare that the French King can fortifie himselfe on this side the Alpes: he will prepare all his forces against this army, but I haue another ready to invade Picardy; and besides, the Emperre prepares one in my Kingdomes of Spaine, which shall come by Languedoc to ioine with me. I leauy another to assaile Champagne and Bourgongne in the hottest of these warres, the which shall performe as much for my seruice as the rest. Having so great preparatiues, and in so many places, and the King so surpris'd as he cannot in time assemble sufficient forces to encounter so many armies, it is impossible but on some one side, wee should make a passage by force, euen into the heart of his Realme. We haue good intelligences, and manage great F practices. This spake the Emperour. But, Doest thou know the decrees of Heauen? (saith the Eternal, reprehending man) And wilt thou dispose of the government thereof vpon earth? What were these great practices and secret intelligences, which the Emperour vaunted to haue in France? A polirike Commander doth commonly vse this kind of speech, to giue courage to his men, and breed iaculosity and distrust in his enemy against his subiects. Hee had some secret practices vpon the towne of Langres (but the inhabitants were too faithful to their King, and since in these latter daies haue giuen sufficient testimony of their obedience to the Crowne) some held that the Marquis of Salusses had partakers of his treachery,

The death of Francis the Duke, his

chery, and William D. ke of Bavaria said openly, that many in France, holding the same A party, would discouer themselves at need.

But whatsoever it were, that which gaue a more liuely impression: Francis Dauphin of Viennois, the Kings eldest sonne, whom his Maiesty (going from Lions to see his army which he meant to oppose against the Emperor) had left sicke at Tournon, dies the fourth day of his sicknesse, being about twenty yeares old, bred vp by his father in singular expectation of all the world, to proue in time a great and most excellent Prince. And Sebastian Earle of Monte-cucullo, found guilty of poyson, and for that cause was drawne in pieces with foure horses within Lions, had by his confession declared, that the Emperour had once enquired, if he knew the order and manner of the Kings eating and drinking. An B attempt so wicked, as it is scarce credible, that so wretched and damnable a treason should enter into the heart of so generous a Prince. Notwithstanding, when Don Ferdinand of Gonzagua presented the laid Sebastian to the Emperour, saying, that he was ready to execute that which he had promised vnto him, and to Anthony de Lena: if the deligne extended vpon any places of the French obedience, why did hee informe himselfe of the Kings eating and drinking? Besides, during these practices, why did Don Lopes of Sora, Ambassador for the Emperour at Venice, enquire who should reigne in France, and against whom the Emperour should pursue these warres, in case the King and his children should die: if hee had not bene acquainted with some fittall practice against the sayd Princes.

Thus the Emperour, resolute to passe against the opinion of the cleereft sighted (as hee afterwards confessed vnto the King with his owne mouth: who hauing till then seemed to follow counsell, did now rashly follow his owne head) and now by diuers and many expeditions, of diuision of places, offices, Captainships, governments, gifts of townes and castles, deuouring (by presumption) the goods of the Kings subiects and seruants, he left ten thousand men to continue the siege of Turin, and for the affaires of Piedmont he diuided his army into three troops, for the greater commoditie of the passage, and appointed their rendezvous at Nice, and thereabouts. In the first, were the men at armes, with the Lanquenets of the Lord of Thamié, conducting the artillery and the baggage, who tooke their way by the riuer of Genoua. In the second, Don Ferdinand of Gonzagua, D Generall of the light-horse, and with them some Neapolitane men at armes, the Lords of Iseltstein, Dietric, Spech, Wolfe, Dietric of Kuttringhem, Colonels of the Reistres: then the Marquis of Gualt, with the Spaniards and Emperours household: and at their tayle Anthony de Lena, with the Lanquenets of Marc Ebenstein: after whom marched the Emperour in the midst of a troop of Spaniards, followed by the Lanquenets of Gasser of Fronsberg, taking the direct way from Fossan to Nice. In the third, were the Italians, which tooke their way by Cony.

Emperour.

On the other side, the King made his necessary prouisions at Lions, and prouiding for all parts where the enemy might enter, he sent Claude de Sauoy Earle of Tende, and the Lord of Bonneuil, his Lieutenants generall in that army, to ioyne with William Earle of E Furttemberg Colonell of his Lanquenets, and other Captaines placed towards Cistron, vpon the passages of Roque-paruier, Terreneue, and other approaches, to spoile the corne, either standing, or in the barn: to draw all that might be into strong places: to beat downe all ouens and mills which might any way helpe the enemy, to burne the horsemeat, to beat out the heads of their wine-vessels, if they did not speedily retire them, and to cast corne into their welcs to corrupt the waters. All the people, both great and small, were so wonderfully affected to the publike good, as euery man forgets the griefe of his priuate losse.

The Lords of Mas, Calds, Carfes, and many others, pricke them forward by their example, themselves setting fire on their corne, barnes, and mills, and causing good fellows F to drinke their wine. And for that the King had not yet all his forces vniued, to present himselfe with honor and reason in person before the Imperials, his Maiesty appointed the Lord of Montmorency, at that time Lord Steward and Marshall of France, his Lieutenant Generall as well on this side as beyond the Alpes, to seize vpon Auignon. But for that the King would consult with him more at large of these great affaires, he sent Robert Steward Lord of Aubigny Marshall of France, to that end, with eight thousand Suisses, who kept the enemy from the sayd towne.

A Montmorency hauing in Auignon imparted to the Marshall D' Aubigny and other commanders, the meanes which seemed most conuenient for the managing of this warre, he came to Aix, viewed the situation of the place, and finding it hard to fortifie, by reason of certaine little hills neere at hand, which looking into the towne, might serue as a Cauallier or Mount for the enemy to plant his Ordnance on, hee caused all that might be, to be transported, razed the portals, and such defence as it had, and abandoned it, leauing it empty and vnprofitable for the enemy.

The Emperour was now in the plaine of Cannes, and the next day Don Fernand Gonzagua, who led the fore-ward, should aduance with eightene hundred horse and six thousand Lanquenets (whereof the master of the campe marched sometimes three or foure leagues before the whole army) Monticau, a hardy and aduenturous Knight, seeking opportunity in the beginning of this warre to doe the King some notable seruice, resolute to see if he could surpise the master of the Camp. Bosy no lesse couetous of glory, would be his companion in this enterprife, they part with about eight score horse, and three hundred foot, and encounter Don Ferdinand with his horse-men, who came to take lodging for the fore-ward in the towne of Luc, on this side the riuer of Argençe, and gaue him an alarme: but vnable to fight with so great a troop, they found the retreat, and all tired come about the shutting of the euening to Brignoles.

Don Ferdinand, aduertised by them that went and came, of the small number of our C men, takes a troop of choice men, marcheth speedily after them, and causeth all the rest of his forces to follow: he passeth on the one side of Brignoles, and layes a great ambush where our men should passe the next day, and doth compasse them in betwixt his troop and the ambush: at the breake of day hee chargeth into the village, and seeks to force some barricadoes which the Captaines had made to stay them, whilst they arme and goe to horse-backe, they kill some at the first, and lose about forty. Monticau and Bosy take the field, they place Captaine Partis with his footmen on the wings of their horse-men, marching close couered with their shor to get to Aix, maintaining still the shocke of the enemy, they kill and hurt many in the narrow wayes, whereas the enemy could not stretch forth his troops. But thrust into the open champaign, assailed by their whole force, charged by the ambush vpon one of their flanks, the Lanquenets approaching, this present D supply giues courage to the enemy, and the perill, without hope of succour, makes the French to faint: they all giue way, all are ouerthrowne, and of all this troop but three men at armes escaped, but were slaine or taken. Monticau, Bosy, the other Captaines, and many Gentlemen which had followed them (desirous to make prooue of their persons) are taken prisoners. There were slaine of the enemies (besides the wounded) six score men, and two hundred horse: but the number preuailed about valour.

The defeat and taking of Monticau and Bosy.

The Emperour hearing of this victory, did not forget to make a triumph, publishing it throughout all the world, as if he had defeated all the Kings fore-ward. Without doubt this lightnesse allowed by Montmorency, at the importunate request of the vnder taker, E purchased to the enemy, those which were doubtfull and vncertaine, what party they should take, confirmed his adherents, and stricke feare into them that were contrary. This first encounter might giue courage to the Imperials to seeke the Constable in Auignon, yet he sees no reason to hazard a battell in open field, before he had sufficient forces to encounter so great a power. To put himselfe into Auignon, were to hazard himselfe in a Towne not defensible, and hardly to be fortified so speedily as necessity required.

Marcellus was the onely frontier towne, sufficiently furnished with all things necessary to endure an Imperiall siege: but to leaue all the rest of the way open to the enemy, had bene to giue him meanes to fortifie on either side of the Riuer of Roine at his pleasure, and to draw vpon him (without resistance) a flourishing and glorious army. It was therefore better to let the Emperour know, that for an vnfortunate encounter they had neither lost courage nor hope: with this deligne Montmorency lodgeth his men in field, and chooseth the place for his campe, betwixt the Riuer of Roine and Durance, the one did furnish his army with victuals and other commodities: the other serued a Rampier and barre against the enemies approach. And to cut off all meanes and liberty to runne to forage, to learne newes of the French Campe, and to found the passage of the Riuer at his pleasure, without contradiction, he placed garisons in all townes and places, to bee held on the other side of the water. The King on the other side was at Valence, where like the Master of a ship commanding from the helme to the prow, he sent daily new forces to the Constable, fortified the towne, and assembled such a power, as if any mischance had ruined this first army, the Emperor had had the King presently ready to giue him a second battell.

The Earle of Nassau in Picardy.

Let vs now change our climate, and make an escape into Picardy. Henry Earle of Nassau, and Adrian of Croy, Earle of Reux, Lord Steward of the Emperours house, being entred into Picardy, did at the same instant, spoile all places in their passage which were of weak resistance; but besides the taking of Bray vpon Somme, they did no great exploits; for being repulled from before Saint Riquier, they lost some of their Artillery, and a great number of their men for a slight enterprise. Charles Duke of Vendosme, with three hundred men at armes, and six thousand foot, hauing forced them to re-passe the water, reuenged the wrong they had done vpon the frontier, hee tooke and spoiled some small townes, castles and villages vpon the marches. But seeing the enemy fortified with two thousand men, the which he hoped to surpris at Marolles, an open towne, hee re-passed the water, not to hazard his forces rashly, attending the coming of Claude D. of Guise his brother in law. Amongst other places vpon the frontier not defensible, he had appointed to abandon Guise.

The Earle aduertised by his spies, of the haste they made to cary away their mouables and victuals, to driue away their cattell, and that the garison of the castle, careful to free the towne, and to beat downe the defences which might any way accomodate the enemy, did negligently guard the approaches, hee marcheth thither with speed, surpriseth them in disorder, and kils some before they could recover any place of safety, he summons the Castle: some preferring life before honor, cast themselves ouer the walls into the ditch: the rest amazed, yeld the place at the enemies discretion. A baselesse vnworthy of Nobility, so as those which were found to bee Gentlemen, were degraded, and both they and their posterity declared Pefants, and subiect to taxes.

sieged.

Guise being fackt, and all the Country about burnt, the Earle carying away a booty of men, cattell and goods, marched against Saint Quintin. But being aduertised of the good order the Duke had set for the guard and defence of the towne, he turned suddenly, and tooke the way of Peronne. It is strong by nature and situation, but at that time not well fortified, nor sufficiently manned to withstand so great a power. He therefore passed the riuer of Somme about Aplincourt, abandoned as not defensible, and spoiling, burning, and making the whole Country desolate, he camps before Peronne about the middelt of August. The Lord of Seru, Colonel of the Legion of Picardy, puts himselfe into it with a thousand men, and the Marshall of La Marke with a hundred men at armes. Misfortune is good for something. The darkness of the smoake which the fire of the farmes and villages burnt by the enemy, had caused, covered the passage of our men; in view of the Imperials. In the meane time the Dukes of Vendosme and Guise, leauy new bands in Picardy and Champagne, to ioyne with the Lansquenets which Nicholas of Rusticis did bring. Let vs leaue Count Nassau assailing, and the defendants valiantly encountering his attempts, vntill that the Emperor after his first disgrace recieued before Marfeilles, shall be blemished with a second at Peronne, in the persons of the Earles of Nassau and Reux, and let vs see what hapned in Piedmont after the yelding of Fossan.

Warren in Pied-
mont.

The troops which Guy Earle of Rangon, Cesar Fregose his brother in law, Cagnin Gonzaga, and other Italian Captaines, Pensioners to the King, had leauied, were broken, by reason of the last hope and practice of peace, cunningly giuen out by the Emperor. Now they renew them by a new Commission from the King, to crosse the Imperials in Italy, as he might thereby diuert the great forces they had in France. Rangon Lieutenant for the King in this army, leauied two thousand men, Cagnin as many, Cesar Fregose the like number, and two hundred light-horse: the Lords of Paluoin a Vicount of Milan, Peter Stroffi a Florentine, Balthazar called the Cheuallier d'Azcala Ferrarois, either of them a thousand men. Beringer of Caldore, a Neapolitan, Earle of Monte de Rife, and Iohn of Turin a Florentine, euery one five hundred; Auerol of Bressan four hundred; Bandin of Tulsane four hundred, and two hundred light-horse, and the Lord of Tais (a Frenchman borne, but sent into Italy, to recueie the Earle of Mirandola into his Maiesties service) two hundred light-horse. An armie of great hope, whose exploits wee shall soone see.

A Annebault and Bury, being straitly besieged in Turin, performed the parts of good and vigilant Captaines, and well practised in matters of war, preventing both the enemy and the citizens newly reduced to the Kings obedience, from daring to attempt any thing against them, and by their daily sallies, bringing prisoners, and store of cattell, returned victors within the circuit of their walls. Maramao had gathered together within Ciria all the corne and victuals he could get thereabouts. Annebault aduertised thereof by his espials, sent Esse with twenty horse, and Auchy and Cany leading either of them five hundred foot: who parting towards the euening, came to the wals side before they were discovered, they plant their ladders, surpris the town, put all to the sword that made resistance, B load their beasts of burthen with victuals and booty, and retire to Turin without any encounter. This happy victory brought vnto the besieged the conquests of Riuelles, Veillane and Saint Ambrois. The garison thus reuiued, aspires to greater enterprises. The Emperor had left in Saullan fixteene pieces of artillery, with all their prouision of bullets, powder, and other necessities, and a good supply of farmes. The garison which hee had placed there, foraging without feare in the villages about, gaue them hope to defeat them, and to surpris the towne. Marc Anthony of Cusan, Capitaine of two thousand Italians, commanded the execution of this stratagem, with his troops: they giue him for Companion Chambray Lieutenant of Annebaults company, with three score choice horse. But they lose an ox, to take an egge: vpon the way they are aduertised by their scouts, that certaine C free-boaters of the enemies, laden with a great spoile, were presently retired into a castle adioyning.

A braue and happy captiue.

Enterprise vp-on Saullan.

They turne head, and take the castle by assault, and sack it, it may bee more greedily then wisely. For whilst they are busie at the spoile, the alarme is giuen in the country, and some troops enter speedily into Saullan, draw the bridges, rampier vp the gates, and man the wals and the defences. The towne being furnished, the suburbs remaine in spoile, they beat in pieces two great Cannons, they cary away all the armes, and make booty of all they find good. In the mean time James of Scalenghe approached with about foure thousand men, as well of his owne troops, as of pefants gathered together. Our men making a vertue of necessity, troop together, and goe closely to field, charge the enemy running D hastily to surpris them, being disperfed in the streets, and busie at the spoile: they make them turne their backs, kill about three hundred, hurt many more: and of nine Ensignes winne seuen, the horsemen flying pulled away the other two from them that caried them, seeking to saue them. In the end, Iohn Iagues of Medicis, Marquis of Mirignan, came to succour them with two thousand Lansquenets, being called by Schalenghe, our men hauing their bodies tyred with trauell, and their armes with striking, resolu to retire, and send to Annebault for succours. Alegre, an aduenturous and wise Capitaine, brings them two hundred horse, who arriuing when as our men were in danger to be defeated, entering amongst the enemies, killing and chasing, gaue their companies (halfe tired) leisure to take breath: and through the fauour of twelve hundred foot, which followed Alegres E troope, retire with their booty and baggage safely into Turin. A shot which Cusan recieued in the head, caused him to remaine at Pignerol, where soone after he died: leauing a happy memory of his valour, and a great griefe to his friends for the losse of his person.

The Imperial
defeated.

The Emperor approached now to Aix, hauing receiued some losse by the way, not so great as troublefome, in regard of the quality of the persons. The pefants and mountaineers, lying in ambush in the straights and narrow passages along the Alpes, and issuing forth suddenly, sometimes vpon the scouts, sometimes vpon the rere-ward, stayed them euery two hundred paces, to defend themselves: hauing no means to offend this swarme of men, who being charged, vanished by crooked and vknowne wayes. Fifte men of the Country, resolute for all euents, had shut themselves in a fort, called our Ladies Tower, with an intent to shoot at the Emperor in the passage, and all of them at one instant to discharge their hargbuzes. But they take Martha for Mary: they kill a Nobleman with a rich coat of armes, and followed by a troop of men which did him great honour. The Emperour brings the Cannon, batters the Tower, and forceth them to yeld at his pleasure: and to purge the offence they had made, sends them all to be hanged.

Moreover, being aduertised that a great number of pefants, women, children, and Ggg cattell,

cattell, were hidden in a piece of ground enuironed with wood on the side of a mountain, A he caused the wood to be fired in many places, so as all were miserably burnt or flaine. A stragem which did so incense the people against the Emperor, as neuer any one of his men fell into their hands, but he made trial of a most tragick and cruell death. These first fruits might induce the Emperor to draw a consequence from the lesse to the greater, in comparison of these people vnacquainted with armes, with those whom nature and exercise had instructed, and to make him know, that it was no small enterprife to assaile a King of France at his doore. But this troubled his mind. He thought in the beginning of this war to haue so disgraced the King with the Germanes and Swisses, as hee should draw no men from them. Notwithstanding, aduertised that besides the eight thousand Swisses B leauied by Lewis of Anguerrand, Lord of Boisrigault, Stephen d'Aigne Lord of Beaumais, and William Lord of L'ernay, Gentlemen of the Kings house, had made a leauie of the like number, all which had in a manner ioyned with the Marshall of Montmorency, who had now about thirty thousand men in his campe: he is now much grieved in his heart, that hauing in the former warres wonne so many happy victories, vnder the command of his Captaines, now marching in person with so strong and mighty an army, after that hee had proclaimed his triumphs throughout the world, hee should performe no honourable exploit of warre. Therefore the fifteenth of August hee makes choice of three thousand Spaniards, foure thousand Italians, and five thousand Lanquenets, and takes in his company the Duke of Alua a Spaniard, Alphonse d'Avilar, the Marquis of Guast, and Don C Ferdinand Gonsique Italians, and the Count Horne a Germane, followed with all the flower of his horsemen, and aduanceth neere to Marfeilles: hee goes himselfe in person to view the towne, being couered with the ruines of a house lately beaten downe, and puts forth the Marquis to make a conuenient place for the planting of his Artillery against the weakest part of the towne. This resolution had bene good, when as the Kings forces were not yet vnited, and his subiects terrified by the sudden and v unexpected enuy of so mighty an enemy. The Centinell vpon the rampiers discovered the Marquis: they send forth men to compasse him in behind, if there were no more then those which appeared with him. He retires towards the place from whence hee parted, and by his retreat they discouera a greater number of men, behind that ruined house. They set vpon them that issued forth, D and some Cannon shot scatter the stones, kill some and hurt others.

This first amazement carried the Emperour to his Campe, after that he had appointed the Duke of Alua and the Count Horne, to stay about Marfeilles: and the Marquis of Guast with twelue hundred horse, and six Ensignes of foot to goe and view Arles: that if they found it not able to be taken by assault, he would come thither with all his forces. In the meane time, lest the first that fallied forth should fall into some ambush, they send other fresh men in fregats and boats armed, who going along the shore, get about the place where they had seene the glistering of their armes: who landing take a compass among the myrtles and other bushes which grow in that Country. The Duke discouers them, and to busie them, sends certaine horses to draw the whole troop which followed E vpon them. Our men had the like designe, and when as the enemies whole strength appears, they seeme amazed, retire without order, and draw them that pursued towards an open plaine, commanded by the Cannon, then turning their backs they save themselves among the bushes. The Cannon plays, and passing through the Imperials, makes heads, legges, and armes, to flye into the ayre so pitifully mangled, as the cries of them that died, the terror of them that fled, and the amazement of them that were found, turnes them all into a hasty flight, and the souldiers hidden in the bushes, make a furious fallie vpon them that fled: the Duke gathereth againe his men farre from the shore into a valley couered with Rocks and Hills, and hauing viewed them, he found his number greatly diminished, amongst others, those of the Count Horne, and of another Germane Cap- F taine his neere kinsman. The Marquis of Guast had already discovered, that they had taken downe a little hill which did ouer-look the towne of Arles, vpon the which a few pieces of artillery being planted, would haue held the towne in great subiection. Arles is seated vpon Rofne, at the point where it parts in two, and runnes with two mouthes into the sea: making an Island, which they call Camarola. Iohn Carraccioli a Neapolitane, Prince of Melfe commanded there, as the Kings Lieutenant with a thousand foot Galkons, of the troops of Iohn de Foix, Earle of Carmaine: a thousand Champansio vnder the prized by the Emperour in imagination.

A the command of Iohn Anglere Lord of Iour, two thousand others vnder the Ensignes of the Lords of Marieu of Dauphiné, la Goute a Bourbonnois, du Palais of the County of Foix, and the Baron of Rixou of Languedoc, to currey one fiftie hundred, and Domnaul about an hundred and thirty men at armes. As the Marquis lying in ambush behind certaine wind-mills, viewed the weakest parts of the towne, being discouered, Ambois of Ancienulle Lord of Villiers, Commissary of the artillery, plants two pieces of artillery directly against these mills, so as if the Marquis, seeing them give fire, had not slipped aside, he had there ended his dayes. So the Marquis (frustrate of his hope, either to surprise or to force the towne of Arles) took his way to Marfeilles.

B Marfeilles was besieged by the D. of Alua, more in shew then with any hope to force it, and onely with an expectation to draw the besieged to some rash fallie, or to haue the Kings army to come and succour them, and then to fight with them with art. aduantage. With this designe, the Emperor lay so neere, as at the first dislodging of the French camp he might easily preuent them, and ioine with his forces. But those within the towne had good and wise Commanders, who suffered not their men to issue forth but to good purpose, and alwayes to the enemies losse. As for remouing of the campe, Montmorency would not hazard the estate, nor the forces of the King his master: he hopes by the rout of his enemies armie to preferue his owne: and according to the aduertisements hee had of the Imperials designes, he restrained or gaue liberty for the execution of his Countels C and commandements. The surprise of Brignoles had made him more wary: yet not to daunt the courage of his men, he continually studied of reuenge, vexing the Imperials with daily alarms, encounters, and charges, and all without any losse or prejudice.

The King being aduertised of the approaches which the Emperor had made to Marfeilles, Henry the new Dauphin and Duke of Britany desirous to make proofe of his person in so iust and honourable a warre, and against so worthy an enemy, obtaines (by his instant sure, and the intercession of such as might preuaile much with his Maiesty) leave to goe to the Campe. Not to command presently (said the King) but to learne to command hereafter, and vnder the Lord Steward (as another Palantes vnder Eneas) to passe his apprenticeship in the art of warre. His comming made the youth to cry for battell, whensoever they D went to consult, whether it were more expedient to approach neere their enemy, or to prolong the warre by temporizing and delays: and many which till now had followed the last opinion, were caried away to the contrary. Many considerations moved them, the Kings forces able to encounter the Emperors, the presence of a young Prince, burning with desire to try himselfe in the warre, the dishonor (as they said) in suffering the towne of Marfeilles to be besieged, the meanes they had to defeat their enemies, before the Emperor could bring all his forces to succour them, who for want of victuals were constrained to lye disperfed.

But the Lord Steward, and the wisest heads, found it farre more safe to win the victorie without striking stroke, cutting off the enemies victuals as they had done before. Marfeilles was well fortified, furnished with all necessary munition, manned with valiant Captaines, and men of resolution. Contrariwise, famine and pestilence, which did much afflict and daily increase in the Emperors Campe, would soone ruine his forces. It was now neere at hand: The Peasants had lately carryed away, flaine and hurt all the beasts which carried the basket that was made at Toulon, and continuing to molest them by these affronts, they brought the Imperiall army into wonderfull wants and necessity. Moreover, the daily checkes which the French men at armes gaue vnto the enemy, made the Emperor thinke of his retreat. It was therefore a wise constancy and resolution of the Lord Steward, not to subiect the importance of this war to the discretion of a doubtfull hazard. There is no lesse honour to vanquish an enemy by counsell and government, then by battell: and F to hazard himselfe to the chance of armes without necessity; it is an abusing of the blood and liues of men.

Hereupon newes comes to the King, that his army beyond the Alpes had brought most part of Piedmont vnder his obedience; and all the Marquitate of Salusses, except some castles. His Majesty (vining his rights) might haue annexed this Marquitate vnto Dauphiné, whereon it depends as confisicate, by the rebellion and trechery of the Marquis Francis. But let vs heare an act of his naturall clemency and bounty. Iohn Lewis, brother to the said Francis, was prisoner at Paris for the like rebellion. The King set him at liberty, he did Ggg 2 inuif inuet him in the Marquise, receiues his oath of fealty to him, and against all other men: A he causeth money to be giuen him, to furnish him and his traine, and then sends him to take possession. Francis within few weekes after came to Carnagnole: John Lewis receiues him into the Castle, and suffers himselfe to bee so caried away with sweet words, as he sweares by nothing, but by the confidence he had in his brother Francis: Francis was farre more malicious and cunning. John Lewis, against the aduice of Saint Iulian (a Gentleman Galcon bred vp in the house of Salusses, whom the King had sent with John Lewis to observe the actions, and the going and coming of his new Marquis; being a simple and dull man) he suffers himselfe to be drawne out of Carnagnole, and to be led to the Castle of Valfemere, where Francis detained him prisoner, and then seeks to recover the places of the Marquise. Saint Iulian fore-seeing the issue of this subtil stratagem, practised Saluador d'Aguerres by his perswasions, and receiued of him in the Kings name, the strong Castle of Vrezeul, a beame in Francis his eye, which kept him frō being absolute Marquis. Andrew Doria comming then from Spaine, brought victuals and money to the Emperour, vpon whose ariual he made a Proclamation throughout the campe: That all men bearing armes, should be ready to muster (without doubt the great decay of his armie, the which from fifty thousand men that he had parting from Nice, he found decreased to fife and twenty at the most, did touch him to the quick) to receiue money, and prepare to depart vpon the day assigned, every man to be furnished with eight or ten dayes victuals. This proclamation made the King suspect, that hee meant to come and assaile his Campe, or to march after the D. of Alua to the siege of Marfeilles. And seeing the Emperour was there in person, the King did hope to haue meanes in the midst of these great armies, to effect the contents of the challenge he had before sent to the Emperour by an Herald, as we haue heard. But his Maiestie was no sooner come from Valence to his campe neere Auignon, as hee was giuing order to prepare to receiue or giue battell, newes comes vnto him, that the Emperour with all his Campe, is dislodged from Aix, leaving behinde him (besides the dead bodies which were infinit, the ayre being corrupted round about) a great multitude of sick men, which could not follow the armie, neither on horsebacke nor on foot: and taking the rout of Spaine, hee left the towne of Aix spoiled with all the desolations which warre could bring forth, except fire, from which the Emperour did preserue it. Onely the Palace, and especially the Chamber of accompts were abandoned to the fire, at the instance of the Duke of Sauoy, who would assist in person the burning thereof, hoping (it may be) to abolish the memorie of the titles, whereby it appears, that Piedmont belongs to the Earledome of Prouence. But the Lord Steward had foreseene this inconuenience, sending them to a strong place of his named Baux. The King gaue money to repaire the losses. Amongst his chiefe champions, the Emperour lost Anthony de Leua, Mark Bussheim, another Captaine of Lanquenets his kinsman, the Count Horne, Baptista Castalde, and many other men of accompt. Let vs apply here that holy Oracle, speaking of Senacherib King of the Assyrians: Thy bragging hath come vnto mine eares, I will put myring into thy nostrils, and my bit into thy mouth, and will make thee returne the way thou camest. And, Thus said the Eternal touching the King of the Assyrians: hee shall not enter into this Citie, neither shall hee shoot an arrow therein, hee shall not present himselfe before it with a shield, nor cast, &c. Behold the Earle of Prouence in imagination, who had lately threatned the Provinces of this Realme with fire and sword, and swallowed vp the Crowne thereof by presumption, ashamed and confounded in his retreat, hauing lost halfe of his troopes, turmoiled by the peasants, who vsing the armes of his sick men, and of those that were dead, seize vpon the passages and streights, beat downe the bridges vpon the riuers, which were then very violent, charge them in front, in flanke, and behinde, and the light-horfe-men led by the Earle of Tende, Bonneuil, Langey, and John Paul de Cere follow them so close, as they had no meanes to forrage, leaving the waies from Aix to Freius, couered with dead carcases, and men languishing, harnesse, lances, pikes, harguebufers, and all other armes pel-mel on a heape.

The King resolved to march after them, and wheresoever hee should ouertake them to giue them battaile, and so passe into Italy, where at that instant he had a mighty armie in field. But he is diuerted from his designe by Letters from the Marshall of La-marke. Hee had no more meanes to hold Peronne long, the waies were beaten downe in many places, famine pressed the besieged, they wanted harguebufers and powder. So the King caused

A some part of his men at armes to march speedily, and ten thousand French foot, resolute to follow after by great marches, to raise the siege, or to recover the towne before the enemy should fortifie it and furnish it with victuals. God would preserue him from this toyle, and giue him leisure to take breath. The Imperials being alwayes repulled, with losse from many and sundry assaulls, the myne wherein they had long laboured, prouing fruitlesse, (besides the death of Philip of Boulonniers, Earle of Dammartin, ouerwhelmed in the ruines thereof, in a countermine he made to blow vp the enemies myne, whose death was reuenged with the slaughter of three hundred Lanquenets, and twenty of their men at armes, at the last assault giuen by the Tower that was vndermined) and the towne being reliued with fife hundred shot, every one carying tenne pounds of powder, entring by meanes of a generall alarme giuen by the Duke of Guise with two hundred horse, and all the Trumpets he could recover, they dislodged in the night, about the middest of September, continuing their burning as they had begun.

France (by the grace of God) is now free from enemies. But nothing is perfectly happy. There are crose newes which trouble the Court. The English Ambassadors that were neere the King, ill affected to his Maiesty, and without doubt, no faithfull seruants to their master, giue him intelligence, That the Emperour seeing that he could neither by spoile, or any other meanes, prouoke the King to battell, made shew of a retreat, to draw him to pursue him, and so to fight, or else retire to take a greater leape, and to inuade Prouence suddenly, when as the French forces should be farthest off: That the Emperour himselfe (the better to colour his departure) gaue out that famine and mortality had diminished his forces of one third part, and the rest had runne the like danger, if he had not retired: yet notwithstanding he had no such want of victuals as was supposed, and since his coming out of Italy, had not lost about two thousand men: That since the taking of Montreian and Boisy, no man durst giue any alarme to the Emperours campe, nor yet follow it at their dislodging. These importunes & false impressions had wrought such effects with the King of England, as Pomeray being sent from the King to three ends: To satisfie him of the truth touching the enterprise of Prouence: To procure his liking of the mariage of Margarete a daughter of France, with the King of Scots: and to learne the King of England's intention vpon the motion before made, touching the mariage of the Duke of Orleans with Mary of England, daughter to the said King: he had much adoe to alter him in any thing from the opinion he had conceiued. But the mariage of Scotland did so incesse the King of England, as hauing laid open vnto Pomeray his griefes and the causes of his discontent vpon this Article, he sent him backe without any conclusion, being loath to haue his neighbour so highly allied. There comes another matter of great importance: the Country of Tarentaise in Sauoy had lately shaken off the French yoke. To reduce it to his obedience, the King sent the Earle of Saint Paul, Duke of Estouteuille by his wife, with some French troopes of horse and foot, and the Earle of Furstemberg with his companie of Lanquenets, to whom, for the puring of their offence, the Country was abandoned to the spoile, with the Towne of Conflans. Being thus punished, they afterwards performed the dutie of subiects, and the Duke returned into France with much honor. Let vs now discharge our promise, and conclude the yeare with the exploits of the Assembly made at Mirandole by the Italian Captaines, Pensioners to the King. Their first designe was vpon Genoua: and to this effect they came speedily and closely, hoping either to surpris it, or by the partisans of Cesar Fregose, to become masters of the towne: but a Luquois of the troopes of Cornetury, stealing away in the night, had discovered the enterprise to the Citizens. So the Earle retiring his Campe halfe a league from Genoua, betwixt two mountains, he suddenly caused many ladders to be made, which prouing too short, made the success fruitlesse. These Captaines had no Cannon to make any battell: moreover, Turin being besieged, required their presence.

F They therefore turne head. The Imperials aduertised of the Earles approach, abandoned the siege, and leaue the field at the deuotion of this new army. The Lord of Anchaulet, seeing the Campe dislodged, sallies out after them, and in passing takes the tower vpon the bridge of Pau by composition (the taking whereof the Emperour had so highly commended) and the Lord of Bury tooke Groillan: the corne and wine that was found there, sent to scetch Turin. The towne of Quiers was taxed by the Imperials at fife and twenty thousand crownes: but whilest the souldiers were busie to force the inhabitants to pay this summe, Annebauld sent certaine Capitaines, who surpised the towne from foure hundred souldiers, which kept it in the Emperors name. Montcalier sent presently to offer obedience: and the Castle of Carignan yeelding, did furnish Turin with about three thousand lackes of meale, packt vp ready to send to the Campe. Salusses, Quieras, and many other places of the Marquisate of Piedmont did homage vnto the victors. The King sent to refresh Annebauld and his troops both with horse and foot: he drew them out of Turin, sending two thousand French foot vnder the command of Capitaine René, and la Godiniere: and two thousand others vnder the Cheuallier Birague: and for Gouverneur he sent Bury, to whom he gaue the company of men at armes, which Francis of Salusse being recoyled, did command. But behold an act as remarkable as it is rare, proceeding from B a singular affection: and what will not a braue Knight doe for his mistresse? Vpon the first newes of the Emperors descent into Prouence, the King of Scotland did arme sixteen thousand men, to come and succour the King without his request or priuie, (saves the Originall) and nothing stayed him from comming in time vpon the generall hope of a battell, but a contrary wind, which had put him backe twice. The King had assured himselfe of his new conquests, and hauing giuen order to the frontiers of his Realme, returned into France.

Vnexpected
succours from Scotland,

The King of Scotland came to meet him at la Chapelle, betwixt Tarare and S. Saphorin in Lionois: and there he demanded one of his daughters in mariage. The ancient alliance of the Realme of France & Scotland was considerable. The father of this King had beene slaine in battell against the English, for the party of King Lewis the twelfth, and should his kind affection be denied? So the mariage betwixt him and Magdalene of France was concluded in Blois, and solemnized the first day of the yeare followinge. Great prosperities are oftentimes accompanied with some crosses, else the vanity of our senses would easily transport vs; and we would attribute that to our owne valour, which belongs to the great Iudge and Moderator of battels: behold pitifull first-fruits, in the gouernment of the Lord of Bury at Turin. Oftentimes he is taken that thinks to take. The Emperour had adiudged Montferrat to the Marquis of Mantoua, against the Duke of Sauoy, and Francis of Salusses who pretended it: and those of Cassal would not accept of him. Bury during these garboiles, practiseth Damian Curiala Capitaine in the garison at Cassal for the Emperour. Damian promisseth to deliuer him a gate. Bury leads thither Christophor Gnauff, D with twelue hundred Italians, whereof he was Colonel, and some number of horse vnder the Lord of Tais: and at the first becomes master of the towne.

But the matrockes, shouels, and other instruments for Pyoners, which William Earle of Biendras should haue prouided with the money, he had receiued to that end, to make a trench suddenly betwixt the towne and the Castle, whilst that Count Guy should come to succour them, with the artillery to batter the Castle, were yet to buy. Whilst they seeke for others to make trenches, the Marquis of Gnauff had leisure to assemble his forces within Aft, and to enter into the castle by the field-gate, and so into the towne. Twelue hundred men were not able to withstand the fury of this vnexpected storm. He maintains E the shoock, and enters fight: but in the end being forced by the enemy, hee is taken prisoner. Tais, Gnauff, and all the rest were slaine or taken. Biendras, Damian, and other Merchants save themselves. We find the fault when it is done. It is good to obserue it to make vs wile. Hee should haue imparted this enterprize to Count Guy, who should haue drawne his army neere vnto Aft. The Marquis fearing to lose the one, and not to saue the other, had contained himselfe within his walles. Guy Guiffroy Lord of Boutieres was appointed Gouverneur by the King in Buries place.

Pursuit against
in iustice.

The snow, ice, and slipperinesse of the winter stayed the course of the Garisons in Picardie. And whilst the season kept them from doing any memorable exploits, the King laying open in his Court of Parliament at Paris (in the presence of the Peeres of France, and Princes of the blood, forty or fifty Bishops, many officers of the Crowne, and other great personages of all estates) the lawfull armes of a Lord against his vassall that hath committed a trespasse: hee sent to summon the Emperour, vpon the frontiers by a Herald, to come and plead what he should thinke good, against the demands of his Maiesties Advocate and Proctor generall: concluding, that in regard of the rebellions and treacheries of the said Emperour against the King his naturall Prince and Soueraigne Lord, by reason of the Earledomes of Ilanders, Arthois, Charolois, and other places, hol-

A holding of the Crowne of France, they should be adiudged confiscate and vnto the Crowne. And no man appearing for the Emperour, the demand of the Kings Councell was registred according to the forme vsuall in those cases.

For the execution of this sentence, the Lords of Annebauld, Tais, Termes, Auflin, French-men: More of Nouate, Francis Bernardin of Vimercat, Italians: George Capusfement, and Theode Manes, Albanos, either of them commanding two hundred light-horse: Bies Sheshall, and Gouernour of Bouillen, and Cregui Gouverneur of Monstreuil, Capitaines of fifty men at armes: hauing victualled Therouenne in view of the Earle of Rieux, who issued forth of Saint Omer with fixe hundred horse to preuent this stratagem, B the King parting from Amiens, (wheras Charles Duke of Vendosme then dyed, much lamented of the King and Realme, a braue Prince, and well desering of this Crowne, for his many and notable seruices) the King in the end of March, sends William Earle of Furstemburg to field with eight thousand Langueues, the Lords of Sercu and Auchi, (who were slaine at the first approaches at Hedin) Heilly, S. Seual, Picards: Bacqueille, la Salle, and S. Aubin, Normands: Quincy a Champanois, Haraucourt a Lorraine, either of them leading a thousand men: and many other bands of Germanes and French, amounting all to fixe and twenty thousand men, whereof Montmorency (Lord Steward) was Lieutenant Generall for his Maiesty.

Hedin is of consequence to the King, for the preferuation of his other places in Picardy: and being in his power did wonderfully annoy the enemy. The towne abandoned C by the Garison, they retire into the Castle, the which was taken without resistance, but the Earle of Rieux had well furnished the Castle for the defence of a place of importance. Captain Samfon an old Knight of Namurs, a great souldier, commanded there with 1300 men, vnder the Ensignes of Boubers and Faudcuille. They make their approaches, and many Capitaines perswaded that the thickeesse of the wall, maintained with a great rampier, would neuer admit any breach, they come to vndermine. The Prince of Molphe, the Lords of Barbesieux, Bury, Villiers, Cornelies, vnder take the worke, and cast downe halfe a tower passing from the Towne to the Castle, but that part which ioyned to the Castle standing firme, the place was not much weakened. The King then resolues to attempt it by battery, and hee himselfe shewes the place where to plant the Cannon. At the approaches Lusarches and Pont-briant, well experienced Commisaries of the artilerie, with many Canoniers and others lose their liues. The Cannon planted vpon the brinke of the trench, playes two dayes together, and the third they make a breach of thirty fadomes. The Kings presence being the rewarder of vertue, sets many yong Gentlemen on fire, being desirous of reparation, and before that order bee giuen for the assault, carries them to the top of the breach. But they finde the like valour in receiuing them: some are slaine vpon the place, others returne sore wounded. Charles of Bucel among others, Earle of Sincerre, a yong Nobleman who followed the steps of his Ancestors vertue, Anbigny Lieutenant to Sercu, and Damiet Ensigne-bearer of the said E Company, testified by their deaths the hope of their youth, if the chance of armes had lent them a longer life. Herancourt a Lorraine, and his brother his Lieutenant, sonnes to the Lord of Paroy, Lieutenant to the Duke of Guise, in the gouernment of Champagne and of his company of men at Armes, Fleueures sonne to Mardicque, and many others returned backe lame. Yet this attempt amazed the besieged, and helpt the Generall. For when as they see the order the King had giuen to assaile them in the morning, a great number of men at armes on foot, with fixe or six hundred light-horsemen, all the rest on horsebacke, the whole armie ready to be put in battaile if the enemy approached, some appointed to march first, others to second them, and some to relieue them that went to the assault, the resolution and courage of the night past, made them enter into composition, whereby they departed with their baggage, leaving the artilerie, F munition, and victuals. The King committed it to the guard of Sercu, giuing him a company of fifty men at armes, and a thousand foot. Saint Paul neere vnto Hedin might much annoy him, and reduced to the Kings obedience, crosse the garisons of Betune, Aras, Liliers, and other places thereabouts. Annebauld did this exploit, and Anthony of Castell, an Italian Engineer vnderooke the fortification of the towne and Castell. Liflers abandoned by Lienin Capitaine of the towne, was by the Lord Steward and Duke of Guise, visiting the Country, added to the former Conquests, and left vnder the command of

of Martin du Bellay Captaine of two hundred light-horse, ioyning vnto him la Lande A with a thousand foot, to keepe them of Saint Venant and Maruile, from annoying the foragers and victuallers of the French armie. The Bourguignons had fortified an Island, at Saint Venant, vpon the River of Lis. The Lord Steward vndertakes to force it, and takes with him the Earle of Furstemberg, with eight thousand French and Germanes. At the first the besieged repulse the Lanquenets, kill some, and wound many. And now the day began to faile, when as Charles Mariel Lord of Bacqueville, and La Lande discouering one part of the trench worse manned then the rest, they crosse it with their Normans and Picards, and come to handy-blows; they lose some men, and kill many of the enemies, force the trench, the rampar and the bastion, they compell them to abandon and leaue their defences, and make way for the rest of their companies and troopes to enter, who chasing the enemies, make a great slaughter of men, to reuenge the death of their companions. They presently fet vpon the second fort, the bridge whereof was croft with great long pieces of wood, ioyned one to another, and betwixt, manned with good shot, defended with a mill of stone well pierced, and furnished with harguebuses of Crock, and other shot. But nothing is difficult to a resolute minde, and the first flying to the second fort, strucke terror into them: they force them, and put them all to the sword: The number of the dead was esteemed twelae or fiftene hundred on both sides, the place spoiled, the bootie caried away, and the houses burnt.

There passed no day without an enterprize of one side or other, courtes, and recourses, C prizes, and reprisals, of men, victuals, and places ill guarded, or not guardable. The King seeing the Emperor had no armie ready, able to crosse his new conquest, content for that yeare to haue taken Hedin, and fortified Saint Paul, he caused Liliers to bee burnt, (referring the Abbey of Nunnes and the Churches) and the walls to bee bear downe, that the enemy lodging there, should not annoy Therouenne and S. Paul: he gaue the gouernment of Saint Paul to John d'Estouteville Lord of Villebon, Prouost of Paris, with his company of men at armes: that of Moyencourt named de Hangeft, to Martin du Bellay, with his two hundred light-horse, and two thousand foot, commanded by the Captaines la Sale and Saint Aubin Normans, Blerencourt and Tulle Picards, euery one 500, and in the castle 1000 men, vnder the charge of René of P. lliere. Hee left the Earle of Furstemberg D in garison at Doullans, with his Lanquenets, and an hundred men at armes, vnder the guidons of the Lords of Estrecé, and la Roche du Maine. But these bands were so ill compleat, as they made not halfe their numbers. Then hauing in like sort provided for other places, he brake vp his campe, and dismissed his troopes, to giue order for the affaires of Piedmont, where the enemy grew strong.

The King thus disarming, the Earle of Bures armes foure and twenty thousand Lanquenets, six thousand Wallons, and eight thousand horse, and resolues to charge the Lanquenets, lodged neere to Doullans, to make the siege of Saint Paul more easie, which he meant to attempt. By the surpris of some Letters, he learned that the fortifications of the place required yet twenty dayes time, to make it able to repulse the enemy. Hee changeth his opinion, and turning head to Saint Paul, makes his approaches the tenth of Iune, notwithstanding the many fallies and skirmishes of the besieged: he recouers (by means of a great hollow way, which the fodaine arriall of the Imperials would not suffer them to make euery) the point of a great Bulwarke vpon the way to Mouchie: they undermine day and night, shoot sixteene or eightene hundred Cannon shot, make a breach of three or foure hundred paces, and by the fury of ten or eight pieces of artillerie, force Martin du Bellay, Blerencourt and Tulle to abandon the breach which looks towards Doullans, their chiefe and almost onely defence: he giues an assault with fure or six hundred men, onely to view the breach: and by the thunder of their Cannons which battered all along the breach, and into the towne, they kill, or at the least hurt, about a third part of the defendants: those which were set to defend the breach, being forced to lye flat vpon their bellies. They discouer the breach, draw ten or eight engines more into the ditch, which diuided the great bastion from the towne, they had had no leisure but to make two Courtins of pipes full of earth, to defend the way which went from the bottom of the trench into the towne: they fet fire to the props which supported the point of the bastion that was undermined: it sinks downe, and presently ouerthrowes all them that defended this point into their trenches: they giue the assault by that place, and are valiantly

A valiantly receiued by la Sale, and Saint Aubin. But during the assault, those which the enemy thrust into the trench, winne the Courtin made of pipes, force fure and twentie or thirtie shot that kept it, and enter the towne pel-mel with them: they come behinde them, (who performing as much as valour and nature could doe) defended the bastion, and cut in pieces all they encounter.

Those which defended the breach, ignorant what passed on the other side, had already endured a furious assault, when as behold, those which were entered by the port of the great bastion, come and charge them behind, and the greatest number surmounting the lesse, at the first charge they kill Moyencourt, and his brother d'Ne, they massacre in the fury of the fight, seven score of the company of Du Bellay, and the most part of that of Villebon: Villebon and Tulle were taken prisoners by Tonnaire a Spanish Captaine, du Bellay and Blerencourt were saved by Pose a Germane Captaine. La Pallatiere forced in the Castle by the bulwarke which was not yet in defence remained prisoner: but the contention of some (euery one maintaining that he had giuen his faith vnto him) was the cause of his death. Finally, sparing neither men nor children, wifes nor maids, religious men nor Nunnes, about foure thousand fure hundred persons tryed the pittifull chance of a horrible and cruell victorie, whereunto they are commonly subiect, who against the lawes of armes vndertake the defence of a place not defensible, or that is not ready to withstand the violent attempts of a mighty armie.

C Saint Paul being burnt, the Castle and all the defences razed to the ground, the Imperials come before Montrueil. Montrueil was ill furnished: Canaples Gouernor of the towne, entered but three or foure dayes before, with a thousand foot, and some two hundred horse of the bands of Normandie: but the towne not being re-trenched, it required at the least six thousand foot, and three hundred men at armes. So the Earle of Bures lodgeth a part of his campe at the port of Hedin, one part at the Celestins vpon the way of Therouenne, and a part at the gate of the great market towards Abbeville: hee plants his Artillerie in three places: makes a breach along a great Courtin from the gate towards Hedin to the Port of the great market, and then prepares for the assault. The breach was reasonable, but the trenches full of water made the access difficult. On the D other side, the defendants were troubled with many disadvantages. Two batteries of the enemies kept them from coming to the breach: and being at their defence, they lay open vpon both the flanks, and had no means to couer themselves: besides, their number was not sufficient to keepe the one halfe of the base towne, so as the enemy coming to the assault, had the rest of the towne at his discretion, the which is of a great circuit.

These considerations made Canaples demand Composition; and the Earle intending the conquest of Therouenne, to prevent the next victualling, which hee did foresee, hee graunts the men of warre to depart in armes with bagge and baggage, and to the inhabitants to carry what goods they could about them. This done, the want of men E and powder which hee knowes to bee in Therouenne, inuires him to this enterprize. Francis of Montmorency Lord of Rochport, then Lieutenant General for the King in Picardie, knowing the importance of Therouenne, and the enemies designe, besides three score men at armes, an hundred foot, and some hundred dead payes which kept it, hee sent the Lord of Cany, Lieutenant of the Company of the yong Duke of Vendome (whom we shall see King of Nauarre, and father to our most Christian King lately murdered: Foudras Lieutenant to Cany, the sonne of Dampierre guidon to the Dauphin, leading foure score men at armes, and Saint Brise foure hundred foot. Hee comes before it, makes his approaches, plants his Cannon in batterie, forceth our men to abandon the Castle which had but two towers (the English Talbot having taken the towne in the year 1513 had razed the Castle) and makes a breach in the towne wall, about two hundred paces long, but hardly to bee forced: our French-men retrying, had made a trench behinde them, and made the rampar in such sort, as the enemy winning it, should fall into a trench well flanked.

When as the Imperiall armie began to march against Saint Paul, the King sought to raise his armie, hoping (according to the promises of the fortificators) it would hold out vntill that succours should come. Now the Dauphin accompanied with Montmorency Lord Steward, Commander of the armie vnder the Dauphin, giues the rendezuous towards wards Abbeville, to the Earle of Furtemberg, and to Nicholas de Ruffies, newly arrived A with foure thousand Low Germans, warlike men, and in good order.

Whilest the Dauphin attends the rest of his troopes, the besieged giue him notice that they had great need of shot and powder: for the furnishing whereof; they choise Annebauld Generall of the light-horse. With this designe, Annebauld followed with an hundred men at armes, and sixteene hundred light-horse, made choice of foure hundred harquebuziers, vnder the charge of Biendras, euery one carrying a sacke of leather bound about him full of powder: many voluntarie Gentlemen desirous of honour, (a braue ambition if we could temper the heat of youth) augment this troope, resolute to bee either taken or defeated, rather then to faile of their enterprise. The Imperials hauing intelligence of this designe, goe to horse to prevent the execution: and the French light-horsemen, prick forward by these yong Noblemen, desirous to trie their valour, giue them an alarme. Mischance is good for something. It was night, and the darknesse hindring their enemies foreward from knowing their battaile, which came from another side to ioyne with them, they charge, and kill one another, whilest that our shot enter into Therouenne without disconerie: being entered, they make a signe, whereby Annebauld should make his retreat, and might haue done it without danger. Notwithstanding, aduertised that his light-horse were in skirmish, he sought to retire them. The enemy prevents him, and cuts off his way at the passage of a bridge. Here begins the combat, and so violent, as the greatest checke falls vpon the Imperials. But in the end of all the horsemen atchieue, Annebauld is ouerthrowne, taken prisoner, and nere vnto him the Earle of Villars, the Lords of Piennes, d'O, and Sanlac, Captaine Capusment, Francis Bernardin, and almost all, but some which had before passed the bridge. Those (amongst the which was Aulfin) retire to Hedin, change their horses, post to the place of combat: finde the Imperials in disorder, dreaming no more of any enemy: they charge them, defeat them, take a great number, and recouer many of their companions that were prisoners: and so cut off a great part of the glory which they did challenge for such a victory. In the meane time, the Dauphine and the Lord Steward had gathered together about sixteene hundred men at armes, two thousand light-horse, ten thousand Germans, and twelue thousand French, with the which they pretended to succour the besieged, or to force the D Imperials to fight with disadvantage: when as the treatie which Mary Queene of Hungary, sister to the Emperour, had made by the means of the Duke of Alsot, for the procuring of a Peace or truce, caused a suspension of armes for three monthes betwixt the King and the Emperours countries of the Netherlands, vntill that matters being pacified, there might bee a generall peace concluded betwixt these two great Princes and their allies. Let this truce now cary vs beyond the Alpes, to see the estate of the forces in Italy,

A truce for three monthes.

The ordinarie jealousies, dissensions, and partialities of Captaines, which thinke themselves equall in authoritie and reputation, and of like vse for seruice, is commonly of dangerous consequence. The composition which Caguin of Gontagua made with the Imperials at Carignan, without the priuie of Guy Earle of Rangon, Lieutenant Generall for the King on that side the Alpes, had discontented the Earle, and on the other side, Caguin complained, that they had cashiered some of his footmen, and in case if Count Guy should die, or leaue the place, the King had substituted Cesar Fregese his brother-in-law, without any respect of the ancient seruice of his house, and his breeding in the Kings seruice, from whom he had not false as the Earle had done, although he had bene sought vnto with many profitable conditions.

These quarrels did so increase, as after many complaints and reproaches vpon the point of Honour, Guy and Cesar banded ioyntly against Caguin, framed a challenge vpon some writings published to the disgrace of the said Cesar, vnder the name of Arctin, whereof they held Caguin to be the chief author. William of Bellay, Lord of Langey, sent by the King to heare of the griefes of either partie, hauing giuen Count Guy, and Cesar Fregese, to understand what prouidence their quarrell with Caguin would be vnto his Majesties seruice, and that by the Articles of the Kings Order, the Knights may not without the leaue of their superiour (which is the King) send nor accept of any challenge one against another, Caguin offered not to wrong the Kings seruice, and to deferre the combat, vntill the seruice were ended, so as after the answer he had made vnto the challenge,

A Cesar had not written or said any thing that should come vnto his knowledge, whereunto he should be bound in honour to answer: and vnder colour to goe to the bathe for his health, he obtained a passport to retire himselfe to his house, with promise that if it pleased the King to giue him an honorable charge, he would returne with a troope fit to doe him seruice: and that how soeuer, he would neuer weare a red crosse.

During these contentions the Imperiall armie increased daily, and the Kings decreed, so as the Lord of Humieres sent by the King for the affaires of Piedmont, could not be master of the field, without a bodie of foure or five thousand Lanquenets or Suisses, and some supply of men at armes. To this end the King causeth his light-horse-men to march into Piedmont, after the conquests of Hedin and Saint Paul, and sent to Christopher Duke of Witttemberg, who brought ten thousand Lanquenets to passe the Alpes, and to ioyne with Humieres. But vpon the coming of the Imperials before Saint Paul, the King being forced (as wee haue seene) to countermand his light-horse, hee sent the Baron of Curtin, Lu-Fayste, Brissac, and others, leading three or foure hundred men at armes, and two hundred light-horse, Lafsigny, and Allegre, either of them commanding a thousand foot.

The Marquis of Guast had at that time deliuered into the Marquis Francis hands, all the Marquisate of Salusses, except the Castles of Verculo and Carmagnole. Two hundred Italians held it for Count Guy: the Marquis of Guast doth summon it, and vpon their refusal approacheth the artillerie. Francis Marquis of Salusses (knowing the place) brings two Cannons on the right hand going from the Towne to the Castle, breakes downe two houses to couer himselfe in stead of Gabions: himselfe plays the gunner, and shoots two volleys. A souldier of the Castle discouers him (but knows him not) and shoots him through the bodie starke dead with a Musket. The Marquis of Guast causeth him to bee couered with a cloake, and then againe sends to summon the besieged, promising them an honourable composition: they depart with bagge and baggage, and the Marquis seeing them passe, commended their good endeouours. But when hee came to demand what hee was that had shot so well from one of the windowes ouer the Port, the souldier both ignorant of the Marquis intention, and of the effect of his shot, presents himselfe vnto the Marquis, who against the Capitulation caused him to be hanged at the same window. The King hauing afterwards reduced the Marquisate to his obedience, did inuest Gabriel Bishop of Aire in Gasconie, who married the daughter of the Admirall Annebauld, but dying without heires, hee left the said Marquisate to the Crowne. The coming of Humieres and the Lanquenets had first the Marquis of Guast with his troopes into Ast and Verceil, who by his retreat left Pignorol, Chinas, Montcallier, and other places abandoned to these new Conquerors. But at the first, want of the chiefe finewes of warre, makes the Italian bands to mutine, whereby our men lose ten or twelue dayes, during the which the Marquis had leisure to hasten his Lanquenets, leauied by the elder brother William Duke of Furtemberg.

Humieres had no sooner pacified the Italians with a portion of their pay, but he frames an enterprise vpon Ast, where the Marquis had left his brother-in-law, Don Anthony of Aragon, Lieutenant for the Emperour, with two thousand foot, and two hundred horse. The Lanquenets require the charge to make the approaches, and take it from Iohn Paul de Cere, who had a meaning to discharge it well. About midnight Humieres comes speedily to see their lodgings & finds nothing done. Some exclaiming first, would haue made their cause good: others storme (their pay being now out) and protest, that if it be not satisfied, they will wrap vp their ensignes, and found a retreat. They had reason, it is an ordinarie course, when as the chiefe force of an armie consists in a mercinarie Nation. F Humieres searcheth all the purses in the Campe, makes for euery company five hundred Crownes, and with this bone did somewhat satisfie their greedinesse. But in the meane time the besieged, giuing the alarme to the Campe, they bring in seuen companies of foot, & three hundred horse to their succours. Thus the small likelihood to force the town, and lesse to finish it, seeing that for want of pay, the strangers were no men of resolution, Humieres leaues the towne of Ast, to surprize that of Alba. About eight hundred Spaniards, were parred from Alexandria to enter into it: Iohn Paul de Cere meets them, chargeth and defeateth them, so as at the arrival of the French, the Citizens of Alba vnto furnished furnished of souldiers, yeelding to the yoke of obedience, gaue occasion to them of A Quiers to follow their example.

This absence of the armie made Cesar of Naples, Gouverneur of Vlpian, a man active and vigilant, but vnfortunate in his enterprises, to attempt Turin. Turin had in it but two companies of foot vnder de Wartis and d'Angars, weake forces for a place of such importance, yet the Inhabitants were well affected to this Crowne. Cesar laboured a Corporall, a Gascon, to deliuer him the next day of his guard, a bulwarke of the towne right against our Ladies Church. Such base people should neuer know the day nor houre of their watch. The night being come, he brings ten ensignes of foot, and some three hundred horse: the souldier giues him notice by a signe, of the most conuenient place to plant his B Ladders, he sets them vp, and before the alarme was in the towne, hee puts fine ensignes into the bulwarke: two or three base souldiers whom the traytor had of purpose drawn in with him, fued themselves by flight.

Boutieres Gouverneur of Turin hearing the alarme, goes into the street, followed only with the Suisses of his guard, and some Gentlemen: hee findes the towne-men armed, and resolute to doe their duties, he marcheth directly into the bastion with no armes but a Halberd, thurs the gate by which they came from the said bastion into the Towne, (the darkness of night had hindered the enemy from seeing it open, the which preferred the towne: for whilst that Cesar made fit his ladders to enter into the Towne, the alarme grew hot) Wartis arises with two hundred thor, and forceth the enemy to abandon the C bulwarke, hauing loste seven or eight-score men, at whose departure the souldier payed for his offence with his life.

This attempt, the bad inclination of the foraine forces; the quarrels betwixt Cesar Fregosse, who led the fore-ward, and John Paul de Cere, Colonell of the Italian foot; the controuerfies of Brissac with Amibal of Consigua Earle of Lanioulaire, six thousand Spaniards, and twelve hundred horse, being entred into Montcallier, and threatening Turin, but weakly furnished with men: made Humieres to leaue Julio Vrsin in Alba with a thousand foot vnder his charge, and a thousand more vnder Artigue-Dien and Peter Streffy: in Quierras Cesar Fregosse with the like number of men, such as he would choose, and with the rest of the armie turnes head towards the enemy to surpris him at Montcallier. The D
Marquis of Guast aduertised of this designe, puts the rest of his troops into the said place. This enterprife proving fruitlesse, and Humieres not able any longer to hold his strangers without pay, he sent Francis Earle of Pontremie with sufficient forces, to make good Pignerol against the Marquis, who threatened to surpris it, to take from the French all means of retreat and succours in keeping the passage of Suze. Then hee supplied Turin with two thousand French foot, commanded by Allegre and Lasigny: Quiers with a thousand men of the bands of Aramont, besides eight hundred which the Knight Assal gouernour of the place had: Saullan with a thousand Italians vnder the command of John of Turin, leading the Lansquenets and the rest of the troops into the Marquiere of Salusses, to attend newes and money from the King for their pay: for want whereof this E armie serued to small vse. The Marquis of Guast seeing Humieres retired into Pignerol, whither the violence of the Lansquenets had driuen him, there to attend their pay: hee sent thirteene ensignes of foot, to Silvia a small towne vpon the mountaine, to keepe the valley of Suze in subiection, and by the taking of the Castles of Riuele and Villane, to take from them of Turin all means to heare newes out of France. So the way by the valley of Suze being cut off, and that of Pignerol by the means of Montcallier, Carignan, and Carmagnole which the enemy enioyned: Humieres being ill obeyed by the Lansquenets (whom they forced to pay vpon their old roll, although their number of ten thousand were halfe decreased) and those of Turin prest with want of victuals, and money, which they could not endure after S. Andrews day, the King was in danger to lose F

The Marquis (having taken the towne of Quiers by assault, with Alba and Quierras by composition) was become master of the field, and held Pignerol, a great and vast Towne, so freightly begirt, as no victuals might enter, when as the King by a supply of five and twenty thousand Crownes, which he sent to Boutieres, made an entry for the Countrey men to bring victuals to Turin, which before was shut vp, for want of payment for their warres: then he caused the bands of the Earle of Furstemberg, and of Nicholas de Ruffis to march

A march to Lions, vnder the command of the Daulphin his sonne, and of the Lord Secward, with ten thousand French foot, commanded by Montenac, followed by fourteene hundred men at armes, and light-horse, attending a leaue of fourteene or fifteene thousand Suisses, which the Earle of Tende made for his Maiesties seruice: resolute to march after himselfe in person. And not to leaue his Realme vnfortified, hee left the gouernment of Paris, and the Ile of France, Picardy, Normandie, and other Countreys about, to the Duke of Orleans his yonger sonne: he sent backe the Duke of Guise into Bourgongne, and Champagne: Henry King of Nauarre his brother-in-law into Guienne and Languedoc, and the Lord of Chastebauriant into Britanie.

B The Daulphin accompanied with Anthony Duke of Vendosme, parts from Lions about the tenth of October, gathers together in Dauphine some 3000 Legionaries, and the remainders of Humieres armie, which were come out of Alba and Quierras: he forceth the passage of Suze against Cesar of Naples, who kept it with ten thousand men, chafeth them two miles, wins all their baggage, makes the Marquis to retire all his forces to Riuele and Montcallier, leaueing Pignerol at libertie, opens a way by the taking of Villane from 200 Spaniards which were cut in pieces, addes to his conquests Riuela abandoned by the Marquis, turnes head to the enemy, incamped on this side the Riuier of Po, right against Montcallier: but hauing the bridge to fauour him, to retire when he pleased, hee begins the skirmish with his light-horsemen against theirs, kills many, takes some, and loseth few, C he chafeth all their troops beyond the bridge, who breaks it after them, but with the hazard of their liues that remained behinde. Those of Montcallier, come with a great shew of affection and repaire it: and then receiue into their towne all the souldiers which the Daulphin had left to guard the riuier, whilst the armie passed at Carignan. The Marquis dislodging still, left in Quiers Don Anthony of Arragon his brother-in-law, with 4000 men, and himselfe recovered the Countrey of Aft.

Thus our men being at liberty on all sides, become masters of Poirien, Rieu de Quiers, Villeneuse of Aft, Montafé, Antignan, and of all other forts, vnto the gates of Aft, of Quierras, Alba and Fossan, whither they retired all the come of the Countrey, which did serue for the victualling of the campe and places of conquest. About thirty thousand D sacks of corn, which the Marquis had gathered together, but had not leisure to bring from Montcallier, and much other munition found in diuers places, supplied Turin for a yeare. During these adions, the King comes accompanied with the Earle of Saint Paul, the Cardinal of Lorraine, and many other great personages. And as his Maiesty rooke council at Carignan, with the Daulphin, and the Lord Secward, newes come vnto him, that the Garison of Vulpian kept the valley of Suze, and for that Riuele nor Villane had any horsemen, to stay their incursions, they did wonderfully annoy those that followed the campe. He presently sent away Martin du Bellay, and very happily. They had newly seized vpon six moyles laden with money for the payment of the armie, driving the moyles, and the treasurers in the midst of them. Du Bellay passeth the riuier of Douaire, intercepts their E way, and ouertakes them three miles from Vulpian, he makes them to leaue the moyles, and onely with the losse of the treasurers, which they caried away, brings them safe to Riuele.

The conclusion of this Councell was, to besiege Quiers, where the King would imploy the first fruits of his last forces. But the great Commander of battailes, giues him a more fauourable issue. The riuier of Picardy had giuen liberty to the Queene of Hungarie, and likewise to the King to send some Gentlemen into Spaine, to mediate a peace, or a general truce: and the Deputies had so well performed their charge, as a suspension of armes was concluded on either side, from the eight and twentieth of Nouembre, vntill the two and twentieth day of February following, whereby euery one enioying that F whereof he should be made seized at the time of the publication, the garisons of Turin, Vordin, Saullan, Montdeuis and other frontier places, were not slacke to enlarge their limits as farre as they could, nor to put men in the Kings name into all the small places, and castles thereabouts.

Three dayes after the truce was proclaimed, the Marq: of Guast, came to kisse the Kings hand, whom hee receiued very graciously, and the King making the Lord of Magnan gouernour of Piedmont, he left William of Bellay his Lieutenant generall in Turin: Francis Earle of Poitune at Pignerol, the Baron of Castel-per at Saullan: Charles of Digos at Piedmontois at Montdeuis (he had surprized, and kept the place from the Imperials, A when they were the strongest in field.) Lodovick of Birague, at Vorlin, and Nicholas of Rufficis at Carmagnole: he dismissed his Suisses, and taking his way to France, he sent the Cardinal of Lorraine from Lions, with Montmorency the Lord Steward, to Locrate, where the Emperours Deputies should meet, concerning a peace betwixt their Majesties. The confusions had bene great, and their spleene not easily to bee pacified, which made them to prolong the truce for fixe moneths more. After all these toyles, and painefull endeavors, the loyall service of the most worthy, deferred reward; which made the King, being at Molins, to advance Anne of Montmorency to bee Constable of France, the place being voyde by the reuolt of the Duke of Bourbon: hee gaue his place B to Marshall of Monticau, and that of the Marshall la Marke deceased, to Claude of Annebault. It was now time to suppress these infernall furies, which had so long troubled the quiet of Christendome with such fatal combustions, and that the Pope (doing the office of a common father) should therein imploy his authority. Hee procures an C interview of these two great Princes at Nice, and himselfe assists, being about threefore and fifteene yeeres of age, in the beginning of Iune. Their mutuall hatreds had taken too deepe rootes in their hearts, and that fatal and bloody checke, which his brother Ferdinand King of Hungary had lately receiued from the Turke, had nothing mollified the Emperour. Time doth pacifie discontentes. Ten yeeres were sufficient, or neuer, to dispose both the one and the other to a general peace. The Pope therefore seeing that by the full deciding of their quarrels, hee could not confirme a final peace, hee propounded a truce for ten yeeres, the which they concluded betwixt their Countries, and subiects, and then euery one returned home. But Charles was borne to bee a perpetuall scourge to this Realme, and many yeeres shall not passe before hee put vs in alarm with an unworthy and base motive of new confusions.

policy.

Let vs now see how he worketh like a Foxe, to produce effects for his owne benefit. The Gantois being oppressd with many extraordinary tributes, had spoiled the Emperors officers: who growing desperate, and seeking to fortifie themselves against the reuenging wrath of Charles, they secretly offer obedience to the King, as to their Soueraigne Lord. The King performing the dutie of a good brother, and faithfull friend, giues the Emperour D rout intimation thereof. The Emperour desisteth by some notable examples, to suppress the Gantois infolencies. But the passages thither were not very certaine. By Germany, the Protestants might some what hinder him. By sea, a storme might as well cast him vpon the coast of England, as vpon Flanders: the diuisions hee had with the King of England by reason of the diuorce of Queene Catherine his Aunt, would not suffer him to take any assurance from him: France was very commodious for him to this end, he demands the Kings word for his safety, and among other toyles, hee promiseth, in case hee giues him an assured passage, to ieiue him, or some of his children, in the Duchy of Milan. But (oh notable policy) he desires not to be prest to signe these promises. To the end (saith he) it may not be spoken, that I haue done them by constraints to obaine a passage, and requires the King to take his word for assurance. This was to build a castle vpon a quick sand.

The Emperours
passage through France.

Notwithstanding the King iudgeth another mans heart and intentions by his owne, hee grants his brother-in-law such assurance as hee demands: Being sicke, he parts from Compiegne, to goe to meet with him; sending his two sonnes to Bayonne, to receiue him, and to accompany him to the place where the King and he might meet (which was at Chastelleraud) giues him authority to make entrees, and to deliuer prisoners, in many townes of the realme, as if he had been in his owne country: casts him in all places, causeth him to be conducted by his children vnto Valentignies, the first place of his owne territories, where he is moued to confirme that which he had promised before his departure from Spaine, but it was to no effect: The Emperour desires the manner, vntill hee had conferred with his Councill of the Low countries: it may be hee would haue kept his promise, if hee had found the Gantois so desperately affected, as he must needs haue iudged them. And the Constable, who (relying vpon the word of such a Prince as the Emperour) had giuen the King assurance, was for this cause in disgrace with his Majesty, and

A and retired himselfe from Court to his house: from whence we shall see him called and restored to his dignities.

Let vs obscure the craft and subtiltie of the Spaniard, to bring the King into dislike with his friends and allies. The Venetians were ill satisfied of the league they had made with the Emperour against the great Turke: their treasure was wasted, and their estates (after that great and famous victorie in Hungary) were in danger. They were (for their owne safety) ready to enter into a treatie of peace, or of a long truce with the Turke. To breake this, the Emperour solliciteth the King to enter into this common league, and the King perswaded thereunto, sends (by his instigation) the Marshall of B Annebault (Lieutenant General for his Majestic in Piedmont, by the death of Montiscan, lately deceased) to goe in company with the Marquis of Guast to Venice, and the Lord of Gié to the Pope, as solemne Ambassadors, and to giue them hope, that the King of France ioyning his forces to theirs, all ioyntly together, would make an armie both by sea and land, to extirpate the race of the Ottomans out of Europe. The Emperour strucke three strokes with one stone, he dissuaded the Venetians from all accord with the Turke. He bred a hatred and dislike betwixt the King and the Turke. And put the King of England in ieiuness: who could not well like of this great alliance and fraternitie, which the Emperour did cunningly make shew to haue with the King. So as the English being perswaded, that the King had with-drawne his loue, he grew strange, C and began to assure himselfe of the Emperour. And which is more, all the Kings other confederates, seeing that honourable and respectiue entertainment giuen to the Emperour, and the Ambassadors of both their Majesties, ioyntly sent into Italy, they conceiued many causes of distrust, blaming the King in leauing them at need to the Emperors mercie, from whom they could not expect (if he did vanquish them in warre) any better vantage then that of the Gantois.

This yeere William Budeus Master of Requests, died at Paris, a man of singular learning and godlinesse, to whom all men that loue learning are much bound, hauing by his learned and laborious writings, eased them of much paine: whose credit with the King, and the Cardinal Du Bellay, caused honest pensions, according to that age, to be giuen to those D whom we call the Kings readers, and professors, a fountain from whence are sprung so many great Riues, that in the end they are spread ouer all Europe. The extreme heat, and great droughts, did likewise make this season the more memorable, by the name which it carries yet, of the yeare of Roasted Vines. The Emperour hauing by his dissembling disappointed the King of his hopes, it was now needfull to satisfie his friends and allies, touching the truth of things past: for (to incense all the Potentates of Christendome against our King) the Emperour had vnder-hand giuen them to understand, that the King treating with him of matters to their prejudice. To this end he sent Cesar Fregose to the Senate of Venice, and Anthony Rençon a Gentleman of his chamber to the great Turke. The Marquis of Guast hath some notice thereof, and to surpriseth these Ambassadors with their instructions and Letters of credit (which notwithstanding were not found about them, the Lord of Langey, who could not disswade them from the passage of Po, had so preuailed with them, as they sent their instructions vnto him, to conuey them vnto Venice another way:) he sets watches vpon all the passages, especially vpon the Po, knowing well that Rinçon, a bigge fat man, would rather passe by water then by land, and causeth them to be murdered in their barke, passing at Cantalone, three miles aboue the mouth of Tesin, putting all the Watermen into the dungeon of the Castle of Paua, as well those which carried the Spaniards, that were the murderers, as the French: they were souldiers of the garison of Milan, and of the said castle. An odious and reproachfull act. Some packets coming from Venice to the King, and from the King to Venice, were surpris'd, and the F Carriers wounded by men attired after the Marquisses deuce.

The Kings Ambassadors surpris'd and murdered.

But see the notable policy of Langey, to discouer the truth of a fact which the Marquis thought to haue managed so secretly, as it should neuer haue come to light. Gifts (sayes an Ancient) pacifie both gods and men. Langey findes a meane, by money, to fyle a sunder the grates of the prison towards the Castle ditch, with secret Files: draws forth the Mariners, winnes some of the faction to the Kings seruice; learns from them the number, the names, and the nation of the murderers, the order, the manner, and the houre of the murder, and all other auailable circumstances to incounter the dissembling of the Marquis,

The Emperour goes to Alger without successe.

Marquis, who making a good shew of a bad cause, seemed to enquire carefully of the crime, by the Captain of the Iustice at Milan. The Emperour was then at the Diet at Ratisbone, where he granted an Interim to the Protestants, that is to say, untill a Councell were held to determine all controversies of religion, every one should peaceably enjoy the belief and ceremonies whereof he then made profession: and in doing this, the restoring of the Duke of Savoy to all his estates, was granted at the Germans charge.

Soone after, William of Roquedolse, Lieutenant Generall for Ferdinand King of Hungary, was defeated before Buda, with the losse of twenty thousand Germans. It was a great shame for the Emperour, being neere to so mournfull and fatal a checke, if hee should not employ his forces in his brothers favour. He undertakes againe the voyage of Alger in Afrique, with an intent (that if passing through Italy, hee should finde the Kings affaires disordered, and his forces dispersed) to attempt some thing against him, making account that the King would not faile to be reuenged of the violence and wrong done vnto him, in the persons of his Ambassadors. But the good prouision which the King had made in Prouence, and in Piedmont, by Langey his Lieutenant generall, caused him to passe on without any further attempt. Being at Luques, he had conference with the Pope, and the King sent his Ambassador vnto them, to demand satisfaction for the crime: but he was put off with shifts. The enterprise of Alger was vnfortunate, the violence of the winds, the continuall raine, the stormes and haile, with all the iniuries of the ayre, had conspired against him: breaking some of his ships, he was beaten backe with great danger of his person, and losse of his men.

Hitherto the Marquis had as concertly as he could, disguised the matter: but finding now that all men had discovered his deuices, that notwithstanding the death of the Ambassadors, he could not decypher the Kings designe, that the King demanded as well from the Emperour, as from the Estates of the Empire, satisfaction for this foule fact: Now to make his cause seeme good, he writes to the Estates which were assembled againe at Ratisbone, for their common defence against the Turke, whereby hee maintains, that hee committed no act that might touch him for breach of the truce, and in shew to iustifie himselfe of the crime wherewith he was charged: There are (saith he neither denying nor aduoyning the fact) two wayes of iustificatiō, the one ciuill, the other Knightly. I offer to maintaine ciuilly, that there is no breach of truce growne by me, and to deliuer into our holy fathers hands (the protector of the truce) both my selfe, and all those the King shall thinke culpable of this act, to the end the truth might be knowne: and if any Knight my equall wil charge me with any such fact, and proue his saying by armes, I will maintaine that he hath spoken falsely, and as often as he shall charge me with the like, so often shall he speake falsely. We do often shadow a lie with such good wordes, as it giues it a colour of truth. But did hee thinke by this brauadoe, to proue his innocency? the retreat of those murderers to him, bringing them all prisoners that were left aliue within the boars, to the end there should bee no means to discover this infamous murder: the detention hee made of the Warer-men, whom he afterwards transported into other prisons vnder his command: the penall Edicts he did publish in places where the fact might bee knowne, against them that should bee found discouraging of this action: the ill vsage of them that had spoken of it: the fauours, honours, and aduancements giuen to them that had bene the actors: the depositions of prisoners freed by Langey, were not all these sufficient witnesss, to cry vengeance against the Marquis? Langey answering to the pretended iustifications of the Marquis, was the Knight to make tryall thereof, by the one or the other way. But the Marquis had no such meaning.

We haue heard how the King demanded of the Emperour (being in conference with the Pope at Luques) satisfaction of the murder, audaciously and against all diuine, naturall, and humane lawes, committed vpon the persons of two of his especial seruants, men of estate, and of reputation by their births, hauing by their meritis deserved, the one an honorable degree amongst his chiefe Gentlemen: the other an especial place amongst the greatest Noblemen. They would haue satisfied him with frivolous reasons and excuses, perswading him to leaue the abolition of their blood, to the forgetfulness of time, which might haue bene an imputation to his Maiestie, either of want of wit and iudgement, or of valour & courage. Profit vrged the King, honor prickt him forward, and necessity constrained him, to vs: those means which the law of Nations did allow that moued the King to warre.

A to him which doth acknowledge no other superiour: and three chiefe reasons did vrged him thereunto. Vnder this colour of peace, the Emperour had a thousand practices vpon the frontiers of his Realme: and the King had no sooner cut off one of this Hydras heads, but presently there riseth vp an other or many moe. Moreouer, this truce allowed the traffike and conference of eithers subiects, by means whereof so many treasons were practised. Neither could he draw his subiects from the commerce of the Low-countries, belonging to the Emperour, without expresse prohibitions, the which by consequence would argue hostilitie. But that which did most moue a noble and generous spirit: hee had good and certaine intelligence, that the Emperour (seeing warre proclaimed, in B case he did not within a certain time make satisfaction for the aboue-named murders) made his account, that vnder colour of zeale to the common-weale of Christendome (filling the eares of the whole world with a goodly and great enterprise, against the enemies of the faith) he would raise great forces, and prouide great preparation, at the cost and charge of his most credulous subiects, lying most open and neereft vnto the Turkes inuasion, and conuince the most Christian King to assist him either with men or money.

If then the fumes of an African or Turkish voyage, had been proclaimed through the world, before that warre were denounced betwixt these two Princes, those which were not acquainted with the deuices of the one, would haue imputed the stay of so holy an enterprise to the other. Let vs adde, that howsoeuer, he must entertaine men, both in Italy,

C and vpon the frontiers of Languedoc and Prouence, for that both a truce, and warre were of equal charge vnto him. There were two means to begin the warre: the one profitable and lesse honest. Many thrust him on, some with discontent, others with reuenge, some with couetousnesse, some with desire of inuouation, or some other priuate passions, offering to seize vpon diuers places for his Maiestie, the conquest whereof, might bee a worthy reward for a long and doubtfull warre. The other was more honest, but of lesse profit, iust, and not couetous. The Duchy of Luxemburg, and the county of Roussillon were worthy motives in generall, besides the priuate interest of inuasion, which the King had against his enemy. The Emperour did possesseth them both, without any lawfull title.

D Luxemburg, by the succession of Charles & Philip dukes of Bourgogne, his great grandfather, and his father, who had by force dispossessed the true and lawfull Lords of the said house, who had substituted our Francis, by a new grant into their rights and actions, besides the ancient rights, which the Kings of France haue euer pretended thereunto, and especially, since the purchase which Lewis Duke of Orleans, brother to King Charles the sixth made. Besides that the Lords of la Marche had of late transported their pretensions vnto him, of the said Duchy. Roussillon, by the too scrupulous restitution of Charles the eighth, being abused and deceived (saith the original) by Frier Oliuer Maillart, his confessor, a man in shew holy, but in effect an Hypocrite, and corrupted with money by the King of Arragon, to sell and deceive his master. King Charles hauing no power to make this alienation, in preiudice of the Crowne, neither the King of Arragon, nor his successors, accomplishing E the conditions annexed to the contract, Charles now Emperour, was but an vsurper, and a violent possessor.

The situation of Luxemburg was commodious to receive the Germanes that came vnto the King: but more, by this approach, to fauour the duke of Cleues, whom the Emperour did threaten to make the poorest man in Christendome. So the King sent Charles duke of Orleans, his youngest sonne, accompanied with six hundred men at armes, six thousand French, and ten thousand Lanquenets, and Claude duke of Guise commanding the army vnder him: Francis of Bourbon duke of Anguien, brother to Anthony D. of Vendosme, the Earle of Aumale, eldest sonne to the duke of Guise, the Lords of Sedan, Jamets, Rochefort, du Maine, la Guiche and many others, men of resolution, valour, and experience. And F for the enterprise of Roussillon, Henry his eldest sonne Dauphin of Viennois, assisted by the Marshal Annebault, for the chiefe conduct of the warre: and for an assistant in those military toiles, the Lord of Montecat, Lieutenant for his Maiestie in Languedoc. Patpignan is the chiefe citie of this countrey: the onely barre and bulwarke of Spain towards the South, the conquest whereof drew after it not onely the losse of that which the Emperour possessed on this side the mountains, but layed open all the Prouince beyond it: and the King conceiued, that assailing it (being vnfurnished of many necessities, for the maintaining of a great siege) either honour, or feare of losse, would draw the Em-perour to fight, and with this hope, he prepared the rest of his forces to march in person. A But this was but a great shew without any effects.

The Duke of Orleans having assembled his troopes betwixt Verdun and Dun-le-Chateau, he besieged, battered, and took Danuiller, a place of Luxembourg: where there came to joyne with him the Baron of Hedeccq sometimes Lieutenant to the Earle of Furstemberg, the Earles of Mansfield, and Piquelin, and the Colonel Reichro, with their regiments of Lansquenets, making about ten thousand men. Then came Count Reingraue to the Kings service, a yong Nobleman and resolute, who promised in his person many good parts, as we shall hereafter see. Danuiller being burnt, as not defensible, had opened the way to Luxembourg: but newes comes, that a part of the wall was false at Yury, the Duke turnes the head of his armie thither, makes his approaches, plants three Cannons and a halfe vpon the brinke of the ditch, but vndiscreetly, without gabions, without trenches (this was to contemne the enemy too much) and without any couering for them that guarded the artillerie. The garison sallies forth in the open day, in view of the arrie, and tie ropes vnto the Ordinance, but the weight of them was the let they could not draw them into the ditch, whereupon they burnt their cariages and dismount them. They make trenches, and batter it towards Ardennes: they make a reasonable breach, but it was not assailed. In the midst of the breach, the besieged had a Calsmate in the bottome of their trench, the which could not bee taken from them without great slaughter of them that should attempt it. They draw from Sedan, Mouzon and other neere townes a supply of artillerie and munition, and make a new batterie: the besieged (being amazed) demand a parle. The bastard of Sambret, the Lord of Noyelles, Hannuyer, capitaine Famas, Gyles de Leuant, and others, vnto the number of two thousand men, defended the place, the which could not be assaulted without hazard and losse of men. So it was concluded, they should depart with their baggage, and to cary with them fix faucons with munition to discharge them six times a peece.

Then William Duke of Cleues fortified the Kings armie with ten thousand Lansquenets and sixteene hundred horse, led by Martin de Roslan Marshall of Gueldres, William had lately espoused (but without any consummation of marriage, by reason of the Infants baseage) Joan daughter to Henry of Albrecht, and of Marguerite the Kings sister, whom D hereafter we may see, by the nullitie of this contract, to marry with Anthony of Bourbon, Duke of Vendosme, and of their marriage was borne Henry the fourth, the French King and of Navarre, lately murdered.

Luoy (which men held the strongest place in the country, and best furnished with men, artillerie, and munition) by their yielding, caused Arlois to open her gates at the first summons. Luxembourg seemed of a harder issue. It was kept by three thousand foot, and foure hundred horse. But the trenches, the approaches, and a breach made, although not reasonable to giue an assault (considering the trench was very deepe cut off the Rocke) did so amaze the besieged, as they yielded to depart with their baggage. The Earles of Mansfield and Piquelin promised to defend it against all men: but wee shall shortly see how E they will discharge their duties.

Montmedy a small place situate vpon a Mountaine, so as they could not approach but on the one side, moued with this happy successe, yielded at the first view of the Cannon. To conclude, such was the successe in this expedition, as onely Tionville remained in the Emperors hands of all the Duchie of Luxembourg. But the great desire the Duke of Orleans had to be at the battell, which, in shew, was to be giuen before Pargignan, drew him to Montpellier, where the King remained attending the progresse of the said siege of Pargignan, to be ready to receiue the Emperour, if he came to succour it.

The Duke had no sooner dismissed his armie, and turned his backe to Luxembourg, leaving the Duke of Guise as Lieutenant General for the King, but the Imperials presented themselves before the towne, and receiued it very easily of the Earles of Mansfield and Piquelin: and by the recouerie of Montmedy did wonderfully endamage all the French troopes at Senay, and along the Meuse, if the Duke (assembling what he could of those companies, he had dismissed) had not chased them from Montmedy, before they had any time to bethinke themselves. A stratagem which did pacifie the Kings wrath, for the dismissing of so gallant and braue an armie, in the heate of their most honorable and happy successe. It is commonly laid. That youth can doe what age doth know but

A but cannot doe. What did this youthfull escape of the Duke of Orleans benefit, preferring a desire of vncertaine glory, before the fruits of an assured conquest? No increase of his reputation, small assistance vnto the Kings troopes, if hee had beene vpon the point of battell, and a great prejudice to his Maiesties affaires: for this voyage of Rouffillon, being wonderful sumptuous, and of no profit, he might with great honor haue continued his victories the which he had so happily begunne.

Let vs now obserue the successe of this enterprife. Amnebauld having brought vnto the Dauphin, being at Auignon, eight thousand Suiſſes, six thousand French foot, of the old bands, whereof Charles of Coffer, Lord of Brillac was Colonel: six thousand Italians, B Your hundred men at armes, and sixteene hundred light-horse, whereof the Lord of Termes was General: and Montespar hauing ioyned with him at Narbonne, with his Legion of Languedoc, and part of that of Guienne, six thousand Lansquenets, and a great number of Suiſſes, newly leauied, who being ioyned with their country-men, made about foure-teen thousand, so as the whole army was esteemed forty thousand men of all Nations; two thousand men at armes, and two thousand light-horse. The rough entertainment the Imperials gaue them at the castle of Saulles, with their Cannon and Culuerin, made them to coniecture, that the intelligences which Montespar (the first fire-brand of this attempt) pretended to haue, were vncertaine.

And what successe could Pargignan promise them, finding it very well fortified with C platforms, well manned, and well furnished with artillery and munition? what assistance could the assistants haue in a plaine field, behind gabions which they could not fill but with sand? The long time which was spent in assembling so many sundry Nations, and the fruitlesse stay of Amnebauld, six or seuen weekes in Piedmont, had giuen the defendants time to prevent their enemies designs. Moreover, winter approached, and the Emperour might well keepe the place without hazarding of his person or trying the chance of battell, whereunto the King sought by all means to draw him. This was the meanes to take cold, and to consume himselfe in vaine. Vpon the first taine there had beene no meanes to retire this army, by reason of the floods which runne on all sides from the mountaines, the which the needresse of the sea makes to ouer-flow the champion country that lies neere D it, so as being shut vp betwixt two seas, and the mountaine, the enemy would easily haue preuailed. The King foreseeing these dangers, retired the Dauphin and his armie, knowing but too late, that he had beene ill serued. These flourishing troops, fresh and resolute, might haue beene most profitably employed in the Estate of Milan. But the assistance they gaue the King, to take Pargignan at the first, of two parties made him chooe the worst. Moreover, in an army there is alwayes some one of those that are of the Councell (being jealous, and enuying that any other should doe better) loue rather to crosse and frustrate designs, then to aduance them.

In the meane time, Anthony Duke of Vendosme, Gouernor and Lieutenant for the King in Picardy, suffered not his armes to rust: the enemy lurk in diuers places, which did E greatly annoy Ardres, and the country about Bologne: namely Montoire and Tournillon, the first being strong of situation, vpon a little hill, at the entry of the county of Oye, discouraging all that come out of Ardres. The other vpon the edge of the county of Bologne, going from Ardres to Saint Omers, belonging to the Count of Bures, one of the strongest places of the country. The taking and razing of these two, was the destruction of many others which held for them, and yet the enemy being the stronger in men, made some shew to try his forces.

But on the other side, the country of Piedmont, was left in prey to the enemy, by reason that Amnebauld, had caried away the troops for the enterprife of Pargignan. The Marquis embracing this occasion, assembled his forces at the bridge of Esture, a fine place F he had the riuers at commandement, and wherefoeuer he pleased, on this or the other side of Po, to assaile Piedmont. Langey Lieutenant for the King in Piedmont, to crosse the Marquis, drawes a company of 1200 out of euery towne, makes an enterprife vpon Cony, Quieras and Alba, being ill furnished with souldiers. The undertakers for Cony and Alba, wander in the night, and the day approaching, made their voyage fruitlesse. Ant. fari Gouernor of Saillan, and Cental of Riez, appointed for Quieras, planted their Ladders, notwithstanding the day breaking had giuen the alarme in the towne, they force it, and die the Castle hauing but one horse, and two sakes of meale in it, yielded after they had fasted six and thirty houres. Cental being made Gouvernor, manned it with two thousand A souldiers which he leaued as well vpon his owne lands as elsewhere.

The Marquis posted to succour them, but the distance of the places required three daies journey. He tooke his reuenge vpon Villeneufue of Ait, Poiring and Cambian, small places not fortified, resolute to passe the Po, and to campe at Marignan, to take from the French all the plaine country, and to famish Turin and Pignerol, with the other places which they held on this side, and to take from them all commodity of the Marquisate of Salusses. Five thousand foot, with some few men at armes, and light-horsemen, which Langey might oppose against the Marquis, who led fifteene thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, were not sufficient to stop his passage. But the industry of a well B aduised Commander, doth often that which force cannot effect.

He comes first to lodge at Carignan, fortifies himselfe speedily, and with continual skirmishes, keeps the Marquis from forcing of the passage. The waters were low (it was in the month of Iuly) they might easily wade through both above and beneath Carignan, these two armies had already camped fifteene dayes one against another, and the weakest in number was almost tired. Langey himselfe with his exceeding toile, was growne lame, yet hauing his tongue and his spirits free, hee winnes from the Imperiall army six thousand Italians: so as weakening his enemy, he fortifies himselfe. The Marquis amazed, and fearing lest these should suborne the rest of his troops, retires to Villedesfelon and Quiers.

It was a goodly thing to pursue them, and the Swisses had accepted of this proposition: but in stead of passing the Po, being warned by the perswasions of some, they turne their Ensignes directly to Pignerol, and Bontieres with them. Langey seeing himselfe abandoned, diuides his last com- C italians into Castles and Siria, betwixt Turin and Vulpian, leaues about fifty souldiers in the Castle of Carignan, and causeth himselfe to be caried to Turin.

The Marquis hearing of this sudden departure, sends to summon the place, and threatens the souldiers with death, if they attend the Cannon. They yeld at the summons. It was likely the Marquis would finish the fort which Langey had begunne. He therefore sends his brother Martin du Bellay, Gouvernor of Turin thither. Du Bellay sends before him D Capitaine Marville, and the Earle Maxime, Anthony de Sesse, his two Lieutenants, with about fifty horse, to obserue the enemies countenance. The Earle leaves his companion in guard, and by a Trumpet demands to speake with the Capitaine of Carignan. This Capitaine goes forth vnder his assurance (the Earle knew him well: he had sometimes serued him:) the Earle tels him they are sent to inuest him, attending the troops and the Artillery, and assures him, that if he makes any delay, it will not be in his power to saue his life. So the Capitaine terrified by this stratagem, deliueres the Castle to the Gouvernor of Turin, who tooke order the like incontinencie should not happen.

Then the Marquis, after two assaults, giuen in vaine to Chiuas, and repulsed by Ierome of Birague, he stayed at Casal, and Cesar of Naples, to open the way from Vulpian to Turin, hoping to recouer againe the Italians, lately fallen from him, came to assaile Cazelles. Langey discouering this designe, appointed the Cheuallier Villeagnon to command them, who lent backe his enemy with the losse of about foure-score men, leauing his ladders in the trenches, for a pawne of his vaine enterprise. Barges stop the passage from Pignerol to Ruel, and did then greatly annoy the places which obeyed the French, being in the midst of them. The Marquis retired from Casal could not succour it in many dayes. And therefore not to suffer the Swisses to grow dull for want of exercise, Bontieres by the commandement of Langey, parts from Pignerol with six Cannons, finds a Conuent fortified, ioyning to the Castle, without the taking whereof, the Castle might not be attempted: he makes a breach, takes it by assault in foure and twenty houres, and puts three hundred Spaniards which had the guard thereof, to the sword. Then hee approacheth the Castle, makes a breach, and compounds with the besieged, that if within six dayes the Marquis or some for him, came not strong enough to raise the siege, they should depart, with their liues.

The Marquis aduertised of this composition, postes to succour them, and Bontieres being too weak to attend to great a power, retires to Pignerol. In recompence whereof Langey takes from him the Castle of Montault and some other places in Montferrat, being hard

A hard to be recovered in winter. And to pull so trouble some a thorne out of his foot, hee causeth Vasse, Gouvernor of Pignerol, to practise Paul Monnet Capitaine of Barges: and then with some bands newly come from France, hee marcheth with speed to the said place, plants foure Cannons in battery, and by means of a hole which hee made in the Tower, although not reasonable for a breach, hee receiues both the place and Capitaine into the Kings seruice. The time fitted well for the warre, and the King being loath to lose the opportunity, and to employ some part of the forces that were retired from Rar-pignan, sent the Lord of Annebault, with the Regiment of Reichrac, into Piedmont, with the old Italian bands and the French, all the light-horse, and foure hundred men at armes.

B This new army, might in shew (whilest the Marquis of Graft was at Carmagnole, doubt- less where they would make their first attempt) haue surprised Cazal, and other places where Langey had intelligence. With this designe, he secretly kept boats vpon the River of Po: within foure and twenty houres they might goe downe by water, and the Marquis could not come to succour them in lesse then foure dayes march. Moreover, a friend, (whom he entertained neere vnto the Marquis) assured him to deliuer ouer vnto the French three thousand Lanquenets, and a thousand Spaniards, the which hee himselfe should lead and cause them to be surprised at a passage neere to Villedesfelon, where they had no means to escape: so as passing the Po by night, they had sent some foure hundred horse, betwixt Carmagnole and Villedesfelon, and opposed the army betwixt Villedesfelon and Quiers. Without doubt Langey being lame of his limbs, employed all his wits to discouer the Imperials purposes, and full to get from the enemy. But Enny hath alwayes sworne the ruine of Vertue. Some enuious persons breake off these two designes and disswaded Annebault from these great enterprises.

Langey seeing his proiect crost by his enemies, he parted from Turin with the Kings good leaue, to acquaint him with many things touching his Maiesties seruice, which hee could not commit to any mans report: but death preuented him at Saint Siphon, vpon the Mountaine of Tarare. The Marquis dislodging from Carmagnole, had left so few men in Cony, as a sudden assault had caried it at the first. To this end Annebault parts with foure Cannons, and caused Riuoles to come with the Regiment of Reichrac. The D bridges of Carignan and Montcallier were broken, so as the Lanquenets must passe at Turin. Du Bellay Gouvernor of the towne, and Lieutenant for the King on this side Po, prepares their lodging, to employ them as they passe. The Tower of Saint Bony, Chastillon, Saint Raphael, and other small places, vpon the Mountaine of Montferrat, did wonderfully annoy Turin: They could not goe to the places of Montferrat, whence the victuals (especially Wine) came in great abundance, without being dis- euered.

Hee mooues foure Cannons, departs with some troops of horse, three Ensignes of French- men of his garison, and the said Germanes, plants his artillery before Saint Bony, makes a hole, the Lanquenets giue the assault, force it, and put all they find armed to the sword, E except the Capitaine, who was hanged by the Law of Armes, for that he had endured the Cannon in so weak a place. Chastillon could not be battered but from another mountain opposite, and the horse could not draw vp the Artillery. The Lanquenets, felled with the prey of Saint Bony, force it vp by maine strength, and the besieged, being foure hundred good men of warre, terrified with the vface of Saint Bony, yeld to depart with their baggage. Those of Saint Raphael, and some other places, send to demand a composition and retreat. Onely Chastillon was defensible and commodious for the guard of the passage, all the rest were razed.

The Lanquenets hauing ioyned with Annebault, hee besiegeth Cony, ouerthrowes a piece of the wall, and giues an assault, but it was the place that was best fortified: a great F rampier behind the breach stayes our men, the which after an houres fight they are forced to abandon, with the losse of many men of seruice: and the night following, two hundred horse, and eight hundred foot being entred, made the Admirall to found a retreat, eight Cannons diuided into two batteries, had fo troubled the defendants, as not able to answer the diuers assaults, the towne in shew had bene wonne. But errors are knowne after they are committed. Vpon the retreat, the Earle Maxime, Anthony Marville, and Theode Bedaine an Albanos, encounter two hundred Imperiall horses, neere to Bra: they charge them, defeat, and take the most part of them, and the enemy hauing abandoned many small places, the Admirall reduceth to the Kings obedience Villeneuve de AA, Poring, A Cambian, and Riue de Quiers.

Winter did cut off all meanes of more happy successe. So dismissing his army, and sending the Lanquenets of Colonell Reiches into France, he tooke his way to Mont-Cenis: Mont-Cenis is subiect to tempests, as well as the sea. The way is straight, restrained by two mountains: when any storme ariseth, the gusts of wind doe gather together bals of snow, vpon the tops of the hills, which growing great as they roule downe, ouerthrow all they meet, and th. y to whom the straight is not knowne (for oftentimes the guides are lost) run many times into caues full of snow. Annebault was in this danger, most part of them that did accompany him, found their graues vnder the snow: some lost their eyes, others die B with cold, some returne benumbed of their feet, others of their armes and hands, and few of this whole troop enioyed his perfect health: himselfe was neere vnto a fatal end, if some men attending the end of the storme, in little caues, had not preferred him from the injury thereof.

the Rochellais.

At that time the King determined a reuenge against the inhabitants of Rochel, and the neighbour Islands which were mutined against the Kings officers, for the custome of salt. Being arrived at Rochel, they assembled all in the garden where his Maiesty did lie, confessed their rebellion publicly, and most humbly craued pardon for their offence. The fury of a King (saith the Wiseman) is the messenger of death: but a wise man will pacifie it. And the cheerefull countenance of a King is life, his fauour is like vnto a clond, bringing raine C in due season. The King moued with the pittifull noyse of this people, crying for mercy with their hands lift vp, kneeling on the ground, and teares in their eyes: did graciously remit their offence, freed the prisoners, deliuered their armes, and the keyes of the towne, commanded the Garisons both of foot and horse, to retire: received them into grace, and restored their liberties and priuiledges: without doubt, A King maintaines his Throne by clemency. In the meane time, many practices and enterprises are made against Turin.

vpon Turin.

The Marquis of Guast did at sundry times send vnto the Iudge of Turin, being borne at Quiers, a number of carts laden with wine: and within the vessels which was as long as the carts, many armes, harguebuzes, pertusians and corselets, to arme fourescore men, D which he should receive into his house, disguised like country-men, bringing victuals to the market: who at the first tumult they should heare at the towne-gate, should issue forth armed, and seize vpon the Court of guard in the market place, whilest that other souldiers armed with lackes and shirts of Maile, morians, swords, daggers, and targets, brought in five carts of hay, six in euery one (the hay being so cunningly layd, as cutting a cord within, the bundels would fall downe) should fight with the Guard at the Port, and fauour the entry of eight hundred horse, and five thousand foot, which should bee ready at the alarme. But the enterprife being discovered, made the Iudge to lose his head.

The enemy notwithstanding, lets not to proceed to the execution of his carts of hay, in the absence of Belley, whom his priuate affaires had called into France, after the death of E his brother: and the twelfth of February, Bontieres Lieutenant for the King at Turin, was well advertised of some carts which were preparing at Ligni (an Imperial towne neere vnto Vulpian) but not of the manner of the former enterprife. They hazard their hay, Raymonet commanding at the gate, causeth Perrichon his Lieutenant to thrust a pike through the first cart, he drawes it out all bloody, the souldiers leape forth, and the first thrusts Raymonet through the body with his sword. Raymonet takes him by the throat, and slabs him, his companions likewise come forth, force the Guard, seize vpon the armes that hang vp, and become masters of the port. Valiantly without doubt, but somewhat too soone for them, their succours were a mile or more from the first bridge.

Capitaine Saluadeur de Aguerre, (who deserues to be registred, hauing a great share in F the persecution of the towne) hauing then the guard of the place, hearing the alarme at the gate, and crying Sanoy, turnes head with his troop, repulseth the fue that were slipt out of the first cart, & goes directly to the gate. A well aduised Smith, who dwelt neere the gate, goes vp, and with a great hammer breaks the chaine, and lets downe the Portcullis, so as the Imperials could not enter. Bontieres and Montins arise, they shut the gates, kill some of the souldiers that were betwixt the gate and the Portcullis, the rest creepe vnder the Portcullis, being too stout, and Cesir of Naples (who not many dayes before, had left three

A three of his souldiers hanged at Turin, being executed for another conspiracy against the towne) seeing his enterprife made frustrate, retired without the losse of any, but of his Lieutenant, who was slaine with the Cannon.

On the other side, the Duke of Cleues made warre in Brabant, and had wonne some places from the Emperor. So as the Bourguignons turning all their forces against him, giue the Duke of Vendosme meanes to victuall Therouenne, to take Lilliers by composition, being a strong place, betwixt Aire and Betune, at the entry of the Marfiss: to burne the towne, beat downe the gates, and to make it and many other places about Therouenne, Saint Omer, Aire, Betune, altogether vnprofitable for the enemy. And to the Earle of B Aumale eldest sonne to the Duke of Guise, accompanied with the Lords of Laual, Saint Andre, Elcars, Dampierre, Chastaigneray, Eguilly, and a great number of other young Gentlemen, occasion to quicken the enemy with continuall skirmishes and assaults, most commonly carying away the aduantage.

candie.

The happy successe, and the fauourable season, inuited the King, in the beginning of June, to goe to field with all his forces, with an intent to assaile Auennes, being vnfortified of men. To this end he sends the Admirall of Briton, newly aduanced to that office, by the death of the Admirall of Briton, that attending his coming, he should inuest the towne; and sent to the Duke of Vendosme to come to him to Chateau Cambresis, which was the rendezvous for all the Army. So the King had the Admirals army, as a C foreward on his right hand, that of the Duke on his left, and his Maiesty in the midst. Longueual and Langcy, with their companies of men at armes, and La Lande with a thousand foot, goe before, by the Admirals commandments, they take the Fort by assault, which the enemies had built vpon the bridge of the Riuer of Estruel: and before the towne had any knowledge thereof, they put to the sword three hundred men that had the guard thereof. In this amazement, if they had furiously assailed the towne, in shew it had bene forceable. Notwithstanding Landrecy, the Castle of Emery, and some other places taken and fortified, gaue entry into the country of Hainault. Landrecy is situate vpon Sambre, a small riuer, but deepe and strong vpon the bankes, which issuing out of Oise, in the Duchy of Guise, runnes by Chastillon, Landrecy, Marolles, Emery, and Mapbeuge: then D it runnes into the Meuze neere to Namur. Beyond Sambre, is the Forest of Mormaut. Langcy foreseeing that the garison might vse the same stratagem they had done in the yeere 1521, had placed an hundred horse betwixt the forest and the towne, that being fortified by the Admirals coming, they might cut off the retreat to them that were assailed. But as we haue said elsewhere, Envy doth alwayes crosse braue designs. The Admirall in stead of fauouring the enterprife, calls them backe that were on the other side of the riuer, being ready to performe a worthy exploit. And the enemy seeing the way open, retires into the forest, and at their dislodging consumes the towne to ashes: and not able to saue any thing but the Church, they burne their victuals and munition, which was sufficient to feed the garison of the towne a whole yeare. To repaire and make it defensible, E the King gaue the government thereof to La Lande, who by a counter trench covered it from a mountain on the forest side, which looks into the towne, he made three great bulwarkes, and filled the Castle with earth to make a platforme, seruing as a flank to the bulwarkes.

Landrecy still

French.

Let vs marke another fault no lesse remarkable. The Duke of Vendosme marching by the high country of Arthois to the Rendezvous, had suddenly reduced Bapaume to his obedience. Anchinmont, with the souldiers and citizens of all sexes, being retired into the Castle, had but one Well, which being dried vp, in two dayes would haue brought them to the Dukes mercy, when as he receiues a second charge from the King, that vpon paine of disobedience, and to incur his disgrace, he should come the same day to him to Chateau Cambresis: so as he left the besieged at liberty.

F The King hauing his forces vnted, he found the number to be about eighteen hundred men at armes, whereof the Commanders were, the Dauphin, the Dukes of Orleans, Vendosme and Guise, the Earles of Saint Paul, Aumale and Briffac, the Marshall of Biez, the Admirall Dampierre, Maugeron, Baiffy, Longueual, Bonneual, and many others, the number whereof would be tedious: eighteen hundred light horse vnder Briffac, their Colours twelue thousand Legionaries, Pikards, Normans, and Champanois, and twelve thousand low Germanes. The Castle of Emery might be fortified, and serue to second Landrecy.

Landrecy. To that end the King sent the Daulphin with part of the army, and some artillery. The Lord of the place was at the warres in Gueldres, and they which kept it, yielded vpon the first approaches. Langcy with his company of men at armes, and an Ensigne of the Legion of Picardy was left for the defence & fortification of the place. The taking of Barlemont, another Castle vpon the same riuier, opened the passage vnto Bains, and to the gates of Monts in Hainault. Maubeuge was the enemies store-houfe, when as hee made any attempt against this Realme, and the towne being vnfurnished of men, able to attend the Cannon, the inhabitants yielded to the Daulphin, who (leaving Heyle Capitaine of a thousand men of the legion of Picardy, and Saint Yue with five hundred) he retired to the army.

The army camped tenne leagues from Bains, and Bains was the ordinary retreat of the Imperials returning from the warre in Guelderland, who for the distance of the French campe, did lodge securely in the suburbs and villages about: considering that there were no horsemen at Maubeuge, Langcy giues intelligence to Maugeron, that they had meanes to doe a braue exploit with honor and profit. Hee comes with his company of men at armes, and fourescore of the Admirals, and parting by night, they take (in their passage) Capitaine Saint Yue, with fifty Harguebuziers on horsebacke, of the garison of Maubeuge, they lay an ambush halfe a league on this side Bains, within a wood, and send La Mot Gondin Lieutenant to Maugeron, who remained sicke at Maubeuge, to enter the suburbs of Mons, and by the firing of some houfes, to take from them of the towne the knowledge of the enterprise of Bains: and then to retire themselves into the ambush, in case they were charged: and they send Marville, Lieutenant to Langcy, (who commanded the ambush) the Vidame of Chartres, la Rochevignon, and the Harguebuziers on horsebacke, to surpris the Imperials in their suburbs, at the breake of day. Euery thing was executed accordingly. About fixscore horse, arising the night before, slept at their ease: they awake them somewhat ruddily, and cary them away prisoners, spoile the villages about, returne to diuide their rich booty at Maubeuge. At the same time the Earle of Aumale tormented the garisons of Auenues with continuall skirmishes: but fill with the decrease of their men, and no losse of his.

The Imperials surprised at Bains.

The prisoners of Bains had assured the King, that the towne was vnfurnished with men of defence. He therefore sends the Daulphin and the Admirall to subdue it to his obedience. But at the first approach they found themselves abused. The Imperials had the next day after the alarme put fifteen hundred Lansquenets into the towne. Moreover, for want of well viewing the fort, they had indifferently planted the Cannon against the strongest part: the battery did small harme, many died there, and many returned wounded. Allegre amongst others, a young man, who for his age had made good prooffe of his person, lost his life. Gaspard of Coligny Lord of Chastillon (he shall hereafter play many parts vpon the Theater of this History) for one of the first exploits of his armes, had a shot in the throat. So the great number of Germanes which entred into Bains, the want of munition and victuals (the Daulphin having brought but for two dayes) the enemies which assembled at Monts, and at Quesnoy le Comte, the danger the King did foresee in keeping his troops diuided, the feare that going in person to ioyne with his sonne (with whom were his chiefe forces, he should be constrained to leaue the fortifications of Landrecy imperfect: his Maistie drawes the Daulphin vnto him, he causeth him to beat downe the defences of Maubeuge in his passage: and (for that the Emperour was wont to assemble his forces there that came out of Germany and the Low-Countries) to fire the towne. Trelon and Glavon, places betwixt Auenues and Simay, did greatly annoy the frontiers of Tierasse and Champagne. Bonneval, and Stenay, Lieutenant to the Duke of Anguien (who was in Prouence, as we shall shortly see) had commission to prevent it. Being come to Trelon with two thousand French, and foure thousand Lansquenets, those within at the first sight of the Cannon yielded to haue their liues saued. Glavon afterwards submitted with the like facility. Both being burnt, but their fortifications not ruined, shall serue againe to lodge the Imperials.

Emery remained still whole, but it might not be made fit to endure the attempts of a mighty army in twelve dayes. Moreover, it must be furnished with victuals: Two riuers not to be waded through, betwixt Landrecy and Emery, made the victualling difficult. Auenues did cut it off, and the Commissaries of the victuals reported, that to put victuals into

A into Emery, were in time to furnish the army, and to take away the meanes to victual Landrecy, for the want of cariage, which was greatly hindred by a continual raine three weeks together. And that which did most import, newes comes to the King, that the Emperors armes, and approached neere the countries of the Duke of Cleues, whom he might not abandon to the paves of a roring Lion, who had long time vowed his ruine. So the towers of the dungeon of Emery, and the portall of the wals flying into the ayre by myne, and other meanes, serued to fill vp the trenches.

Hitherto we haue made warre with small resistance, hereafter wee shall haue a stronger party, and by consequence more glory to crosse the Emperours attempts, whilst that famine and the winter driues him from before Landrecy. In the end of Iuly, Landrecy was in such estate, as without any support of an army, the fortifications might well be continued, leaving some troops at Guise, and the Duke of Cleues (against whom the Emperour banded all his power) appealed to the King for succours. The King therefore, to diuert the Emperours forces, to draw him to battell, and to try if he were accompanied with the like happinesse, leading his forces in person, as he had bene by his Deputies, or at the least by the taking of Luxemburg, to make the way easie to succour his allie, he sent the Duke of Vendosme to encounter the enemies attempts vpon the frontiers of base Picardy, and to fauour the necessary victualling of Landrecy: and for the execution of his enterprise, he appointed the Duke of Orleans, vnder the conduct of the Admirall of Annebault. The Prince of Melphes, whom the King had left in Guise with three hundred men at armes, and Brissac, Colonell of fifteene hundred light-horse, to goe and ioyne with him about Rheims: And the Earles of Reux and Roquendolfe, with the forces of the Low-countries, came from a skirmish at Landrecy, which they did hope to surpris, being vnfurnished of victuals.

As they trooped together with a designe to attempt the Castle of Bohain, newes comes that La Hunauday and Theauide Bedaigne an Albanos, (either of them being Capitaine of two hundred horse) were lodged neere vnto the Castle of Bouhourie, making account to dislodge so early, as they might come in time to part with the Generall. To surpris them the Lord of Liques, Lieutenant to the Duke of Afcots company, drawes eight hundred choice Bourguignon horses out of the Imperall troops, two hundred Englishmen, (the King of England being then fauoured by the Emperour, pretended to inuade vs, as we shall hereafter see) and foure ensignes of foot-men. But lest he should come too late, hee leaues them behind him, and marcheth before with his horsemen. At the first they charge Bedaignes lodging, who whilst the enemy was breaking open the gate, had leisure to put on his cuirasse: he goes to horse-backe with his lance in his hand, forthwith furiously through them, ouerthrowes them: he meets, and ioynes his troop with La Hunauday, who was likewise on horse-back. Aché and Bertrand of Foissy, Lord of Crené, Capitaine of 200 harguebuziers on horse-back, being lodged at the same Abbey, poste to their succours: they force the bridge which the Imperials kept, and ioyntly with the light-horsemen repulse the enemy. The alarme is giuen at Guise. Theauide Manes arises with his 200 light-horse to second his companions: and Brissac borrowing about threescore horse of the Prince of Melphes (his troops had already taken the way to Marle) goes to their ayd: he is advertised by Bedaigne, that the enemy (fearing to haue the whole army vpon them) beganne to wauer: all the troops ioyne and charge them suddenly: they ouerthrow their horsemen vpon their foot, which aduanced and put them to rout: they pursue them speedily, leaue three hundred dead vpon the place, cary away six hundred prisoners, and win foure Ensignes and two Cornets. The rest of the Imperiall army going to assaile Bohain, hearing of this defeat, and doubting they should be forced to fight with the whole army, grew amazed, and retired to Quesnoy le Comte. The Duke of Orleans hauing already by the taking of Saint Mary (for Montmedy and Yuoy were vnder the Kings obedience, since the first conquest made by the said Duke) Danuilliers, Vireton, Arlon, and other places, made his approaches to Luxemburg: he prest it with two batteries at a corner of the high towne towards France, the one crossing the other: the one was committed to the Duke of Aumale, the other to Peter Storffy, a Florentine, kinsman to Pope Clement deceased: who, (being lately come out of Italy) had brought three hundred Tuscan Soldiers, all men of note and commandement: two parts armed with Pikes, the third with Harguebuzes all with gilt colesers. The towne was defended by foure hundred horse well appointed, pointed, and three thousand five hundred foot well armed, vnder the command of Giles de A Leuant, a man well esteemed by the Imperials, and John de Heu one of the Lords of Metz: yet at the fifth or sixth volley of the Cannon, hauing demanded composition, they departed with their baggage.

Longueil entered as Gouvernor with his company of men at armes. Anglure with a thousand of the Legion of Champagne: Haracourt a Lorraine, and the Vicount of Riuere, commanding either of them five hundred men: and Ierom Marin a Boulonois, sixscore Italians. The King hauing passed the Feast of Saint Michael there, and performed the ceremonies of the Order, he disposed of the fortifications of the towne: then he prepared himselfe to succour Landrecy, which the Imperials besieged, leaving the Legionaries of B Champagne and Normandy vnder the Cont Brienne, to fauor the victualling of his new conquest, the which he had committed to the Prince of Melphe, being assisted with the companies of men at armes of the Lords of Sedan, Tarnetz, Brienne, Langey, Estauges, La Mailleray: two thousand Lanquenets led by Fresnay, and ten thousand Legionaries.

The munition was prepared at Stenay and Mouzon: and for want of carriages which they had purposely stayed on all sides, the campe was so oppressed with famine, as the Captaines themselves had no bread to eate. So the souldiers being impatient and ill-affected: disdaining moreover to see themselves disappointed of the sacke and spoile of Luxembourg, whereof they were in hope, they mutine and returne home to their houses: so as of tenne thousand, about three hundred remained vnder their ensignes: and Captaine C Tauernier (whom the Duke of Orleance had left in Arlon) hauing spoiled the towne, took the same way with his company. Without doubt these poore townsmen newly conquered, shewed themselves more faithfull then this wretch, who was appointed to defend them. They giue notice, that they had shut their gates against the Imperials that were come to seize on their towne: and that hauing taken their oath of fidelity vnto the King, they were resolu'd to keepe their faith, so as they might be releued. Ten or twelue thousand Lanquenets were assembled vpon Mozel to hinder this victualling. Notwithstanding, through the helpe of the men at armes, and the Lanquenets of Fresnay, Luxembourg was victualled for three months, in despite of the enemy, and Arlon supplied with six hundred men, and such a quantity of munition as the time would permit. The taking D of Luxembourg had giuen the King means to send the Admirall with foure hundred men at armes, and ten thousand foot, to succour the Duke of Cleues, in whose fauour this war was chiefly attempted. But the Duke after the taking of the towne of Dure, hauing no means to auoid the storme which threatened him with apparant ruine, nor long to withstand so great a power, made his peace with the Emperor, yeelded vnto him the Duchy of Guelldres, the County of Zuphen, and the forts of Heusberg and Sittart, to dispose thereof at his pleasure. At the same time Don Fernand of Gonsagua, Lieutenant generall for the Emperor, besieged Guise: but being aduertised of the Kings arriall at Couchy, who marched with great speed to encounter the Emperor, he resolu'd to make his retreat to Landrecy. Brissac with a number of men at armes, and harguebuziers on horse-backe, E lies in ambush in a wood to surpriseth them in their dislodging, and sends Theau de Bedaigne his hand to enter skirmish with the Imperiall light-horse men, and to draw them (if it were possible) into the ambush. But Bedaigne not able by skirmish to make them abandon the body of their army which marched towards Landrecy, Brissac puts forth five hundred horse, to giue a furious charge, and he followes with his whole roop to second them. Our men making a gallant charge, overthrow all they encounter: they kill and take prisoners, amongst others, Don Francis of Esté, brother to the Duke of Ferrara, Captaine generall of all the Imperiall horsemen: and they presse the rest so hotly, as Gonzaga gathering together all his battalions, is forced to turne head to saue the rest. So Brissac suffered him to goe on his pretended way, to ioyne with the Earle of Reux, who had long time before possessed the fort of Landrecy. F

sieged.

Now are all the Imperiall forces before Landrecy, eightene thousand Germanes, ten thousand Spaniards of the old band, six thousand Wallons, ten thousand English, thirteen thousand horse, of the ordinary band of the Low-countries, Cleuiois and high Germanes. The Campe being lodged, and the Artillery planted, the Emperour makes three batteries of five and forty peeces against the bulwarke of Orleance, against the Caffe, and against the bulwarke of Vendosme: and to keepe the defendants from making of any ram- pier,

A pier, or comming to the defences, the bulwarkes and curtaines being not yet halfe finished, they plant a long Culuerin vpon a little hill towards the Forest of Mormault. This peece did wonderfully annoy them, and they had no means to charge the Lanquenets which did guard it but on the one side. The river that passed by the trench of the base towne, which they had abandoned, ranne betwixt them. Ricardville with forty horse, and Saint Simon with thirty foot, and some pioneers, vnder take to seize vpon this peece. They passe the water, surpriseth the Lanquenets, put them to rout, draw the Culuerin by maine strength to the bulwarke of Orleance, turne the mouth of it against the enemy, and from the rampier kill many Bourguignons with their small shot, being come to the trench to B rescue it. The King aduanced, but the Emperour (to doe some notable exploit before his arriall) overthrew a great part of the wall, making it very easie to assaile: and to take from the besieged all means to defend this breach, he put them into a portall of the base towne which was abandoned: and about it he plants certaine field-peeces, which commanded the breach. The souldiers were now brought to halfe a loose of prouant-bread aday, and to drinke faire water. So whilst they were well-affected, and had some courage (for men ill fed and tired with continuall labour faint soone) they must take this lodging from the Imperials. Three hundred men appointed by La Lande and Esse, assaile them one morning at the breake of day, and before they could come from the campe to succour them, they dislodge them. The breach inuities them to the assaile: but the Emperor considering C the valour of the defendants, foreseeing that he should hardly take it by force, without the losse of many of his men, he makes his accompt that famine, and the continuall toile of warre would in the end vanquish them.

The want of victuals, the weaknesse of the place, and the insupportable trauell which they must necessarily endure day and night, made the besieged to hazard Tuelle a Norman Captaine of five hundred men in Landrecy, to aduertise the King, that extreme necessity would force constraineth them to yeeld, but no force, whilst they had a man liuing. The King assembles his Campe at La Fere vpon Oise: and knowing the resolution of these braue men, he went to lodge at Chateau-Cambresis, holding it more honourable to turn head to the enemy, then by delays to make them think he would not fight: he gaue charge D to Langey to gather together all the fat cattell, all the meale, and all the horses of labour he could, that whilst the King should feed the Emperor with the hope of a battell, they might refresh the besieged.

On the 29 of October he had drawne into Capelle twelue hundred sheepe, nine-score cattell, six hundred sackes of meale, with so many horses and men, euery one carrying a sacke vpon his horse. The enemy scoured the country with a thousand or twelue hundred horse. Notwithstanding, Langey hauing ioyned with Sansfaict troope, being resolute to passe on, or to sell their liues dearly, he causeth his peasants to march in battell like to men of warre, to the end the enemy discovering them asfarre off, should hold them to be men of another quality. Thus they brought their victuals safely to Landrecy, and then retiring E contrary way to that where the Imperials attend them, they returned safely to La Capelle. Our men are now victualled for fifteene dayes, but they haue need of rest, and the place to be refreshed with men.

The Emperour finding the King to approach, retired on this side the water, gathering together all his forces, which were before diuided: and his Maiesty embracing this occasion, sends the Earle of Saint Paul and the Admirall of Annebault, to retire them out of Landrecy, who had suffered much for his seruice, and to supply the place with fresh souldiers. They left the Lord of Verucin for the Kings Lieutenant, commanding a thousand men of the Legion of Picardy, and Rochbaron five hundred. La Lande, and La Chapelle Rainsuin, in recompence of their good seruices, were made Stewards of the Kings house, and Esse a Gentleman of his Chamber. The Dukes of Neuers and Aumale, the two brothers of Rochfoucault, the Lords of Andelot, Bresse, Creuecœur, Bonniet his brother, Saint Laurent of Britany, Alouy, Saint Phale, and many other young Gentlemen, who to winne honour by some worthy exploits, had voluntarily entered into it were rewarded according to their qualities. The souldiers were made Gentlemen during their liues, and such as had offended the law, pardoned. The King had now put in execution one of his chiefe designs, in view of a great Emperour. Winter was coming, the continuall raine had made frustrate all their attempts of warre: and the long abode of the two armies, had broken the wayes six leagues about. The Emperour camped high with advantage, having a valley and a small brooke not easie to be passed, betwixt both the armies. There was no reason to passe the water, and mounting to fight with the enemy. The Emperour like wise would not passe to give the first charge. So his Maiesty giuing the enemy hope by fires and great noise, that he would fight, made his retreat towards Guise. The Emperour advertised in the morning that the army was dislodged, hee commanded Fernand of Gonsagua to follow, who (the better to discover them) intended to put some men into a wood where they must passe, but it was too late: the wood was full of French Harguebuziers, who received these adventurers so gallantly, as few escaped to cary news vnto their companions of the manner of their retreat.

The Emperour followed with the rest of his forces, whilest the skirmish was maintained in the wood. Gonsagua seeing himselfe seconded by his chiefe commander, drew forth a thousand or twelve hundred horse, with a good number of shot, and English light-horsemen, on the right hand towards Bohain. But all in vaine, the Cannon and baggage (having passed the wood) followed the King in safety who marched before, and the Dauphin holding the middle, with eight hundred men at armes, and fourteene thousand Suisses, having left Brissac with his light horse-men, and four hundred men at armes to second him: moreover, the Suisses were behind in the battell, and himselfe on the wing to support them, with an intent to fight with the Emperour if he passed the wood: but he forced the enemy to retire, not daring any more to appeare: many of his men were slaine, many taken, and few of ours.

The season was not fit to campe: so the King, to refresh his army, sent the Marshall of Biez to Saint Quentin with four hundred men at armes, and four thousand foot, to oppose against the Emperours designes vpon that frontier; the Lansquenets to Crecy vnder Cerc, the Suisses to Ailly; and he lodged the rest of his army along the river of Oise. And the Emperour seeing that he had lost his labour before Landrecy; and that hee had with losse and dishonour followed the French army, retired to Cambrai, winning much more with the Foxes skinned, then hee had done with the Lions: for by means of their Bishop, who was of the House of Croy, perswading the light-belecuung Citizens, that the King meant to seize vpon their towne, to spoile them of that ancient right of neutrality, and to incorporate them to the crowne, he made them yeeld to the building of a citadell, by the which of free-men they are now become slaves, and this citadell shall hereafter serue as a buckler against Landrecy. We haue here omitted to describe the exploits of the Duke of Anguieu in Prouence. The King had sent him to receive the army by sea, which Barberousse brought to his succour. Being at Marseilles, Grignan Gouvernor of the towne, did acquaint him with an intelligence which he had with three souldiers of the garisons of the castle of Nice, who promised to deliuer him the said castle. The Duke well informed of the Kings pleasure, being loth to commit himselfe rashly to the discretion of traitors, who might as well sell the stranger as their owne Country, armed foure Gallies, and sent them before vnder the command of Captaine Magdelon, brother to the Baron of S. Blancart, himselfe with eleuen other Gallies, tooke the sea, and the advantage of the wind, either to second his men, or to retire at need. When as Magdelon approached to Nice, six Gallies issued forth to inuest him, and fifteene more led by Ianetiu Doris, chase him vnto the port of Antibo. Magdelon hurt with a Cannon shot, died soone after: the Gallies being abandoned were a prey for Ianetiu, and the Duke discovering by Moone light, that Ianetiu came to surprise him, retired speedily to Toulon without any losse.

A false practice
vpon the castle of Nice.

Hereupon Barberousse arrives at Marseilles with an hundred and ten Gallies. The King pretends Nice to be his, and heretofore engaged by the Earles of Prouence, to the Duke of Sauoy for a summe of money. They assaile it, and within few dayes bring it to composition. But without the castle, this victory was fruitlesse: the castle seated vpon a high and steepe rock: is hard to batter, and more vncasie to vndermine. So Barberousse seeing the time spent in vaine, and winter approaching, retired his Gallies to Toulon: and the Duke vpon hope of a battell, came to the King to Cambresie.

The taking of Nice drew the Marquis of Gualt to succour the Castle: but advertised of their liberty, he employed his forces elsewhere. Montdeuis was the first place of the kings obedience in Piedmont, which made head in his return: and Bontieres having few French-foot to man in, he was forced to put the Suisses. The Suisses are more fit for the field, yet are they

A they commended to haue done their duties. But after, many assaults and toiles, want of victuals, and despair of succours, made them enter into capitulation: the which was ill observed by the Spaniard: for they were stript, and many put to the sword. A wound which shall proue bloody to the Spaniards at the battell of Serifolles. This victory caused the Marquis to passe the Po, and to take from our men the commoditie of all the plaine of Piedmont on this side the water (for that which they held on the other side, as Suillan, Beine, Roque de Bau, and Centall, were without hope of succour) he turnes head towards Carignan, whither the Lord of Aussun, and Francis Barnardin of Vimarca (having no forces to make head against eightene thousand men, and to take from the enemy all means to make vse thereof) they razed the fortifications which were made the yeere before by Langey. But they had no means to finish their enterprise, nor leisure to recover Montcalier, for the enemy meeting them at the passe of a river, slue many, and tooke the greatest part of them prisoners.

This losse was ready to be seconded by that of Luxemburg which the Earle of Furstemberg (a man variable in his parties) besieged in the Emperours name, with twelve thousand Lansquenets, & a good number of horse. The besieged wanted victuals, and the winter had not bene so violent in twenty yeares. They diuided the prouant-wine with harchers, and it was sold by weight, and then the souldiers caried it away in baskets. The king being loth to lose any part of his conquests, sent the Prince of Melphie, with about foure hundred men at armes, Brissac Colonell of the light-horse, and some foot. The Earle seeing that the extreme frosts did kindle the courage of the commanders and souldiers, who marched with an intent to fight with him, raised his campe, and tooke his way to Germanie. The Prince retired Longueval and his troops, having bene long kept in, to enjoy the liberty of the fields, leauing the Vicount of Eustanges, surnamed Anglure, with his companie of men at armes, and fifteene hundred foot: then he dispersed his army into Garisons in Champagne and Picardy, to make head against the enemy the rest of the winter, and to preserve the last conquests.

On the other side, his Maiesty knowing that the Imperials was master of the field, hee supplied Bontieres his Lieutenant in Piedmont, with four thousand French foot leaued by the Lord of Tais in Prouence, Daulphine, and thereabouts, and five thousand Gruyers or Grisons (to ioyne with the five thousand Suisses, entertained in Piedmont) with some three hundred men at armes. With this supply he recovered the field which he had long before lost, tooke many small places betwixt Vercell and Yurec, forced Saint Germane, (a towne vpon the way from Chinasto to Vercell, where the counter-scarpe of the trenches is as high as the wall, so as the Cannon cannot beat at the foot thereof) to plant the Ensignes of France, and then he marched before Yurec, and besieged it on all parts. But hee had small credit with the souldiers: and the King was discontent with him, for that he had so lightly suffered the Marquis to fortifie at Carignan, and to victuall it without any resistance. He therefore sends Francis of Bourbon, Duke of Anguieu in Bontieres place, to bee Lieutenant General in Piedmont.

The Kings
army in Piedmont.

The Duke having taken charge of the army, he marched downe the Po, and at the first subdued Palezol, Cressentin, Desanne, and other places thereabouts, to make the way easie to Carignan: the which kept all the plaine of Piedmont in subiection, which the King desired infinitely to haue in his power. But the means to force it? It is a place in a plaine country, it was fortified with five goodly bastions of earth, curtaines, and a great trench, defended by foure thousand the best souldiers of all the Imperiall army, so as their only hope to recover it was to famish them. To this end he burnt the bridge they had vpon the Po, whereby they might daily haue refreshing from Quiers, Aix, and other places vnder their command, and to cut off the victuals they had on this side the Po, he went to camp at Yimeux, two miles beneath Carignan. They received also many commodities from Rencallier vpon the river: a tort built vpon the said way a quarter of a mile from Carignan, cuts off all: and to enjoy the river of Po freely, he builds a bridge of boats two miles beneath Carignan, with a fort at either end, manned with 4 ensignes of Italians. Then passing the water, he went to camp at Villedeslon betwixt Carignan and Quiers. The Marquis made haste to assemble his forces, to succour the besieged, and came to lodge at Camagnole. Holding this lodging, he might fortifie himselfe, and suffering our men to die for hunger in a country already wasted on that side Po, he found the Marquisate of Salusses full of all commodities, wherewith he might without danger refresh Carignan. The Duke A preuents him, and lodging at Carmagnole, drives the befieged to that extremity, as within few weekes they were draine to the Kings obedience. Carignan was the chiefe troope of the Marquis victories: he was loth to lose it without some blowes, and the Duke as loth to lose a prey which was ready to fall into his hands.

So the Court filled with the hope of an approaching battell, that gallant Nobility which had alwayes so willingly gone to horsebacke at the first bruite of a battell, would now haue beene loth to haue lost the sport. All post thither, some with leaue, others without. Gaspar Lord of Chastillon, Francis of Vendôme Vidame of Chartres: the Lords of Saint André, Dampierre of the House of Clermont in Dauphiné, Jarnac, the three brothers of Bon-Binet, Bourdillon, Escaris, the two brethren of Genly, After Master of the Ordinance, la Hunauday the onely sonne of the Admirall Annebault, Rechfort, Lusarche, Wartis, Lafsigny: to conclude, the Court was left in a manner naked: namely of thole, which as the Sunne-rising, followed the Dauphin, and he was not held an honest man that would not haue a share in it.

A happy arrival: they were all men of account, they had by this voyage emptied their owne or their fathers coffers, and the Dukes treasure was so wasted, as both he, his Treasurers, and all the rest of the campe had emptied their purses, and for want of money the souldiers would haue beene lesse courageous in this occasion that was offered. But what would not these braue Noblemen doe for the Kings seruice, and the authority of so gallant a Prince that commanded? With their voluntary lendings, the Duke contents his troops, attending forty thousand crownes which Langcy brought. This was the fourth part of that which was owing to the strangers: but they must seeke it elsewhere. The Emperour leaued a mighty army in Germany to invade the frontiers: moreover, a great storme threatened vs from beyond the Seas, which soonce after fell vpon Boulon and Montreuil.

They had no meanes to content the souldiers, if they had not presently found out the want of their numbers: they therefore resolute on Easter Eue the seuenth of April, to make a priuate muster of every company apart, and giue them hope to receiue money the next day. But they did foresee, that Easter day would not passe (the Armies being so neere) D without some blowes, & by consequence the enemies presence, and the necessity of fighting would easily make them defer the souldiers pay. And so it proved. The Marquis set forward with an intent to passe on this side the riuer of Po, to keepe our men on that side the water, without victuals and without money, and to recouer the Marquisate of Salusfes: being assured to find corne and meale there to victual his campe, and the towne besieged, forcing the French army in the end to seeke their retreat. Without doubt this had bene their ruine, for the souldiers being vnpaid, what meanes was there to keepe the field, and retiring into towns, the Marquis would haue spoiled Piedmont, burnt the country, driuen away their cattell, and ruined the country-man. This was his designe, and to receiue ten thousand men at Yurée, which the Earle of Challan brought, and with this supply to passe by the valley of Aouft, into Sauoy and Bresse, whilst the Emperour should make some great attempt vpon the frontiers of Champagne. E

But he reckoned without his host. The Duke takes counsell, and resolues to fight with him on the way, before he should recouer a country of strength, and to that end giues the foreward to Boutieres, (who vpon the newes of this battell was returned from his house) takes the battell to himselfe, and commits the reereward to Dampierre.

On Easter day every man is vnder his Ensigne, they discouer the Imperials marching from Serifolles to Sommerie: and the Duke to diuert them, sends forth Aussun with his troop and some shot, vnto a high ground of aduantage, who placing his Harguebuziers in a little groue, seekes to draw the enemy by skirmishes into the ambuscade. But the Marquis F dares not charge home, he fears some disorder before hee had discovered his aduersary. The Duke marcheth with about 300 horse, and the rest of his thor, and going to the hill, puts all his horse in battell vpon the side, and in the midst plants three mynions, which shooting against a battalion of the enemies, standing in the valley, kills some men, and giues a shew of battell. So the Marquis fearing to be fought withall as hee lodged, retired to Serifolles from whence he parted. Night approached, and the Duke seeing the Marquis returne to Serifolles, retired to Carmagnole, leauing two hundred horse to obserue the

A the enemies countenance in the night, then an houre after midnight he goes to field.

The Marquis seeing this retreat, perswaded himselfe, the French would passe on the other side of Po, and leaue him the passage: so as changing his designe, he parts an houre before day, to ouertake him before he should passe the Riuer. To returne to the fort which they had left, had bene (by some signe of sight) to daunt our men, and to giue courage to the enemy, necessitie therefore presseth both the one and the other to fight. The Imperials had ten thousand men more, and the aduantage of the place: they had recouered that high ground from whence our men were parted the night before: they should haue kept it, seeing their meaning was to returne. On the right hand of our men marched the B Prince of Salerne with ten thousand Italians, seconded by eight hundred horse sent by the Duke of Ferrara, to succour the Imperials. In the midst of Ailfrand of Madruce with many other Germane Colonels and Captaines, who commanded ten thousand Lanquenets all in white armour: and on the left, (right against our Gruyens) Don Raimond of Cardone with a battalion of six thousand men old souldiers, halfe Spaniards, the rest Germanes: betwixt these two nations the Marquis of Guast with the like number of horse: on the other side of the Spaniards the Prince of Sulmona, sonne to the deceased Don Charles de Lannoy Viceroy of Naples, Colonel of all the horse, with the like number of horse: ten pieces of Cannon by the Germanes, and as many by the Spaniards, placed with such aduantage, as our French could not march against them, but they shot into the C midst of their battalions. Thus they marched in forme of three great battalions of foot, either hauing a wing of horsemen. Their order being viewed, the Duke brings his armie into the like forme: on the right hand a battalion of the old French bands, being about 300 besides the thor, led by the Lord Tais their Generall, hauing on the right hand the light-horse-men vnder the Lord of Termes: on the left hand Boutieres with fourescore men at armes: then on his left hand a battalion of Suisses, of about three thousand men, supported on their left hand by the Duke of Anguien with a great troope of horse: and on the Dukes left hand 4000 Italians, and Gruyens, hauing on their left Dampierre, with all the Guidons and archers of the men at armes. The troopes thus disposed and ordered, he sent forth before the battalions about 800 shot, for a forlorne hope, led by Captain D Montluc: eight pieces of artillerie before the battalion of the Suisses, and the like number before the Gruyens.

At the Sun-rising the two armies stand one against another: the skirmish begins, and whilst that either army seekes to get the flanke of his enemy, they continue vntill eleuen of the clocke. In the end, the enemy finding himselfe too strong by a third part, he comes to the charge. Tais aduanceth to fight with the Prince of Salerne, but he was commanded by the Marquis, not to stirre before hee gaue him charge. So Tais seeing the Prince make no shew to march, and that our Suisses being weak in number could not withstand the shoocke of the Imperiall Lanquenets, which came to charge them: he turnes the head of his battalion, and comes neere to the Suisses, Boutieres being betwixt both. The Imperials E likewise change their designe, and of their great Squadron make two; one against the Suisses; the other against the French.

The battell of Serifolles.

At the same instant the horsemen of Ferrara approached to charge the French battalion in flanke when as the armies should ioyne. Termes with his light horse-men being loth to attend this hazard, chargeth them furiously, breakes and ouerthrowes them vpon the Prince of Salerne: and thinking to be well followed, chargeth into the midst of the Princes battalions: but his horse was slaine, and himselfe taken. A happy charge, for without it, it was likely the Prince of Salerne had marched vpon the flanks of the French battalion, and whilst that he was couered with the Ferrarois that were driuen vpon him, the French and Suisses had leisure to deale with their Lanquenets: Who falling vpon the F Suisses and French, fought long with the like armes and a doubtfull euent, till that by the aide of the French-men at armes led by Boutieres, all the Imperiall Germanes were broken. The Marquis seeing his Germanes in rout, vpon whom hee had anchored his chiefe hope, retires apart without striking stroke, and by this meanes makes the victory easie for Dampierre vpon the enemies horse-men, who supported the Spaniards. But this old battalion of Spaniards and Germans incounter our Italians and Gruyens with great aduantage: at the first charge they are surprised with feare, and all but the Captaines, which fought in the forme of franks, die.

Without doubt it was wisely advised of the Duke to leave the Suisses whom he promised to assist, to second their poor amazed souls, for without him not one had escaped. He suddenly charged the poor amazed souls, and taking one corner of their battalion, forced through them, and leaves not any ensigne of the whole battalion standing: yet not without great slaughter of his men. The Lord of Aslier, the Baron of Oyn, Lieutenant to the Earle of Montrauel, Montsallais Ensigne to the Baron of Cusoll, de Glaiue Gouernour of Cahors, Cornille and the Dukes two Squires ended their dayes there. S. Amand (otherwise called Rochechouart) and Fernaques were found among the dead carcases languishing of their wounds, yet they were afterwards cured: many others were slain or hurt, whereof fourteene or fifteene were Captaines or men of account; but he that fears B leaves, must not goe into the wood.

But this is not all, for the front of the Spaniards (who by the voluntary rout of our men that ranne away, had no foot-men to encounter them) come furiously and charge the Duke, who having no foot-men to second him, loseth more at this second charge than at the first: and to increase the danger (which had been sufficient to daunt a minde inclining to feare) he had no newes of his Frenchmen nor Suisses: a little hill kept them from the knowledge one of another: but hee had rather die then retire. Hee charged and recharged, and still a number of the enemies shot pel-mel at him, and a battalion of their pikes follow him without breaking their ranks, and his troope being greatly wasted, was not now above an hundred horse: an unequal force to fight with foure thousand men. C We may truly say, he is well kept whom God keeps. The Duke was ready to bee swallowed, as when retiring on the right hand, to free himselfe from the Imperials foot, which compassed him in on all sides: the Spaniards had newes of the defeat of the rest of their men. They see at the same instant some troopes valley themselves under the Cornet of their enemies Generall. So their first heat grew some what cold, and they begin their retreat, but they had no time to finish it. The Duke appoints Aussun with about fifty horse to charge them upon the flanke, and himselfe with those that came unto him, followed them in the taylor. All give way, all die, every man seeks to save himselfe, some in the wood, some in cottages: they beat downe and kill, all are taken or slain, few escape.

He wins the battaille.

The French pursuing the victorie a mile, and especially the Suisses, incensed with the foule warre the Imperials had made at Montdeuis, and crying in reuenge of that day, Montdeuis, Montdeuis, put all they encountered to the sword without mercie. In the meane time the Prince of Salerne, seeing the whole defeat of the Germans, and of their horsemen, made his retreat without any great losse. And the Marquis of Guast posted away to Alt: but at his departure he had said unto the Citizens: That if he returned not a Conqueror, they should shut their gates against him. They take him now at his word. Without the cowardize of the Gruyens, the battalion of Spaniards had in few been defeated at the first charge: the Duke of Anguien had not received so fatal a checke in his troope, the retreat of the Prince of Salerne had not beene so easie: and pursuing the Marquis, E they might haue overtaken him, before hee had recovered Milan or any place of safety. But the necessitie this brave Duke had to be succoured at need, made this happy victorie imperfect in that respect. There were slaine of the enemies about fifteene thousand of all nations, in lesse then a quarter of a league.

dead & prisoners.

Of Germane prisoners there were two thousand, five hundred and twenty: Alibrand of Madence their Colonell, was found among the dead bodies mayned in many parts of his bodie: of Spaniards six hundred and thirtie, amongst them Don Raymond of Cardone and Montesola, with seven, or eight, other Spanish Captaines. Don Charles Gontigua and many other Italians. The spoile was great and rich, an hundred thousand crownes in money, and plate, fifteene pieces of artilerie, all the bridges they had brought to passe the Po, much munition, meale, and other victuals wherewith they presumed to relieve Carignan; about eight thousand Corslets of Milan, and mountebanks of diuers sorts, of great value. Of the French two hundred slaine, and men of name, besides the above mentioned, the Ensigne-bearer to Aussun and his Nephew: Charles of Dros, Gouernour of Montdeuis, Disero of the Countie of Nice, Colonell of six Ensignes, of Italians, the Colonell of the Gruyens a Dauphinois, in the absence of their Earle; de Castelles Brigadier, Captain Passin a Dauphinois: Barberan and Montaul Gascons, and few others of

A of the Suisses, the Baron of Saxe was hurt in the throat with a pike, and none else of account.

If the Duke of Anguiens ariall had beene pleasing to the armie, farre greater was the reputation which he got by his famous victorie with all the nations of Europe, and the credit he purchased with men of warre, commending his wisedome in so young yeares, admiring his valour, and louing his courtesie and bounty, vertues worthy of a great Prince and General of an armie. This bloody victorie had terrified the whole country, and amazed Milan. The Marquis of Guast stricke vp the drumme, and twenty dayes were spent before that any man came to his colours. Moreover, the King had made a new leauy of six thousand Grisons: the Duke of Somme, the Earles of Perillane, Mirandola, Martinengue, Peter Stroffy, Valerio Vrsin, Roberti Malateste, and many others leauied an armie to ioyne with the Duke of Anguien.

There was some likelihood after so furious a battaille, to deprive the Emperor of the estate of Milan. But he armed vpon the Rhine, his troops were ready to invade the frontier. The English were at sea, and the King had rather need to draw forces out of Italy, then to supply them.

The Duke therefore to draw them speedily to the Kings deuotion, sends the Lords of Tais with the French bands, two hundred men at armes, six great Cannons, with some other pieces, to force some places vnder the Emperors obedience. Saint Damian a place of C Montferrat, had not planted the French but the Spanish Ensignes: notwithstanding being without hope of succours, they yielded to the yoke, vpon condition that they should haue none but a French garison. Montcallier followed, being a strong place: Vigon, Pont d'Esture, S. Salvador, Fresnet of Pau: to conclude, all Montferrat, except Casal, Trin and Alba yielded their necks to the French obedience. And the Duke going to campe at Carignan, did by many forts so restrain the fallies of the besieged, and the entry of victuals, as extreme necessitie hauing forced them to demand composition, they departed with their armes onely, without ensignes or drums, taking an oath not to carie armes for six moneths against the King nor his allies. This done, the duke sent vnto the King, six thousand French souldiers of the old bands, and six thousand Italians to oppose against D the Emperors inuasions.

On the other side the Duke of Somme, with the other of the French faction, hauing leauied ten thousand foot, but few or no horse, came to ioyne with the Duke of Anguien: and the Princes of Salerne and Sulmona attended with a number of horse and foote, to fight with them at the passage of a riuer. They send to the Lord of Tais to demand a conuoy of horse. Hee promisseth, but performs nothing. And they (not able to retire without shame) charge the foot which were farre from their horsemen, and put them to rout: but they consider not, that leauing a place of strength, they giue the enemy the advantage they had of them. The horsemen come and charge them in flanke, as they had broken their ranks, thinking to haue gotten the victorie, and put them to flight, they take E many prisoners of qualitie, kill few, and no man of marke except Valerio Vrsine, the rest saued themselves at Quieras and Carignan. We commonly say, that a small ayde doth a great good. The foot-men being overcome, an hundred men at armes had made the victorie absolute.

This checke doth not daunt them. The Duke of Somme being newly deliuered from prison, (the Prince of Salerne his kinsman had freed him, fearing lest the Emperor should doe him some disgrace) and Peter Stroffy gathering together six thousand men of this shipwracke at Marandole, meaning to ioyne with the Duke of Anguien at what price soeuer, he being vnurnished of forces; for besides the twelve thousand men he had sent vnto the King, all his Suisses (except two thousand) had beene for want of pay dismissed: F They giue ouer the plaine, and passe out of Parmelan with much toyle, by the mountains of Genoa.

The Marquis aduertised of this new leauy, gathers together what forces hee could of horse and foot, draws forth his garisons, and to stop their passage, attends them at the foot of the mountains. They aduertise the Duke: who having no men, but for the guard of his places, resolves notwithstanding to effect two things at once, and both to surprise Alba where they had left no men but for the guards of the gates, and to succour Stroffy, and finding meanes to aduertise him, that he should march towards Alba, where-

of the enemy was left in doubt. The Duke comes thither on the one side, and Strossy on the other: he makes a hole in the gate towards the mountain, on the other side of the water, about ten foot long: prepares to give an assault, and Strossy the scalded, which the besieged seeing, they grow so amazed, as they yeeld the place, and depart without carrying away of any thing.

Truce in Piedmont.

The Marquis makes haft to succour them, but knowing the towne to be lost, frustrate of his hope, hee retired, and the Duke having taken many places thereabout, returned to Carmagnole. Within few dayes after the Marquis practised a suspension of armes, which being confirmed by their two Maesties, there followed a truce for three monthes. Let vs now see the enemies attempt invading the Realme. The Emperor had no sooner found the King of Englands discontent, (whereof the marriage of the King of Scotland had been the chiefe motive) but forgetting, or rather dissembling the injuries he had received, hee wins him to his devotion, although hee had assured the Pope neuer to treat any alliance with him; vntill he had repaired the offence done vnto the Sea of Rome, intitling himselfe supreme head, vnder God, of the Church of England, and punishing them which maintained the authoritie of the Pope and Church of Rome.

Warre in Picardy.

Thus two grey-hounds tearing one another in pieces, lay aside their choller to runne after the Wolfe their common enemy. And for that, during the warre of the Dukes of Wirtemberg, by the bond of the Princes of Germany with the King, the Emperors designs had bene greatly crost, now perswading them (and about all the Protestants) that he hath done more then his duty to the French King, for the calling of a Councell, to call backe them that were strayed from the vniion of the Church, and to reforme the Pope and his Ministers (but the King onely had hindred this assembly) to giue him prouision of men and money, and ioynly to bandy with him to the destruction of this Realme. So he sends the Earle of Furtemberg with an army before Luxemburg, which hauing maintained the siege to the extremitie for want of victuals, the Vicont of Estuages was forced to capitulate, and to depart with baggage. Commerce was the second triumph of his victories, Ligny in Barrois the third, being the way for victuals which came to him from Metz and Lorraine. The castle is commanded by two or three mountaines: and the besieged notable to stand to their defences, came to parle, when as the Imperials entring D behinde, compassed them in that were come to the breach, attending the assault: and take them prisoners with small slaughter. Without doubt the place was not to withstand the force of an Emperor, being in person: neither was it so contemptible, but it deserved an honest composition. But the Earle of Brienne Lord of the place, and Rouffy his brother, Eschenaïs and Gonzalles, who commanded about an hundred men at armes, and fiftene hundred foot, won small reputation. Doubtlesse the Earle of Sancerre will win farre more honour in the defence of Saint Disier, a place ill flanked, ill rampared, and vnworthy to oppose against an Imperiall armie.

Saint Disier besieged.

Whilst the King assembled his forces, being ten thousand Suisses, six thousand Gisors, six thousand Lansquenets (whereof the D. of Neurs was General) and the twelue E thousand men which came out of Piedmont: he sent the Earle of Sancerre, to Saint Disier (whither the Emperor turned the head of his victorious armie without contradiction) with the Duke of Orleans company, of an hundred men at armes, whereof hee was Lieutenant, and some other troopes of horse: La Lande and the Vicont of Riuiere either of them with a thousand foot. The Emperor being come before the towne, hastens his approaches and trenches, makes two batteries, and plants fix great Culuerins towards the castle, to beat into the towne, and to hinder their ordinary sallies, he turned the water out of the ditch, and brought them to the vse of three VVels onely, which hardly could furnish the souldiers: and by a continuall batterie makes them careful to repaire it. La Lande was tyred with this toyle, and retiring at night to his lodging to refresh himselfe, a Cannon-f non-shot passing by the breach through the towne, takes off his head, whose losse was much lamented being a valiant Gentleman, and a good souldier. In exchange, about the same time the Prince of Orange going to visit the Emperor in the trenches, a Culuerin shot into a heape of stones, hurt him in such sort as he died, to the great griefe of the Emperor and his whole armie.

The death of the Prince of Orange.

The breach was reasonable, and they come to the assault. Eightene ensignes of Spaniards goe to it and fight hand to hand with them, which were besieged, for an houres space.

A space. The Emperour causeth nine or ten thousand Germans, to aduance speedily to succour them: but if the assault was fierce, the defence was no lesse valiant. Our men ouerthrew the Spaniards from the breach into the ditch by maine force. The Emperour sends about eight hundred men with Veluer cassocks, and bourguinets on their heads: they turne them likewise downe. Eight ensignes of Germans renew the assault with many small barrels of powder and wild-fire. They are likewise repulled with such shame and losse, as all their engines and devices remaine in the ditches at the defendants discretion: (and very happily, for they wanted powder) and seven or eight hundredaine in three assaults, gaue a certaine testimonie of the valour of the besieged. A Cannon shot did miraculously take away the Earles sword which hee held in his hand without hurting him, but lightly in the face.

This braue defence made the Emperor thinke, that the besieged would accept of an honorable composition. He sends a Trumpet to trie their minds, but he had no audience. So the Emperor ceaseth his batterieto come to the myne. The besieged discover it, and in the night send forth Linières a Norman Capitaine, who forces the Spaniards to abandon the trenches, which they had brought to the bulwarke of victory: they bring some pioneers into the towne to tell newes, and cuts the rest in pieces. Moreover, the Duke of Aumale being at Srenay vpon Meuze, did greatly annoy the Imperials campe, and cut off their victuals from Bar-le-Duke. They must therefore seek to winne by policy, what they could not get by force. The Lord of Granuelle had surprisid a packet, wherein hee found the Alphabet of the Cypher, whereby the duke of Guise did communicate with the Earle of Sancerre. By this meanes he counterfets a Letter in the Dukes name, and makes an vnknown man to giue it secretly to a French drum, returning from the enemies armie for some prisoners, that he should deliuer it to the Earle. The contents were, that the King knowing in what want of victuals and powder they were ready to fall, commanded them to make so fauourable a composition, as their men might be saued, hauing yet no meanes to succour them. They had endured six weekes siege, their victuals and munition grew short, & their powder was not sufficient to endure another assault. So they obtaine twelue dayes truce, during the which, they should understand from the King, if he had meanes to succour them: or if he would be pleased, that for want of succours within the time, the horse-men should depart with their armes and horses, their Corners displayed, and casks on their heads: their foot-men with their armes marching in battaile, ensignes displayed, and drums sounding, carrying with them all their iewels, and foure pieces of artilerie furnished, at the choice of the besieged. This treaty pleased the King, and they departed according to the capitulation. As honorable a composition as euer was read of, for men besieged by so great an Emperor, with all the forces of the westerne Empire, in a bad place which had no better esteeme then a Country towne.

Saint Disier yielded.

But what was the motive of this easie accord? The Emperour was not ignorant of the small hope they had of succours, and that within few dayes famine would bring them E to his subiection. But hee would take from the King of England, (who camped before Boullen and Montreuil) all colour of excuse, and let him know that the fault was not in him, if the treatie were not fulfilled, according to the which, without any stay elsewhere, they should ioynne their forces nere vnto Paris, (the which vnited together, would haue made three score and ten, or foure-score thousand foot, and eightene or twenty thousand horse) and to force the King to fight with disadvantage, or to suffer his Country and Subiects to be ruined before his face. Moreover, hee did foresee, that the Dauphin camping vpon the riuier of Marne, with the bands come out of Piedmont in good order, and well armed, would make him consume his armie, whilst the King made a bodie of forty thousand men, the which confronting him being F fresh, lustie, and resolute, might cause him more losse and dishonour then he had received in Provence.

And therefore the Emperour, to proceed in his conquests, and designs, which hee had with Henry King of England, came to lodge at Vitry in Parthois. Here hee learns that the King of England is not resolute to passe on, before hee had reduced Boullen and Montreuil to his obedience: the first dislike which shall soone draw the Emperour to Bruxelles. He considers, that the trauels past at Saint Disier, and want, had greatly wasted his souldiers: that to proceed, were to ingage both his men and his person in a Labyrinth, from whence whence he should not easily free himselfe with honour: that hauing in front a mightie Armie, still prospering, hunger (besides the Kings power) would be sufficient to force him to make a shamefull retreat: that if the English take Boulle and Montreuil, he will impart nothing to him of his conquests: that being strong on this side the sea, hee will be more obstinate when there shall be any question to treat with him. So as he begins to raise of some proposition of peace, moved before Saint Disier by the Lord of Granuelle, and his Confessor a Spanish Monke, of the Order of Saint Dominick, and of the house of Guimant.

A treatise of peace.

A day is appointed for the meeting of the Deputies at La Chaussee, betwixt Challons and Vitry. For the King there came the Admirall of Annabault, and Chemans, Keeper of the Scale of France: for the Emperour, Fernand of Gonzaga: and to know if the King of England would enter into it, they sent the Cardinall of Bellay, Raymond chiefe President of Rouan, and Aubespine Secretary of the State and Treasurer.

As the Emperour camped towards the riuer of Marne, a league beneath Challons, and within two leagues of the French armie, a riuer being betwixt both, William Earle of Fursenberg, parted about mid-night with a guide onely, to view a foard which hee had in former times passed, when as hee came into France for the Kings seruice. Being come to the foard hee leaues his guide vpon a banke: sounds it, finds it easie and passeth the Riuer. But hee discovered not some Gentlemen of the Kings House, and part of the Admirals companie, who had the guard that night, who without giuing any alarme, put themselves betwixt the Riuer and him, take him without resistance, led him to the Campe, know him, and send him to the Bastille at Paris, from whence hee shall not depart, untill he hath paid thirty thousand Crownes for his ransom. In the meane time the Emperour sees his armie ready to breake for hunger: they cut off his victuals behinde and on either side. And if that goodly Captaine whom the Daulphin had sent to draw into Espernay the victuals therabouts, to breake the bridge vpon the riuer, and to spoile the corne, wine, and other provisions, which could not bee saved, had carefully executed his commission, the Emperour (disappointed of the munition and victuals which hee found in Espernay, and hauing no meanes to passe the riuer) had not in the end enioyed those commodities, which hee found in Chateau Thierry, another storehouse of the French campe, wherby his troopes languishing for hunger, recovered some strength.

In the end, the Daulphin being come to the Campe at La Ferté vpon Louarre, and hauing sent a good number of mento Meaux, to hinder the Emperours passage, who desiring to make his retreat by Soissons, he takes his way by Villiers-cotte-Retz, and vnder-hand reuiues the proposition of Peace with the King. The King knowing that a battaile could not be giuen in the heart of his Realme, so neere vnto his capitall Citie, without a very doubtfull and dangerous consequence, and the losse of men, and in case he should vanquish, the King of England, and the Earle of Bures would encounter him with as mighty an armie as his owne: that by the losse of one, and (perchance) two battles, his Realme were in danger: that winning them he should get little, especially vpon England being an Iland. Moreover, the Marshall of Biez was almost forced to yield vp Montreuil to the English, for want of victuals and succours: the sufficiency of the Lord of Veruein Gouverneur of Boulle, as we shall shortly see, was not without cause suspected: and without a conclusion with the Emperour, hardly could these two important townes be relieved.

The King therefore sent the Admirall of Annebault againe to the Emperour, being in the Abbey of Saint Iohn des Vignes in the suburbs of Soissons, where in the end was concluded: That Charles Duke of Orleans should within two yeares after, marry with the Emperours daughter or his neece, daughter to Ferdinand King of Romans, and at the consummation of the said marriage, the Emperour should inuest the said Duke of Orleans in the Duchy of Milan, or in the Earldome of Flanders, and the Low-countries, at the choice of the said Emperour. And in exchange, this done, the King promised to renounce all his rights pretended to the said Duchy, and the Kingdome of Naples, and to restore the Duke of Sauoy to the possession of his Countries, when as the Duke his sonne should enioy the said Duchy of Milan, or the Earldome of Flanders: and all things during the terme of two yeares, as well on this, as on the other side of the Alpes should remaine in the

A the same estate, as they were at the truce made at Nice. So the Emperour deliuered vnto the King on this side the Mountaines, S. Disier, Ligny, Commercy: and the King, Yuoy, Montmedy and Landrecy. Stenay was deliuered into the duke of Lorraines hands, and the fortifications razed. On the other side the Alpes, the Emperour had nothing to yield but Montdeuis: and the King, Alba, Quierras, Antignan, S. Damian, Palezol, Crescentin, Verruc, Montcal, Barges, Pont d'Esture, Lans, Vigon, S. Saluador, S. Germane, and many other places which he possessed.

These treaties thus concluded and proclaimed beyond the Alpes, the Duke of Angien returned into France, with as great glory and honour, as a wife and valiant Prince could desire: and the Emperour retired his army (which the Earles of Reux and Bures led ioyntly with that of England:) he dismissed his owne, and parting from Soissons, tooke his way to Luxelles, accompanied beyond the frontiers by the duke of Orleans, the Cardinals of Lorraine and Meudon, the Earle of Laval, la Hunauday, and others. The Emperour is now out of the Realme: let vs also seeke to send the King of England beyond the seas. Henry the 8 King of England, according to the league hee had with the Emperour, landing at Calais, with an armie of thirtie thousand men, fortified with ten thousand Lanquenets, and three thousand Reistres, which the Earle of Bures led, and the troopes of the Earle of Reux, chiefe of the armie of the Low-countries for the Emperour, hee found Picardy very much vnfortified of men: the King had with-drawne his forces towards Champagne, to oppose them against the Emperour: and the duke of Vendosme being weake in men, had fide places of importance to furnish, Ardre, Boulle, Theroenne, Montreuil, Hedin, all equally exposed to the inuasion of the English.

Henry therefore seeing no armie to withstand him, making his account to cary a legges or an armie of the body of this Realme, sent the Duke of Norfolk and the Earles of Reux and Bures to besiege Montreuil, and himselfe went and camped before Boulle. The Marshall of Biez was Gouverneur, but when he saw the enemy turne the point of his army towards Montreuil, hee left the Lord of Veruein his sonne in law, to command in Boulle: (from which he was dissuaded by some, to whom his sufficiency was well knowne) assisted by Philip Corse a Captaine very well experienced in armes, the Lords of Lignon and Aix, otherwise called Renty, yong and without experience, with their regiments, and halfe the company of a hundred men at armes, of the said Marshall: and hee put himselfe into Montreuil, with the Constables company of a hundred men at armes, ledde by la Guiche his Lieutenant (a man of great experience in the Art of warre:) Genly, Captaine of foure ensignes of French foot, the Earle of Berenger and Francis of Chiaramont, Neapolitans, either commanding a thousand men.

At the beginning of the siege of Montreuil, the duke of Vendosme aduerted of a conuoy of victuals, which came from Aire and Saint Omer to the enemies campe, guarded by eight hundred horse, and twelue hundred Lanquenets, with foure meane Culuerins, to fortifie themselves, if they were charged: he sent the Lords of Villebon, Efree and Eguilly, with their companies of men at armes, to busse the enemy, untill that he might come with his company of a hundred men at armes, Chastaigneray, with fifty of the Daulphins, and Senerpont with the like charges: who arising in troope, charge the enemy, breake them, put them in rout, and besides the dead, carie eight hundred prisoners to Theroenne, win two Culuerins (the other two remaining, for that their carriages were broken) and foure ensignes of Lanquenets.

On the other side, the Kings presence before Boulle, kindled the courage of the besiegers, and daunted Vernern, the head of the defendants, a man of no worth. The first approach of the Cannon killed his heart: and amazed with the furious battery of the enemy, after hee had endured a kinde of an assault (but whilest that Philip Corse stood by him, who being slaine with a Cannon shot) he sends presently to sound the intent of the King of England, and yields him the towne by composition: that the men of warre, and citizens, should depart with their baggage: and thus he deliuered him the place, with all the artillery, munition, and victuals, whereof there was great store. The inhabitants refuse this bad composition: the Maior offers, with the towne-men, and those that were well affected, to keepe the towne. A shew of loue very commendable in this people, but in such an action hee should haue proceeded farther, and haue lodged the Captaine, where he might hee yielded a good account to the King, and by the effect, haue performed what was offered. Without doubt, his Maiestie would haue allowed the enterprife, as done for: A the good of his seruice: for the capitulation was no sooner concluded, and hostages not yet giuen, but a horrible tempest of winde and raine, ouerthrowes all the enemies tents, and leaues not one standing, and the foyle being fat and slipperie, they had no meanes to mount to the assault. An vndoubted signe of the present assistance of heauen. Moreover, the Dauphin marched with speed to succour them: who by his approach, had made the King of England to change his designe. But, said Veruein, I will not breake my word with the King of England. A foolish, and impertinent scruple, to continue constant in a treacherous promise to the enemy, and to make no conscience to breake his faith to his naturall and Soueraigne Prince. A scruple which shall soone make him iustly to lose his head on B a scaffold at Paris.

Siege of Montreuil.

This peace with the Emperour, had greatly impaired the King of Englands forces. To surprise their campe before Montreuil, and to take Boullen from them, before they had fortified it, the King causeth his armie to march with speed. But the duke of Norfolk, fearing lest the French armie would come betwixt Boullen and him, and cut off his retreat, he raised his campe, and went to ioyne with the King of England: who knowing his forces, being diuided from the Emperours, would be vnable to encounter the Kings army, he embarked a part of his great artillerie for England, and leaving the duke of Somerserset for the guard of his new conquest, he retired to Calais.

The hast he had to dislodge, caused him to leave part of his artillerie, victuals, and munition, in base Boullen, being fortified onely with some small trenches: for the surprizing whereof, the Dauphin sent in the night, two troopes, led by Fouquerolles and Tais, and to second them, he leaues six thousand Grisons in a valley. Fouquerolles and Tais enter the place, cut all in pieces they meet, winne both the artillerie, and munition, and think to haue gotten an absolute victory: but for want of making a stand, of ten or twelue ensignes betwixt base Boullen, and the high towne, to hinder their follies, and to leaue some troope in battaile in the market place of the base towne: five or six ensignes issue forth from the high towne, and finding the fouldiers in disorder, busied at the spoile, they put them in rout. Fouquerolles was slaine, Tais hurt, and no persuasions of the Captaine could euer stay the rest, but they cast themselves confusedly among the Grisons, to save their liues: yet were D they (saith the Originall) as good fouldiers, as any were that day in Europe: but in matter of enterprises, if all accidents be not foreseene, it is too late to repair them, when the disorder is hapned.

Day being come, and the raine falling in such abundance, as the most part of our shot had no fire: the victuals by reason of the bad way could not follow, all the country of Boullenois was wasted, spoiled, and burnt, euen vnto Montreuil: and from Montreuil to Abbeville (which were seuentene leagues) no grasse, nor forrage for their horses. So the Dauphin hauing receiued newes from the King, dismissed his Swisses and Grisons, leaving the Marshall of Biez in Montreuil, with the French and Italian bands, which came out of Piedmont, and retired to the King his father, at Saint Germaine in Lay. Then dyed James E King of Scotland, leaving by his death, his Realme in prey to his nearest neighbour. To saue it from oppression, and keepe the people in the obedience of the Queene Dowager (he had taken to his second wife the daughter of the duke of Guise) the King sent (with a good number of men, and money) the Earle of Lenox of the house of Steward, Nephew to the deceased Marshall of Aubigny. The Earle being young, and ill-advised, hauing in his vaine and riotous expences employed the Kings money, and fearing to be accused of theft, retired to the King of England, who desiring to vse his seruice, and tye him by some notable bond, caused him to marry a Nece of his, daughter to his sister, mother to the deceased King of Scots. The King aduertised of his revolt, sent La Brache a Gentleman of Bourbonnois, wife and well aduised, to giue counsell and comfort the widow, and soone F after, the Lord of Lorges Earle of Montgomerie, to crosse the King of Englands attempts against the Scots.

But in caring for the affaires of another, should hee neglect his owne? Boullen possessed by the English, was too great a beame in his eye; it was an open port for the enemy to take footing dayly, and to fortifie himselfe within the Realme. They therefore make great preparations by sea and land, to dislodge them. By sea, hee sends capitaine Paulin (hereafter Baron of La Garde) into Prouence, to bring five and twenty galleies out off the East

A East seas, into the Ocean, by the straight of Gibraltar, and eight, or ten Carracks of Genoa: but they came so late, as they serued to no vse: most part of them perished at the mouth of Scine, for want of expert Pilots. By land he raiseth a mighty armie, vnder the command of the Marshall of Biez, to campe before Boullen, the riuer betwixt both, attending his armie by sea, and there building a good fort vpon the point of the tower of Ordre, to keepe the enemy within their walls with the Cannon, and to cut off all means for the ships to enter into the haven, to succour the towne: making account to goe afterwards in person, to besiege Guines, and there to fortifie: to keepe Calais, and the land of Oye in subiection, and by that meanes to famish Boullen. But man purpoiseth, and God B disposeth: we shall see both Boullen and Calais, by other meanes, and at diuers seasons, reduced to the obedience of this crowne. According to these designes, the King sent Cont Reingraue, the Colonels Reichrac and Ladomwie to fill vp the regiments of Laniquenets, to the number of foure or five thousand a peece, and to ioyne with ten thousand men, which he leaui'd in Gascony and Languedoc.

This done, his Maiestie rooke his way to Normandy, to embarke his armie at New-hauen, and being at Touques about Mid-summer, hee discovered his armie out of the Leuant seas, then vpon the assurance which the Marshall of Biez (hauing receiued the Lansquenets, and fix or seuen thousand pioners) gaue him, that by the midst of August the fort of Boullen would bee in defence, hee caused his Navy to set saile, C wherein the Admirall of Annabault commanded. But behold a pitifull beginning. As they came to weigh anchor in the Carraquon (which was the goodliest ship of the westerne sea, and the best sayler, being of eight hundred tunnes burthen, in the which the Admirall should fight) fire takes the gunners roome, and consumes it to ashes. Many, to auoid the furie of the fire, leaped into the sea: the Gallies saued many, and many were cast away, the fire takes the artillerie (there were a hundred great peece of brass) which sinking all that was before them, behinde or on the sides, forced the other ships to goe roomer. A hundred and fifty great ships, threecore barks, and five and twenty galleies set sayle, the sixth of Iuly, and bent their course towards the Ill- of Wight, and the haven of Portsmouth in England, where the English had threecore ships, well appointed D for warre.

The Admirall resolved to fight with them, made choise of thirty ships, to accompanie that wherein he would fight: Boutieres coasting this Squadron on the right wing, with thirty six ships, and the Baron of Curton on the left, with the like number: The aduantage of the place where the enemy lay, defended on the one side by some forts, and on the other with rocks, banks and sands couered with water, which lye in the midst of the way, and make a narrow & crooked entry, dissuaded him. To draw them to sea, the gallies aduance, skirmishing with their Cannon, and fighting, they retire towards their Squadrons. The calmnesse of the sea, without any winde, or great current, shewed it selfe fauourable to our men, for the space of a whole houre in the morning, hauing meanes to gouerne their Gallies at pleasure, and to annoy the enemy, who for want of wind lay open to the French E artillerie. So the Mary-Rose one of the best ships of their fleet, was sunke with the Cannon, and of five or six hundred men, onely five and thirty escaped: the great Henry which carried their Admirall had made the like end, if the neerer ships had not succoured it. And greater losses threatened them, when as the wind changed, and became good for them; perceiving them from perill, and desiring them to charge our ships with full sayles: which change was so sudden, as the English ships pursuing our gallies, were ready to ouerturne them, if by a great assurance of the Commanders, and experience of the Saylers, and rowers, hauing no Cannon in their peopes, they had not speedily turned their prowes, who (being without the reach of the Cannon) slacke their course, seeking to draw the enemy F out of the rocks and banks, as they had been directed.

Some English pinaces (these best ships more long in forme then round, more narrow then our Gallies) swift and easie to gouerne, and which better command the currents in that sea) followed with an incredible swiftnesse, and with their artillerie, did wonderfully annoy our gallies, when as the Prior of Capua, brother to Peter Stroff, impatient of this brauadoe, turnes his gally against a Pinace, which aduancing his companions, was ready to grapple with one of our gallies in poupee, and forceth him to retire to the body of the battaile. And our Admirall hauing now put his ships in order, and ready to giue the signe of the bataille, he sees the enemy retire from the chase, and returne to their hold. In A this conflict, they lose some slaues, few souldiers, and no men of account.

They must now prepare another bait. The King of England was at Portsmouth, and the Admirall (burning his country, and killing his men in his sight) imagined that the indignation of this wrong, the compassion of his subjects blood spilt, the sacke and burning of his country, would force him to send forth his ships, to succour them (being not above two Cannon shot off,) or else the subjects wrongs, being no way relieved by the presence of their Prince, would breed some sedition, and mutiny in the country. Hetherfore makes three sundry landings, to diuide the enemies forces. The one by Stroff, vpon a little fort, furnished with artilerie, which did beat our gallies in flanke, and manned by the country. B men, who seeing the resolution of our men, abandon their fort, and fly to a wood neere by, some behinde were slaine, and the houses about it burnt. The Lord of Tais, and the Baron of la Garde, both Generals; the first of the foot, the other of the Gallies, land in another place, they encounter some squadrons of foot, who by couert wayes in the woods, were gathered together, to fight at their aduantage: they make head against our men, and hurt some, but the rest of the troops marching in bataille, make them abandon the place, and flie to recouer their straights, where they could not follow but in disorder.

Marly and Pierrebon Captaines of Gallies, were hurt in their landing, at an encounter of the English, but to draw them in grosse to fight, it was not possible, and lesse meanes to charge them on their own ground. Neither Captaines nor Souldiers wanted will, but the danger was too apparant. They must slip downe a narrow channell, where but foure ships could goe in front, and the like number of the enemies ships might easily defend it. They could not enter, but with the tyde and winde, and the foure first ships repulsed, had false backe vpon the rest of the fleet, and disordered them. They must of necessity fight neere vnto their land: and fauoured by their forts and Cannon, had they not meanes to hinder the approach, to the great preiudice of our fleet: and our ships boarding and grappling, the force of the current had driuen them on ground one vpon another. There was as little reason to fight at anchor, the cables might be cut, and this inconuenience avoided, the danger was not lesse, for the nature of the current is to turne the prow, so as D our ships in stead of the prow or the broad-side, must haue presented their poope to the enemy. Moreover, their anchors not able to stay the ships suddenly, by reason of the violent turning of the streame, either the anchor or cable might breake, and by consequence cast the ships on ground.

The French
consule to take the Isle of Wight and to fortifie it.

They therefore propound two things in counsell, either to saile into Picardy, to fortifie the Kings armie, and to cut off all succours from Boullen, or to fortifie the Isle of Wight. Many reasons perswaded the most part to the last opinion: for hauing the Isle at their deuotion, they might easily become Lords of Portsmouth, one of the goodliest ports of England: and forcing the enemy to maintain a continuall armie both by land and sea, to crosse the Conquerors designs, it would consume them in exceeding expences. Moreover, they kept the passage of Spaine and Flanders: and might in time till the Island, and make it yeeld victuals sufficient to maintain men for the guard thereof.

Without doubt this was an opportunitee which hath not since happened, to oppose a strong barre betwixt both the Realmes. But lets say, that he which holds both land and sea, within the palme of his hand, would leaue this Island in the power of her ancient and lawfull Lord. But howsoeuer, the Admirall might easily haue left foure thousand men, and foure thousand Pioners, for the defence of the Island, as hee did to fortifie the Kings army before Boullen, after the overthrow of the Cheualier d'Aux, a Prouencall and Captaine of the gallies of Normandy, leaving his fleet well manned. As the Admirall lay at anchor before Boullen a Westerne winde ariseth, and makes him to seeke harbour vpon the coast of England. Being at the Perrais, and there kept by force of winde, and a swolne sea, the English fleet thinking to haue the aduantage, imbarke speedily: being a hundred good ships, and come with full sailes against our men, hauing the winde in poope. The violence of the windes, and the greatnesse of the seas, which might haue taken from our men the vse and seruice of their gallies, gaue them hope of victorie. On the other side, the Admirall feared that the tempest would drine him to shore, or force him to weigh anchor in disorder (for that the bad weather would not suffer them to keepe together.) and

A and with great danger to passe the strait at Calais, or else to take his course towards Flanders, and so they might stop his passage in his returne: moreover, foule weather might stay him so long, as he should want victuals, and in the meane time, the enemy (who to attend him at the passage, would come to Boullen) would disturbe the Kings forts that hee pretended to make, the which he desired by all meanes to prevent.

And therefore following the aduice of his Captaines, hee attends at anchor the change of the tyde. The next day the winde and tyde fauours him, so as he desires to encounter the enemy. The night passeth, and at the breake of day, the English armie appeares. Hee followes them, but was so becalmed, as he could not aduance but with the tyde. Either hee B toger the winde, and coasting neere, salute one another with the Cannon. Some ships are sunk, and some men perish in the sea. In the end, the enemy seeing our men to haue gotten the winde, set saile, and take their course to the Isle of Wight, hauing both winde and tyde, which carried them without disorder to their Port, and the night approaching ended the combate. The enemy hauing recouered a safe Port, the Admirall tooke his course towards New-hauen, to refresh his armie, and to land many sicke men languishing in the ships. This was about the midst of August.

In the midst of August, the King meant to execute his enterprife vpon Guines, whereof wee haue spoken. His armie was of twelue thousand French, twelue thousand Lanquenets, six thousand Italians, and foure thousand Legionaries, a thousand or twelue C hundred men at armes, and seuen or eight hundred light-horse. But the fort before Boullen was no more defensible then eight dayes after it was begun. First not built vpon the point, as it was appointed, right against the Tower of Ordre, but against base Boullen, so as it could no way stop the entry of the ships into the hauen. The Marshall of Biez excused himselfe, that they had giuen him to vnderstand he should finde no water there, and that the souldiers could not lodge, for the violence of the winds. Secondly, he relied vpon this Enginor, Anthony Mellan an Italian Captaine, who was held to be a man of experience, and a good souldier, who being ignorant of his measures, made the worke fruitlesse for two months.

The Marshall notwithstanding assures the King, that within eight dayes, the fort would D be defensible, but it was no more forward, then at the first day. And to couer this defect, he lets the Captaines vnderstand, that he is aduertised, how the enemy assembled at Calais, to come and succour Boullen by land, holding it in danger to be famished: hee was therefore resolu'd to passe the river, and to abandon the fort. And without imparting of anything to the Lord of Estrée, Marshall of the campe, who contradicted this designe, he leaues three or foure thousand men in the fort, and goes to lodge at Mont-Lambert, within Cannon-shot of the towne, to make head against the enemy, and to fight with him, if he came to succour the towne. But what likelihood was there, that the English being weaker in force and numbers, would hazard a battell, and by land (seeing that one ship would carry more victuals then a thousand carts) come and victuall a towne, which E daily he might refresh by sea, without danger, in fight of the enemy. But in effect, it was a great honour for the Marshall of Biez, to see so many yong Princes subject to his command: and if Boullen had bene recouered, hee had lost the authority to command so goodly and mighty an armie. The hope of a battaile made all the youth in Court poist to Mont-Lambert, the dukes of Angiers, Neuers, Aumale, Thours Lord of Tremouille, the Earle of Lauai, and others, who by continuall skirmishes, sometimes with gaine, sometimes with losse, did trie their valours with the besieged. And the King relying vpon the assurance hee had of the Marshall of Biez, advanced, hoping that the bulwarks, and the Courtin: of the fort, had bene in such defence, as he might haue employed his armie else where. But there are two reasons which diuert him: The one F priuare, which was the death of the duke of Orleans his yongest sonne, who surprised with a Quotidian Feuer, which they held to be pestilentiall, died the eight day of September, in the Abbey of Forest Moutier, betwixt Abbeuille and Moutreuil, being three and twenty yeeres old, leauing a second griefe to the father, to haue lost two sonnes at such times as they grew capable to ease his decaying age: and without doubt the waywardnesse which made this Prince melancholike and difficult, will hasten the course of his life, to bring him to his grave. The other was publike: the Prince of Melphe being sent to visit the fort, hauing considered the time of the foundation, and the reime it required: to come to the perfection, reported, that winter would be well passed, before it should bee made fit for service, without the assistance of an armie.

So the King seeing his hopes lost, and the season spent, for the effecting of his designs, he retired towards Amiens, to the Abbey of Saint Fuscien. In the meane time, the arrogance of the Kings campe at Mont Lambert, did invite both nations, daily to make great skirmishes. One day amongst the rest, the duke of Aumale, seeing our men withstand a charge of the enemies but faintly, and were ready to be overthrowne: making account he should be seconded by his troope, hee fals vpon a company of English, which went to charge our French vpon the flanke, and at the first approach stayes them: but being stricken with a lance, betwixt the nose and the eye, it breaks in pieces, and left the French halfe a foot within his head: without doubt, we may admire the generositie of this young Nobleman, who for so rough a charge, lost neither shirops, nor vnderstanding, to free himselfe from those which had compassed him in, and his admirable patience in enduring the paine, when they came to draw forth the three square head, as constantly, as if they had pulled but a haire from his head. Winter approached, and the King considering that his enterprise vpon Guines was frustrate: aduertised moreouer, that the English made a new leauie in Germanie of ten thousand Lanquenets, and foure thousand horse, to come with this supply and raise the siege at Bouillon, he fortified all the approaches in the countrie of Tierache, and about Aubenton, Veruein and Guise, to stop their passage. He sent the Marshall of Biez to invade, ruine and burne the land of Oye (for that Calais, Guines and Hames, which the English held vpon the maine land, had no other reliefe but out of that country:) and to dispose of the affaires as occasion should serue, he marched towards la Fere vpon Oize.

Description and lack of the land of Oye.

The land of Oye contains about foure leagues in length, and three in breadth: a marshy very fertill in pasture, hauing on the one side the sea, and at the one end towards the sea Calais: at the other end Grauelin, of the countie of Flanders: towards the land, and alongt the bankes of the Marish, is the towne of Guines, and the castle of Hames, and at the end towards Arthois stands Andres. For the safety of this Countie, the English had made great trenches towards the firme land, the which were commonly full of water, and fortified with Rampars: and to flanke them, forts and bastions well manned to defend the entry into the country.

The affection which euery one bare vnto the Kings seruice, made them to passe the channels which flowed into the country, directly against the forts. They assaile them, force them, and put all to the sword they finde. Two thousand English come to their succours, the French-men at arms charge and defeat them, and kill the most part: the rest cast themselves into the trenches, where the horse-men could not follow: fourescore or a hundred of our horse, with many men at armes, testified by their deaths or wounds, the fury of this encounter. The English were strong, both in high and base Bouillon, and in the Tower of Ordre (this Tower was built by Iulius Caesar, the second time he passed into England, to haue a Lampe vpon the top of it, to direct his ships, if they should be diuided by any storm at sea, as in his first voyage) and the retiring of our troopes, made them to enterprise vpon our fort, which was made on the other side of the water, right against base Bouillon. Seven or eight thousand choise men, come an houre before day, and mount suddenly to the top of the rampar, where they might easily enter in many places without any ladders. Thibault Roubault Lord of Riou, Lieutenant for the King within the fort, finding his succors faile off, (layes the originally) watched in the night, and rested in the day. If the enemy charged furiously, he repels him with no lesse assurance, kills all them that mounted, overthrowes the rest, and puts them in rout: so as by this gallant repulse, hee was afterwards freed from the attempts of the English.

A leauie of Lanquenets for the English made fruitlesse.

We must now plant strong barres against the Lanquenets, which come to succour the King of England. They were lodged at Fleurines, a great Village in the countie of Liege, ten leagues from Mezieres. Mezieres was of great importance, if the enemy had surprised it. And the Emperor fearing that this great swarme of men, finding his countries vnfortified of souldiers, would doe some harme, had hindered their passage through his territories. This refusal might haue made the Germans to haue sought a passage by force through the Realme. So the King to crosse them, sent Langy into Mezieres with a thousand foot, and the horsemen of Bourgongne, and part of Champagne: he sent Longueuil his

A his Lieutenant into Champagne, to muster the legion of the Country, and manied the passages where he thought the enemy would attempt. He sent the Duke of Anguien into Guise with three hundred men at armes, and a number of foot. In the end the Lanquenets hauing stayed three weekes at Fleurines, doubtfull where they should make their passage: the day of their pay being come, and the money yet in England, they turne their ensignes, and returne home the same way, leading with them the King of Englands Treasurers for assurance of their entertainment. Our Francis is now freed of a great care. By the death of the Duke of Orleans, the chiefe conditions of peace made with the Emperor were voyd: so his Maiesty sent from Folambray neere to Couilly, the Admirall Anne Bault, and the Chancellor Olier to enter into a new treaty. The Emperor was at Bruges, and determined to send an army against the Protestants and Commonalties of Germany, who yielded him no such obedience as he required of his subiects, and with this designe he went to Antwerp, to receiue money by imposition and loane.

This voyage is a cloake to delay our Ambassadors. But in effect he meant to know the minds of them of Antwerp, that according to the course of affaires, he might bee more milde or sower in his answer. And the sayd Ambassadors discouraging his ordinary delays and dissimulations, in the end tooke their leave, returning with no other assurance, but if the King beganne no warre against him, he was not resolu'd to make any. A word serues to a man of iudgement. What might the King conceiue of this cold entertainment? C but that the Emperor sought an opportunity to beginne a new warre with advantage: and if he had forced them to obedience whom he threatened in Germany, hee would bring all his forces both Catholiques and Protestants, ioyntly against the frontiers of this Realme. To auoid a sudden surpris, he giues the gouernment of Languedoc to the Duke of Anguien: that of Piedmont to the Prince of Melphie, lately created Marshall of France, hee sent to fortifie the weak places of Picardy, he made a fort about Maubert Fontaine, seven leagues from Veruein, and five from Mezieres, at the going out of the wood: and for that the frontier of Champagne lay most open to the Germans, he fortified Mezieres and Mouzon, built a fort vpon the Meuze on this side riuer within the Realme, betwixt Steuay and Dun-le-Chateau, which he called Villefranche, he fortified the Castle of Saint D Menchault, Saint Desier, Chaumont in Bassigny, Coiffy and Ligny: and made Bourg in Bresse able to make head against a mighty army. Thus the King provided for his frontiers, and places subiect to the enemies inuasions. But the plague had so diminished the number of souldiers that were in the fort right against Bouillon, as of twenty Ensignes, not above eight or nine hundred men escaped this mortality. The souldiers notwithstanding are commended for their fidelity, constancy, and patience in the regard thereof. The raine, snow, and other iniuries of the ayre, the moistnesse of their lodgings (being but holes in the ground, couered with a penile of straw, and when a whole household was dead, the ruines serued to bury their carcases) had bred these diseases. But the spring time hauing tempered the season, and stayed the plague, the Lords of Elbe and Riou, being refreshed and supplied with men, returned to their ordinary skirmishes, to the enemies losse. The fort wanted victuals. Seneport Lieutenant to the Marshall of Biez, was appointed for this execution. Three hundred English horse come to hinder this victualing. He meets them the day after Easter day neere to the bridge of bricke, beneath mount Saint Stephen: the skirmish begins on either side: the Lord of Tais, and the Conte Reingraue arise either of them with six or seven-score gentlemen, the alarme comes to Bouillon, and the English supply their men with seven hundred horse, and foure hundred Hargebuziers: Seneport chargeth the horsemen before they had ioyned with their shot: the Reingraue is hurt at the first charge, and overthrowne, and on the other side the Marshall of Calais, being chiefe of the enterprise, is slaine, with a hundred or six-score English, about two hundred horse on either side, and three-score and fiftene English prisoners, all in cassacks of velvet garnished with gold and furer.

A great plague in the fort before Bouillon.

A while after the Marshall of Biez parted from his campe, for the same effect, accompanied with fifty men at armes, the Reingraue with his Regiment of foure thousand Lanquenets, and two hundred French shot, he encountered the Earle of Surrey followed by six thousand Englishmen, with an intent to take from our men the meates to refresh the fort with victuals, and necessary munition. Here the combat was long and furious: in the end the English being overthrowne, retire to a little Fort, where they force them. Seven or eight eight hundred of their men are slain. Surrey saues himselfe by flight, and leaues feuen or eight-score prisoners. Boullen was but a Church-yard for the English, and a waiting for their treasure. The King of England considering how obstinate the King was in the recovery of his towne, that moreover the Emperour (what league soeuer they had together) had his priuate designs, and regarded nothing but his owne interest, he lets the King vnderstand, that he is resolu'd to haue him for his friend, and to end all controuersies. So the Deputies for their Maesties meet betwix Ardres and Guines. For the English, came the Admirall Annebault, and Raymond the first President of Rouan: for the English, Dudley Admirall of England, (and afterwards Duke of Northumberland) and finally, after many consultations, a peace was made, with these conditions: That the King within eight dayes should pay 800000 Crownes to the King of England, as well for the arrerages of his pension, as for many other expences made by the said King in the fortification of Boullen, and of the Country: and in regard of the said summe, the King of England should deliver vnto the King, Boullen, and all the country belonging vnto it, with the ancient places or newly edified by him, Mont-Lambert, the Tower of Ordre, Ambletuel, Blacquenay, and others, with all the artillery, victuals, and munition in the said places.

The death of the Duke of Anguien.

This yeare is famous by the death of Anguien. In the moneth of February, the snow was very great, and the Court being at Roch-Guion, some young Noblemen attending the Dauphin, made a challenge, some to defend a house, others to assaile it with snow-balls: but this pastime ended soone with a pitifull and fatal spectacle. As the Duke came out of this house, a coffer full of linen, cast out of the window, fals vpon his head, and within few houres sends him to rest in the graue with his ancestors, leauing a suspicion of some great men, being enuious and ielous of his vertue, reputation, and fauour, which he had gotten with the King, the people, and men of warre, of whom he was more then any other of his age, esteemed, beloued, and respected.

The death of the King of England.

The beginning of this yeare is likewise remarkable by the decease of Henry the 8, King of England, leauing for his successor his son Edward, eight yeares of age. This death bred a great alteration and change in the health of Francis: they were almost of one age, conformable in complexions. And our King taking this for a presage or foretelling, that his turne should soone follow after, grew then more melancholly and silent then before. Hee fals sicke of a feuer, for auoiding whereof, hauing passed many places fit for the pleasure of hunting, la Muette, Saint Germain in Lay, Villepreux, Dimpierre neere vnto Cheneuse, Limours, and Rochefort, he came to lodge at Rambouillet, and as the pleasure hee tooke both in hunting and hawking, stayed him there some time, his feuer encreased, and grew to a Quotidian.

first.

So finding his houre come, he disposed of his conscience and of his house: he greatly recommended his subiects and seruants to the Dauphin his successor: and the last day of March, in the yeare 1547, being fifty and three yeares old, hee changed the painfull and continual toils of this mortall life, with the eternall rest which the happy enioy for euer. A Prince wonderfully lamented both of his subiects and strangers, whose vertues deserue to be placed among the most famous. He was valiant, courteous, bountifull, iudicious, of a great spirit, and an excellent memory. A louer of learning, and men of merit, to whom Arts and Sciences owe the perfections they haue gotten at this day, hauing by his bringing vp of youth, founded Colledges in Paris, in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latine tongues, assembled from all parts of the world, learned men, and of good life, and by this means cleared the darknes of ignorance, wherewith the world had bene so obscured, by the malice of time, and negligence of former ages. A Prince fauoured with many good, yet croft with as many bad and finifter fortunes. Happy notwithstanding, that no aduersity could euer make him degenerate from a noble and royall mind, nor from the true beleefe of a good and faithfull Christian. Happy and blessed in his end, to haue pacified all foraine confusions, which had so long troubled his Estates and his subiects quiet. But without doubt, he had bene farre more happy, if hee could haue left his Realme free from those fatal diuisions, which even in his reigne had so miserably diuided his subiects, and shall cause hereafter strange combustions: the first consideration whereof, makes my haire to stand vp right, and my heart to tremble at that which is to come.

HENRY the SECOND:

The 59 French King.

Sage, nature, and the good education he had receiued vnder his Father in the government of the Estare, did countenance him in this succession: the which he receiued on the same day that hee was borne, and he confirmed it in Saint Germain in Lay, by the restitution of the Constable of Montmorency: by the publication of many goodly ordinances, for the reformation of apparell, ordering of the treasure, providing for the poore, suppression of new erected offices, gouernment of the Riuers and Forests, maintenance of Iustice, and relieuing of his subiects: but about all, that necessary law against blasphemers, as we may see in the Originall. Doubtlesse this was a commendable beginning, and worthy the homage hee did owe to the Soueraigne Lord, as an acknowledgement of the fee, whereof he tooke possession, if hee had not polluted it with the mournfull spectacle of that bloody and fatal combat betwix Iarnac and Chastaignery, Gentlemen of Noble Families, hauing taxed one another with iniurious words, and the Lye past, to the preiudice of one of their honours, the King in stead of reconciling them by the aduice of his Councell, and to haue forced the culpable to do right to the interested, he granted them the combat, and on the sixteenth day of Iuly they came to the place appointed at Saint Germain in Lay, where in the presence of the King, Princes, Noblemen and all the Court, they entered the Lists. Iarnac, who was held the weaker being newly recovered from sicknesse, contemned and disgraced, ouerthrew the other (who before the combat was held a Conqueror) and wounded him in such sort, as within few dayes after he died; wherewith the King was much grieved, and hereupon did forbid all combats. He beganne his reigne by a bloody tragedy, and ended in like manner; whereby we may see, that God doth punish him that thirsteth after another mans blood, with the losse of his owne.

The restoring of the Constable, disappointed the Cardinal of Tournon, and the Admirall of Annebault, touching the chiefe gouernment of the State: and the Lords of Longueuall, Escars, Boncour, Frametzels, Antiboy, Grignan, the Baron of la Garde, the General Bayard, and many others, accused some for theft, some for other disorders in their charges, did somewhat trouble the Court. It was an old saying: that hee which eates the Kings Goose, will cast vp the feathers a hundred yeares after: but since, they haue turned this saying into a proverb; He that steales a hundred thousand Crownes from the King, is quit if he restore ten thousand. So some preuailed by this expedient, others escaped rigorous punishments through fauour.

restored.

In the meane time, the ceremonies of the Kings Coronation were prepared at Rheims, and hauing receiued it the seuen and twentieth day of Iuly, by the hands of Charles of Lorraine, Archbishop of Rheims, he made a voyage into Picardy, and did visit the forts which were made about Boullen: then did he prepare an army to succour Scotland, against whom the English made war, for that the Lords of the Country had refused to giue their Princeesse Mary Steward in marriage to goe to young King Edward, hoping by this bond to vnitte the two Realmes of England and Scotland, to the preiudice of the French, and of the common alliance betwix France and Scotland. The Lord of Esse was chiefe of the armie; Peter Stroffy General of the Italian bands, d'Andelot Colonell of the French foot, the Reingraue chiefe of the Lansquenets, marching by land against the English forces: & Leon Stokly Prior of Capoua, by sea spoiled the English of the greatest part of their conquests: but the confirmation of the peace lately concluded betwix the deceased Kings of France and England ended this waire, and brought backe our aduenturers into France.

Francis at the end of his dayes, had well fortifed the Ieuaine, which should soone breed new combustions with the Emperor. Henry must be heire to his quartell, as well as to his crown, and knowing that the Pope had a fresh and iust cause of indignation for the murder of Peter Lewis, Duke of Parma and Placentia, his sonne; and for the inuasion of A Placentia, by Ferdinand Gonzaga, Lieutenant for the Emperor in Italy: he sent Charles of Lorraine, lately honored with a Cardinals Hat (this is hee that shall minister so much matter to talke of him, vnder the successors of Henry) to draw the Pope from the Emperors party, to the Kings alliance: but death shall frustrate the Pope of his intended reuenge. Commonly men fish best in a troubled streame: and many knowing this new King to be of a mild spirit, addicted to the delights of Court, and little practised in affaires, they kindled a desire in his mind to reuenge the wrongs the Emperour had done to France, whereof they vrge for a testimony the death of Fogelsberg beheaded in Ausbourg, at his returne from the Scottish warres for the Kings seruice.

Sedition for the customs.

On the other side, the Emperour grew not a little ialous of the progresse the King made into Bourgogne, Briele, Sauoy and Piedmont, as if he had caried with him an alarme bell to stirre vp the people to the following warre. And it may be it had then been kindled, but an home-bred mutiny stayed it for a time. During the Kings voyage into Sauoy and Piedmont, the extorsions of the toll-gatherers and farmers of salt, caused the Commons of Guienne, Xaintonge, and Angoulmois, to rebell. In few weekes forty thousand men goe to field armed with all kind of weapons, the Islanders ioyne with them, and with a common consent fall vpon the toll gatherers. The people of Gascony doe presently follow this pernicious example. The commons of Bourdeaux rise, & finding La Vergne, Esbonnac, Marquannan, and others (Tribunes fit for their humors) they expell the customs, lacke many good houses, vnder colour to seeke for these exactors: the commons search throughout the towne, whence followed many massacres in diuers places, and many of the Kings officers were slaine, who abusing their charges had bene the cause of this mutiny. The Mayor, Jurats, and other Magistrates of the City of Bourdeaux, and the Court of Parliament, with the Seigneur of Moncins, who commanded there as the Kings Lieutenant, in stead of remedying these tumults in the beginning, temporized too much, namely Moncins, who for that he did not suppress the insolency of La Vergne, one of the heads of these mutines, hee made him dare to raise vp the people by the sound of a bell.

Another error of his was, that he sent forth a number of shor out of the Castle of Ha, D thinking to terrifie this enraged multitude. But this increased their popular fury. They forced the Councillors of the Parliament to lay aside their gownes, to put on Mariners caps, to carry pikes, and to follow their Ensignes, and the masters of Saulx brethren, the one Capitaine of the towne, the other of Castle Trompeté, to bee their Leaders, to assist at the sacking of many houses, and to see their friends and fellow Citizens massacred before their eyes. They spoile the Towne-house, a goodly store-house for armes: and to increase their villanies, they murder Moncins most cruelly, being come amongst them, thinking with courteous words to pacifie the fury of these mutines. Having wrought their wils, and being laden with booty, they disband, some one way, some another: the Parliament fortified with men of honour, and refusing their authority, punish by exemplary iustice La Vergne, one of the chiefe Tribunes of this rebellion, and some other of the most apparant. The King was no lesse ready to reuenge this outrageous and rash rebellion, then the commons were active in the execution. The Constable had the commission for Guienne, Francis of Lorraine Duke of Aumale (whom we shall afterwards see Duke of Guise, so famous vnder Francis the second, and Charles the ninth): that of Xaintonge with foure thousand Languenques and many French hoise. This man seeking to winne the reputation of a mild and mercifull Prince, pacified the Country without punishment of what had passed. The other marched after another manner, for ioyning both armies together, he entered into Bourdeaux, disarmed the people, tooke and burnt all the records, Registers, rights, and priuileges of the Citizens, and of all the country of Bourdelois: he caused the Court of Parliament to cease; beats downe their bells: forced fene score of the chiefe to goe vnto the Carnes (who had three dayes after the mutiny, in the night taken vp his poore dismembred carcasse with a Gentleman of his called Montelien) to fetch the body of Moncins, and to conduct it in mournfull sort vnto Saint Andrews Church, and by the punishment of the two Saulx, Esbonnac, (another Tribune, who had seized vpon Castle Trompeté) and many others, hee purged their offence. Talemagne and Galassie, Colonels of the commons, were afterwards broken vpon the wheele, either

A ther of them caryng a Crowne of burning iron for a marke of the Soueraignty which they had vsurped.

The end of this year was more comical. Anthony of Bourbon Duke of Vendosme married Isabe of Albret, daughter to Henry of Albret King of Nauarre, and of Marguerite sister to King Francis the first, and the Duke of Aumale, the daughter of Hercules of Elte Duke of Ferrara, and of Renée of France daughter to King Lewis the twelfth. And during these sports in Court, that extraordinary chamber, against them who they cal Lutherans, was erected, who persisting constantly in the profession of their faith, suffered their bodies to be consumed to ashes. The birth of Lewis the Kings younger sonne, the third of

B February, at Saint Germaine in Lay, his baptisme the nineteenth of May; the Coronation of Queene Katherine at Saint Denis, the tenth of Iune; the stately entry of their Majesties at Paris the sixth of the same moneth; and the great tourney at the Tourneils, made in fauour of the Ladies, continued the sports in Court: which finished, the King sitting in his seat of Iustice the second of Iuly, would giue sentence in his Court of Parliament at Paris, according to the ancient custome of his Predecessors. The presence of the Prince giues authority to the Magistrate, and the eye of the King (saith the Wiseman) scatters ill counsells.

At that time the Nobility of England were at iarre with the commons. During the which, the King sent Paul Lord of Termes, to continue the warre in Scotland begun by

Troubles in England.

C Elfr, who hauing lately defeated the English before Hedington, and taken the Isle of horses, resigned his charge to his successor. After much sport at the Queenes Coronation, the King caused a general procession to be made in Iuly, where he assisted, with the Queen, the Princes of the blood, Cardinals, and all the Orders and Estates of Paris; and at his returne from the Bishops lodging, where he had dined, hee would see certaine Christians burnt detesting the errors and abuses maintained by the Church of Rome. Among the which there was a Taylor, who some few dayes before had made answer of his beliefe before the King and many Courtiers, and spoken boldly to the Duchesse of Valentinois, telling her that she should rest satisfied to haue infected France, and not seeke to pollute so holy and sacred a thing as the true Religion, and the truth of the Sonne of God with her

D filthinesse; and that it was to be feared that God for this cause would send some great plague both vpon the King and Realme. But the King being incensed and not amended (being caried away by the allurements of her that did betwixch him) hauing commanded that his processe should be dispatcht, he would be a spectator of this Taylors execution, standing in the Lord of Rochports lodging in Saint Anthonies street right against the scaffold, whereas the Taylor shewed a wonderfull constancy and patience.

Hauing discovered the King, he began to behold him so constantly, as nothing could diuert him, yea the fire being kindled, he had alwayes his eyes so fixt vpon that object, as the King was forced to retire himselfe, yea he was so troubled, as he confest that he thought this mans shadow did still follow him, and that for many nights this spectacle did present E it selfe vnto him, whereupon he protested that hee would neuer see nor heare any such people: but forgetting his protestation, ten years after he heard these which hee should haue giuen attentive care vnto, and pretending to see a great personage burnt, whoe words did merit credit, he lost both sight and life.

In the moneth of Iune past, James of Coucy Lord of Veruein was beheaded at Paris, and Ondard of Biez Marshall of France degraded, after a long imprisonment: the one for that he had inconsiderately committed the guard of Bouillon to his son-in-law, the other for that hee had so lightly yielded vp a strong and well fortified place vnto the enemy. There were witnesses and Commissioners found out for the purpose by them that were in credit: so as soone after it appeared that the innocency of these Noblemen had bene F suppress by the enuy of Courtiers, which possit the King, who acknowledged the error he had committed, but he could not helpe it, but this processe lay dead with Verueins, vntill the year of our Lord 1575, that his sonne and heyre by an expresse declaration of King Henry the third, caused the memory of his Father and Grand-father by the mother side to be restored to their former honor and fame, one of the Heralds being commanded to assist at the Funerals of these two Noblemen, the which were solemnly made at Boloine in the year 1577.

This year was pleaded in the Parliament at Paris the cause of Merindol; since the year

year 1540, the Parliament of Prouence, had for matter of religion condemned seuentene persons of Merindol to be burnt, the village to be razed, and the trees to bee cut downe within two hundred paces. The Clergy pursued it: but some gentlemen and others lesse bloody, stayed the execution of this decree, and King Francis sue moneths after sent a pardon to these Vaudois of Merindol, and other places, vpon condition that within three moneths they should abjure their errors. They appeare in Court, and protest that they haue not maintained nor published any erroneous thing, offering to yeeld, if by the word of God they can shew them any founnder doctrine: they giue a confession of their faith in writing, with an answer to the reproaches wherewith they were taxed, and require to be allowed, or iudicially heard in their defences.

Four years passe away, during the which, being onely threatened with words, they subsist. But the President Chassan being dead, John Menier his successor, a violent man, became a mortall enemy to those of Cabrières and Merindol, amongst whom there dwelt certain subjects of his of Oppede, whose lands he possessed to ioine them to his owne. Through the perswasions of Menier, the Cardinall of Tournon, obtains Letters Patents from King Francis, to the Court of Parliament, for the execution of the first sentence, according to the which, Menier terming himselfe Lieutenant of the Lord of Grignan, Gouvernor of Prouence, accompanied with the Baron of la Garde, and a great troop of others, in the month of April 1545, fired many villages neere vnto Merindol, put many of the Countymen into the galleys, spoiled, razed, and burnt Merindol being vnpeopled, tooke Cabrières by composition, and against his faith, in cold blood, hee cut in peeces five and twenty or thirty men, chosen at his pleasure, rauished wifes, and young virgins, burnt about forty in a barne, whereof the most part were with child: put about eight hundred to the sword, and caried away many prisoners to Marsailles, Aix and Auignon.

This did too farre exceed a decree giuen against seuentene persons, abusing the Kings authority, with too great violence: who in his latter age, toucht with a remorse of conscience, by reason of this horrible proceeding against his subjects, whom he had too lightly abandoned to these butchers, grieved that he could not before his death punish the authors of these murders exemplarily: lying in the bed of death, he commanded Henry his sonne expressly, not to make his memory hatefull vnto strangers, nor subiect to the wrath of God, in not punishing of this guile. Even so, that great King Dauid, amongst other dispositions of his last will: Thou knowest (said he to him that should sit on the throne after him) what Iobab the sonne of Tereia hath done vnto mee, and what he hath done to the two Commanders of the armies of Israel, Abner the sonne of Ner, and Amasa the sonne of Iether, whom he hath slaine, hauing shed blood in time of peace: Thou shalt not suffer his white hayres to descend with peace into his grave. But Salomon performed his fathers will more religiously. The King granted an euocation of the cause to the Court of Parliament at Paris, where it was solemnly pleaded about fifty times in the great Chamber. There was great expectation of seuerer punishments for those horrible murders: but these great mountaines proued mole-hills, and in the end it did euaporate into smoke. Yet one at the least must suffer for many: the chance fell vpon one that was least guilty, named Cuieris, an Advocate by profession, who was hanged at Paris. The Cardinall of Tournon, Grignan, and la Garde, were in some trouble, but more feared then hurt. Menier escaped, but hee died after, being tragically possessed with a fury, & a secret fire which consumed his bowels. The year ended with the death of two famous personages: Pope Paul, the ninth of November, to whom succeeded Cardinall John Maria Bishop of Mantoua: and the vertuous Princesse Marguerite of Valois, sister to King Francis deceased, and wife to Henry of Albret King of Nauarre, the fourteenth of December. They say commonly, that for offences there needs but one satisfaction. Seeing then, that by the punishment of the chiefe authors of the sedition in Guienne, the King had pardoned the commons, hee was not so inexorable, but for a small satisfaction they were easily admitted to fauour: so as in October past, they of Bourdeaux had obtained a remission, binding themselves perpetually to his Majesty: To entertaine at sea for euer (as well they as their descendants) two ships furnished for the warre: to victual the Castle Trompet and du Ha, and to renew the victuals euery year. By this means their Parliament was restored in January, and all things settled in their former estate. By their example the three estates of Poitou, Xaintonge, Angoulmois, Perigot, Lymouin, and la Marche, in the beginning of this year, obtained abolition of the

A the custome vpon salt in Guienne, paying foure hundred and fifty thousand frankes, and five and twenty thousand for the satisfaction of the Kings officers of the said custome, Then sprung there many and sundry fire-brands of warre.

At the same time three Presidents of Paris, not pleasing to the House of Guise (who were then in credit) were dismissed from their charges. Soone after S. André and Minard hauing promised to be good seruants, were restored: Lislet was made Abbot of Saint Victor to giue place to one that was not so cunning as himselfe. In this solitary kind of life, hee would be dealing with Diuinity, wherein he was no apt Scholler: for of a good practitioner he became an ignorant Sophister, and was scorned, so as he died for griefe. Hee had

B shewed himselfe a sworne enemy to them of the Religion, thinking to aduance himselfe by his cruel inuentions: but hee was ouerthrowne in his course, to serue as an example for them that are more sufficient then he, not to attempt against him who surpriseth the most cunning in their deuices, and against whose wisdom humane force is but foolery and vanity. And this year, for that the coynes were found for the most part clipt, the King commanded by his Edict, that all clipt money should bee new minted, wherupon many Masters of this art, and counterfeit coyners were punished with death.

But before we quarrell with the Emperor, the English must yeeld vs Boullen. The fort which the Lord of Chastillon had built in the year 1548, annoyed them much, and the recovery of the forts of Selague, Blaconnet, and Bonlamberg, and so many men defeated by C the surpris of them, gaue the Duke of Somerset and the Earle of Warwick to vnderstand that there was nothing but blowes to be gotten in maintaining the warres of Boullen: moreover, the diuisions of England, and the warre of Scotland, called home their troops. So as for the summe before specified, payable at two termes, a peace was againe concluded with the English, and Boullen restored to the King, into the which his Majesty made his entry the fifth of May, and did his homage, whereunto the Kings of France are bound by the institution of Lewis the eleventh, as we haue elsewhere obserued. Hereafter those small sparkes, which began to appeare, after the murder of Peter Lewis, sonne to Pope Paul Farnese deceased, slaine by his household seruants, by the perswasion of Andrew Doria, and Ferdinand Gonzaga, with the priuety and consent of the Emperor, to seize vpon

D the City of Placentia, with the more facility, haue kindled so great fires, as wee shall seee France, Germany, and Italy in combustion. Paul had giuen Parma to Ottauio Farnese son to the said Peter Lewis, whereof he had institution of Iulio his successor. This Peter Lewis was inclined much to the French party. He had giuen ayd to Peter Storffy, when as he came into the country of Placentia, with some forces for the seruice of the most Christian King, and that which more incensed the Imperials, he was suspected to haue assisted the Count of Fiesque in an enterprise made vpon Genoua for the Kings seruice, the year 1547, in the which Iacotin Doria was slaine, and Andrew Doria expelled. This caused the death of Peter Lewis Farnese. Ottauio his sonne had married the Emperors bastard daughter. But they say that charity begins by it selfe. The Emperor did labour him much: hee would

E gladly ioine Parma to Placentia, and that by lawfull means, letting the Pope vnderstand, that Parma being of the patrimony of the Church, the which was in his protection, hee ought to be preferred before Farnese, seeing that Farnese could not keepe it but with the men and money of his Holinesse. The Pope being of a base metall, and fearing the touch, tempted with the Emperors practices, sends to Duke Ottauio, that hee could no more furnish the extraordinary charges, wherewith he had promised to assist him: and Farnese finding that the Emperor laid this plot to dispossesse him of his inheritance, hee seeks a strong support in France against his father-in-lawes practices. The King who had not renounced the ancient pretensions of the House of Orleans to the Duchy of Milan, declares himself (but with the Popes good liking) Protector of the patrimony of the Church

F and of the Farneses. The Emperor is in a rage, who with his violent exclamations fo terrifies the Pope, as he abandons his vassall Ottauio.

The Pope on the other side (nothing well affected to the French) grew bitter against the King: he commanded him to renounce this protection: and for not obeying, he threatens to curle both him and his realme. Thus Iulio the second not able to satisfie his greedy desire with the keyes of Saint Peter, he vniuersates the sword of Saint Paul, kindling by his madnesse these deadly diuisions throughout all Christendome, as if the Bishop eard the spirituall sword in his hand to draw it for vnlawfull things, at the first impression of his fantasie. To crosse the Pope, the King forbids expressely to cary or send any gold or siluer to Rome for any dispatches, Bulls, Annars, Dispenfations, or any other thing, commanding the Metropolitans of the Realme to provide according to the ancient priuiledges and liberties of the French Church. And for that Gonzaga besieged Parma (to giue both the Emperour and the Court of Rome a blow) he commanded Charles of Coſſe, Lord of Briſſac, and Marshall of France, his Lieutenant Generall in Piedmont by the death of the Prince of Melphe, to fortifie and furniſh Mirandola. Briſſac ſends ſome ſouldiers: Gonzaga ſurpriſeth them, and puts them ſecretly to death, and ſuddenly doth beleaguer Mirandola. Warre is now begunne on all ſides, and for light occasions, he that ſeckes a quarrell, wants no apparant ſhewes to colour it. Both theſe Princes expected ſome worthy occasion: but let vs raiſe vp our thoughts, and ſay, That GOD had now poured out all his iudgements againſt Chriſtendome, being full of exceſſe, and worthy of ſharpe puniſhment.

The King ſends new forces into Piedmont, and commands the Marshall to ſuccour Parma and Mirandola. He effects it, and by the taking of Quicrs, Saint Damian, and other places, he forceth Gonzaga to abandon the Countrey of Parmelan, to ſuccour Montferat, and to defend the eſtate of Milan. On the other ſide, Mary Queene of Hungary, and Gouverneſſe of the Low-Countries for the Emperour, armed in fauour of her brother, both by ſea and land. And vnderſtanding that for a greater confirmation of loue, the Marshall Saint Andre, carried in the Kings name the Order of France to young Edward King of England: ſhe cauſed certaine ſhips to lye betwixt Calais and Douer, to leiſe on him in his paſſage. But to preuent her policy, the Marshall cauſed ſome Flemiſh ſhips to ſtayed, which lay at anchor in the roade of Deepe, vntill they were aſſured of his arriual in England. And Mary likewiſe aſſetled all the French ſhips that were within her government. Thus heart-burning grew on all ſides, which burſt out into open warre: euery one calls home his Ambaſſadors, and aſſures the places neereſt to the enemy: the King, eſpecially Lorraine, hauing ſome iealouſie of Chriſtienne the Dowager, and neere allied to the Emperour: who to free her ſelfe from that imputation, did put her ſelfe with her ſonne Charles into the Kings protection: who cauſed him to be brought vp with the Dauphin Francis, and afterwards he married one of his Maieſties daughters.

Before we proceed to open acts of hoſtility, the King excuſed himſelfe vnto the Pope by the Lord of Termes, for that which he did in fauour of Oſtavian Farnese, and by the Abbot of Belloſanne, he proteſted againſt the decrees of the Aſſembly which was held at Trent: the which (conſidering the Popes and the Emperors ſpleene againſt France) hee could not hold to be a lawfull and holy generall Councell: Not that I pretend (ſaid he) to withdraw my ſelfe from the obedience of the Church: but onely to auoid the ſurpriſes of ſuch, as vnder colour of reformation, ſeek to diſgrace both my perſon and Realme.

After this proteſtation, the King publiſhed an Ediſt made the yeare before, touching Benefices, and againſt the frauds and abuſes of the Court of Rome: and alſo vpon the ancient Ediſts and Decrees againſt Annats, and the abuſe of Reſeruations and exactions inuented by Popes: forbidding all his ſubiects to goe any moroer to Rome for Annats, nor for any other occasion concerning Benefices: commanding the Ordinaries to diſpoſe thereof, publiſhing to all men the wrong which Julio did to him, and to Oſtavian Duke of Parma, who was deſtroyed of that whereof he had bene ſolemnly inueſted. The Cardinals and other the Popes creatures in France, fearing that this Ediſt (vpon the which Charles of Moulin, a famous Lawyer, did write a learned Commentary, wherein he diſcovered many terrible practises of Rome) ſhould ſhake the Popes authority. They did very carefully procure the King to publiſh very ſeuere Ediſts againſt them of the Religion, to the end that Julio and the Cardinals at Rome ſhould aſſure themſelves of his friendſhip, whenſoeuer they would adhere vnto him. Theſe Ediſts were followed by cruell executions in diuers parts of the Realme againſt many of the Religion, who were burnt alive, for that they had conſtantly maintained the truth of the Goſpell, and reiected the Traditions of men eſtabliſhed in the place of Gods diuine ſeruiſe. Thoſe that were at Trent did write vnto the King to induce him to receiue the decrees of their Councell, and to ſend the Biſhops of his Realme thither: moreover, to entreat him to be ſure that the Swiſſes ſhould ſend thither: but the warre being now begunne in all places, and the Emperour hauing called the Spaniards which were in Germany, to come

A into Italy to the warre of Parma, the purſuit of them of Trent was ſuſpended.

The warre being kindled, the King reſolved to aſſure himſelfe towards Lorraine, hauing ſome diſtruſt of the Ducheffe Dowager, whereupon he cauſed ſome troops to march towards the frontiers, and the Emperour did alſo man all his places, the one looking vpon the other with diuers deſignes whereof the effects did ſoone after appeare. While it that the King perſecuted them of the Religion in France, he treated ſecretly with the Proteſtant Princes of Germany, and generally with all the Electors and free Cities of the Empire, who ſaw their liberties and freedoms in a manner ruined, if they did not oppoſe ſome mighty aduerſary againſt the Emperour who by maine force might ſtay the courſe of his vnmeaſurable courtouſneſſe. The Emperour (contrary to his oath) detained Iohn Duke of Saxony, and Philip Landgraue of Heſſe in miſerable captiuitie. He had vanquiſhed moſt of the other Princes in war, and fearing leſt the French ſhould in the end demand the right viſtured in old time by the Saxons vpon the heyres of Charlemagne, when the Empire was hereditary: he pretended to tranſport the Imperiall Crowne into his Houſe for euer; and now he thought to haue a fit opportunity. He had ſuppreſſed his enemies in Germany: he had a Pope at his deuotion, and he was armed. The moſt part of the Cardinals who aſſiſted at the Councell, were either naturall Spaniards, or of the Spaniſh faction: and by conſequence, might eaſily by a decree of this Councell, giue authority to what he intended. With this deſigne he had cauſed his ſonne Prince Philip to come out of Spaine, (who died King of Spaine in the yeare 1598) to haue him declared his ſucceſſors, or at leaſt his aſſociate in the Empire: oppreſſing the people of Germany by inſolent and tyrannicall exactions. The Electors not accuſtomed to ſeruitude, and leſſe to the ſlavery of Spaine, not able with their owne forces to ſhake off the yoke which they ſaw ready to be laid vpon them: they repaire vnto the King, and ſhew him the wrongs and outrages done vnto them: that they pretended the ouerthrow of the whole Empire, and the abolishment of the rights and priuiledges of the Electors, Commonalties, and Lords of the ſame: they beſeech him that in regard of the ancient league betwixt the Empire and the Crowne of France, he would take their iuſt cauſe in hand, and maintain the common liberty of Germany. The King reſolues to enter into league with them, according

D to the which in the beginning of the yeare he ſent the Biſhop of Baione for his Ambaſſador vnto the Princes Electors, with Letters full of proteſtations and offers of friendſhip, and an ample declaration of the wrongs done by the Emperour vnto the Princes and Cities of Germany: adding, that he was reſolved to employ both his perſon and forces for the defence of the rights and liberties of all Germany, without reſpecting any other recompence then the honor to haue donchis duty, and to haue bound ſo mighty a Nation vnto him: giuing moreover aſſurance by oath of this his affection and intention, taking God vnto witneſſe, and ſwearing by the faith of a Prince, that his deſigne was to free all the Eſtates of Germany from the oppreſſion of the Emperour and his Miniſters. The which he alſo pretended to do particularly in fauour of his moſt deare and well-beloued Couſins Iohn Duke of Saxony, and Philip Landgraue of Heſſe, detained in miſerable captiuitie by the Emperour, notwithstanding he had promiſed and ſworne the contrary. In the end of his Letter he added theſe words: we promiſe you alſo by the Almighty God, before a the Kings, Princes, and Potentates of Chriſtendome, that we will not ſuffer with our priuaty any wrong or injury to be done to you all in general, nor to any one in particular, of what eſtate or condition ſoeuer he bee: and much leſſe will We (who cary the Title of moſt Chriſtian) endure that any harme ſhould be done vnto the goods or perſons of your moſt Reuerend Prelates, Abbots, and other Clergy-men, as hath bene wrongfully giuen out by our aduerſaries: Nay rather we are reſolved to take you into our protection, ſo as you declare your ſelues for vs and our allies, and giue vs ſufficient aſſurance of your wils: hoping there-vnion of the Church, the which is reſpected by the recovery of the publike liberty; for the which (with the helpe of GOD) we will employ all our forces. The which we haue thought good (moſt Reuerend Prelates, moſt famous Princes, and other the Eſtates of the ſacred Empire) to let you vnderſtand, to the end you may not be ignorant of the true cauſe of this warre, by the which we pretend to purſue the Emperour with all violence, and (to our grieve) cut him off as a putrified member from the body of the Common-wealth: or at the leaſt force and conſtraine him to eſtate from oppreſſing you.

The King makes a league with the Princes of Germany against the Emperor.

The Kings army.

Hereupon they give him this honourable title, Defender of the Germanes, protector of the Nation, and of the holy Empire. He armes thirty thousand men, and desirous to countenance his forces with his owne presence, he appoints Queene Katherine his wife Regent in France: he makes many goodly Edicts for the government of the State, for the ordering of his men at armes, and for the obseruation of military discipline: hee reformes the abuses of Commanders, suppresseth the insolency of souldiers (a commendable institution in comparison of that which hath bene seene in the reignes of his children) and gives the rendezvous for his army at Vitry. He was accompanied with Anthony Duke of Vendosme, (whom we shall shortly see King of Navarre, by the decease of Henry of Albret his father-in-law) John Duke of Anguien, Lewis Prince of Conde, all brethren: Lewis D. B of Montpensier, Charles Prince of Rochefort, all of the Royall Family of Bourbon: the Dukes of Nevers, Nemours, Guise, Aumale, Elbeuf: the Lords of Rohan, Rochefoucault, Chastillon, d'Andelot, and others in great numbers, in very good order.

The Constable of Montmorency was made General of the army (a House which shall hereafter be made a Duchy, and a Peere of France) Claude of Lorraine Duke of Aumale, a younger brother of the House of Guise, was General of the horse, consisting of fifteen hundred men at armes, every one having two archers: two thousand light-horse, as many Argoleiers, besides an infinit number of voluntary French Nobility, marching vnder the fauour of their Prince, and desirous to make their valour apparent by good and faithfull seruices. Gaspard Lord of Chastillon, afterwards Admirall, was Colonel of the foot, consisting (besides the new and the ordinary companies, which were twenty Ensignes of the old bands of Piedmont, and five and thirty ensignes of Gascons and Prouençals (they note the two companies of the Lord of Duras to be compounded for the most part of Gentlemen and old souldiers, worthy of command) of ten thousand Lanquenets in two Regiments, commanded by the Reingraue and Reichbro. To these bands the Protestant Princes ioyned a battalion of horse, vnder the command of Colonel Charrel. But let vs now see their exploits.

The City of Thoul at the first abord, puts it selfe into the Kings protection, but this was not the chiefe point of his designe. The Emperor passing into France, had the passage of Metz at his deuotion, and had victuals and other necessaries out of that Country. The King now requires the like from them: they offer victuals for money, and consent to admit his Maiesty into their City, with the Constable, followed with some Princes and Noblemen: but as for any passage of the army, they excuse themselves, and pretend neutrality. The Constable departs, and protests that he will haue free passage, free entry, and free issue at his discretion, without any limitation; & partly by promises partly by threats, he wins the inhabitants. The Citizens had not foreseene this storme, and lesse provided any remedy to auoid it. Thus being forced to bid their liberty adieu, they agree with the Lord of Bourdillon, afterwards Marshall of France: That the Constable accompanied with some Princes and Noblemen should enter with two companies of foot: the companies were six hundred men strong: they increased them with halfe as many more, all chosen men of account, the which being entred, repelled the people, became masters, and draw after them so long a traine, as the Metzins had no meanes to resist.

This was the tenth of April on Palme-Sunday: nine dayes after, the King made his entry in armes, being followed with all his forces put in battell: he received the oath of the Citizens, and sware solemnly to them in the porch of Saint Stephens Church, as hee had done to them of Thoul: which was to defend them against all men, and to maintain them in their freedoms, rights, priuiledges, and liberties: moreover, to provide for the fortification of the place, which he pretended to make one of the bulwarkes of France. He left Gonnor brother to the Marshall of Brillac for Governor; and with him the company of the Earle of Nantueil, two hundred light-horse, two hundred Harguebuziers on horsebacke, and twelue Ensignes of foot. Thus the famous City of Metz was brought vnder the obedience of this Crown: a portion of the ancient patrimony of the Kings of France, and in former times vsurped by the Emperors.

The Constable would gladly haue vsed the like stratagem to Strasbourg: but he found more assurance and resolution then at Metz. They put a strong garison into their Citie, and prepared for defence against any that should seeke to make them subiect: so as seeing that neither reproaches, threats, nor bitter words, could draw any thing from the inhabitants,

A bitants, but victuals and necessaries for the campe, the army tooke the way of Haguenau and Wisbourg. Thither came deputies from the Count Palatine, the Archbishops of Mentz and Treues, and from the Dukes of Cleues and Wirttemberg, who were then assembled at Wormes for the good of the Common-wealth. They make petition vnto the King that he would not spoile the Champion Country, but take pittie of the poore Commons: and seeing that hee had protested to make this warre for the liberty of Germany, that he would stay his army: for if hee advanced, it would be very preiudiciall to the Empire. They also besought him that hee would hearken vnto a peace, whereof they had spoken vnto the Emperor, and were in good hope thereof. As touching any particular alliance, they desired him not to presse them, but to haue regard vnto their honors, and to the faith which they ought vnto the Empire. At the same time, being the eleuenth of May, Duke Maurice Elector of Saxony, sent Letters vnto the King, containing all that had bin done at Lintz, where the confederate Princes of Germany had treated of a peace with King Ferdinand, who negotiated the same for the Emperor, in whose name he promised a speedy resolution to the good and quiet of Germany. He also desired the King (in case he would be comprehended in the Treatie) to declare with what conditions he meant to compound with the Emperor. Having receiued these Letters contrary to his expectation, and hearing that the Queene of Hungary had taken Stenay vpon Meuse, and spoiled the Country being without defence, he resolved vpon his returne: but before his departure he made answer to the Princes Deputies: That he was well satisfied that the captive Princes should soone be deliuered, and that Germany should be in quiet: That if at any time it should haue need of his assistance, he would employ all his meanes to succour it.

As touching a peace with the Emperor, he referred himselfe vnto them, hauing by his trauell, charge, and valour, freed Germany from those miseries which did oppresse it, whereof they must now be carefull, and not basely lose that libertie, which he so honorably had recovered for them. Notwithstanding, to enterraine his Confederates, and to haue one alwayes in Germany, which might aduertise him truly how matters passed betwixt the Confederates and the Imperials, and the better to be enforced of the Emperors designs, he left Du Fresne Bishop of Baionne his Ambassador with Duke Maurice, who in an Assembly held at Passau, to aduise what was to be done for the restoring of Germany to her beaury and ancient liberty, in the presence of the Emperors Ambassador, and of the Electors and many Princes of the Empire, he made a long and eloquent speech the third of Iune, propounding the ancient coniunction of Germany and France. The great affection which the King bare vnto the Empire, being very ill gouerned by Spaniards and their adherents: he also held it fit that the Protestant Princes should make an accord with the Emperor, so as the prisoners might be released & the ancient alliances of France with the Empire, and the last league made with the Princes ratified for euer: That the Emperor should doe him right for his pretensions: That hee desired to satisfie them, and especially Duke Maurice. The Princes answer consisted chiefly of thanks and declarations, so deliuered, as neither the Emperor nor the King could pretend any cause of dislike. As touching the renewing of the ancient alliances, they sayd that a matter of so great weight required a greater Assembly. In the meane time they desired, that the amity so long continued betwixt these two Nations, might remaine firme, and that the differences which the King had against the Emperor, might be pacified: promising therein to employ all their meanes: In the meane time they intreated the King to declare what wrongs hee pretended to haue bene done him by the Emperor, to whom they would write, to aduance the businesse to some good peace.

In the meane time, the King leauing Germany, brought backe his army into France: as hee advanced, the Marshall of Cleues, who led the Queene of Hungaries forces retired, and his troops disbanded: which made the Kings Councill resolute to vndertake the conquest of the Duchy of Luxemburg. They first attempted a strong Castle called Reck-de-Mars, the which was presently taken and spoiled: the like was done to Mount Saint-Iohn, Solleure and other places, the which were ruined whilst the Kings and Emperours forces skirmished before Thionuille. The army hauing passed nere it, they approached to Danuilliers, the which being battered, yielded to the Kings discretion, the Captiues were detained prisoners, and the souldiers sent away with white wands. Yuoy being battered, yeelded in like manner, and the Gouverneur was sent to Paris. All the goods were given to the Constable, who distributed the greatest part unto his company, and to that of his eldest sonne, wherewith the old bands did mutine, and beganne to disband: Mommedy followed Yuoy. During these prizes, the Marshall of La Marke obtained some troops of the King, with the which he recovered the towne and castle of Bouillon, with all the other places depending vpon that Duchy. After which, the Castles of Trelon, Glaiion and others were ruined. To content the old bands, they gaue them the sacke of Cinay, a towne and castle belonging to the Duke of Arles. The besieged retiring into the castle, and offering to parlee, they were forced by the portall and other places, by the fury of the assailants, being greedy of spoile. They ranne thither with such violence, as a match falling into certaine powder, there were about 120 of the forwardest burnt and slaine. The fury of the warre consumed Townes and Castles to ashes. But for as much as the armie beganne to decrease, some disbanding being laden with spoiles, but the most part sick and diseased, in the end of Iuly they put the rest into garisons, to see what the Emperour would doe, who hauing to doe with the Protestant Princes and the King, he resolved to make an accord with the Princes, that he might be assisted with their means against the King. The last of Iuly he granted a peace to Germany, that he might make violent warres in France. The King was much discontented with this accord: notwithstanding, hee sent backe the hostages to Duke Maurice, who also released his, which were the Earles of Nantueil and of Iametz.

Peace in Germany.

Emperours desire against Metz.

Difficulty of the siege of Metz.

Metz besieged by the Emperours.

The Duke of Aumale defeated.

After this accord with the Germanes, the Emperour prevailed so, as the Princes and townes granted by little and little to furnish him with men, money, and artillery, to chase the King out of Metz, Thoul, and Verdun, Imperiall townes. Thereupon hee leaues an army of 50000 foot, and 20000 horse, with much artillery. Whilst he prepares, Albert Marquis of Brandenburg, who had in the Kings name made cruell warres against some Townes and Bishops of Germany, now seeks vnder-hand to bee reconciled vnto the Emperour as well as the rest, but he will insinuate himselfe by some notable seruice: being followed by 2000 horse, and 8000 foot, and drawing after him some artillery, he approached the frontiers of Luxembourg and Lorrain, where for a long time he entertained the King with hope to carry arms for him, during the which he did wonderfully spoile the champion Country. In the end, the Marquis retired himselfe from the French army, and hauing cut off the victuals from them of Metz, he went and caried armes for the Emperour. Winter approaching, many thought the Emperour would not hazard so mighty an army, to encounter (without any profit) the cold, frosts, and discomforts of the season. But the hope he had to take Metz, in the which there were many Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen, made him reiect all other apprehensions, so as his forces began to aduance towards Lorraine, and comes to Sarbruch seven leagues, from whence he sends the Duke of Alua his Lieutenant Generall, and the Marquis of Marignan with fourteene thousand foot, four thousand horse, and six field pieces, to view the City, and to choise a convenient place to lodge his army, attending his coming with the rest of his forces. The Duke of Guise, Lieutenant generall for the King, sends forth some troops to skirmish, where he loseth Marignia Gentleman of Picardy, two Captaines, and five souldiers; and the enemy about an hundred and fifty men. But the Marquis of Brandenburg reuengeth this difference vpon the Duke of Aumale, and by a second stratagem, hee giues the King an assured testimony of his defection; and to the Emperour, the effects of the seruice which hee had vowed vnto him. The Duke considered the Marquis his retreat, and cuts the heaviest of his troops of pieces, when as the Marquis (turning head) ouerthrowes a great troop of seruants mustred together to make a shew: and chargeth a squadron of light-horse: who making but a weak resistance, leaue the place. So all fall vpon the men at armes, who were ill furnished to withstand the shoocke of the Restles pistols. The Duke seeing his men at armes broken, and seeking to save themselves, rallies a small troop, and returns to the charge. The multitude inuitions him, and doth oppress his best men: some are wounded, and others taken: two hundred Gentlemen, by their death, and the taking of many others, made the Marquis valour famous. The Duke being ouerthrowne, remained as a pawne of an assured victory, and shall not bee deliuered vntill the King hath paid fifty thousand Crownes for him. This chanced in the end of October. But we shall see this losse recompenced with a happy successe against the Emperours attempts.

A The Earle of Reux entred Picardy at the same time, with the desolation thereof, and the burning of Noyon, Nefle, Chauny, Roye, Folembray, and about eight hundred villages: a testimonie of the Emperours spleene. Then hauing besieged Hedin, and filled vp the trench with the ruines of a wall which they had vnder-mined: the towne was very lightly yeelded by the Lord of Rasse, who was in danger to haue bene made a publike spectacle vpon a scaffold, if the Constables fauour had not protected him. The reason was, for that he had not endured any force, nor made any resistance, and had a little before sent the King word, that there was no feare of the Castle.

The second losse made them to apprehend a third. The Emperour incamped before Metz: and the King desirous to vnderstand in what estate the besieged were, as the Duke of Guise, John and Lewis of Bourbon (the one was Duke of Anguien, the last was Prince of Conde) brethren to the Duke of Vendosme, Charles of Bourbon, Prince of Roch-sur-yon, Francis and René of Lorraine, (the first Grand Prior of France, the last Marquis of Elbeuf) brethren to the Duke of Guise: the Lords of Rochefoucault, and Randan brethren: Peter Stroffly, la Brosse, Brian, Gennor, Parroy, with an infinit number of others, who had voluntarily thrust themselves within the wals, to eternize the memory of so generous a preservation of their new conquest against the Imperiall forces: they all with one consent and resolution, free the King of this suspence, and the effects second their promises. They toyle the enemy with continuall sallies both of horse and foot: they come vp to the Cannon, ouerthrow their tents, force their quarters, put the whole campe in alarme, and performe more then hath bene heard of in any former siege. The place did well deserve it, and their vertue was the more admirable, for that the time was so vnseasonable both for the one and the other, being in the cold of winter: But the constancy of the besieged, and the obstinacie of the besiegers, encountered the rigour of raine, snow, cold, and ice.

The 16 of Nouember they batter the wall with forty Cannons, without any intermission, but to coole them: and the besieged both Princes, Noblemen, and souldiers, carie earth indifferently to rampar vp the breach, making the Imperials admire their diligence and valour. The King resting assured, leaues the Duke of Neuers to command his armie in Lorraine, and gaue commission to the Lord of Chastillon, then Admirall of France (Annebault being lately dead at la Fere) to goe into Picardy, as Lieutenant to the duke of Vendosme.

The Duke of Neuers employes all his cares to cut off the Emperours victuals: and the Admirals approach chafeth the Earle of Reux from Hedin, leauing his sonne with a strong garison in the Castle. Hauing spent foure thousand and threescore Cannon shot, he makes a breach the 16 of December, but yet not reasonable: notwithstanding the besieged being amazed, yeeld it, to haue their liues and goods saved: And the Duke of Neuers did still molest the Emperours army, and at one time cut off a great conuoy of all sorts of victuals and munition by Mons: de Monty, without the losse of any one Frenchman wherein he got great honour, hauing aduanced himselfe far, and retired discretely from among many of the enemies troops, leauing not any one engaged behind him. This blow troubled the Emperour: the iniuries of the ayre molested his men before Metz: extreme hunger made them weak, the continuall sallies of the besieged diminished them, his treasure grew short, his reputation decayed, his mynes were blowne vp, and all his attempts were made fruitlesse: to conclude, all went against the haire. So the Emperour giuing charge to the Duke of Alua, to order the retreat, he left the Empire deuiued of the Country of Metz, and the Crowne of France assured of this new conquest, by the Constables industry, and happily preserued by the valour of the besieged.

But there followed rough encounters. Hedin and Therouenne had till now bene the instruments of warre. It is better (saith the Prouerbe) to stumble once, then to stagger alwayes. The Emperour to be reuenged for some part of his losses, sends the Lord of Binecourt with a mighty army to besiege Therouenne. The Lord of Else, and Francis of Montmorency defended it. The place is furiously battered, the besieged sustaine a most violent assault of three charges, and many die on either side. The chiefe among the French, were the Lords of Else, of Vienna, of Beaudisne, of Roch-polay, of Blandy, Captain Ferrières, with many Gentlemen and souldiers. They vndermine, they myne, and with the ruines of the wall fill vp the trenches, which caused the besieged to demand a composition. But

whilest they are busie in parle, (an error which often chancing, should make a Commander wise) the Germanes and Bourguignons enter at diuers places, and kill all they encounter. The Spaniards louing money at that time more then blood, saved many. The Seigneur of Quarr, to save the life of Montmorency his Generall, was fore wounded, whereof hee dyed soone after. And the Emperor causing the towne to be razed and spoiled, shall save many foules which should be lost in the defence and winning thereof.

Hedin assailed, battered, and vndermined more then a Foxes burrow, had like successe vnder Emanuel Philibert, sonne to the Duke of Sauoy, and Lieutenant Generall for the Emperor, his vnckle by the mothers side. The Duke of Bouillon, and Horatio Farnese newly married to Diana the Emperours bastard-daughter, had taken the guard thereof, and had prepared great store of wild-fire at the breach to defend the assault. A Priest, either through malice or negligence sets it on fire, and consumes many souldiers ready for the defence. The Imperials on the other side, blow vp their mynes, and bury a great number of men in the ruines thereof: they enter pell-mell, and so become masters of the place. Farnese, the Vicount of Martigues, the Senehall of Castles, with many other Gentlemen, were flaine there. The Duke of Bouillon with many others, had a long and hard imprisonment.

Let vs take our reuenge. The French armie assembled about Amiens and Piquigny: the Prince of Conde led the light-horse, who in the midst of August incountered with some troopes, led by the duke of Artois: he charged them, defeated them, and followed them about a league: he slue seven or eight hundred men, tooke about 560 prisoners, and amongst the rest, the Duke himselfe with twenty Ensignes. The Kings armie consisted of about seven thousand horsemen, five and twenty thousand foot, with an hundred pieces of artillery, great and small, doing nothing more, then to make his valour admirable, by the issue of some happy battaile. Being and abiding in the enemies Country, the Constable went to Bapaume two leagues from Mary-mont, a place well fortified, and also strong by nature, with fife thousand French horse, and as many foot: In the which Hautfmont (a Knight much esteemed among the Burgonians) was Gouverneur, hauing twelve companies of foot, and three or four hundred horse, who at their first approach spared not his Cannon, and entertained them with a hote skirmish, the which continued foure houres: during the which, the Admirall with a small troope viewed the towne, and found it pregnable, the Rampar being made of a crumbling sand, but the difficulty was to haue water, whereof they could finde no lasting springs, which made them change their resolution for the siege. At their departure they burnt all Villages and places belonging to the enemy euen to the gates of Bapaume. The Imperiall armie coasted them in their retreat, keeping still a riuer betwixt them. The King finding that the enemy fought nothing but to temporize, vntill that winter came on, whereby his army might be weakened by cold and diseases, and then to fight with him vpon aduantage.

The King resolved with his Councell to draw him to battaile, if it were possible, or to take the first place he should attempt, and so ruine the whole country in view of the Emperour, and so to returne in triumph, as hauing braued him in his owne dominions. Hee therefore meanes to found Cambray, both for that the taking thereof would be an example to other great townes, as also thinking the Imperiall armie would rather hazard a battell then lose such a place, where the inhabitants would willingly shake off the yoke, which not long before had been laid vpon them, yet being a neutral towne.

The French were incamped two little leagues from Cambray: by the breake of day the King caused his armie to be put in battaile, and sent an Herald to summon the towne, letting them vnderstand, that he was not come to oppress them, but to restore them to their ancient Liberties, whereof they were deprived by the Emperour: if they were desirous to shake off their bondage, they could haue no better meanes then by his comming, being there in person ready to fight for their Liberties: but if they did otherwise, they would be the cause of their own ruines, in losing the priuiledge of Neuter townes, which affect neither quarrell, and whereby they had libertie to traffike in both their countries. Besides, their country should be freed from the miseries of warre, and from all manner of exactions and spoiles. But they demanded eight and forty houres respite of the King, to aduise thereon, and to yeld him an answer: whereupon the King caused his armie to retire a league backe, making a Proclamation, vpon corporall punishment, that no man should take

A take any thing within the territory of Cambray without paying for the same. In the meane time the Emperor is aduertised of this summons, being then at Brussels, who sent them diuers instructions. Among others, that they depended of the Empire, and that hee was Emperour to protect them, not the French King, who fought nothing but their ruine: so hauing set before their eyes the example of Metz, he promised if they were besieged, to succour them by all meanes whatsoever: and then he gaue order to the Prince of Piedmont (who was gone with his armie towards Valenciennes) to yeld them what succours they should demand, appointing the Earles of Boffu and Brabant for gouernors. The time limited being expired, the King sent to know their resolution: who answered, that if it pleased his Maiestie they would remaine his humble neighbours and friends, offering to furnish the armie with victuals, but it was not in their power to dispose any further of themselves, the Emperour hauing put a great garison into their towne.

Answer of them of Cambray.

Vpon this answer the towne was adiudged for enemy, and the same day being the 8 of September, the Constable with two Regiments of men at Armes, and three or foure hundred light-horse, being followed by the Admirall with ten ensignes on foot, went to view the towne, where the Cannon played on them from all parts, and the souldiers sallied forth gallantly to skirmish, the which the French continued six dayes together, making a shew as if they would besiege the town: but the weather growing very rainy, they dislodged to the Castele of Cambray, from whence they marcht within two leagues of Valenciennes, whereas the Imperiall armie was lodged in a fort which they had made about a Culuerin shot from Valenciennes vpon the riuer of Escau.

And on the 17 of September, the French hauing left their baggage in their lodging with a good guard, the rest of the armie aduanced to seeke out the Imperials, and to present them battell. The Avant-currers going before, found many of their horsemen in battell, vpon a little hill, ready to fight: and hard by they tooke one on horsebacke, in habit of a merchant, as a spy, who gaue intelligence, that the Imperiall foreward had passed the riuer to come to fight with them, so being brought vnto the Constable, and sent by him vnto the King, he was the cause that the armie aduanced with all speed that might be, and was put in battaile: in the meane time the skirmish grew hote, many of the Imperiall armie sallied forth, which did greatly annoy the forlorne hopes.

French seeketh

During this skirmish the Imperiall armie was put in battaile within their fort. The Kings armie being likewise in battaile, and the skirmish growing still hote on either side, the Imperiall horsemen stood still vpon a little hill about three houres, as it seemes, expecting some aduantage: which the Constable foreseeing, hee commanded the light-horse-men to charge them, which they did with such resolution, as they forced them to retire vnto their trenches, which done, the French armie seeing they could not draw the Imperials out of their fort, retired backe againe vnto their lodging from whence they came, and from thence it marched within two leagues of Saint Quentin, where it was dislodged the 20 of September: which done, the King sent the Marshall of S. Andrew to E spoile the County of S. Pol: then in the end of October, hee puts part of his forces into garison, the rest hee dismiseth and sendeth away. Now our armes are laid aside vntill the next spring.

At the Spring the King diuided his forces into three armies. The first was commanded by the Prince of La Roche-sur-yon in Vermandois, being compounded of ten thousand foot, three hundred men at armes, and five or six hundred Argoletiers. The Constable had the charge of the second towards Crecy, containing five and twenty Ensignes of French, as many Suisses, two Regiments of Lanquenets, two thousand horse, some of them light-horse, and some Argoletiers, with some English and Scottish horsemen. The third (led by the Duke of Neuers) had twenty Ensignes of English and Scots, two Regiments of Lanquenets, three hundred men at armes, eight hundred light-horse, and shot on horsebacke, with two hundred Reifers, Pistoliers: and all three breathed nothing but reuenge, and desire to requite those confusions in Picardy.

New exploits

The Prince enters into Arthois: he spoiles, burnes, and defeats two Cornets of horse, hee kils two hundred vpon the place, and sends their colours to the King. The Constable takes Mariembourg, fortifies Rocroy, ruines the forts of Trelon, Glajon, Simay, and others built within two yeares. The Duke batters and takes the Castles of Orcimont and Beaurin by composition, ruines and burnes a great number of villages: then hauing (by the the taking of some strong places seated vpon the Meuz) opened the passage of the riuier, he A enters Liege and takes Agimont and Bouinies by assault, putting almost all the inhabitants to death, either by the sword, or by the hand of iustice, for that they presumed to stand against an armie Royall, and for their outrageous speeches: and to increase their punishment he burnt the towne: he assured himselfe of Castelhery and Valuin being abandoned, he tooke and spoiled Dinan, but hee preferred the female sexe from the violence of the Germanes, being fled into a Church. Emanuel Philibert Duke of Sauoy, by the death of his father Charles lately deceased, assembled his army with an intent (said hee) to fight with the French, if they advanced. We must try this braue resolution.

The King passeth the riuier of Sambre the 25 of Iuly, being followed by the D. of Ne- B uers: he enters the country of Hainault, spoiling, burning, and making all desolate, seeking to draw the enemy to fight. Some troopes charge euē vnto the suburbs of Niuelle, the first towne of Brabant: and for a note of their passage, they fire the said suburbs and villages thereabouts, so as many pleasant dwellings were consumed vnto ashes. The Duke of Sauoy flies the lists: and the armie marching towards Bains, (one of the chiefe towncs of Hainault) left nothing behinde it but teares, sighs, desolation, fire, smoake, and ashes: and to conclude, a mournfull scaffold whereon two great Princes played a horrible Tragedy, being cruelly incensed one against another. The castles and pleasant dwellings of the Gentlemen of the country, yea Bains it selfe, and Mary-mont that stately house, and others belonging to Mary Queene of Hungarie, sister to the Emperor, Tragny that goodly and proud castle, Reux, Hauets, with an infinit number of others, were (in reuenge of that goodly place of Folembray reduced to that estate, as they might well say, Here was Bains, here was Mary-mont, here was Tragny, Reux, and Hauets).

In the end the French (having spoiled the whole country) drew the Prince of Pied- mont to fight: the two armies incounter about the midst of August neere vnto Renty, where there was a sharpe incounter: the Imperiall fore-ward chargeth the D. of Guise his troopes, but to their confusion: he defeats them with the helpe of those succours that came speedily vnto him, he kills eight or nine hundred men, and strikes such a terror into the rest of the Imperiall armie, as they retire hastily into their campe, as hauing no more desire to fight. So the winter approaching, and want of forrage troubling the men at D armes, the King dismissed the Swisses and his Nobility: then leaving the D. of Vendosme Generall of the rest of the armie, he tooke from the enemy all meanes to endamage the Realme, but by sacking and burning of the country about Hesdin. The thirteenth day of March Pope Iulius the third died, Marcel Cerein borne in Tuscanie succeeded him: but soone after his election, death buried both his name and memory. John Peter Caraffe a Neapolitan, called Cardinal Theatin, the chiefe author of the Iesuits sect, held the Roman see, and called himselfe Paul the fourth. We shall this year quench the fires of the year past, but it shall kindle new combustions, both on this side, and beyond the Alpes. So as no affection to the publike good, but the onely indisposition of the ayre, hath made vs till now surcease our armes.

Philip sonne to the Emperor Charles had the year past married with Mary Queene of England by the decease of Edward the sixth, and whilst that England did flame on all sides, by reason of the burning fires against such as had shaken off the yoke of the Romish obedience, they did solicit our two warriors to pacifie their mutuall hatred by some firme and durable peace. Cardinal Poole an Englishman was employed therein, but without effect: for the fore was not yet ripe. The courtes of the Imperials made the French to attempt vpon castle Cambresis, the which was taken by scalado, and faire warres made vnto the Spaniards, and to victuall Mariembourg at diuers times, by Bourdillon Lieutenant to the Duke of Neuers, while on the other side Francis of Cleues Duke of Neuers, with the Admirall of Chastillon, Gouvernour in the absence of the D. of Vendosme (who F was goneto take possession of his new estates, false to him in right of his wife, by the death of Henry of Albret, and shall hereafter bee King of Nauarre, and Soueraigne of Beaugue order for the defence of the frontier,

But behold one of the trickes of our ordinarie confidence. Fifteene hundred of the Arrierban, and foure hundred foot with some garisons of Picardy, returned home laden with spoile, without fronts, (saith the Originally) without order, without feare of the enemy, and without courage. Hausfiment Gouvernour of Bapaume, being more vigilant, incouters them betwixt a wood, a village, and a riuier: chargeth them, and in a moment takes from them both their bootie and their liues at his discretion. The Hannuyers and Arreseians made a iest, that they had taken the Nobles of France without weight. The Imperials seeing Mariembourg victuall'd, opposed a Fort called Guiers, whence foraging all the neighbour country, they did starue Mariembourg. Twenty thousand foot, some ensignes of the old Spanish bands, and five or six thousand Reistres, vnder the command of Count Barlemont, camped about this fort, to hinder another victualling, conducted by the duke of Neuers, the Admirall, Sanjac, Bourdillon, and others, with eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light-horse, and some eight thousand foot.

B The 26 of Iuly, the French horse charge the Reistres, and drue them into their fort: then seeing the Imperials loth to make any farther adventure, the time being very rainie and vnseasonable, want of forrage, cold, hunger, and many other difcommodities caused them to found a retreat, and to leaue the third victualling of Mariembourg, to Sanjac and Bourdillon: after the which the rigour of the season, and the injuries of the aire, forced both parties to liue in rest. The King hauing then gotten from John of Brosse Duke of E-stampes the rights which hee pretended to the Duchy of Britanie in the right of the house of Blois, he gaue him in exchange the Earldome of Ponthieure. Whilst they remaine quiet vpon the frontier, let vs visit them beyond the mountains. The Marshall of Brissac had the winter past, seized vpon Yuree and Bielle: the Spring hee had fortified S.

W. beyond the Alpes.

C Iaco, taken Crepacuore, surprized (by the industry of Captaine Saluafion Gouvernour of Verre) Cazal, the store-house of victuall and munition, prepared for the Imperials for the recouerie of Piedmont, ruined Poman, Saint Saluador, and other small places not to be held, and vneasily fortified in any short time. About the end of Iuly, the Duke of Alua, successor to Gonzagua in the government of Lombardie, went to field with twenty thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and forty Cannons, who at the first besieged Saint Iaco: but he found good resistance, Birague and Vimerca commanding in the place, forced him to retire, and to fortifie at the bridge of Sture, hoping to vanquish those by famine, who had repulsed his attempts by force. The Marshall being fortified from the King, with foure thousand horse, and fourteen thousand foot, led by the duke

D of Anguieu, Prince of Conde, the Dukes of Aumale and Nemours, the Vidame of Chartres, Aubigni, Connor, Vantador, & Vrse, la Chastre and Lude, with a great number of voluntarie Gentlemen, besieged Vulpian, defeated the succours which the Duke of Alua sent, took the high and the low towne by force, and the castle by composition. Montcaluo took town and castle (after the dismantling of Vulpian) followed the Conquerors fortune: the French made these conquests in September and October: some dayes after, the Dukes troopes had by meanes of an Ambush layed neere vnto Incise (where some French were slaine and others taken) a small reuenge for their losses at Vulpian and Montcaluo: the remainder of the year was more quiet. But before wee proceed, let vs speake something of the warres of Siena, which beginning long before, were ended this

The insupportable behaviour of Don Diego of Mendosa, Gouvernour of Siena for the Emperor, had driuen the Citizens to put themselves into the Kings protection, and to bring into their citie foure thousand men, vnder the command of the Earle of Pettillano, who being entred, force the Spaniards, kill some, and expell the rest by composition. These men chased from Siena, seize vpon Orbitello and fortifie it. After the siege of Metz, the Emperor sent Don Garfie of Toledo Viceroy of Naples, with fifteene hundred horse, and twelue thousand foot, to spoile the Country of Siena: and the King to crosse him, sends the Lord of Termes with twelue thousand foot, besides the Inhabitants of the country, all hauing vowed to roote out the government of the Spaniards. Termes being F entred, he provided for the fortification of the citie, and assured himselfe of Montelice, Montelle, and Montekin against the threats of the Viceroy, and of Ascanius de la Corne, attending the arrival of Peter Streffy who came with the title of Lieutenant General for the King, with a good troupe of men at armes.

Streffy being arriued, he makes new leauius in Italy. Cosmo Duke of Florence giues intelligence to the Pope and Emperor, and all ioyne together to send home the French, giuing the charge of their common army to James de Medicis Marquis of Marignan. The Marquis besiegeth Siena, and at his first approach had almost surpris'd it by night, the fortifications tifications being not yet finished. The Sienois withstand him, give him the repulse, and kill many of his men. He then incamps before the towne, spoiles the country, and had already reduced them to want, while that Stroffy was busied to provide for the other places within the estate of Siena. Stroffy comes into the towne, and goes presently to field againe with six hundred men; he surpriseth Ralph Bailon and Ascanius de la Corne, who had an enterprize vpon Chiusi: he defeats their troopes, kills Bailon, and sends Ascanius prisoner to the King.

The King relieved him with new supplies in Tuscane, and likewise in the Ile of Corsica, where the Lord of Termes had taken from the Genouois (partisans to the Emperor) the Townes of Saint Florent, and Saint Boniface a port of the sea. These last succours consisted of five thousand Suisses and Gascons, with some light horse. And whilst they take breath in Siena, Stroffy makes a second fallie, with five hundred good horse, and six thousand choice foot, takes Montcalin and Montcarlo from the Duke of Florence, and by this stratagem hee forceth the Marquis to leave Siena for to succour the Florentine: then seeing the Marquis fortified with new troopes, hee returns with his men to Siena. Moreover, Leo brother to Peter Stroffy ranne along the coast of Tuscane, and spoiled the ports belonging to the duke of Florence. But as he approached too neere to Scarlin, to discover the place, he was slain with a shot. Stroffy to revenge his death, comes to continue the siege, attending the succours which the Lord of Montluc brought. Montluc being arrived, Stroffy makes an armie compounded of six hundred Italians, two thousand Gascons, two thousand Suisses, two thousand five hundred Lanquenets, and about a thousand horse, with which troopes he resolved to fight with the enemy, if he presented himselfe: having left the guard of Siena to Montluc, hee went to batter Chiuselle in the territory of Florence.

The Marquis goes to succour it, and at his arrival chargeth Stroffy, who makes head against him, and both the one and the other bathe the field with a great effusion of blood. Stroffy leaves Chiuselle, to set vpon Foian, a strong and rich place: hee batters it, and the first day takes it by assault, cutting Charles Frin in pieces with all those that kept it, spoiles it, and abandons all to fire and sword. But see a troublesome Catastrophe. The Marquis approacheth better furnished with artillery, and Stroffy marcheth towards Montpulcian, favouring the retreat of his men, with many and rough skirmishes: then the Italians, being the chiefe strength of his army, slip from him, and leave him much inferior to the Marquis: who following with speed, overtook him betwixt Marian, Lucignan and Foyan, and gives him bataille. Stroffy entertaines it, and with a bloody fight gives testimony of his valour. But Bighet an Italian, being ensigne Colonell of the army, turns his backe cowardly: and the French saving their lives after him by the nimbleness of their legges, leave the horse, the Gascons and the Suisses to endure the charge, who had rather dye with their armes in their hands, then turne their backs. Bighet and the Earle of Alte were afterwards beheaded, the first as being the principall cause of this defeat: the other for that he had cowardly yielded Lufignan, a place impregnable. They reckon two thousand five hundred slain (some say four thousand) besides a great number wounded to the death, and five or six hundred prisoners. Stroffy saved himselfe in Montcalin, and the Marquis recovered Foyan, Martian, Lucignan, and some other places, which euen then began to force the Sienois to obey the Conquerors command, who camped before their towne with all his forces. Montluc comforts them, and confirms their resolutions: but the coming of Stroffy with two ensignes of foot, and two companies of men at armes, saved in this shipwrecke, reuived them more: the which hee did hazard in favour of the besieged vpon a report of the death of Montluc. Montluc foreseeing, that bread would sooner faile the besieged, then courage, had already set an order for euery mans diet. The Marquis repulsed by the losse of six hundred men, at a scalded giuen in the night to the Cittadell, and the fort of Camollia: and finding that by skirmishes, batteries, assaults, intelligences, or other stratagems, hee should neuer be master of Siena: hee resolves vpon the longer, but the more easie expedient: so as the watches, the toyles, the diseases, and worst of all, famine and despair of succour, forced Montluc the twenty one of April this year, to save the rest of his men by an honorable composition, which is read at large, in the history of the warres of Italy. Siena fell afterwards into the hands of the Duke of Florence, and the Marquis, for that hee had prolonged the warre of Siena,

A Siena, contrary to the Emperors liking, and wasted a mighty armie before it, dyed in disgrace, in the end of the same year.

Now the Emperour (whose humour we haue sufficiently learned by the discourse of the History) thinking vnder the burthen of the affaires of this world, wearied with the toyles of warre, toucht with some remorse for the blood spilt in those long and mournfull warres of Christendome, being perswaded, that his discord with our King, had made the Turke to preuaile much in diuers parts of Europe, his comming of late in fauour of the French, to the Ile of Corfe, to assist them at the siege of Caluis, and Saint Boniface: to aide them to conquer the Islands, then in their retreat to spoile the coast of Tuscane, to besiege Plombin, and the Ile of Elbe, of the territory of Florence: to assist the estates of Naples, Sicilia and Calabria, with infinit miseries, and being laden with great spoiles, to cary away with controll, and to sell infinit numbers of Christian soules at Constantinople and other places.

These considerations caused him to call Philip his sonne from England to Bruxelles; where by autentike letters, of the five and twentieth day of October, hee resigned all his Realmes vnto him: commanding all his estates and subiects, to acknowledge him as their true and lawfull King, he aduised him particularly, amongst other exhortations, to make a peace, and entertaine loue with the French King, vnting their common forces, rather for the defence, then oppression of Christendome. King Philip following his fathers aduice, and being solicited by Mary Queene of England his wife, was inclined to a Peace: for the effecting whereof, after many voyages, a truce was concluded for five years. The Earle of Lalaine came to Blois to see the King sweare the truce, and the Admirall of Chastillon went to Bruxelles to the Emperour and King Philip, but this truce was as soon broken as made.

During the continuance of this truce, one called Villegagnon a Knight of Malta armed certaine ships, and made a voyage to America, promising to doe wonders for the King in this new world. But his vnstedfast spirit, and his vnusd dealing expell him, so as hee performed nothing of worth. If this enterprize had incountered a discret Commander, there had bene a port open for the execution of great matters, but the gouernour of the world had beene otherwise disposed.

Paul the fourth was enemy to the Spaniards: and the Colonne suspecting him to be of the French faction (as in truth the house of Caraffe had of old time fauoured the title of our Kings, to the realme of Naples) fought to assure their estates and persons. To this end they held some secret assemblies within Rome, in the houles of Marc Anthony Colonne, and the Cardinal of Saint Fiore, enemies to the house of France. The Pope to crosse them imprisons this Cardinal in the Castle of S. Angelo, with Camillo Colonne, Julian Cesarin, and the Abbort of Breslegue: he summons Marc Anthony, and plants guards and Sentinels throughout all the Citie. The Colonne and their adherents, fly to the Castilian. He commands the D. of Alua to succour them. The Duke marcheth with that designe, and takes E from the Pope about Rome Anagnio, Pilaftine, Segne, Tiouli, and by the siege and taking of Ostia, cuts off the victuals from Rome, and the Colonne fortifying themselves about Rome, kept the Pope mewed vp within compasse of his walls.

The Pope appeales to the King for aide, and sends him by his Nephew the Cardinal Caraffe a triumphant hat with a stately word. Our two Kings did not greatly loue: their ancient hatred and discontents were yet fresh, and their household flatterers (to whom common confusions did serue as a ladder to aduance their estates and to enrich their houses, whereas peace sends the most of them home to liue privately) were glad that Rome kindled the coales of new quarrels betwixt their masters. So the French (meaning to crosse the Castilian, in fauour of the Pope) sent Stroffy (Marshall of France in the place of the Lord of Sedan, lately deceased after his returne from prison out of the Low-Countries) to oppose against the Spaniards, attending the succours led by the Duke of Guise. The Duke of Guise arrived at Turin, with about fiftene thousand foot, eight hundred men at armes, and twelue hundred light-horse, being assured of supplies as soon as the warres should begin: having ioyned his forces with those of the Marshall of Brisac, he marcheth directly to Valencia, making this his colour, that the garison had shot at the French going to succour the Pope: and for that it was secretly giuen out that the French had taken Paulia, he amazeth Spulerin, who kept the towne with two thousand men: summons him to yeeld, threatening him to put all to fire and sword, if hee A enter by force. Thus Spoluerin being terrified, departs with baggage and baggage; and loseth his head at Paui for a reward of his base cowardise.

The duke of Guise being come to Thurin in January 1557: the chiefe towne in Piedmont, the Spaniards fortified Milan, and refresheth the garisons of all places of importance in Italy. The duke of Florence armed, and lodged troopes vpon the frontiers of Ferrara, manning Florence and other townes of his obedience, especially towards Bolonia. The Duke of Alua fortified the townes in the Realme of Naples, and along the sea coast in Calabria. So as all Italy was in alarm, and stood vpon their guards. On the other side, Stroffy, Montele and others which were in Rome, issue forth with 600 horse, and five thousand foot, recover Ofsia by composition, and expell the Spaniards from Velitres, Tusculum, Marin, Grotteferate, Palestin, Saint Angelo, Saint Paul, Vico, Valerio, and other small places in the territories of Rome. The duke of Aluaes retreat had opened the way to Rome for the duke of Guise, presuming vpon the convention lately made betwixt the King, the Pope, and the duke of Ferrara: whereby the Pope should furnish twenty thousand foot, a thousand horse, and the charge of the army: the King the like number of foot, and 2000 horse: the Duke six thousand foot, two hundred men at armes, six hundred light-horse, and twenty pieces of battery. But Popes haue commonly advanced their affaires at their costs that haue beleued them, and then haue abandoned them very lightly that haue assisted them at their need. The duke of Guise comming to Bolonia, findes no men in field, neither were the Popes coffers open, and it may be, if they had not toucht this string, the expedition had been more successful.

In the meane time the French armie decreased for want of pay, the Spaniards increased, and the Ferrarois in stead of assisting, craued aide of the duke of Guise his sonne-in-law. What could our men doe, but study of their returne into France? but the Pope had not yet firmly settled his affaires: and if he had long remained alone betwixt two stools, without doubt the Spaniard would haue ouer-ruled him. And therefore, to stay the duke of Guise, he sweares, Not to treat any accord without the Kings consent, and that for assurance thereof he would send his Duke of Palliane for hostage into France. But it was rather to attend the successe of the affaires of Picardy, where they prepared a Theater to play a bloody Tragedie, then with any intent to discharge his oath. The Admirall having, by the taking and spoile of Lens in Artois, begunne the warre in Picardie, the Prince of Piedmont accompanied with Ernest and Henry Dukes of Brunswicke, the Duke of Arles (newly come out of prison) the Earles of Mansfield, Aiguemont, Meigne and Builemont, leading fortie thousand foote, and fiftene thousand horse: ten thousand English foot and fiftene hundred horse, came soone after that to his succour. The Prince of Piedmont, hauing newly proclaimed warre against the King, came and threatened Guise, but in effect it was to besiege Saint Quentin being vnfortified of men.

The Admirall resolved to enter it, and parted from Pierrepont the second of August, with foure companies of men at armes and three of light-horse. Being at Han, he was forced (by reason of the halt of his voyage) to content himselfe with two companies of footmen: the third part whereof entred with him into Saint Quentin, the rest remained behinde, and were forced to retire, for that the towne was in a manner all inuaded. The Constable being aduertised what past within the towne, he sent the Prince of Conde generally of the light-horse, the Marshall of Saint Andrew with foure hundred men at armes, and the Lord of Andelot with ten companies on foot, to put themselves into Han, as well to annoy the enemy, as to refresh Saint Quentin if they could: Andelot offered to enter with two hundred men, whilst that a generall alarm should be giuen vnto the enemy, but the enterprise being discovered by some prisoners, he could not effect it, but with a small number.

In the meane time the Spanish army was fortified with ten thousand English foot, and about fiftene hundred horse. The Constable desirous to see them that were within Saint Quentin, caused his armie to passe the riuer beneath La Fere, and on the tenth day of August being Saint Laurence day, marched towards Saint Quentin, where they arrived about nine of the clocke in the morning, and put themselves in bataille, at the suburbs of Ille, which the Spaniards had won, whom they chased away. In the meane time the artillerie played vpon the Prince of Piedmonts campe, and caused great disorder, during the

A the which the Constable put what succours he could into the towne. The Spanish army rehelued suddenly to ioyne with the Constable, and to force him to fight: whereupon the prince of Piedmont and the Earle of Egmont ioynd.

The Constable making his retreat, without any intent to fight, hee ioynd with the Prince of Conde, who made a stand with the light-horse-men nere vnto a Wind-mill, and they two together without losse, ioynd with the body of the army. The enemy followed them close with eight great battalions of horse: the Earle of Egmont (who that day did great seruice vnto his master) was the first which charged the French on the one side with 2000 horse: Ernest, and Henry, dukes of Brunswic, seconded by the Earle of B Horne, with 2000 Reistres and one thousand men at armes, fell vpon the other side: The Earle of Mansfield with other Commanders, forced the midst with such violence, as the French were ouerthrowne: for though the party were very vnequall, yet they did fight, whereas the Constable was wounded and taken prisoner, with the Dukes of Montpensier, and Longueville, the Prince of Mantoue, the Marshall of S. Andrew, with many other Noblemen, and Gentlemen of marke. The chiefe of them that were slaine, were Iohn of Bourbon duke of Anguien, the Vicount of Turenne (the Constables sonne-in-law) the elder brother of Roche du Maine, the Lords of Chandenier, Pontdormy, with very many others, and in a manner all the foot Captaines, who seeing the horsemen put themselves into a square battalion, but they were presently broken; part of them were cut in pieces, and the rest taken prisoners. This bloody battaile lasted foure or five houres, the victors pursued them within a league of La Fere, and it hath beene held strange how so great a number escaped, seeing their amazement. The Prince of Conde, the duke of Nevers, the Earle of Sancerre, and the Lords of Bourdillon, Grammont, Crueccour, Piennes, Descars and others escaped. Montmarancy the Constables eldest sonne tooke another way. There was a great amazement at Paris by reason of this defeat, where they had lost a number of men, whereof writers speake diuersly, some say five thousand; others report eight thousand, slaine vpon the place. The King retired from Compiegne to Paris, assured his capitall city, and drew from them a Subsidie of 30000 pounds sterling to supply his vrgent affaires: whilst that King Philip receiving the ensignes taken from the French, and seeing the prisoners led before his lodging as it were in triumph, he contented himselfe with his victory, not entring any farther into France, the which many townes did apprehend.

As for the besieged in Saint Quentin, King Philip comming to the campe, the battery was furious, and the besieged could not be relieved, but with three hundred men, whereof two third parts were slaine seeking to enter. Their towers and defences were beaten downe with the Cannon, and the Spaniards were become masters of the ditch, on the seventh day of August, the besieged (who were not above eight hundred men (distributed into eleuen breaches) endured a generall assault, and could not be forced: But the towne was taken by a Tower which no man guarded. The French souldiers were E in a manner all slaine. The Admirall, his brother (who escaped foore after) Larnac, Saint Remy, Humes with many other Gentlemen of marke were taken prisoners. The sonne of the Lord of Fayette, with the Captaines Saluerti, Ogier, Vicquet, La Barre, Eslang and Gourdes were slaine.

After the taking of Saint Quentin, the Earle of Aremberg with twelue hundred horse, and three Regiments of Lansquenets, besieged Castelet and made a furious battery. The Baron of Solignac commanding there, seeing himselfe destitute of succours that were promised, that the place was not to be defended against an assault, hauing not three hundred men, and those not very resolute, he yielded vp the place without fighting, for the which he was caried captiue to Paris, and had lost his life if he had not escaped out of prison, for that hee had promised (as they said) not to leaue the place without an assault. F After which the Spaniards taking Han, Chauny, and all other places that might annoy them in Picardy, made their victory absolute. Thus the Spanish forces had a happy season, and the Pope resolved to leane to the stronger. These losses make him easily forget the speedy succours hee had found in France: so as at the first approach of the duke of Alua, he sends him a blanke, by the Cardinal Cerast, and renouncing in September following the league made with the King, he made frustrate all his designs against Italy. Doubtlesse the counsell of the Constable, the Admirall, and many others, aduising to maintaine the truce, was farre more expedient, then this light and painfull enterprife in fauour of a Pope, who was content to haue imbarcked vs in a new Labyrinth of confusions, whereof we shall not be freed, without a mournfull and exemplary spectacle. To reach Princes: that an accord confirmed by a reciprocall oath; ought to be holy and inuiolable. So this reconciliation was made famous by a strange wonder. The same day, and the day after this peace was concluded, almost a third part of the buildings of Rome, and a great number of Christians perished, by a sudden and violent inundation of Tiber.

The King being at Paris during these tempests, as he went to heare masse, a yong man named Caboché, borne at Meaux, who had long followed the Court and serued the Secretaries of State, by reason of his faire writing, whether that he was distract of his wits, or thrust on for some other consideration; came and presented himselfe before the King, with a naked sword in his hand, and cried out aloud, Stay King, God hath commanded me to kill thee. Whereupon the Suisses of the Kings guard apprehended him presently, whom the King caused to be deliuered into the hands of iustice to determine of his offence: whereupon the Court of Parliament caused Caboché to be hanged for this attempt.

There was some likelihood, that Philip after his victory at Saint Quentin would haue entred further into the realme with his armie: but vnderstanding that the King expected a supply of fourteene thousand Suisses, and prepared his campe at Laon, he was content to fortifie his last conquests: and so gaue the King meanes to stay the troopes, which the dukes of Guise and Aumale brought out of Italy to chase the Baron of Polleuille from Bourg in Bresse, the which he besieged in the duke of Savoie name, with twelue hundred horse, and twelue thousand foot. The duke of Guise being come with his army out of Italy to the King being at Saint Germaine in Lay, he was by reason of the Constables imprisonment declared his Lieutenant generall. Should the King then suffer the courage of these forces newly arriued to quail, with idleness, when as hee might profitably employ them? The English had held Calais from vs two hundred and ten yeares: the Constables imprisonment had hindred the execution of a designe which he and the Admiral his Nephew had vpon this towne, by the meanes of Senarpont Gouverneur of Boullon. But now they winne that by force, which they could neuer get by policy or industry. His Maiesty declares the duke of Guise his Lieutenant Generall in all his countries: he leaues two armies, the one he giues to the Duke of Guise: the other, to the Duke of Neuers. The first aduanceth vnder colour to hinder the victualing of Saint Quentin. The other turning towards Luxembourg, drawes the Spaniards and Wallons to the defence thereof: then suddenly he sends his forces to the duke of Guise, who marcheth with all speed against Calais. In this armie, among many others, were the Princes of Conde and Roche-sur-yon, the duke of Aumale, and Marquis of Elbeuf brethren, the Marshall Stroffy, Montmorency, eldest sonne to the Constable, the Lords of Andelot, Termes, Grandmont, Creuecoeur, Piennes, Randan, Allegre, Sanfic, Tauanes, Senarpont, Esfree master of the Ordnance, and Goardan, who lost a legge in this action.

Calais taken.

The French armie appeared the first day of Ianuary, and at the first arriual takes the fort of Nieullay: and the next day, that of Risban. Thus the way to the towne being opened, and the besieged suddenly surprized, without hope of speedy succours, first the castle, and then the towne returned to the obedience of this crowne, as gladly, as wee haue seene here ancient Burgesses bid their poore and desolate country mournfully farewell, in the yeare 1347. The county of Oye, and all the forts the English held there, returned likewise to the subiection of their first and lawfull Lord, Guines, and other places dismantled, spare the cost which should be consumed in the defence thereof. The same moneth the King called a generall Parliament at Paris, where he had a grant of three millions of gold for the warre, and then he went to visit Calais, and gaue the government to M. de Termes. On the other side, the duke of Neuers did take for the King, the castle of Herbecmont: the forts of Iamogne, Chigny, Rossignol and Villeneufue. Thus their sorrow was turned into ioy, their hearts panting yet with that bloody battaile of Saint Laurence. The Court was partaker of this ioy, celebrating the 23 day of Aprill, in the midst of these prosperities, the marriage of Francis Dauphin of Viennois, with Mary Steward Queene of Scotland, daughter to James the 5, and Mary of Lorraine, daughter of Claude D. of Guise, and widow before to the duke of Longueuille.

During these happy victories, and conjunctions of alliances: the Duchesse Dowager of

The Dauphin married to Mary Queene of Scotland.

A of Lorraine, laboured to increase these solemn and publike ioyes, by the conclusion of a peace betwixt the two Kings. The Cardinal brother to the Duke of Guise, met with her at Peronne to that intent: but this parle without effect, hastened the execution of an enterprife vpon Theonville, the which being battered from the fifth, to the 21 day of Iune with five and thirty Cannons, and the mynes ready to play, receiued an honourable composition. The proiect of this prize is giuen to the Duke of Neuers, the glory of the execution, to the duke of Guise: and the duke of Nemours, the Marshall of Stroffy (who was slaine there, with a shot vnder his left pap, the duke of Guise leaning on his shoulder, as they caused a plat-forme to be vndermined) the Lords of Montluc, Vielleuille, and Bourdillon, had the honour to haue giuen good testimonies of their valours in this prize. Chigny taken afterwards from the Wallons, was fortified: Arlon, Villedont, and Rossignol, burnt and made vnprofitable for the warre.

The English in the meane time, spoiled the coasts of Normandie and Picardy: and the King to stop their courses, prepares two small armies, one at la Fere, vnder the Duke of Aumale: the other at Calais, vnder the Marshall of Termes, who succeeded Stroffy. The Marshall attempts Berghes (they feared not the French there, and the towne which the Spaniards held vpon that coast were ill furnished) he takes it, sacks it, and by that meanes opens the way to Dunkerke. Dunkerke being taken and spoiled in foure dayes, enriched both the souldiers, and boyes of the armie.

C But the Flemings force them to make restitution: the Marshall camped before Graue line: and the Cont Aiguemont Lieutenant for the King of Spain in the Low-countries, hauing speedily assembled out of the neighbour garisons, and of other forces, about sixteene thousand foot, a thousand or twelue hundred Reistres and two thousand horse, cuts off his way vpon the Riuier of A, which comes from Saint Omer, and forceth him to fight.

At the first charge, the French armie overthrowes some squadrons of horse: but at the second shocke, the Marshall is hurt and taken, with Villebon, Senarpont, Morvilliers and Chauue, a great number of captaines and souldiers are slaine vpon the place, and all the troops lo discomfited, as of all the companies of men at armes, of three coronets of light horse, fourteene ensignes of French foot, and eightene of Lanquenes, few escaped death or imprisonment: a wound which reuiued the scarce of Saint Laurence, and did frustrate the Duke of Guise his enterprife vpon Luxembourg: but it was partly recompenced by the Lord of Kerfimon, vpon six or seuen thousand English and Flemings which landed at the haven of Conquet, spoiling, and burning the weakest parts of the coast of Britany. This was in the end of Iuly. The duke of Guise sayling of Luxembourg, came to lodge at Pierepont in Tiraiche, and there fortified with seuen corners of Reistres, brought by William, yonger sonne to John Fredericke Elector of Saxony, and a new regiment of Lanquenes, led by Iacob of Ausbourg, made the French armie as strong, as the yeare before. About others, were most apparant the companies of the Duke of Guise, Lieutenant Generall, of the Dukes of Montpensier, Neuers, Aumale, Bouillon, Nemours, Saxony, Lunembourge, of the Prince of Roche-sur-yon, of the Prince of Salerne, of the Cont Charry, the Marshall S. Andre, the Marquis of Elbeuf, and of the Lords of Roche-foucault, Randan, Corton, Montmorency (the Constables eldest sonne) Efcheneis, Roche-du-Maine, Jenlis, La Vauguion, Bourdillon, Tauanes and Beauuais. The light horse of the Earles of Eu and Roissy, of the Lords of Valette, Bueil, Laigny, Rottigort, Lombay and others, whereof the duke of Nemours was Generall, and so great a number of Germanes, Suisses, and Frenchmen, as this flourishing armie (lodging neere to Amiens, along the riuier of Somme) prevailed much for the treaty of peace, which followed soone after.

F Philip had his armie likewise vpon the riuier of Anthy, both intrenched and fortified with artillery, as if they meant to continue there, and in time to tire one another. Some monthes passe without any other exploit then in roads and light skirmishes. In the end, the eternal God of armes, who from his heauely throne beheld the feat of these two mighty armies, changed the bitterness of former warre into a pleasing peace, confirmed by alliances the yeare following. The Abbey of Cercamp vpon the confines of Arthois and Picardy, gaue the first entry. Ambrosine Secretarie of State, assembled for the King, treated with the Duke of Alua, the A Prince of Orange, Regimes de Sines, Cup-bearer to King Philip, Granduile Bishop of Arras, and Vilge of Zuichem, President of the Councell of State for the Low-countries: behold the death of Charles the fifth Emperour, chancing in September, and that of Mary Queene of England, in the middest of Nouember, changed both the place, and the time of this conclusion.

Castle-Cambresis had the honour to finish it at the second conference, the which was confirmed by the mariages, of Philip with Elizabeth, eldest daughter to King Henry: of Philibert Emanuel duke of Sauoy, with Marguerite the Kings onely sister: and of Charles duke of Lorraine, with Claude a younger daughter of France. The King yielded to the B Castilian all that he had taken from him, as well on this side, as beyond the mountaines. To the Sauoyard, he restored Bresse, Sauoy and Piedmont: to the Genouois, the Isle of Corse, and about foure hundred places more conquered, during these fatal and pernicious warres, which had made so many Provinces desolate, ruined to many castles, villages and townes, drunke so much Christian blood, and slaine so many millions of men of all qualities, retaining nothing but the territories of Boullen and Calais. Thus the wind doth suddenly drink vp, all the toyle, all the trauels, all the sweat of many ages. And the Lord saith vnto man: Thou foole, this night will I take thy soule from thee, and who shall haue the things which thou hast prepared? And, All men are vaine, doubtlesse man labours for a shadow, hee troubleth himselfe for nothing.

The King being at peace with his foraine enemies, with whom euery man thought there should be eternall alliances, he was counselled to continue his seuerer proceedings against his subiects of the religion, the which had increased much during the troubles, for the redressing whereof there needed no violent, but spirituall remedies: many ill aduised Councillors to this Prince (who of himselfe was of a milde and temperate disposition) made him conceiue a wonderfull hatred against them of the said religion, filling his eares with vnworthy reports. The Lord of Andelot was the first that smarted, being sent prisoner to Melun for his religion. This caused many discontents and ialousies amongst great houses, which was the cause of great mischief after the death of Henry.

The prisons were full of such as they called Lutherans, and even then many noble families were toucht with that cause. Moreouer, many officers of the Parliament, wished a milder proceeding against those prisoners. This diuersitie caused an assembly, which they called Mercuriale, to heare the opinion of presidents and counsellors vpon this controvertie, the which the King was required to countenance with his presence. Anne du Bourg vsed a great libertie of speech: some others did second his opinion. This freedome transported the King into choller: hee commands the Constable to put them in prison, and vowes to see them burnt within few dayes, if they persist. But oh Prince: The yeeres of thy account are come, and thou entrest into a path from which thou shalt no more returne. The Constable deliuiers them to the Count Montgomery, captaine of his Maiesties guards, who leads Bourg to the Bastile, and the rest to diuers other prisons. Let vs not iudge hereby, but admire how soeuer, the iudgements of God: in that we shall see these three personages, euery one in his ranke, die an extraordinarie and tragicall death.

In the meane time the Courtiers made all the inuentions that might bee for sports and delights, to solemnize the mariage of the Kings daughters and sister, the which in outward appearance seemed to bring a great happinesse to France: But the sighs of prisoners for matter of religion, the horrible punishments and executions of others, the earnest prayers of infinit families threatned, who found by experience that this peace was concluded betwixt the French and the Spaniard, to make an irreconcilable warre against them, were the windes which drew from aboue these wonderfull alterations, which the wise prouidence of God did let them see soone after. Elizabeth of France, hauing beene conducted by the King her father, to our Ladies Church at Paris, was there married with great state and triumph, by the Duke of Alua, who had procuracion from the King of Spaine his master, the ceremony was done by the Cardinall of Bourbon, where there assisted many Princes, Noblemen, Cardinals, and Prelates, from all the parts of the realme, with an infinite number of the Kings officers and household seruants: there also assisted the Duke of Sauoy, the Prince of Orange, the Earle of Egmont, and a great number of other Noblemen of the Low-countries: after all their sumptuous banquets, sports,

Councillors of the Parliament imprisoned.

A maskes and dauncing, followed the last act which changed all these pleasing Comedies and sports, into a bloodie and mournfull Tragedy, whereof the King was the lamentable prologue, for hauing published a solemn running at the Tilt, the King (contrary to the aduice of many who besought him to leaue that exercise to others who would giue him content) would needs be one of the challengers, being seconded by the Dukes of Guise and Ferrara: but the second day of this Tournay, after that he had runne well, being intreated by the Queene to retire, wherein the Duke of Sauoy laboured also, hee sent her word by the Marshall of Montmorency, that he would runne but once, and that for her sake, he sent a Lance to the Earle of Montgomery. The Earle excuseth himselfe to B runne against his Maiestie: the day before hee could not hit any one, and it may bee now he feared a second shame. But hauing a second charge from the King to enter the Listes, hee runnes, and breaks his Lance vpon the Kings Cuirasse, and with a splinter thereof (his Beauer being somewhat open) strikes him so deepe into the eye, as the tenth of Iuly his soule left his body, in the house of Tournelles, the foure and fortieth yeare of his age.

King Henry.

The day before his death he would haue the mariage of the Duke of Sauoy and of the Lady Marguerite his sister, celebrated in his chamber, and that whatsoeuer had beene accorded vnto the Duke by the Treaty of peace, should be fully performed. His heart was interred in the Celestines Church in the Dukes of Orleans Chappell. His royall Obsequy was celebrated on the thirteenth day of August, and his body was layd at Saint Denis in the common tombe of the French Kings: during this Princes reigne, there were two great finnes crept into France, Archeisme and Magicke, whereunto was ioyned the corruption of all good learning: for the knowledge thereof, being brought in by King Francis the first, was in many curious and malicious spirits an occasion of all wickednesse, especially in that multitude of French Poets, who by their impure rimes, full of blasphemies ouerthrew a number of soules.

He had by Katherine de Medicis his wife, siue sonnes and siue daughters. Francis his successor, of the age of sixteene or seuentene yeares, Louis Duke of Orleans, who liued few moneths: Charles-Maximilian, Edward, Alexander, afterwards named Henry the third, and Hercules, afterwards called Francis. Elizabeth married to Philip King of Spaine, Claude to Charles Duke of Lorraine, Marguerite to Henry of Bourbon, then King of Navarre, Jane and Viviana twinnes, who died soone after their birth. Hee was a religious Prince, goodly, of a mild disposition, peaceable, affable, not greatly subiect to passions, generous, louing his seruants and men of merit: but voluptuous, and not able to discouer in due time the ambition and couetousnesse of such as possessing him, made sale of lawes, iustice, offices, and spirituall liuings, empied the subiects purses, and nourished the warres which wee haue before obserued, namely, since the breach of the truce: finding such sweetnesse, profit, and honour, in the managing of the treasure, and commanding of the Kings armies in the voyage of Italy, and especially in this last Lieutenantcy in Picardy, as hereafter we shall see a young Prince reigne like a shadow, and they being seized of the gouernment of his person and of his Realme, shall dispossesse the chiefe Officers of the Crowne, keepe backe the Princes of the blood, the true and lawfull Gouernors of the State, the King being in his minority: and plot the means to raise their Race to the Royall Throne.

FRANCIS the SECOND,

The 60 French King.

THIS Reigne is short, but very memorable. Wee see a Theater, whereon is acted a horrible Tragedy, a King young of yeares, and of iudgement, governed by his mother and his wifes vncles, and of a new forme of Court. The Princes of the blood haue now no more credit: and seeme to neglect both the publike and priuate interest. The Courtiers stand at a gaze, and for the most part stoop to the stronger. The Clergy shield themselves vnder those that kinde these fires in France. The Nobility wearied with former toyles, doe not yet wipe off the dust and sweat from their armes.

The people diuided for matter of Religion, and oppressed with the burthen of former warres, desires to breathe. The Constable holds his place: yet is he not so surely seated, but they will displace him. There are two factions in Court: the Constable holdeth the one, those of Guise the other. The first was firme and sincere, the last, cunning and pliable. The Queene Mother ioynes with the last. The King of Nauarre might crosse them, and therefore to be the better informed of his designs, shee entertaines seruants and pensioners about him. The Princes of the blood, the Constable, the Marshalls, the Admirall, and many other Noblemen, prepared for the funerals of the deceased King, when as the Duke of Guise and the Cardinall of Lorraine, leading the King, his brethren, and the Queenes to the Louvre, begin a strange alteration, a true patterne of the inconstancie of this world. The Duchesse of Valentinois had quietly governed the deceased King, and by her practices had caused Francis Oliver, a man of a singular reputation, and Chancellor of France, to be dismissed. At the first entry, shee is spoiled of her precious Jewels, which witnessed the Kings loue vnto her, to adorne the Queene that reigned: and by her disgrace, leaves the place to Katherine, to rule hereafter without companion.

The Queene Mother (who hated her extremly) was glad to see her thus disgraced, for that she would not lose the fauour of the House of Guise, who although they had beene aduanced by the Duchesse, yet seeing her to bee a weake support, they abandoned her, and ioynd with the other, who assisted them no lesse then the first. They took the scales from Cardinall Bertrand, and sent him to Rome: and from Auançon the Superintendence of the Treasure, yet he remained still in Court, for that it was not yet necessary to force him to seeke a new party.

The Marshall of Saint Andrew aduanced by the fauours of the deceased King, and made fit by the confiscations of them of the Religion, and by borrowing, which he neuer payd againe, hauing made offer of all that he had vnto them of Guise, he is receiued into their band, and Oliver restored to his Chancellorship.

The Constable seeing the King had made a declaration, that his meaning was they should addresse themselves for all matters concerning the estate of the Crowne and of his House, vnto his two Vncles, the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinall of Lorraine: and by consequence, his mortall enemy seated in his place, and executing that which belonged to his office of Constable and Lord Steward of France, yea in the presence of Spaniards and strangers who before had so much respected him: within few dayes after the death of Henry, he goes to the new King, and deliueres vp the Signet (which his deceased master had committed vnto him) who told him that the charge of the Treasure and of the affaires of State was giuen vnto the Cardinall, and the commandement of all that concerned the warre vnto the Duke: telling him withall, that he would retaine him still of his Council, and that he should be welcome when he came to Court. He thanked the King for giuing him leaue to retire himselfe, beseeching him to excuse him for not comming to Council, for two reasons: The one, for that he could not serue them whom he had alwayes commanded: The other, that being held an old dotard, his counsell was not necessary. Then offering his life and goods vnto the King, he went to visit the Queene mother, who entreated him roughly, reproaching him that he had told the deceased King

sent home to his house.

A meaning wife, that he had not any child like him but his bast daughter, who was married to the Marshall of Montmorency. She added withall, that for the loue of the deceased, she would forget her priuate iniury: and that without this respect she had meanes to cut off his head. In the end she perswaded him not wholly to abandon the Court, but to come sometime. He maintained that he was falsely accused with that speech of the Kings children, intreating her to remember the seruices which he had done to her and the Realme, and not believe the reports of his enemies, who should not doe him so much harme as they pretended. So hauing taken his leaue, and conducted his master to his grate, he retired to his house.

B The two brethren to play their parts absolutely without controule, send the Prince of Conde into Flanders, vnder colour to confirme the peace, and him of Rochelle into it, to carry the Order of France to the King of Spaine: then at his returne they depure him with the Cardinall of Bourbon, to conduct Elizabeth to Philip her husband.

In the meane time, the Guisians call the Cardinall of Tournon from Rome: a man fit for their humours, an inueterate enemy to the Constable and to them of the Religion. They displace part of the ancient officers of the Kings house, and place new at their deuotion: they furnish Provinces and frontiertownes with Governors of their owne choice: they obtaine a Declaration from the King, sitting in Parliament, whereby hee made it knowne, that touching all affaires which concerned the estate of his Crowne and house, his pleasure was, they should hereafter repaire to his two Vncles.

C The first Edicts were against the carying of Pistols and Harguebuzes, and then against long cloakes, and great hose. It was a common saying, that the Cardinall (as fearefull a man as euer was) hauing vnderstood from a Magician at Rome, that through enuy, and when he was in his greatest dignity, his enemies should cause him to be slaine with a peece, had procured these defences, being wonderfully disquieted, euen then when as all yielded vnto him: they doe and vndoe, place and displace, in Parliament and Priuy Council, like to a King of absolute power. And the Queene Mother challengeth the gift of money growing by the confirmation of offices and priuileges of townes and commonalties, the which by right cannot be exacted, but when the Realme falls into a collateral line.

D Now they are settled in this vsurped government: they haue officers at their pleasure. But there is yet a moat in their eye. Those of the Religion, who were then called Reformed, (let vs hereafter call them Protestants) for their common cause (with the Protestants of Germany) multiplied infinitely. Some Princes, and many Noblemen did countenance them, and were ready to take their protection. To weaken them, nay rather to ruine them quite, the Kings Letters Patentes are granted the 14 of Iuly, with a Commission to certaine Iudges, for the trial of Anne du Bourg, and four of his companions prisoners. It was to be feared, that their proceeding against these five Counsellors, would preiudice the whole party. They beseech the Queen by their Letters (who had made shew to incline to their doctrine, when as she was barren) to vse her authority in the restraint of these rigorous pursuits. She passeth her word to the Prince of Conde and Admirall, so as they will liue secretly and without any scandall.

E She had beene importuned by Letters from one named Villemadon, who knew much of her secrets, and put her in mind of her affection to Pietie, at such times as she was barren, exhorted her not to reiect the Princes of the blood from the managing of the affaires of State, to aduance them of Guise, and to make them petty Kings. These Letters were written the 26 of August, and wrought this effect, that the Queene seemed to bee inclined for some dayes to ease them of the Religion.

F In the meane time they of Guise, to make their Government more pleasing vnto the people, and not to lose any thing, published in the Kings name Letters of reuocation of all alienations made, as well for life as for yeares in recompence of any seruices, except sales, whereof the money had beene employed for the Kings great and urgent affaires, the portions of the daughters of France, and the dowry of the deceased Queene Eleanor, which the Infanta of Portugall did enioy; the rest to be re-united to the Kings demesnes and ordinary receipts. This reuocation was a foreblow to some Princes and great performances, who were disappointed of the fruits of their seruice and of the deceased Kings bounty. On the other side, the fauorites of the House of Guise obtained other Letters of exemption, and so they stript some, whilest that others remained in possession, or got some some new purchase. The Constable seeing Henries death approach, had sent to sollicite the King of Nauarre, to come with all speed to Court, and to seize vpon the Governement before any other. This Prince was not desirous to manage the affaires, and was somewhat jealous of the Constable, which made him to sit still, giving them of Guise time to seize vpon his place.

Some Princes and Noblemen hauing prest him, he gaue care, and imparted this businesse to his foure chiefe Councillors, which were Larnac, the Bishop of Maude President of his Councell, Desfars his Chamberlane, and Bouchars his Councillor, who were of opinion that he should goe presently to Court.

They of Guise are aduertised hereof, who promise wonders to Maude and Desfars, if they can frustrate this resolution, who did worse: for suffering their Master to goe to horsebacke, being far aduanced, they begin to put water in his wine, and to forge ineuitable dangers if he stood too directly vpon his ranke: that he must proceed mildly in this businesse, and entertaine all men politely.

Being come to Poitiers, whereas many Princes and Noblemen met him, hee shewed much resolution, and gaue good hope to the Ministers of the Churches assembled, especially at Paris, Orleans and Tours, entreating them to beare a little in that which concerns the open profession of Religion. Being come to Court, which was at Saint Germaine in Lay, what entertainment doe they giue, this first Prince of the blood of France? His Harbingers find no lodging for him within the castle. It shall cost me my life, and tenne thousand more with me (said the Duke of Guise to his Harbinger) before hee take from mee the place and lodging which the King hath giuen me nere vnto his person. No man goes to meet him: those of Guise looke that he should goe to salute them: and which is worse, the next day he hath no place in Councell.

After some dayes, the King sayes vnto him, that his Vncles hauing the charge of affaires, he desired them that would haue his fauour, to obey them in all things. So hauing obtained confirmation of his offices and pensions, he approved by his silence, the usurpation of the House of Guise, who lead the King to Rheims, where hee was triumphantly anointed the eighteenth of September, by the Cardinall of Lorraine, Archbishop of that place.

Soone after the Coronation, the Queen mother gets a resignation from the Constable, of the office of Lord Steward, in fauour of the Duke of Guise, and in recompence made his sonne Marshall of France. The Admirall foreseeing that they would dispossesse him of the government of Picardy: he first gaue the King to vnderstand that it belonged to the Prince of Conde, for that his predecessors had long enjoyed it. His resignation was willingly accepted, but not the condition. It was better to purchase a good seruant and partisan, which was the Marshall of Brisac. Thus the Princes and chiefe Officers of the Crowne were disgraced, but those that were least passionate amongst the people, were not mute. They had a good share in the private discontent of these great personages, foreseeing the disorders that might ensue, and require a Parliament, as the foueraigne cure for such diseases, whereby the Queen mother might be excluded from the Regency, and those of Guise put from the Kings person.

To please the King, they perswade him, that they sought to bridle him, and to make him a ward, that he should hold them enemies to his authority, and guilty of high treason that talke of a Parliament. The King of Spaine crosseeth them, and by letters written to the King his brother-in-law (the which were read in Councell in the presence of the King of Nauarre) he declares himselfe (saith he for the good affection hee did beare) Tutor and Protector of him, his Realme and his affaires, against those that would change the government of the Estate, as if the King were not capable of the government. Pleasant people, which reiect so much the word of lawfull tutelage, and yet they vsurpe it against the lawes and orders of the Realme, holding it onely by tyranny. This other affront sent the King of Nauarre home into Bearne whence he came.

They continued their pursuits against the Councillor du Bourg, which moued them of the Religion at Paris to send a supplication to the Queene Mother, exhorting her to her duty, and denouncing the vengeance of God, and the danger of future troubles, by reason of these great rigours: But she gaue them no pleasant answer: besides du Bourg, towards the end of this yeare, there were many imprisoned at Paris for Religion, and their

A their houses sacked, as in a towne taken by assault: there were witnesss suborned to depose that in a certaine Assembly made on Thursday before Easter day, in an Aduocates house, at the place Matibert, a great number of Lutherans, Men, Women, and Maydens, after the Preaching, hauing receiued the Communion, and eaten a Pigge, in stead of the Paschall Lambe, the candles being put out, they went and lay together. The Cardinall moued the whole Court with these informations: but the Queene Mother hauing vpon this occasion spoken against some of her maids that were of the Religion, they wrought so as the two chiefe witnesss were heard in her presence, being two young boyes, who had maintained, that then and at many other times, they had carnally knowne the daughters of

B this Aduocate, they then began to wauer, and courtely to deny it. Notwithstanding the accusation and suit continued: and for that in the apprehension of prisoners there was some resistance made in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, they sent vnto all their houses to take away their armes, yea their knives, the which was brought vnto the Hostell of Guise. The Aduocate thus slanderously charged, did constitute himselfe prisoner, with his wife and daughters, where the maidens were found virgins, and yet the false witnesss nor their suborners were not punished, notwithstanding their complaints they by vertue of an Edict, which set all prisoners at liberty for matter of Religion, were in a manner forced to goe out of prison.

All this did but increase the hatred both of great and small against the Guisians. Many Treaties are published, written, and printed, and all tend to proue, that it belongs to the Estates, to prouide Gouernors for Kings in their minorities: that these two brethren are incapable of the government, being both strangers: the one a Priest, the other presuming to stay in the life of the deceased King, that the Realme belonged to the House of Lorraine, as issued from Charlemagne, from whom Hugh Capet had vsurped it. A proposition which they haue presumed to publish in these latter times: but so often confuted, as it needs no further discourse. They had made open pretensions to some members of the Crowne, as to the Countie of Prouence and the Duchy of Anjou: they propounded the lamentable effects of their ambition, in the breach of the truce, and the last voyage into Italy, the cause of the losse of the battell of Saint Laurence, and the danger of the whole Realme, to prevent the which they were forced to yeeld vp all the conquests which Francis the first, and Henry had made.

They did not forget their exactions, the managing of the treasure, and the Kings great debts. The King beganne to grow, and euen now hee complained, that they kept him from hearing of his subjects complaints, hee was so sickly as there was no hope of long life. To get sure footing in the government of Estate, they resolute to purchase many seruants in the Courts of Parliament, to winne the affections of Courtiers and men of warre, and by a burning zeale, to the rooting out of Protestants, to purchase the loue of the Clergy and people.

They publish sundry Edicts against them, they promise great recompences to them that discouer their Assemblies: many townes fill their prisons: they employ aire, fire and water to ruine them, and yet it seemes that the more they kill, the more they increase. The eight and twentieth of December, Anthony Minard President of the Parliament at Paris, was slaine with a Pistoll in the evening coming from the Palace to his house, and yet it could neuer be knowne whence it came, no more then the death of Italian Ferme, agent for the House of Guise, slaine nere vnto Chambourg, where the King was, and stript of certaine instructions of importance, against the life of some great personage. Some were imprisoned and in great danger for Minard, amongst others, Steward a Scottishman (who although hee were allied to the Queene reigning) was cruelly tormented, yet could they draw nothing from him that might preiudice himselfe or any others. About this time the Elector Palatine, hauing sent his Ambassadors to the King, to demand du Bourg whose seruice hee would vse at Heidleberg, the Cardinall, being incensed for the death of Minard, wrote vnto the Parliament, that they should execute the sentence giuen against Anne du Bourg, who (persisting in the confession of his faith vpon the points of Religion in controuersie) was on the twentieth of December hanged at the Greue, and his body then burnt to ashes. The Councillors: La Porte, Foix, Faux, and Fumet imprisoned for the same cause, escaped with some sharpe admonitions.

Many could not beare this oppression. The Princes were kept backe: the greatest of the Realme Realme out of credit, threatened, and secretly pursued to the death: the conuocation of the Estates refused: the Parliaments corrupted, the Iudges for the most part at the Guisians deuotion: and the publike Treasures, Offices, and Benefices giuen to whom they pleased.

Usurpations of the House of Guise incensed
the French.

Their violent government, and against the lawes and orders of the Realme, purchased wonderfull hatred against the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinall of Lorraine, and caused many which could no longer endure these oppressions, to consult vpon some iust defence, to the end they might restore the ancient and lawfull government of the Realme. They demanded aduice, touching law and conscience, of many learned Lawyers and Diuines, who resolved that they might lawfully oppose themselves against the government which the House of Guise had usurped, and at need take armes to repulse their violence, so as the Princes who in that case are borne Magistrates, or some one of them would vndertake it, being required thereunto by the Estates of the Realme, or by the founder part of them. They which first thought of this act of consequence, had severall considerations. Some moued with a true zeale to serue God, the King and Realme, thought they could not doe a worke of greater piety, then to abolish Tyranny, and to restore the State; and withall to find some meanes to ease them of the Religion.

There were others desirous of change: and some were thrust on with hatred, for the wrongs which the House of Guise had done them, their kinsmen and friends: to conclude, all had one designe to suppress this vnlawfull government. But for that in this generall, lawfull, and commendable designe, there were priuate considerations which were wonderfull defectiue, it is no wonder if there were confusion in the pursuit, and that the euent was so fatal vnto the vndertakers: namely, for those which did mixe their priuate passions with the consideration of the publike. As for the rest, who had no other end but to free France from the yoke of strangers, although that most of them bee dead, in the pursuit, as well then as since vnder the reignes of the two succeeding Kings: yet are they departed this world with this singular content, to haue courageously sacrificed their liues for their countries liberty.

In these consultations it was held necessary to seize vpon the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinall his brother, being aduowed by some one of the chiefe members of the State, and then to require an Assembly of the three Estates, to the end they might yeeld an account of their government, and to prouide for the King and Realme. Some haue rashly thought and written, that all this proceeding (which afterward was called The tumult of Amboise) was an enterprize of rash seditious men, enemies to God and the State, thrust on by despair and fury: in like manner there were others which ill affected to the House and memory of the Prince of Conde, (who was prest to vndertake this charge) haue presumed to charge him, that he was thrust on by priuate passions in these intelligences, and that he sought to end a quarrell against the House of Guise by this meanes, and afterwards to cause greater troubles. But the truth of his intent is well knowne to some yet liuing, and future ages will rectifie their testimonies and writings, as full of passion, and repugnant to truth: and will aduow that the Prince did herein shew himselfe a true Frenchman, and well affected to the King and Realme. The Prince of Conde then being instantly required to accept of this charge, he examines the consequence of the fact, and hauing imparted it to some persons louing the good of the Realme, hee giues commission to informe secretly of the crimes where with the House of Guise was charged, to prouide for the same, as conscience and the common good should require. They find by informations, and certaine personages well qualified, being priuy to their secret designes, did witnesse that their intention was (the King being vnable, by the iudgement of the Physicians, to live long, nor to haue any issue) first to root out all Lutherans in France, then to murder all the Princes of the blood, and to seize vpon the Realme. Moreover, they were charged with many thefts, robberies, and extortions, and by consequence were in many things found guilty of high treason.

The difficultie was how to seize vpon these two persons. Godfrey of Barri, Lord of Renaudie, Baron of Perigord, accepts the managing of this action, and the Prince promitteth to assist him with his authority, So as nothing be said or done against God, the King, his brethren, the Princes, nor the Estate: protesting to oppose himselfe first against any one that should attempt the contrary. All that were in the action, bind themselves to the same oath,

A oath, yea to aduertise the King, if any thing were pretended against his Maiesty: they appoint the tenth of March, hoping to find the Court still at Blois. Five hundred French Gentlemen with other troops vnder the command of the Baron of Castelnau, should accompany Renaudie, followed by a thousand others, besides their troops on foot. But it is almost impossible to keepe secret at enterprize imparted to so many diuers humours, but some one will discouer it. Renaudie lodged at Paris in the Suburbs of Saint Germain, in an Advocates house called Auenelles, a Protestant by profession, who hauing discovered somewhat of this enterprize, vnder colour to employ himselfe for the aduantage thereof, he learned all that passed. But hoping of some notable recompence, he suddenly went and discovered it to Alemand, Master of Requests, a fauorite to the Cardinall, and to Milet Secretary to the Duke of Guise, And Lignieres one of the Captaines of the enterprize, did afterwards bewray the names of the Commanders, the Rendezvous for their troops, with other circumstances, to the Queene Mother, to saue (said he) the honour and life of the Prince of Conde, whom they accused of high treason.

To assure their persons, they transport the King to Amboise, they send letters from the King and his Mother, to call the Admirall and his brethren to Court, they dispatch many Letters Patents to Bayliffes and Seneschalls, against all such as should be found carrying of armes vpon the way to Amboise. The Admirall being ariued, makes great complaints to the Queene Mother, in presence of the Chancelor, of the extreame violences and pursuits made against the Protestants: and the Chancelor hauing freely propounded the Admirals aduice in Councell, there followed an Edict for the abolishing of that was past for matters of Religion. But this pardon excluded all Ministers, and such as should be found to haue conspired against the King, his mother, his wife, or the Princeesse, his chiefe Officers, or the Estate, and all other culpable of like crimes.

Notwithstanding this Edict, Renaudie proceeds, and the Prince goes to Court to present these informations to the King against the House of Guise, when as they should bee seized on. The execution was put off to the sixteenth, by reason of the change of the place. In the meane time the Guisians had assembled men from all parts, so as the troops ariuing one after one to the appointed places, were presently surprised. The Baron of Castelnau, and the chiefe of the faction, are at the Castle of Noisy: the Guisians aduertised thereof, persuade the King that there are rebels assembled to murder him. The King sends the Duke of Nemours with a troop, who at the first surprizeth Captaine Mazeuer and Rannay, walking without the Castle, and then hauing set strong guards about it, he carried those two to Amboise, returning after dinner with five or six hundred horse. The Baron had sent to Renaudie that he would come speedily to vngage him, being loth to abandon the place, where there was armes, powder and munition: but seeing himselfe inuested, and the Duke returned, he entred into parlee, vpon the instance that was made vnto him: and hauing related at large the causes of this enterprize, the Duke entreated him often to lay downe armes, and to goe and speake with the King, binding himselfe by the faith of a Prince, that not any harme should be done vnto him, nor to any of his companions, but should all be set at liberty. The Baron relying vpon the word of a Prince, obeyed, with the rest that were with him: but being come to Amboise, they spake not with any man but with Commissioners that were sent for their trial by them of Guise.

Renaudie caused his troop to aduance covertly through the woods: but they had walked vnder the gate, by the which they should enter, and the horsemen sent by the Guisians compassing them in, many were led away and presently hanged, and afterwards drawne to the ruer. And as he laboured to rally his disperfed troop, the Lord of Paradillan encounters him in the forest of Chasteau-Regnard, and passing by, discharged his pistoll, the which not taking fire, Renaudie had his sword first drawn, as he was about to kill him, one of Paradillans seruants ouerthrew him with a Harguebuzze-shot: being slaine, his bodie was straight-way caried and hanged on the bridge at Amboise, with this Inscription: Renaudie, called la Foret, chiefe of the Rebels. Among other prisoners, was La Bigne, who had serued Renaudie as a Secretary and was found seized of a paper in cypher: to saue his life he decyphers this paper, which contained nothing else but what had been concluded by all the associates, and their expresse protestation not to attempt any thing against the Kings Maiesty: nor against the Princes of his blood, or the estate of the Realme: And the Articles tended to no other end, but to take the government of the Realme from them of Guise, and to cause the ancient orders of France to be observed by a lawful Assembly of the Estates. He was also found seized of an admonition vnto the King from them of the Religion, whereas the Cardinals vsuist proceedings against the Parliament of Paris, and against du Bourg, among other things, were discouered. At the first they of Guise would not haue had one prisoner escaped: but afterwards, considering that the multitude would make them more odious, they let the Souldiers goe, to euery of which, they gaue eight, reene pence to beare their charges.

Captaine La Motte, Cocqueville, and some others did not yett faint, but gaue a hor alarme to the Courtiers at Amboise, and without some error in the intelligence, which caused them to retire without losse of any one horse-man, the enterprise, (yee after the death of Renard) had bene executed. But this did but incense the fury of them of Guise, who caused all the foot-men they could get at this time, to bee hanged. It was then very dangerous for any man whatsoever to bee found alone about Amboise, the least harme that could happen vnto him, was to be tripped into his shift, and then did the Souldiers of the Kings guard commit strange thefts and extortions. Those of Guise being assured of their enemies, and their troop dispersed, they gae commandement to the Prince of Conde, in the Kings name, not to depart without leave. They begonne to cut off heads, to hang and to drowne their prisoners, tyed to long poles, six; eight, tenne, twelue, and fiftieene in a company: and although there were herein more question of Estate then Religion, yett they gae out, that the Lutherans would maintaine themselves by the sword, and as such men, they caused many to be executed, who by their examinations and perrigent answers touching matters of conscience, did witness that they were not yett seafonned with any other doctrine, then that of their fathers.

This alarme had put the young King in feare: but more the impression of his vnles perswading him that they fought his person: And what haue I done? (said he often) what haue I done, that my subiects should attempt thus against me? I will heare their complaints, and doe them right. And sometimes to those of Guise: I know not what it is, but I understand it is you only that they fecke: I would gladly you would absent your selues for a time, to see if they would attempt against you or me. Amongst all the prisoners, foure are especially noted, Castelan, Villemaignis, Champagnac, and le Picard, for that with an admirable constancy and resolution, they had blamed the Chancellor, who against his conscience, had signed the sentence of their deaths: which so terrified him, as he suddenly fell sicke of griefe, and melancholy, and soone after left this world, murmuring, sighing, and forswearing the Councellor du Bourg, and crying out some houres before his death, the Cardinall of Lorraine comming to visit him, O Cardinall! thou hast damned vs all. Michael Hospital, then Chancellor to the Duchesse of Saunoy, was called from Nice, and substituted in his place.

The Prince of Conde was at Amboise during these horrible combustions, who caried himselfe like a man without feare, that had an innocent soule. They of Guise incensed the King against him, and suborned men to observe his words and actions, whereof the Cardinall held a Register, especially of some words which the Prince vied, being much grieued to see some prisoners, (looking out at a window of the Castle) executed: which were, that the King was ill counsellor, to put Noblemen and Gentlemen to death, which were honest men, and so well borne, considering the great seruice they had done vnto the deceased King and Realme: That being thus deprived of them, it was to bee feared that strangers during these great troubles would make some enterprise: and that if they were supported by any Prince, they would easily make a prey of the Realme. Soone after they caused de Vaux, Gentleman of his house, to bee apprehended, and the King sent for the Prince into his chamber, to tell him that he had vnderstood by informations, that he was to bee the chiefe of the conspiracy, adding withall some threats. The Prince in his answer besought the King to assemble all the Princes, Knights of the Order, and priuie Councell which were then at Amboise, to the end that he might heare his answer in that honorable Assembly. The company was presently called into the Kings presence, whereas the Prince recited the Kings speech, and what had followed: adding, that the Kings person excepted, with his brethren and the Queenes, they which had reported vnto the King that he was the head and conductor of certaine seditious men, who (they said) had conspired against the King and State, had falsely and trayterously lied: That to proue his innocency, he would (for this regard only) quite abandon his ranke and dignity of Prince

A of the blood, and make them confesse with his sword or lance, that they were villains, and that they themselves fought the ruine of the State, name, and blood Royall: for the preservation whereof, he would employ both life and goods, as he had alwayes giuen good proofe, and also for his owne interest to the Crowne and House of France, the maintenance whereof he should procure with a better title then his accusers: pressing the company, that if there were any one that had made this report, or that would maintaine it, he should presently declare himselfe. But no man presenting himselfe, he besought the King to hold him for an honest man, and not to giue care to such slanderers and abusers, but reiect them as enemies to his person, and to the publike quiet. Having spoken this, he went out of the Councell, to leaue them to their consolation. But the Cardinall making a certain signe, the King brake off the Assembly, without demanding their aduice, whereas there might haue bene somewhat concluded to the preiudice of the House of Guise.

The Queene Mother was much troubled during these broiles, yett leaning still to the stronger (according to the world) shee sent the Admirall into Normandy, to learne the cause of these troubles, intreating him earnestly to aduertise her without dissembling, promising to requite him, and to hold his aduertisements secret. He performed his commission speedily and exactly, and soone after, without feare of any, sent a Gentleman vnto the Queene, signifying that they of Guise were the true cause of the troubles happened within the Realm, by reason of their violent and vnlawfull government. He gaue proofes thereof, adding, that the faithfull seruants of the Crowne held it for certain, that these calamities would not cease so long as strangers gouerned the King and State. Whereupon he exhorted her to take the affaires in hand, and to giue some rest to them of the Religion, causing the Edicts made to that end to be observed.

These aduertisements produced Letters to all the Parliaments and other Iudges, to release all prisoners detained for matter of Religion, the execution whereof notwithstanding was somewhat long and difficult. There was another thing which helpt it forward: some prisoners of Blois and Tours, for the enterprise of Amboise, hauing found means to escape out of prison, wrote a ieaunting Letter vnto the Cardinall, yett full of threats, that they would come and see him with the rest that he held not, and that they were resolved to spoile him.

This man being timorous, grew more calme, whereof followed the enlargement of many prisoners throughout the Realme. Finally, they of Guise seeing themselves assaulted from diuers parts by writings (which were the forerunners of a new charge) the last of March they caused the Kings Letters to be dispatcht to all Parliaments, and other inferior Iudges, and to all forraigne Princes, intimating, that all they of the enterprise of Amboise, especially the heads, were accused of high treason, wherein they of the Religion and the Ministers were disgraced with all manner of reproaches: and withall they promised to make goodly reformations both of the State and Church. An ample answer was made vnto these Letters, and directed to the Parliaments, the which painted out them of Guise in all their colours, & required that in a lawful Assembly of the Estates they should yeeld an account of their government. The Parliament of Paris sent this answer vnto the Cardinall by an Vsher. But that of Roane thinking to do more, the Deputies which were sent to the King, were forced to retire with all speed, and did not any thing.

The ninth of April there were Letters written in the Kings name, of the same tenour: moreover, he was entreated to seize vpon certain men which were about him, being accused to be of the enterprise of Amboise. There was also a relation of the charge imposed vpon the Prince of Conde, and how he had justified himselfe. The Prince on the other side sent a Secretary of his vnto his brother, to aduertise what had past, to aske his aduice, and to vnderstand his mind. This was discouered to them of Guise, who wrote a Letter to the Prince, full of excuses, to the end they might lull him asleepe, the which he sent also vnto his brother, who made answer in general termes, for that he would not bee discouered. The Protestants during these combustions, which concerned both the State & Religion, increased in multitude, and in many places they could not containe nor content themselves with secret Assemblies. An vndiscreet zeale transported them of Valence, Montauban, and Romans, to exercise their Religion in ordinary Churches at noon day. The Lord of Clairmont, Lieutenant for the Duke of Guise in Dauphine, was of that guild an humour: and Angiron more violent. The Duke giues him commission to sup-

Kings Maiefty, and to his Mother, protefting of their fincerity, they difcouered the ground of their griefes againft the Guifens, and propounded remedies to auoid ciuill warres. C Their admonitions contained three chiefe heads: *That order might be taken for the government of the Realme, offering the King a Councell, according to the ancient conftitutions of France. That to pacifie controuerfies touching Religion, a free and holy Councell fhould be held.
That thofe of the Religion in the meane time might quietly, and with liberty of their confci-ences live in their houfes, following that which is contained in the confeffion of their Churches.*
The two brethren feeing themfelves directly charged by the Proteftants, thunder ouer againft them: they write to the King of Spaine, and to the Catholike Princes: that the Lutherans and Caluinifts are the onely authors of the troubles of France, and of the rumours of Amboife. And to the Proteftants; that fuch as were executed in diuers parts of the Realme, are onely certaine Sacramentaries, enemies to the confeffion of Ausbourg. D

A bare fhift and weak remedy to quench the fire which beganne to confume a part of the world. Hereupon Philip aduifeth them, to bring the Inquifition of Spaine into France. The priuy Councell yeelds to it, and the Parliaments allow thereof: but the Chancelor Hopital was too wife a politician: he would not fee France difguifed after the Spanifh manner. Katherine was much troubled, not knowing how to faile amidft fo many ftormes. The Conuocation of the Eftates might eclipse her authority, the reftoring of the Princes of France, incompatible with a Florentin humour: the reftitution of the Conftable, whom he hated to the death, accusing him to haue laid to King Henry, That no one of his children did refemble him, but his bafard, whom his fonne Montmorency had married. Thefe things did wonderfully afflict her. Yet would fhe gouerne and rule, fore-feeing that the could not better maintaine her greatneffe, then by the difcord of the two Houfes of Bourbon and Lorraine. She relies vpon the laft, and arming them with her authority, fhe puts the King her fonne, and her felfe, into the protection of the Duke of Guife, and the Cardinall of Lorraine. This makes them fwel both in heart and fpeech:
but there muft be a meanes found to pacifie this quarrell which concerned the Eftate, that vnder the clofke of Religion, (a goodly and ordinary pretext for great perfonages) the people might forget the vnlawfull vifurpation wherewith they were charged. They proteft therefore to employ all their meanes and th:ir friends to fuppreffe thofe that fought any alteration in Religion: hoping that when they had cut this new from the Princes of the blood, they fhould be more eafily reuenged, both of them and of the Conftables faction. As for them of the religion, fome gentlemen which made open profeflion, although they had no part in the enterprife of Amboife, were accused & fent for, to come and iuftifie themfelves before the King. They feeing that their ruine was intended, afsemble toge-from Amboife.

A Guife did oppofe, and by a long fpeech fhew that it was not fir, and that it fhould bee againft his confent. Some at the firft were amazed to fee thefe two heads in one hood thus difagree: but finding afterwards that they omitted no meanes to take the Prince, they faw that this contrariety was but counterfeit, to draw a confent from the whole Councel, to the end they might fortifie themfelves againft all euent. This irrefolution was available to the Prince, who with great dexterity efaped their fnares, and got into Bearne to the King of Nauarre his brother. They who were accustomed (as they fay) to make bread offtones, and to turne all things to their owne aduantage, began to affure the King and Queene, that without doubt the Princes retreat did argue that he was guilty: wherupon
B new Comiffions were giuen forth to leauy men, to make warre in Gafcony, whither the Marfhall of Saint Andrew (vnder colour to goe vifit his brethern) was fent to difcouer, which made thefe two Princes to ftand vpon their guard.

They had yet another tafke in hand, to fee if the Conftable were engaged in the Princes Councels, whom they thought they had already entrap. To this end they procured the Queene Mother to fend fecretly for Lewis Regnier, Seigneur of La Planch, one of the Mar-fhall of Montmorencies Councell, who being brought into her cabinet, (the Cardinall being hidden behind the hangings) fhe preft him to declare what he thought of the caufes and remedies of the prefent troubles, whereof he made an ample difcource, fhewing that they of Guife being ftangers, fhould not haue the government of the State, vnleffe they C gaue them naturall French-men, for a counterpeaze and bridle. He alfo answered at large to the accusation made againft the Prince of Conde, fhewing, that it was a meere abufe, to thinke that the enterprife of Amboife was attempted againft the Kings perfon, or to trouble the State. He then decyphered the beginning of the Houfe of Guife, and caried himfelfe fo politickly in all his answers, as he efaped from the Court, and there was no hold to be taken of the Conftable nor of his houfe.

They of the Religion apprehending by the aduice of many of the Nobility, that their ruine approached, if they did not provide fpeedily for their affaires, after they had recommended themfelves humbly vnto God, they refolved to call themfelves into the armes of the Princes of the blood, as fathers, tutors, and defenders of the innocency of the poore D afflicted, being called by the lawes of the Country to thofe charges, during the minority of Kings. For this effect certaine fpeciall men were deputed, to goe to the King of Na-uarre, and Prince of Conde being at Nerac, to whom they reprefented (with all their meanes) an ample declaration of all the wrongs done by the Houfe of Guife to the King and Realme, befeeching the faid Princes, to take fome lawfull courfe to deliuer the King, and to maintaine the State. Being hereby much confirmed in their refolution, to acquit themfelves of their duties for the reliefe of France, they began to fet hand to worke. Among other agents, the Prince of Conde fent a Balque called Sagne, to many Noblemen, to entreat them not to faile him at need. He receiued answer from the Conftable and the Vidame of Chartres, and came to Court, where he deliuered fome Letters. Attending

E his difpatch, he bewrayed his charge vnto one Capitaine Bonual, who hauing difcouered him to them of Guife, perfuaded him, and brought him backe prifoner to Fontainebleau, where the Vidames letters being read, whereby he promifed the Prince to maintaine his iufte quarrell againft all men, except the King, his brethern and the Queenes, whom they fent to apprehend at Paris, and committed him to the Baftile, where hee continued with great rigours vntill his death. They found no great matter againft the Conftable, or at the leaft they made no fhew of it, fearing to haue too many irons in the fire at once. Sagne payed for his prating, and they drew from him all that he knew, and more too. His confeffion vpon the racke made them of Guife to haften their defignes: who provided for the frontiers of Lorraine, and caufed the old bands to come out of Piedmont and Daul-F phine, to march downe the riuer of Loire, writing to all them of their faction.

The Queene Mother who feared much to be fupplanted in her authority: by the ad-uice of the Chancelor and Admirall (whom fhe feemed to heare willingly) refolved to propound vnto the Councell, that it was neceffary the King fhould call an Affembly of all the Princes, Noblemen, Knights of the Order and men of authority of his Realme, to provide fome meanes to pacifie the troubles which they did hold to grow efpecially by reafon of the perfecution for Religion. They of Guife were well pleaed with this refolution, thinking they had found a fnaie to entrap the King of Nauarre and his brother: and hoping also for that most of them which should be of this Assembly were of their faction) there should be nothing concluded to their prejudice : and finally, that this expedient should breake off the Convocation of the Estates, and settle their affaires. They began to write Letters in the Kings name, entreating them all to make their appearance at Fontainebleau the fifteenth of August, to that effect. They of Guise did also write their Letters full of good hopes and promises. The King did write particularly to the King of Navarre, entreating him to assist, with his brother, and those Noblemen that were about him. But vnder-hand they of Guise by the means of some secret seruants, stayed the King of Navarres iourney, contrary to the aduice of the Constable, and many Noblemen, who said, that there was then good means offered to expell them of Guise, and to restore the lawfull government of the Realme.

The Constable better resolved, thinking the Princes would assist, arised with eight hundred horse, and by this troop makes the Lorraines to shew him a good countenance. At the opening of the Assembly, the Admirall presents a petition to the King for the Protestants, who required to haue Temples granted them, and free exercise of Religion throughout the whole Realme. Thereupon Charles of Marillac, Archbishop of Vienna, shewed with so great liberty of speech, the necessity to assemble a nationall Council to remedy these controuersies growne for Religion ; and a Parliament to order the government of France, as he furnished but few dayes after his Oration. The Admirall touched the cause of Religion and State more vehemently, taxing by inuectiues such as giuing the King guards vpon guards, entertained him in distrust of his subiects, and his subiects in hatred of their King.

As they had made shew to like of this Assembly, so they seemed to allow of a Parliament. They appoint it first at Meaux, and afterward at Orleans the tenth of December, and the Synod for the Clergy at Paris the twentieth of Ianuary following, to determine of what should be expedient to be treated of in a generall Council, whereof they gaue them hope. But as they had vnder-hand with-drawne the Princes from comming to this Assembly, so must they make them vnwilling to be present at the Parliament. To this intent those of Guise in the Kings name, command the companies of ordinary soldiers, to be ready the twentieth of September : they lodge them in such sort as those whom they suspected, had them in front, in flanke, and behind them, and spies likewise to discouer them : and they giue charge to the Commanders to cut all them in pieces they should find marching to ioyne with the Princes. If their forces were not sufficient to diuert the Prince of Conde, whom they knew to be more active, and to endure lesse : they doe also procure Letters from the King to the King of Navarre, whereby hee doth charge the Prince to haue attempted against the Estate of France, and to haue sought to seize vpon some of the good townes of the Realme. Hee desires him therefore to send him his brother with a good and sure guard : if not, he himselfe will fetch him well accompanied.

The answer made by the King of Navarre and his brother, encountering the Lorraines with their owne armies, holding them guilty of the same crimes wherewith they charged them, made them to change their note. They find a second commandement, whereby the King giues his word to the Princes to come in safely, he promisseth to heare all mens admonitions and iustifications willingly : to receive them according to their Estates and dignities : not to disturbe any Prince in his Religion, whereof he now made open profession : and that they should retorne when they pleased, free from injury or violence.

In the beginning, the King of Navarre shewed much courage : but hearing that the affaires of Lyons and Dauphiné, had not succeeded so well as they expected, he beganne to grow cold, and yet the Deputies of the Prouinces did offer to send their troops for his preservation, before the men at armes of France should seize vpon the passages : or if that it were not held expedient, they promised to rise in al parts to fortifie him, at the Assembly of the Estates. He had about him a Chancellor called Amaury Bonchard, who was Master of Requests to the King. This man in the beginning had solicited him much to giue care to the admonitions and complaints which were made vnto him from diuers parts of the Realme; but hearing that the enterprise made vpon Lyons, by young Malherbe had not bene successfull, hee wrote secretly vnto the King, beseeching him to call the Prince of Conde away from the King of Navarre his brother, for that hee did daily importune him to attempt many things against his Maiesties Ministers, & to trouble the

A the Realme at the instigation of Lutherans, and Preachers come from Geneva, wherunto he added, that as yet his matter had not giuen care vnto them : but it was to be feared that by long importunitie he might be wonne ; whereof he would not faile to aduertise the King, being his naturall subiect, and most humble servant, and one of his ministers of Iustice. Hee did also write vnto the Cardinall, promising to tell him one day many things of great consequence, which might not be written. Finally, hee promised to giue him means to arraigne the Princes, and the greatest Noble-men of the Realme. Some thought that Iarnac who had quite forsaken the Princes, with Sainde-foy his brother (before Lieutenant of the Prince of Condes company of men at armes) had practised Bouchard to write thus much.

B And to draw the King of Navarre his brother on, the Cardinall of Bourbon, (a Prince not well able to discouer the cunning practises of the enemies of his house) is expressly sent vnto them. They march, and are no sooner come to Limoges, but seven or eight hundred Gentlemen well appointed, doe visit them. The Deputies of Prouinces offer them six thousand foot, Gascons and Poiteuins : foure thousand horse and four out of Languedoc : as many or more out of Normandy, and the other Prouinces promise to rise on all sides, to fortifie them at his assembly of States : so as it will please the King of Navarre to declare himselfe Protector of the King and Realme, against them of Guise. But the Cardinall of Armagnac, Elscars, Iarnac, and some other Councillors of the same mould, had seruants to their master, propounded so many dangers, so many inconveniences vpon their comming to Court with force, (and why should they not resist their enemies force) as he sent backe all his company, and countermanded such as came, promising notwithstanding to employ himselfe courageously in the Parliament for the good of all France.

C Having therupon made them great Declarations, and intreated him that at least the Prince of Conde might remaine behinde, to hold their enemies in suspense, but they answered their innocencie should suffice, and that it was no easie matter to put Princes of the blood to death : which if they did they would take it in good part : that God had many other means to deliuer France, and not to make them the occasion of the ruine of so many good men, which desired to ioyne with them. The Noblemen and Gentlemen which did accompany the Princes, being ready to retire, protested that being thus abandoned of their heads, they hoped that God would raise them vp others, to free them from the oppression of tyrants : these words were spoken in the presence of some secret seruants, who aduertised them of Guise. In the meane time, hearing that the Princes were vpon the way, they sent the Lord of Monpesat, one of their confident seruants, to forbid the Princes in the Kings name, that comming to the Court, they should not enter into any walled towne belonging to the King, vpon paine of rebellion, and to be held guilty of high treason. They were now compact in by their enemies forces, led vnder the command of the Marshall of Termes. The Cardinall of Armagnac, Delears, and such other bad seruants, made the King of Navarre beleeeue, that this verball defence of Monpesat, was but a brauado of them of Guise, the which the King and his mother would disauow.

The Princes hauing past Chastelleraut, they were more certaine of the future danger, and perswaded to keepe the high wayes for feare of ambushes which were laid to kill them. They had also means offered them to recouer Angiers, and then Normandy, where they should want nothing : yet they continued constant in their first resolution, marching by small iourneys, and it seemed that one of the brethren was a Prouost to lead the other prisoner.

F They aduertise the King, that the Lutherans of Orleans praisted to subuert his estate, as they had of late attempted at Lyons. To assure themselves of the towne, and to punish some which were noted in the booke of death, whose confiscation vvas good, the Guisens first send Sipiere, Lieutenant to the Prince of Roch-sur-yon, gouernor of Orleans, to disarme the people, and to fill the houses suspected, with men of warre : they call together the Nobilitie and men at armes of France : then they conduct the King thither, to make his entry with the Queene, the 17 of October. The Princes armed by their innocencie, arised on All-Saints Eue, and passe from the Potterean to the Kings lodging vpon the Estappe, betwix two ranks of armed men. The Cardinall of Bourbon, and and the Prince of Roch-sur-yon receiue them. Nor a Courtier nor a Bourgeois meetes A them : and for their first affront, when as they sought to enter on horse-backe, according to the vsuall custome, they were answered with a brauado : The great gates doe not open. The King attended them: hauing done their duties to his Maiestie, and no man aduancing to bid them welcome, I am (said he to the Prince of Conde) aduerstised from diuers places, that you haue made many enterprises against me, and the Estate of my Realme, and therefore I haue sent for you, to know the truth from your owne mouth.

Lewis iustifies himselfe so plainly, and doth charge his enemies so directly, as the King himselfe could not impute their accusations, but to the wilfulness of his Vnclcs against his owne blood. But he was possessed by them, and suffered himselfe to bee easily B abused. So he commands Chauigny, Captaine of his Guard (sent by them of Guise) to seize vpon the Prince. Chauigny flus him vp in a house hard by, before the which they make a fort of Bricke, flanked with canoniers, and furnished with field-pieces to defend the approaches. The King of Nauarre desired to haue the keeping of his brother, and that he would answer for him life for life, the which was refused, and withall they tooke his Guard from him, and set watches ouer him continually. The Lady of Roy his mother-in-law, was likewise caried from Anici, a house of hers in Picardy, prisoner to Saint Germaine in Lay, by Renauart and Carrouges. Ierolme Gressot Bayliffe of Orleans, (vnder colour that his father had bene Chancellor to the deceased King of Nauarre, and hee an affectionate seruant to the Princes, accused also to bee the protector of the Lutherans in C Orleans) was likewise imprisoned two dayes after the Princes arrivall. La Haye Councillor in the Court of Parliament at Paris, who did solicit the Princes affaires, was also in trouble. Aumary Bouchart, Master of Requests vnto the King, and Chancellor to the Nauarrois, was sent prisoner to Melun, with others brought from Lions, to haue proofes against the Prince, whose tryall they did hasten with all speed. But they meant no harme to Bouchart, he had already retired himselfe, and blabbed by his Letters to the Cardinall of Lorraine, to the preiudice of his master.

Neither the informations taken at Lions by the Marshall Saint Andre, nor the prisoners at Melun, were sufficient to make the Prince a spectacle vpon a scaffold. They send for the President of Thou, Bartholomew Fay, and James Viole, Councillors of the Parliament at Paris, to examine the Prince vpon the point of high Treason : and if this piece of battery were not of force, then to touch him vpon the point of religion, and to condemne him for heresie : the Prince propounds diuers causes of recusatation, and appeales from them to the King. The priuy Councill reiects his appeale, and decrees, that vpon paine of high treason, the Prince should answer before these Commissioners: he answers, purgeth himselfe clearly of all crime, and aduowes his religion freely.

By this confession, iudgement was giuen against him, and he condemned to die : a day appointed the tenth of December, to countenance the beginning of the Parliament. They only note the Earle of Sancerre, the Chancellor, and the Councillor Asterier, which did not pollute their soules with the approbation of this vnjust sentence. This E sentence should in the end cause the ruine of all that were accused or suspected, as well for matter of State, as Religion. And for the execution of this designe, the forces of the Realme diuided into foure, marched already into diuers Prouinces vnder the command of the Duke of Aumale, and the Marshalls of Saint Andre, of Brissac, and of Termes. And with the same fury the King of Nauarre should bee confined into the Castle of Loches : the Constable and his children to the great tower at Bourges : the Admirall and some principals, into one at Orleans, the which was afterwards called the Admirale, neare to that of Saint Aignan.

But behold, there are two more violent and more brutish Councillors, Brissac and Saint Andre, they hold opinion, that to auoid all trouble in giuing the King of Nauarre F any guards, they should put him to death. They seek to poison him at a banquet : then they resolute to kill him coming from the King : but neither succeeding, they perswade the King to stab him, and to spill his owne blood, the which God would not permit : for the King hauing a dagger vnder his gowne, and growing into bitter tearmes against the King of Nauarre, he answered so discreetly in the presence of them of Guise, as hee escaped. There was another designe to kill him going a hunting. The Constable had not yett falne into their snares, yett they had sent out Commissions to seize vpon the Lord of Danuile

A Danuile his second sonne. As for the Admirall and his two brethren, their Declaration to be of the Religion, was sufficient to condemne them ; for the effectual accomplishing whereof, the King commanded a generall assembly of his order, to be held (all excuses set apart) vpon Christmas day following. During the which, there was a confession of the faith set downe by the Doctors of Sorbonne, which no man that had any feeling of religion would haue signed.

The day being come, this confession should be presented by the King himselfe, who should signe it first, requiring euery one to doe the like, with an oath to obserue all the Articles inuolubly, and to oppose themselves against all them that should contradict B them without any exception. And whosoever should refuse, hee should be presently degraded from his Order, and from all his estates, dignities, and honors, and should be burnt the next day.

The like should be done among the Cardinals by a generall assembly the same day, to entrap the Cardinall of Chastillon. After which, all the Princes and Noblemen of the Realme should signe this confession, and then all the Gentlemen and Officers of the Kings house. The Chancellor had commandement to doe the like to all the Masters of Requests, Secretaries, and other Officers following the Court. The Queene-mother undertooke to caule all her Ladies and Waiting-women to signe it. After which they should send to all the Parliaments, and other iurisdiccions to require the like confession of faith, and if C any one did refuse, to be burnt without any other proceeding. The 10 of December approached, and the Deputies for the Estates arriue by degrees. They presently forbid them in the Kings name, vpon paine of death, not to moue any thing concerning Religion, his Maiesty hauing referred his controuersie to the Councill : which the Pope (being then Pius the 4, successor to Theatin lately deceased) appointed to begin at Trent, at Easter following. Those of Languedoc amongst the rest, came furnished with ample instructions both for the State and Religion : but they found means to stop their mouths, seizing both on their persons and instructions.

The ninth day of the moneth, they giue commandement to the King of Nauarre, to be ready to goe to horse-backe : their meaning was to carie him to Loches, whilst they D should present the Prince his brother vpon a mournfull scaffold, to the people of Orleans. But O God ! we haue heard with our eares, and our Fathers haue declared, the worke which thou hast done in their time, and in the old time before them. Behold the King is taken during Euen-song with a great fainting, continued with a paine in his head at the left eare, accompanied with a Feuer. The Guisens notwithstanding, sent forth many commissions to leauy men, and command the Marshall of Termes to ioyne with the Spaniard, who tooke the way of Bayonne to spoile the countrie of Bearne, and then to assaile all those whom he should finde to haue fauoured the King of Nauarre, and the enterprise of Amboile.

It may be they would haue sold their liues dearly. Seven or eight hundred Gentle- E men goe speedily to horse, followed with five or six thousand foot, resolute, when the Marshall should passe Limoges, to hem him in betwixt two riuers. He hath some intelligence thereof, and retires to Poitiers. This designe being made frustrate, the Kings sickness increaseth, those of Guise meane to proceed with violence, and to murder the King of Nauarre. God raised vp the Cardinall of Tournon, who (thinking to doe a greater act) prevents it. He aduiseeth to attend the Constables coming, with his children and Nephewes to the end (said he) that killing one, we saue not the rest, who afterwards may doe more harme then the Princes. The departure of the Kings health, made them of Guise to set a good countenance on a bad cause. And the Queene-mother seeking to hold her authority by supporting them of Guise, calls the King of Nauarre into her closet : as he was F entring, a Lady of the Court said to him in his eare : My Lord, deny the Queene Mother nothing that she shall demand, else you are dead. So he signed what shee desired : A grant of the right which hee might pretend to the government of the King and regency of the Realme, and his reconciliation with them of Guise. Vpon this grant, shee promisseth to make him the Kings Lieutenant in France, both for peace of warre, and nothing should passe but by his aduite, and of the other Princes, who should be respected according to the degree they held in France.

In the meane time death presseth the King : and those of the house of Guise shue vp in their their lodging, and having possession of three or fourescore thousand franks which remained yet of the treasure, came not forth in two dayes, vntill they were assured of the King of Nauarre, who hauing embraced one another, all quarrels seemed to be laid vnder foot. In the end this Catarre with a Feuer brought the King to his graue, the 14. of December, hauing giuen no time, by reason of his yong age, & the shortnesse of his raigne, to discouer any thing in him, but only some shewes of courtely, continency and modelic: vertues which his Vncles had easily corrupted by the tast of cruelty, which began to take an impression in his soule, as they did in his successors: little lamented for his person, but of such as possessing him in his nonage, grounded the greatnesse of their vilsed estates vpon his life, to ouerthrow the fundamentall lawes of the Realme, whatfoeuer B some wretched Writers doe babble, whose soules haue beene as vendible, as the Guisens armes were then new in our France.

This death gaue life to the Prince of Conde, opened the prisons for such as had beene committed for this cause, reuiued an infinit number, whom the Princes condemnation had drawne into danger, countermanded the troopes of Spaine, which aduanced towards Bearne, disappointed Montluc of the Earldome of Armagnac: the which he had deuoured in hope, by the promises of the house of Guise, and brought many of their most secret feruants to the King of Nauarres deuotion.

CHARLES the NINTH,

The 61 French King.

OW we fall from a Feuer into a Frensic. Wee shall see vnder another pupill King, of cleuen yeares of age, raigning in the wrath of God, the heauens to powre vpon this Realme, all the curses, dauntly promised against a Nation, whose iniquities he will punish in his displeasure. A raigne cursed D in the city, and cursed in the field, cursed in the beginning, and cursed in the ending. Mortalitie, sword and famine haue followed it euen vnto the end. The heauens about are of brasse, and the earth vnder it of iron: the carkases are a prey to the birds of the aire, and to the beasts of the field, and no man troubles them. They suffer nothing but wrongs and robberies, and no man relieth them. Men marry wiues but others sleepe with them. They sow and plant, but the nations whom they haue not knowne deuoure the fruit. To conclude, there is nothing but cursing, terrour, and desolation.

A Parliament
held at Orléans.

The 23 of December the Parliament began, and that which the Queene-mother most desired, the confirmation of her Regency, allowed by the Chancellor, and afterward by those that were the speakers. John Quintin of Autun a Doctor of the Cannon-law at Paris, for the Clergie: the Lord of Rochfort, Damoiseil of Commercy, for the Nobility: Angelo then Advocate at Bourdeaux, and afterwards Councillor there, for the people. The Chancellor propounded many Articles touching the meanes to pacifie the troubles, and the remedies for that which concerned the estate and Religion, and to discharge the Kings debts.

Quintin would haue the Ministers of the Church inforced to discharge their duties, not altering any thing in the reformation thereof, the which cannot erre: not to suffer any other then the Catholike, Apokolike, and Romish Religion. Against such as demanded Temples, and against the deliuerer of their Perisition (meaning the Admirall) (said hee) they should declare him an Hereticke, and proceed according to the Cannon and ciuill constitutions, for the prohibiting of such bookes as were not allowed by the Doctors of Sorbonne, and for the rooting out of Lutherans and Caluinists. Rochfort did speake against the iurisdiccions vsurped by the Clergie, against the disorders growne among the Nobles, against the wrong done to the true Nobilitie, against the confusion growne con-

A confiscations for matter of Religion, against seditious, of the meanes to order the Clergy, and to containe them in their vocation; for the reliefe of the people, especially in matters of Iustice, the which should bee reduced to a certaine number of Officers. Ange insisted much vpon the ignorance, couerousnesse, and dissolution of the Clergy, whence proceeded the greatest part of these present scandals.

The next day, vpon the Admiralls complaint to the Queene-mother, Quintin excused himselfe vpon the instructions which were giuen him in writing, and in his second speech he did moderate his plea to the Admiralls content. The Estates continued their conferences, and made the beginning of this yeare famous, by some prouision for matters of religion, wherby it was forbidden vpon paine of death, not to reproach religion, or to another, and commandement giuen to all Iudges and Officers, to set at liberty all such as had beene imprisoned for the said religion. Many other good and necessary lawes were published, but with more confusion then profit. And in truth, a number of lawes ill obserued, peruert iustice, and giues the people occasion not to regard them. But when they come seriously to handle the discharge of the Kings debts, and that the Nauarrois submits himselfe to restitution; if it be found that he hath received any extraordinary gifts: those of Guise and others, which could not make the like offer, found meanes to frustrate this proposition, by the referring of the Estates to Pontoise, hoping hereafter to finde some device to prevent their yeelding vp of any account. And in truth all these assemblies vanished away like smoke, without any other resolution, then to lay the paiement of the Kings debts vpon the Clergy. The King of Nauarre, the other Princes of the blood, and the Constable, seeing themselves held to no end in Court, and that for matters of State, they had but the leauings of them of Guise, it made them trusse vp their baggage to retire, with an intent to crosse the regency of the Queene-mother, and the Guisens authority. To frustrate this designe, he makes a new accord with the Nauarrois, she doth associate him in the government of the Realme, and concludes with him, that leauing the title of Regent, he should be called Lieutenant general to his Maiestie, in all his Countries and Dominions. But this was but a government in paper: these strong factions of two parties, shall briefly assayle one another, causing great wounds within this Realme, from whence D we haue seene the blood flow euen to these later dayes.

Soone after, the Prince of Conde being called to Court, he came from La Fere in Picardie to Fontainebleau, and the day after his arriual, being the 13 of March, he came into the Councell, where the King in the presence of them all declared, that he had done him right for his innocency, suffering him to pursue a second declaration to the same effect, in the Court of Parliament at Paris, whither the Prince went within few dayes.

This treaty did preiudice them of Guise, and in the end, peace must needs send them from Court to liue at home like priuate men. They had in their conceits, the argument of a new Tragedy, the which we shall shortly see played vpon this Theater. The Protestants multiplyed, and the King of Nauarre supported them openly. The Prince of Conde (who pursued the sentence of his iustification in the Parliament) and the Admirall, had preaching in their chambers. This sring is strained po high. They publish generally, that these preachings will be the overthrow of the ancient Religion within this realme: and particularly among the duke of Guisles partisans. That vnder colour of rendering accounts, and of extraordinary gifts, they would displace them, hauing managed the most important affaires of the realme, for the space of forty yeares. The Constable holding for a Maxime, That the change of Religion brings an alteration in the State, begins to applaud them: the Duke of Montpensier, and the Prince of Roch-fur-yon, Princes of the blood of Bourbon, vpon this nice point of new religion, ioyne willingly with them. The people conforming themselves commonly after the patterne of great men. Great personages F frowne one at another, so doe the people: one beares the name of Huguenot implicitly: another cannot endure that of Papist: in truth, turbulent and factious names. From hence sprung diuers mutinies, at Beauvais, Amiens, Pontoise, and else where, where the weaker was forced to yeeld to the stronger.

These new broyles caused an Edict to be made at Fontainebleau (where the Court remained, attending the renewing of the Estates intermitted) prohibiting these mutuall reproaches of Papist and Huguenot: to search no man in his house, nor to retaine any one in prison for his religion. From thence the King made his voyage to Reims, and was solemnly lennly crowned by the Cardinall of Lorraine. The Parliament at Paris (not able to digest this last Edict) informs the King, that diuerſity of religion was incompatible in an estate: reiects this pretended liberty of conſcience, and beſeecheth his Maieſty to force his ſubiectes to make open profeſſion of the Catholike, Apoſtolike and Romiſh religion, vpon ſuch paines as ſhould be aduiſed on in Councell.

Now blowes a contrary wind, the which aſſembles (in the Parliament at Paris) all the Princes, Noblemen, and others of the Priuy Councell, with all the chambers, to the end they might freely, and with all purity of conſcience deliberate, aduſe and conclude vpon a matter ſo much importing the good and quiet of the Realme. This aſſembly brought forth the Edict, which they called of July, an Edict confirming the decrees of former Kings, commanding his ſubiectes vpon paine of death, to liue hereafter in peace, without iniuries, without reproaches for any reſpect of religion, and beliefe. But ſee the fire-brand of ciuill warres, which now we handle. All religion, faith or doctrine, other then that of the Church of Rome, was baniſhed the Realme: aſſemblies of Proteſtants forbidden; and they condemned to ſeek their abroad elſe-where.

Some what to temper this bitterneſſe, they limit their exile, by the determination of a generall Councell, or to the next aſſembly of the Prelates of the Realme, at Poiſſy. And at the ſame inſtant the ſentence of the Prince of Conde innocency was pronounced in Parliament, by the Preſident Baillet, ſitting in their ſcarlet gowns, the doores open, and all the chambers aſſembled, the King of Nauarre being preſent, with the Duke of Montpenſier, the Prince of Roche-sur-yon: the dukes of Guiſe, Neuers and Montmorency, the Cardinals of Bourbon, Lorraine, Guiſe, Chaffillon and other Noblemen: his remedy referred againſt whom it ſhould appertaine, as the reputation and quality of his perſon and dignity ſhould require. The King calling the Princes and Noblemen to Saint Germain in Laye, he cauſed the Prince of Conde, and the D. of Guiſe to embrace each other, promiſing to continue good friends. The Eſtates remitted to Pontoife, hauing produced no other effect but a new approbation of the Regency for the Queene-mother, in whoſe fauour the Admirall laboured to the Eſtates, relying vpon the great aſſurances he had giuen him, to procure much good for them of his party, and the King of Nauarre, by reaſon of the reſuſals which the Deputies made to paſſe this Article, declared vnto them by mouth, that he had renounced his right, and ſome meanes to open the coffers of the Clergy, for the payment of the Kings debts: they began to proceed to the conference of Poiſſy. For the Catholikes, came the Cardinals of Bourbon, Lorraine, Armagnac, Guiſe, Chaffillon and Tournon, aſſiſted by a great number of Prelates and Doctours of Diuinity, and Cannon law. The Pope doubting leſt they ſhould make ſome conſolutions prejudiciall to his authority, ſent the Cardinall of Ferrara his Legat into France, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt any alteration in religion, and to haue the cauſe referred to the councell of Trent, the which he had publiſhed.

Poiſſy.

Theodore Beza, Peter Martyr a Florentin, Auguſtin Marlorat, Francis of Saint Paul, Raimond, Iohn Farel, and others, to the number of twelue miniſters, and two and twenty Deputies of the Proteſtant Churches, offer a Petition vnto the King, at his firſt entry, beſeeching him, that the Prelates might examine the confeſſion of their faith, whereof they had conference, ſince the month of Iune, to impugne it if they had thought good at their firſt aſſembly; and vpon their obiections, to heare the defences of the ſaid Churches, by the mouths of their Deputies. That the King ſhould bee Preſident in this conference with his Councell, and that the Clergy, (for that they are parties) ſhould not take vpon them the authority of Iudges. That all controuerſies might be determined by the Word of God. That two Secretaries choſen on either ſide, might examine the diſputations that were daily written, and that they ſhould not be received but ſigned by either party.

Before they entred into open conference, the Cardinall of Lorraine would treat priuately with Beza before the Queene-mother: and hauing heard him eſpecially vpon the Lords Supper. I am greatly contented (ſaid he) with that I vnderſtand: and hope aſſuredly that the iſſue of this conference will be happy, proceeding with mildneſſe and reaſon. It began the ninth of September. The King did briefly touch the cauſes of this aſſembly, cauſing his Chancelor to deliver them more at large. The Cardinall of Tournon in the behalfe of the Prelates, demands the Chancelors propoſition in writing, and leaſure to conſider thereof:

A thereof: the which is reſuſed. Beza with his companions brought in by the Duke of Guiſe, appointed to that charge with the Lord of la Ferre Viſcay Captaine of the Guard, makes an ample collection of all the Articles of the Chriſtian doctrine, expounds thoſe which are in controuerſie, toucheth by the way the diſcipline of the Church, proteſts that both he, his companions, and all thoſe that aduow them, deſire nothing but the reformation of the Church: that they will liue and die in the Kings protection: deteſt thoſe that ſeek to ſequeſter themſelves, and pray to God for the proſperity of his Maieſty, of his mother, his Councell, and his Eſtate: then he preſents vnto the King the confeſſion of the Proteſtant Churches, and deſires the conference may be made concerning it. The King hauing receiued it by the ſaid Captaine of his Guard, delivered it vnto the Prelates. The point vpon the Reall preſence in the Sacrament had troubled them. They conclude, that the Cardinall of Lorraine aſſiſted by Clande Eſpenſus, and ſome other Doctours, not by way of diſputation, but not to faile of a reply, ſhould answer to two points onely, of the Church, and the Lords Supper. And the ſixteenth of the ſaid moneth he makes his oration, and diſcourſeth at large of theſe two points, and then he intreats the King to continue conſtant in the Religion of his Predeceſſors, and to ſummon the Miniſters to ſubſcribe to that which he had delivered, before they paſſed to the other Articles: otherwiſe to deny them audience, and to ſend them out of the Realme, which could allow but of one faith, one law, one King.

C The four and twentieth day, Beza made answer to the Cardinall, diſputed with the Doctours Eſpenſus and Sainctes, and the 26 day, hee treated with him againe touching the Lords Supper: the other Miniſters replied likewiſe to ſome obiections of other Doctours of Sorbonne, and finally all was conuerted into priuate conferences, without any reſolution or conſolution that might end theſe troubles. The Prelates ſent backe their Doctours in October, and referred all reformation to the Councell at Trent, whither the Cardinall of Lorraine and Doctour Sainctes went: of whom we will ſpeake a word by the way, ſeeing it fits with the matter. We finde by a fragment originall, drawne out of the writings of a Chanoin of Reims, and publiſhed in the year 1598, by the means of Perrequin Maior of Langres: That the Kings Ambaſſadors at the Councell of Trent were (amongſt other inſtructions, ſigned Charles, Katherine, Alexander, which was Henry, the third, Anthony, and vnderneath it, Charles of Bourbon, Francis of Lorraine, Montmorency, M. Hoſpital, S. Andre and Francis of Montmorency) charged to demand, "To haue the ceremonies corrected and all other things whereby the people might be abuſed, vnder a ſhew of piety. That the cup might be reſtored in all Communions, within his Realme and all his Dominions: That all adminiſtrations of Sacraments to the Laity, might be done in the French tongue. That in the Pariſh Churches, and not Collegiall, Cathedral, or Monacall, the uſe of the Proſe ſhould be inſtituted according to the firſt and holy inſtitution: that during the high Maſſe in Pariſh Churches, the Word of God ſhould be read and interpreted at the houre accuſtomed, with the catechizing of youth: to the

E end that all men might be inſtructed, of that which they ſhould beleue, and how they ſhould liue according to God, & that in ſtead of the Proſe, publick prayers ſhould be made in the French tongue: that without changing any thing of the ſeruice of the church, in the Latine tongue: ſome houres ſhould be appointed, as well at Maſſe as at Euenſong, whereby it might be lawfull to ſing Pſalmes in the open Church, peruſed firſt and corrected by the Biſhops & ordinary ſuperiours, and approved by famous vniuerſities or provinciall councells. And alſo to complaine of the vnchaſt life of the Clergy men, which breed ſo many diſorders & corruptions among the people. Theſe articles concluded, had without doubt made the way to reduce many realmes & prouinces to the Vnion of the Church, appeaſed the troubles of this realme, ſatiſfied many troubled conſciences, and prevented a greater ſchiſme. But hatred and humane paſſions makes vs yet to attend a ſtroake from heauen to draw vs ioynly into the fold of one vniuerſall Biſhop. Thus the conference at Poiſſy hauing not yielded that remedy, which was expected, for the common miſchiefe, now diuers factions grow in France. The Proteſtants, which before had by many petitions required temples, for the exerciſe of their religion, they now take them by force in many places, and without further attending the approbation of their demands, they aſſemble at diuers times. and in the suburbs of Saint Marceau: they ring the alarm bell at S. Medard, they wound, A kill, take and hang many. Gabaston amongst others, Knight of the watch, to appeale the people, lost his head. To make some Edict for the pacifying of these broiles, the Queenemother assembles the chiefe of the Parliament, with the Princes of the blood, Noblemen, Councillors of the Priuy Councell, Masters of Requests, and other men of authori-tie, and to give some contentment to those that with vehemency required places and Temples for their assemblies with liberty.

The chiefe Catholics, especially those of Guise, disallow of this course, they accuse the Queenes facilitie, and murmure openly against the King of Nauarre, the Prince of Conde, the Admirall and his brethren. These crosse them with an enterprise, made to ca-rie the duke of Orleans (the Kings yonger brother) into Lorraine, so as they retire from Court: the duke of Nemours, who had played the principall part in this tragedy, saues himselfe, and returnes not before the ciuill warres haue fired all France. This new change seemes to draw the Regent to the Protestants party, she desires to know their forces, and their means. They give her a List of two thousand an hundred & fifty Protestant Churches, the Deputies wherof offered their goods and persons to the King to withstand the forces of them of Guise, who called the Spaniard into France.

The Guisens absence made easie the grant of that famous Edict, which beares vnto this day the name of January: the which disannulling that of Iuly, gaue liberty to the Protestants the fouenteenth of the said moneth, to assemble without the townes, and provided that all men might liue in peace one with another. But alas in stead of peace it shall breed horrible confusions. The difficultie was in the execution. The Parliaments publish it as slowly as may be, and that of Dion, neuer. Those of Guise and the Constable ioynd with them, and diuerted them by their authority. But they had another string to their bow, which preuailed according to their desires. They employ the Ambassador of Spaine, the Cardinall of Tournon, Elcars, and some other household flatterers to the King of Nauuarre, to perswade him, that carying himselfe a Neuter, and causing the Prince his sonne to goe once to the Masse, the King of Spaine would giue him the Realme of Sardinia, in recompence of that of Nauarre. The Pope likewise confirms him in his hope. This was properly to conceiue a mountaine, and bring forth a Moufe, and to take from him all means to recouer his Realme of Nauarre, when he should attempt it. So as being drawne by those Spanishe and Lorraine practises, hee estrangeth himselfe by little and little from the Protestants, sollicit the Queene his wife to returne into the bosome of the Romish Church, and so to instruct her children. Vpon her refusal, there growes a breach betwixt them, and he falls in loue with one of the Queene-mothers maids. In the meane time, shee entertained the Prince of Conde and the Admirall, whom shee knew to be yet strong within the Realme, maintained the Protestants in their peaceable exercise, and for that end commanded euery gouernour to retire to his government. Shee would haue sent the Prince of Conde into Guicenne (whose presence without doubt had stayed that horrible and cruell shedding of blood) whereby Montuc vpon his refusal opened the veins of a body wonderfully afflicted. But so passeth the world, euery one would gouerne the King in his turne, and the Regent by little and little did vndermine the foundation of the Edict, to ouerthrow the whole body. Morcouer, those of Guise were desirous to returne to their places, neither had they retired but to get better footing. They are now strong enough, hauing drawne the King of Nauarre from the Protestant part. They march towards Paris, and passing from Iainville to Vassy, they dispersed about twelue hundred persons, which were assembled for their exercise: murder two and forty, wound many to the death, lead away prisoners, and sacke the towne.

This was the first fire-brand of the ciuill warres which were now abreding. This ad-puts the protestants in alarm, and makes them to leaue the trowell and the hammer, F which they employed in many places, to build their Temples, euery one scowres his harnesse, euery one prouides him armes and horses. Their Churches and Nobility complaine, and demand iustice of the King. The Regent giues them good words: and the King of Nauarre rebukes them, and chargeth them to be the first motiues of this trouble.
They haue (saith hee) cast stones against my brother the D. of Guise, hee could not retaine the fury of his followers. And whosoever shall touch the end of my brothers finger, shall touch my whole bodie. The arrual of the Duke of Guise, the Constable, the Marshall of Britain,

A Montmorency. Termes, and afterwards of the K. of Nauarre to Paris, drawes the Prince of Conde and the three brethren of Coligni likewise thither. But the stronger caries it.
They were too weake to incounter the counsels which were held daily at the Constables houfe. To vnderstand what forces the Prince had within the city, they make a proclamaon: That all men of what quality so euer, should depart within foure and twenty houres. So the Prince retires to Meaux, and eals together such as might by their armes force his enemies to some agreement. The Queene-mother (seeing the Guisens fortified within Paris, and seized vpon the Kings person, whom they caused to come from Fontainebleau to Paris, writes vnto the Prince, and recommends vnto him, both the mother and the children.

B The Princes intention was to come to Court, when as newes is brought him, that they possesse the King, and bring him to Paris. He therefore leaues Meaux to goe & seize vpon Orleans: and at the same instant, either faction assures it selfe by diuers surpris of places, exposed to their wils: the Constable catcheth the houles of Ierusalem vpon Saint Iames his ditch, and of Pepincourt without S. Anthonies gate, to bee beaten downe, where the Protestants did assemble for their exercise, and in all other places, the people transported with the like humour, vse extreme violence. The Protestants grow bitter, and in all places where they had might, reuenge themselves on the Churches, images, priests, and religious houles. To conclude, euery towne thus diuided, prepares a wretched Theater, to act a mournfull and bloody Tragedy. Yet euery one iustifies his cause. Without the C Realme the Prince produceth the Regents letters in an open assembly of the Princes of Germany. Within the Realme, he exhorts them of his party to prouide men and mony, and by an association made with the Noblemen, and Gentlemen of his party, hee promiseth to employ himselfe for the deliury of the King and Queene, and for the maintenance of the Edicts, and the Estate of the Realme.

On the other side, the King declares by his Letters Patents, that both he, his mother, and his brethren, are at liberty, forbids all his subjects to arme vnder that pretext: commands them that are armed to surcease, and to retire home to their houses: and by another Edict he commands the execution of the Edict of January, but within the City of Paris and suburbs thereof. But to quite abolish it, hee calls the Nobility the 28 day of Aprill, D and declares by Proclamation, the Prince and his adherents to bee seditious and bad Christians, and that the Prince made prouision of foraine forces to disturb the quiet of France. It is an example of dangerous consequence, when a people armes vnder colour to set their Prince at liberty: for oftentimes in stead of libertie, they make him captive. The Queene-mother did easily arme that party which shee meant to employ: but great men, who commonly maintaine their authority by armes, doe more willingly take them, then lay them downe. Shee cannot now cause them to surcease, whom shee had armed for this deliuerance: the confusion is too great, their courages are too much incensed, and their hearts putt vp with many hopes: they must come to blowes, their fingers itched on either side. In the meane time, the heads being gone, and perswaded to preferre E the publike before all priuate respects, they offer in shew, to lay downe their armes, and to retire home to their houses, so as their aduersaries will submit themselves to the like.
But to conclude, the companies of men at armes being for the most part armed at Paris, with part of the old bands, the King of Nauarre, the Duke of Guise, the Constable, and the Marshall of Saint Andre (the Protestants called the three last Triumuires, and in truth they were but three heads in one hood) hauing by an Edict banished the Calvinists out of Paris, take the way of Chastaudun with twelue thousand foot, and three thousand horse. The Prince was as strong, and euen then would haue ioynd with them: d' Andelot and Boucard aboute all others vrged it, but the Regent abused them with fruitles hopes of an accord, whilest the Kings armie grew stronger, both with French and fo-raigne forces.

Having thus lost the opportunitee of a battaile, the Prince maintaines his armie about two moneths, with a commendable discipline, without blaspheming, whoring, robbing, or theft. In the end, they lose all patience. Baugency taken by assault, opens the gates to disorders: for this first heate soone past with the French growes cold, money for their pay growes short, and the Nobilitie could not frame themselves to this strict discipline of warre, which the Admirall did practise, being a great enemy to robbing. In many Prouinces, matters went indifferently betwixt the Catholics, and Protestants: and to give two strokes with one stone, to stay the dissipation of this armie, and to relieue them that might in the end fall, the Prince sent the Earle of Rochefoucault, with some troopes into Poitou, Xaintronge and Angoulmois: Soubize to Eyons: Tuy brother to Genlis, to Bourges: Montgomery into Normandy: D'Andelot, to hasten the succours of Germanie, and Bisquacant into England. These troopes from the moneth of Aprill, vntill the midst of August, did possesse Orleans, Baugency, Vendosme, Blois, Tours, Poitiers, Mans, Angers, Bourges, Angoulême, Rouen, Chalon vpon Soan, Mafcon, Lion, and the most part of Dauphiné, with many others, not without effusion of blood, spoyleing of Churches, and such insolencies, as the warre doth cause in a country of conquest.

Bourges recovered.

Orleans and Bourges held by the Prince, did much helpe their affaires, but Bourges might easily bee surpris'd before it were fortified. The King then (whom the Commanders had drawne into the armie) marcheth thither, and the composition which Tuy made with his Maiesty, put him for a time in disgrace with the Prince. This arme cut off (as the Guisens said) from the Huguenots, inuited the Kings armie to the siege of Orleans, where the Prince and the Admirall were. But the resolution of these two Commanders, and the feare to receive shame and losse, made them passe on to Rouen, where Montgomery commanded with seuen or eight hundred souldiers of the old bands, and two companies of English. The end of September, was the beginning of this siege: a famous siege, by the hurting of the King of Nauarre in the shoulder, as hee surueyed the weakest part of the city: whereof he dyed the seuenteenth day of Nouember, three weeks after it was taken by assault, and spoiled. Montgomery saued himselfe in a gally, but many of the chiefe passed through the executioners hands. On the other side, Lewis of Bourbon, duke of Montpensier, reduced to the Kings obedience, the townes of Angers, Mans and Tours: the Marshall Saint André tooke Poitiers from the Lord of Saint Gemme, and Henry of Montmorency, Lord of Damville, incourted the Protestants forces in Languedoc, whilst the Earles of Tende and Suzer, by the defeat of Momburn, tooke Cisteron for the King, and Montluc with Bury governor of Guienne, put to rout the troopes of Gascons which Duras led to the Earle of Rochefoucault, besieging Saint Iean d'Angeli. The cuerthrow of Duras brought the Earle with 300 Gentlemen, and the remainder of the defeated army, on this side Loyre, to ioyne the Prince with the Reistres whom D'Andelot brought. This supply made the Prince to resolue to goe to Paris, and by annoying it, to encrease the feare wherewith they were possessed. He marcheth, forceth Pluuiers, takes Estampes, and besiegeth Corbeil: but finding it better furnished with men then he expected, he approacheth to Paris, makes a great skirmish, and beats back the troopes that were come out of their trenches. So he camped at Gentilly, Arcueil, Montrouge, and other neighbour villages, the Queene-mother busies him seuen or eight daies with diuers parleys, during the which, foure and twenty Ensignes of Gascons, and Spaniards arriuing, were lodged within the suburbs of S. Iames. The Prince then seeing his enemies forces to encrease, resolues to fight with them, before they were all vnited, so as all hope of peace being conuerted with smooke, he riseth the tenth of December, takes the way to Chartres, and resolues to goe into Normandie, to receiue the men and money which came out of England, and by that meanes to diuert the siege of Orleans. The Constable and duke of Guise march after him.

A notable dressing.

Dreames are lies, as we commonly say: yet haue we often tryed those which present themselves in the morning (the spirit hauing taken sufficient rest) to bring certaine aduertisements of that which is to come. The night before the cue of the bataille, the Prince dreames that he had giuen three battails one after another, obtained the victory, ouerthrowne his three principall enemies, and finally himselfe wounded to the death, hauing laid one vpon another, and he about them all, yielding in that sort, his soule to God. And to say the truth, haue we not seene this vision verified by the death of the Marshall of Saint André, which is at hand: by that of the D. of Guise before Orleans the year following: and by that of the Constable at the bataille of Saint Denis, and of the Prince himselfe in that of Bassac.

In the Kings army, they numbred two thousand horse, and nineteene thousand foot. In that of the Prince, foure thousand horse, and twelue thousand foot. They ioyne the nineteenth of December, and without any skirmishes, charge with all their forces. The Princes Suisses lose seuentene Captaines, with three parts of their troops, which were about three

The heretick of Lyons.

A three thousand, and endure three charges before they could bee broken. On the other side, the taking of the Constable, the death of the Marshall Saint André, the defeat of their troopes, caused a general confusion in the Kings armie, if the duke of Guise charging the white cassacks, and the Reistres with fury (whose Pistols had made a great slaughter of his men) had not forced through the Princes horse, who straying too much from the battell, fell prisoner into the hands of the Lord of Danville, the which made the victory doubtfull, seeming before to incline to his side. The conflict continued from ten of the clocke in the morning, vntill night, with many charges, there are seuen thousand men slaine vpon the place, on both sides, many hurt, and in a manner, all died, and a great number of prisoners. The King lost (besides his Suisses) the most part of his horse, and a great number of foot. There were slaine of men of marke, the duke of Neuers, killed by one of his household seruants, either by hazard, or of purpose, the Lords of Montbrun (the Constables sonne) d'Annebault, Giury, la Bresse and his sonne: there were hurt, the Duke of Aumale, brother to the Duke of Guise, Rochefort and Beauvais. Aufun a Nobleman of Galeony, whom feare made fly to Paris, and there hee died of griefe. The Prince lost about two thousand two hundred foot, and a hundred and fifty horse, French and Reistres.

This bataille is famous, by the taking of two Generals, the one in the beginning, the other in the end of the bataille, so as the field was left by both parties: but after the treat, it was viewed, and taken againe by the D. of Guise, and the next day, as it were, recovered by the Admirall, who presented himselfe in bataille. So the Prince had the advantage ouer the dead, and the honour to haue made his retreat with order: but the duke had the advantage of the victory, for that hee lodged vpon the place of bataille, spoiled the dead, and won the Princes artillery, who (a strange matter considering their hatred) supped, and lay all night with the duke of Guise. Doubtlesse, it was a courtesie in the one, and a resolution in the other. By the taking of the two Commanders, the duke of Guise was declared the Kings Lieutenant General in the army, and the Admirall tooke the command for the Protestants. Either had sundry designs. The duke to recouer the places held from the King: the Admirall to preferre Orleans with more facility, by the conquest of some places about it: and then to finish his voyage into Normandy, whither the treasure of England called him. So hauing taken Selles in Berry, Saint Aignan, Montrichard, and Sully vpon Loire, he deliuered the guard of Orleans to his brother d'Andelot, with fourteenne ensignes of French and Laniquenes, foure of the inhabitants of the towne, and a great number of the Nobility, vnder the conduct of Duras, Bouchanet, Buffy, S. Cyre, Anaret, and other voluntaries: and tooke the way to Normandy, thinking by this meanes to diuide the enemies forces, who had Orleans for the chiefe object of their armes. The fift day of February, he camps before it, and the next day hee wins the Portereau, with the slaughter of foure hundred good French souldiers, being abandoned by the Laniquenes, who cowardly left the place they had in charge.

E The eighteenth of the moneth, hee was ready to giue an assault: and making his reckoning to winne the towne, hee writes to the Queene-mother, that within 24. houres hee would send her newes of the taking thereof, and would make the day very memorable, sparing neither sexe nor age: that after he had shroued there, hee would extinguish the remembrance of the towne. But man knoweth not his destiny, nor what shall happen vnto him. The same day as he returned towards night, vpon a little Moile, from the campe to the castle of Coruey, his ordinary lodging, John Pelliot, Seigneur of Mery, a Gentleman of Angoulmois mounted vpon a Spanish horse, by his owne proper and priuate motion, shoots him into the shoulder with a pistoll charged with three bullets, and saues himselfe by flight: but hauing wandred all night, he was taken the next day: soone after, hee was pinch't with hot irons, and so drawne in pieces with horses at Paris. The D. of Guise dyed the 24. of the said moneth, and was interred at Paris, with pompe like vnto a King. Henry his sonne being yong of age, was preferred to the place of great Chamberlaine, and Lord Steward of France.

The D. of Guise slaine.

The Admirall in the meane time, runnes ouer Normandy without opposition, and followed by foure thousand horse, hee coopt vp them into their forts, who had had free scope, since the taking of Rouen: namely, the Marquis of Elbeuf, and Renouart a new Knight of the Order, molested by the Protestants of Caen, tooke some, and slue others.

The money, artillery, powder, with five companies of English, and two of French, which A he newly received, came very fitly to reduce the towne, and the strong castle thereof, to his devotion, Montgomery conquered Honefieu: and the Lord of Colombieres, Bayeux: and by this prize, he so amazed the garison of Saint Lo, as they left the place. The Admirall sent Montgomery thither, who was received into Auranches without contradiction. Viré being taken by assault, endured the ordinary rigour of the warre. The Earle went on with his forces, even as the packet of peace arrived, the which called the Admirall to Orleans. So the 14 of March, he marcheth thitherward: the 18 he entrencheth into Bernay by force, and causeth some priests to be hanged being found in armes perswading the people to resist in a packy dog-hole. Two days after, the Vicont of Dreux takes Aigle, and purs all B to the sword that he finds armed. Falaife compounds: Argenton redeemes it selfe for ten thousand franks. Mortagne a great village in Perche (seduced by some indiscreet priests) makes resistance. They force it, and the most mutinous pay for their folly with the price of their lives. The Monks of Saint Calais had received garison, and ill treated some of the household servants of the Lord of Coignee: but now hee takes a sharpe reuenge, and Cerauy surprizing the castle of Mezières neere vnto Dreux, makes the garison for euer after vnable to beare armes. So the Admirall re-enters into Orleans the three and twentieth of March.

At the beginning of the siege of Orleans, the King, his Mother, the Priuy Councell, and certaine Deputies of the Court of Parliament at Paris, were come to Chartres, to arrange (said they) the Prince of Conde. The Duke of Guise had by this means given C two strokes with one stone: for the losse of the Prince of Condes head, had stricken off the Constables. But Dumouille hauing the honour to haue taken the Prince in battell, had likewise the honour to preferre his life, by the dispersing of this assembly. Now that the Queene-mother stands no more in feare of the duke of Guises authority, shee reuiues the treaty of Peace begun before his death. For the effecting whereof she holds an assembly in the Isle of Oxen, where the Prince and the Constable assist being yet prisoners. The Constable protests at the beginning, that he will not suffer any peace made with the conditions of the Edict of January. The Prince craues leaue to conferre with his councell in Orleans. His councell giues him to vnderstand, that neither the Queene, nor he, can de- D derogate from the Edict so solemnly made, confirmed, and sworne, at the instance of the Estates, and so notable an assembly of all the Parliaments of the Realme.

But the Prince was grieved to see himselfe guarded by a company of horse, and three ensignes of foot, and many Gentlemen had not of long time seene their families. More- over, they gaue the Prince to vnderstand, that the Articles of the Edict of January were not altered, but onely to content the Catholikes: that armes being laid aside, they should by little and little obtaine free liberty. So the Articles of Peace drawne in forme of an Edict, were concluded the twelfth of March, and all confirmed in the Kings Councell at Amboise the nineteenth following, verified in Parliament the twenty seuen, and the same day proclaimed throughout the towne by the sound of Trumpet. E The executions qualified with the name of Iustice, the robberies, general and private massacres, committed on the persons of the Protestants at Paris, Senlis, Amiens, Abbeville, Meaux, Chaulons, Troyes, Bar vpon Seine, Espernay, Sens, Auxerre, Neuers, Corbigny, Aurillac, Moulins, Issoudun, Mans, Vendôme, Angers, Craon, Blois, Mer, Tours, Bourgueil, and places therabout, Poitiers: Rouen, Valongnes, Viré, Saint Lo, Bourdeaux, Agen, and generally in all parts of the Realme, are read at large in the Originals, and would augment this Volume beyond the iust proportion. Time and leisure may hereafter giue all this discourse specified more particularly. Let vs onely obserue the most memorable exploits chanced during these first troubles, from the moneth of April, in the year 1562, vnto the publication of the Peace.

The Protestants of Meaux exceeding the Catholikes in number, had vntill the end of Iune, continued the exercise of their religion, without any disturbance: then transported with an indiscreet zeale, and ill-advised presumption, grounded vpon their numbers, they fly to the Churches, beat down Images, and make the priests retire. This insolency made the Court of Parliament at Paris to censure them, and to abandon them to any that could spoile or kill them, without any forme of proceffe. Therevpon Lihoux brother to Mont- sieur, comes to Meaux, and with the consent of the Protestants, restores the exercise of the

A the Catholike religion, and then giues commandement to the inhabitants, to bring their armies into the towne-houle. Some obey, others to the number of foure hundred, march to ioyne with the Prince Portian: they charge them, and kill them all but forty, which recouer Orleans with much adoe, leauing their wiues to the mercy of the stronger, whereof many were forced to goe to the masse with blowes, many mariages solemnized anew, many children (but without order) baptized againe. The 13 of February 1563 some fugitiues tried to recouer the place, but this caused a rotall ruine of their companions, who remained within the towne, they were massacred, drowned and hanged, their wiues and children rauished, their goods spoiled, and their houses made inhabitable.

B At Chaulons, des Bordes Lieutenant to the Duke of Neuers, Governour of Champagne, slue many men and women, imprisoned handicrafts men, spoiled their houses, caused mariages to be re-solemnized, and children to be re-baptized. Those of Bar vpon Seine became the stronger, and rashly in a place easie to be forced. Some Cannons planted onely against the castle, scattered all within it like vnto Partridges. So the besiegers entring, finding few men to execute their reuenge on, they fall vpon the women, maidens, and children, open some of their stomacks, pull out their hearts, and with a fury (vnworthy doubtlesse of one created after the same image and likeness) tear them with their teeth. Ralet a young Advocate, son to the Kings Proctor, was (a prodigious thing) hanged by his fathers procurement. In the moneth of January following, some fifty horse of the garison C of Antrain, surprized the towne at the breake of day: and at the first tied this Ralet to the top of his house, then with their pistols caused him to expiate the death of his sonne. The other murderers were murdered, and their spoile spoiled by other spoilers. So the Lord requires the blood of many by the hand of man himselfe.

Saint Eslenne being returned from Orleans, with two of his brethren and some o- Saint Eslenne thers to refresh himselfe, in a house of his neere vnto Rheims, was beset, besieged and battered with the Cannon, by a troop of fifteene or sixteen hundred men, who going forth vpon their word to speake with the Duke of Neuers, who (they said) asked for him, was murdered by his owne Cousin germane the Baron of Cerny, and his two brethren, with sixteen others stabbed.

D A hundred persons of all qualities were mistrably slaine at Sens, their bodies cast naked into Seine, their houses spoiled, and (as if it had beene no sufficient reuenge) their Vines were pulled vp. The eleuenth of May 1562, the Catholikes of Neuers called in many Gentlemen of the Country, seized vpon the gates, and three dayes after fell vpon the Protestants. Fayette arises, ransacks their houses, re-baptizes the children, expels whom he pleased, and so laden with booty, worth fifty thousand Crownes, he retires to his house in Auvergne. Noiset Marshall of the Company of Fayette, entreated them of Corbigny in the like sort. Captain Blany surprized the towne few dayes after, and restored the Protestants to the publike exercise of their religion. Captain Blasse surprizing the towne of Antrain, slayed the Catholikes from committing the like excess, as they had done at Antrain. Blasse E Auxerre. Stephen Blondel a Priest, and another called the Dangerous, were hanged and shot. Jfferieux (called in by the Protestants of La Charité to take the charge of the town) was set vpon by Cheneon, Achon, and other troops, and finally (being besieged by Fayette) he yielded vp the towne vpon an honest composition for his partie. This was the tenth of Iune, but the Grand Prior entring, he pulled the Capitulation (being signed) out of Jfferieux hand, and afterwards la Fayette abandons these poore Protestants to spoile and ranisme, like to them of Neuers. The third of March following, the Captains du Bois, Blasse, and Blany re-enter by Scalado. Leauing it afterwards in guard to du Bois, who defended it with threescore and seven souldiers, and some inhabitants, against an army of foure thousand foot and horse: slue about fourescore of them, and forced them to raze F the siege.

Those of Chastillon vpon Loire, standing amidst many difficulties, and in the end spoiled of all their commodities, fortified their little towne, and the fifth of January endure an assault against the Lord of Prie, kill seuen or eight of his men, and hurt many others, the men defending themselves with stones, and the women pouring boiling water vpon the assailants. In the end, Montenard Governour of Berry besieged it, battered it, and took it by force, killed men and women, young and old, spoiled the towne, euen to the hinges of doores, glasse and bars of windows.

At Gyen.

Gyen maintains it selfe long, the Protestants were the stronger, but the insolvency of Captains and Souldiers, whom the Prince of Conde sent thither from Orleans to refresh themselves one after another, forced many of the inhabitants to retire to Orleans. So the towne remaining at the devotion of the Kings armie, who camped before it, was subject to the violence of the stronger, where the Italians amongst other insolencies, cut a young child being alive in two pieces, and with a horrible fury eat his liver.

At Montargis.

Montargis was the Sanctuary of many Protestant Families, under the countenance of Renee of France, daughter to King Lewis the twelfth, and Duchesse Dowager of Ferrara. The Duke of Guise her sonne in law sends Malicorne thither with foure companies of men at armes, but the prey he sought was safe within the Castle: his fury fell vpon an old man met by chance, who was slaine and cast into the river. Malicorne threatens the Duchesse to bring the Cannon to force her to yeeld the castle and the Protestants that were in it. But the generous resolution of this Duchesse, and the death of the Duke of Guise, stayed the execution of his threats.

At Auvergne.

Bersons, according to the Commission he had from the Duke of Guise to seize vpon the forts of high Auvergne, enters into Auvergne, murders eight men, spoiles the towne and that of Argentat, with some castles, ranseth wifes and maidens, making his account to root out all the Protestants in the Country, if the Edict of pacification had not forced him to surcease. Montare comes to Moulins with like Commission, he expelled out of the towne whom he doubted, then giving liberty to his troops, they spoiled the houses and farmes thereabouts: he caused fix men to be hanged, and five others to be drowned, returning from Orleans with three Merchants of Dauphiné, suffering the hangman to execute them without any forme of Proceffe, whom the multitude deliuered vnto him to be put to death. Thirteen young men of Ifoudun were beaten downe in the water the eight of May at Saint Lisiene, a village two leagues from the towne, and the ninth of Iuly following, Sarrazay seized vpon Ifoudun, armed the Catholike inhabitants, drew massacators out of prison, and filled it with Protestants, who for the most part died, being smothered under the ruines of a Tower, of fixteene that escaped, ten saved themselves at Bourges. Vntill the Edict of peace, he spoiled both the towne and country, ransoming some, deliuering others to the Hang-man, which had not meanes to redeeme themselves: he ransith wifes and maids: and to conclude, exposed these poore creatures to all the insolencies of souldiers. The third of April 1562, those of Mans became masters of the towne. But violence neuer continued long, and souldiers led by a Commander of small credit and little authority, did neuer see their armes prosper.

At Moulins.

These men are no sooner armed, but they employ themselves to the beating downe of Images, sacking of Churches: and from the towne they runne to the Villages neere. The commons assemblable, kill such as they meet, and rescue the booty. In the end, an apple of discord diuides them of the towne and the castle: the insolencies of the Captaines and Souldiers amaze the Protestants: the Duke of Montpensier prepares to assaile them, and off three Captaines which command within the towne, two haue intelligence with him. This being discovered, the towne being also ill furnished, La Mothe Tibergeau draws forth tumultuously eight hundred men carrying armes, leading them through many difficulties into Alançon, who then tooke sundry parties: some not praised in armes remained there: others put themselves into the troops of the Conte Montgomery, others of the Duke of Bouillon, and the other two Captaines submitted to those to whom they had given their words. Thus the Catholikes haue their turne, they were driven out of the towne, and now they re-enter, and full of spleene they spoile the Protestants houses, both within the towne and abroad, fill leagues compass: and without respect of kindred, kill, spoile, and ransome men, women and children. Some women of good account, some simple people, seruants and chamber-maids, retired to their farmes, or to their friends in the country, remaine at the deuotion of 500 Harguebuziers, leauied for the guard of the towne and country thereabouts, who forbore no kind of reuenge and rigour. The prisons are filled, they forbid by any meanes to sollicite for them: the accused are not admitted to except against any witness, and for the last act of this Tragedie, about two hundred persons of all qualities and sexes, purge by their mournfull deaths the insolencies of these first furies. The absent were executed in picture, their goods confiscate that were dead carrying armes: their children degraded from all offices, and declared incapable to succeed.

A succeed. In Villages neere and farther off, about sixscore persons yeelded their throats to the reuenging swords of them to whom the change of armes had now giuen the aduantage. One Capitaine Champagne, to glut the Pickrels in a poole which he had, doth gorge them with about fifty persons. Bois-lardin his Lieutenant fills two trenches neere vnto his house, with fifty or three score carcasses. La Ferié-Bernard, Sablé, Maine, Loire-Castle, Meners, Belesme, and Marigue, had the fields thereabout white with the bones of such as were slaine, whose flesh was deuoured with birds and beasts. The Images out throwne at Vendosme, the Altars beaten downe, yea the monuments of the House of Vendosme too insolently broken, might not these stirre vp some reuenge? Tou beat downe (say the Catholikes) the Images, and destroy the reliques of the dead: but we will beat downe as many liuing Images as shall fall into our hands. The Monkes of Saint Calais second them, and of many Protestants which held their Abbey, they massacre five and twenty or thirty. Some troops which kept the fields, kill the first that passe, stone them and cast them into wells. The Lord of Congneé ioyning with some gentlemen, comes to charge them, kills the murderers, and (except a few which fled betimes) puts them all to the sword: then hee dispatcheth the rest of his fury vpon the Priests and Monkes, and causeth two of the most insolent to be hanged in their Church, yea where the alarm had rung to assaile the Protestants.

At Vendosme.

Those of Angers become the stronger, yet without any offence to their fellow-citizens, and make an agreement within themselves: To line peaceably one with another, under the Kings obedience, with obseruation of the Edict of January. This modesty continued from the fifth of April to the two and twentieth. Then they lose all patience, ouerthrowing the images and reliques of Saint Samson. The Catholiques rest patient, but they could well chooseth the time of their aduantage. It chanced that the Prince of Conde required a supply of men and money from the Protestants of Angers. Many Gentlemen and Souldiers march, and by this meanes make their party weak. Paygailard a Gascon Capitaine, sent by the Duke of Montpensier, enters the Castle the fifth of May, and the next day winnes a part of the towne: then to lull the Protestants asleepe, and to haue them in the end at his deuotion, he grants them free liberty of Religion. But two dayes after, vnder colour of disarming them, they enter their houses. A receiuer of Subsidies and some others bar vp their gates. They found the alarme, their houses are spoiled, and the prisons filled vp with men and women: and after the eleventh of the said moneth vnto the end of the yeare, about foure-score men were executed after diuers manners. Many women of all qualities were put into sackes, drawne through the dirt, and their bodies cast into the River, and their daughters ransith: some making strong resistance were stabbed with their daggers. And the Duke of Montpensier, hauing published the Edict of the Parliament of Paris, To pursue all them that should be any way suspected of the Protestant religion, many Gentlemen and others about Angers during these furies lost both life and goods.

At Angers.

At Blois they were masters both of the towne and castle, but being too weak to encounter the forces of the Duke of Guise, all the men of warre retired to Orleans. Those which remained in the towne, payed for their companions: for besides them that were beaten downe in the streets at the Duke of Guises entry, many tyed to stakes, were cast into the river, wifes and mayds were ransith, houses spoiled, and as often chanceth in these inuicill tumults, many Catholikes were slaine in these confusions, as liberty giues euery man meanes to reuenge his priuate quarrels. They compaine to the Duke. There is no remedy (saith he) we haue too much people in France. I will deale so, as visitals shall be good cheape. As if the disposition of seasons were in thy power, oh Duke! or if the earth should desire to be watered with mans blood, to become fertile.

At Blois.

The Towne of Mer was spoiled ten dayes together. Beaupais a Minister of the Church hanged, some men slaine, some women being ransith di. d, some of them in the hands of them that ransith them, others of grieffe soone after. The foresaid decree was published euery Sunday in places depending on the Parliament. It was a meanes to arme theceus, vagabonds, villanes, leud and idle persons: it made the plough-man to leaue the plough and the crafts-man to shut vp his shop: to conclude, it did change the multitude into Tygers and Lyons, and fleteth them against their owne Countrymen. A troop of these rascals fall vpon Ligneul, hang some men, pull out a Ministers eyes, and then burne him. Another company runnes vpon the marches of Comeri, l'Isle-Bouchart, Loches, Azé they burne, and

and the neighbour places, beating downe and murdering men, women, and children. A Those of Tours were seized of the towne, but hauing spared the images no more then the rest, the Duke of Montpensier comes in Iuly, and summons them to yeeld. They had no meanes to keepe the towne, nor the Prince of Conde to succour them. So they make three Ensignes of foot, and two Cornets of horse, and ioyned with them of Chinon, and Chastelleraud, making a troop of a thousand men of warre. This was but a fire of straw: seven or eight companies of men at armes, and some cornets of light-horse of the Earle Villars, charge and ouerthrow them, kill some, and cary others prisoners to Chastelleraud: some recover Poitiers, others which had yeelded themselves at the first in this defeat, being sent backe to Tours with passports, fell out of Scylla into Charybdis. The multitude B receiues them disarmed, and beats them downe. About three hundred recover the gates of Tours with running, hoping to find a Sanctuary at their houses. But the people armes, and murder most of these amazed men, cast their bodies into Loire, massacre their companions remaining within the towne, sacke their lodgings, and in this furious liberty, die the Riuier with the blood of their fellow-Citizens, men, women, and children. Chaungy C armes, and by his presence doth countenance this popular insolvency. Bourgeois President of Tours, no Protestant, but onely suspected to fauour their partie, had redeemed his life out of the hands of Cleruauux, Lieutenant to Chaungy, for three hundred crownes, and a basin of silver, but in the end, being murdered with stauces and swords, hanged by the feet, his head in the water vnto the breast, they open his belly, teare out his bowels, and cast them into the riuier, and placing his heart vpon the top of a Lance, they cary it through the towne, crying: Behold the President of the Huguenots heart. The Duke Montpensier arises, and by gibbets, wheelies, and other tortures, plays the last act of this vnciuill Tragedie. The Protestants of Poitiers, being masters of the towne, did not forget to beat downe Images.

A horrible cruelty.

Poitiers.

The Earle of Villars, and the Marshall Saint Andre besiege them. Saint Gemme commanding there for the Prince of Conde, sustaines a furious assault, making the assailants to determine of a retreat, when as Pineau Capitaine of the Castle, practised by the assailants, giues them a signe to returne: he shoos against them that were at the gate, and forced them to leaue the defence. The gate being thus wonne, they come to fight for the marker places. The Protestants began now to yeeld to the victors force, when as Mangot a Capitaine of Lodun breaking the lockes of Saint Cyprians gate, makes a way for the Citizens and Souldiers to saue themselves, leauing the towne and country about, subiect to all the insolenicies incident to a country of conquest. Corneillis a Scottish Capitaine, escapes from Poitiers with his troop, and to suppress the peasants fury, greedy of blood and spoile, he layes an ambush, and then he cunningly ioynes with them, and by this stratagem, takes from them all desire to assemble together againe for the like effect. The vnrstrained liberty of armes, made the strongest of all sides to seize vpon their townes, thinking delays to breed danger. But alas, how many pitifull Catastrophes grew by these inciuill and fatall tumults: Rouen was not the last to make tryall thereof.

The first siege of Rouen.

The fifteenth of April 1562, the Protestants seize vpon the towne, enter the Churches tumultuously, beat downe and ruine reliques, images and altars, in about fifty parishes, abbeys and religious houses: the exercise of the Catholique Religion fireweaked, and the Court of Parliament retired to Louiers. During these broiles, the Duke of Aumale comes as the Kings Lieutenant Generall. Villebon Bailiffe of Rouen, seizeth vpon Pont de Lauche, the Baron of Clerc, on Caudbec: and so blocke vp Rouen both aboue and beneath the Riuier: the Magistrate ceaseth to administer iustice, the Merchant histrafficke, and the handicraftsman shuts vp his shop: heavy foretellings of a horrible confusion to come. Many difficulties did now presse them of Rouen, when as Moruilliers coming from the Prince of Conde, and slipping cunningly by water into the towne, prouides for the souldiers disorders, and for the guard of Saint Katherinees fort, prolonging the hope of the besieged. The Duke of Aumale assailes the fort, and tires them with daily skirmishes, but most fatal for himselfe: he loseth at the first charge an hundred men, and the besieged Saint Agnan and Languelet brave Capitaines, at the second a great number of men, and two Ensignes caryed into the towne. The eleuenth of Iuly, the Duke giues a generall assault, and so furious as three Ensignes of the enemies planted vpon the rampier, did so inflame the courage of the besieged, as they ouerthrow both Ensignes and men, pursued them to their campe, and

A and forced them to dislodge the night following, in confusion, with losse of their victuals, munition and baggage, to goe and reuenge the dishonor lately receiued at Rouen, by the taking of Ponteau de Mer and Honfleur. Moruilliers content to haue preferred Rouen, at this time, retires to his house, and leaues the charge to the Earle of Montgomery, called by them of Rouen out of base Normandy. About the end of September, the King, the Queen, and the King of Nauarre come to the army, consisting of fixteene thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides Reistres and Lanqueens: five dayes are spent in skirmishes, but with most advantage to the besieged. The fixt day, most part of the souldiers goe to refresh themselves within the towne. A Capitaine named Lewis, who had intelligence with the enemy, giues them aduice. They runne hotly to the assault (during these skirmishes, B they had made a breach in the wall with fire or fix hundred Cannon shot) they kill many good souldiers, many pioners, eight and twenty women, and take the place: but with the losse of Lewis his life, slaine by one of his souldiers as he did helpe the assailants to mount. A worthy reward for so notable a treachery. Three hundred Burgeses did runne to the defence: but the fury of the assault caryed some to their graues, and others to prison, and made the way easie for the taking of the Bulwarke of Martinnille, and the Fort of Montgomery. The thirtieth of October a hot assault was giuen against the town from the morning vntill night, and many men on both sides slaine. The next day, about cleuen of the C clocke, they renew the assault, and plant three Ensignes vpon the rampier of Saint Hilary. Montgomery repels them, and drives them backe beyond the trench, killing of his enemies about eight hundred men, and losing of his party, foure or five hundred men, women, and children.

The second siege.

The fort taken.

The King of Nauarre slain.

The next day was fatal to the King of Nauarre. If I may (said he to a Nobleman) escape from this siege, I will neuer cary armes more for this quarrell. A certaine fore-telling of the mischiefe that followes vs, doth commonly touch our hearts. Hauing visited the trenches, and dined neere vnto the wall without the battery, he was shot in the shoulder as he made water: the bullet being drawne out too late by the Surgeons, and his wound inflamed by his voluptuousnesse, accompanied with a Feuer, he gaue his soule to God the seuenteenth day of Nouember following, as we haue said before. In the meane time, the battery continues, many thousands of shot beat downe diuers towers, many Mynes play without effect. The fourth assault was more auailable, the 26 of October. Thereby the assailants win the breach at the port Saint Hilary, they enter in troop, and kill all they encounter, force houses, raiuish wiues and maids, and commit all such ordinary in the like accidents. Montgomery vnable to withstand this last violence, saues himselfe in a galley with such as could get in, the rest remaining in prey were spoiled, slaine, drowned, and made prisoners. The Parliament returns three dayes after the taking of the towne, and at their first sitting the President of Mandreuille lost his head: Soquence and Berthenouille Councillors, and Marlorat a Minister, were hanged, and the next day five Capitaines, and diuers Burgeses of the towne. Moreouer, enuy and hatred amidst the popular furies brought in question E the Seigneur of Anthot, chiefe President, and Boissager the Kings Aduocate, being Catholickes, but enemies to sedition, and wise politicians. In ciuill tumults, the vulgar doth commonly take for essentiall markes of Religion, the insolenicies and excesses, which fury and the suffrance of the Magistrats doth suggest.

Rouen taken.

Diepe seized.

And taken againe.

Diepe serued for a retreat to many Protestant Families, but the ouerthrow of some troops which Briquemant sent to Montgomery for a supply, and the taking of Rouen, terrified most part of the inhabitants, who being pressed by Aumale and Villebon, were content to yeeld, and to cease the exercise of their religion. Ricarville and Bacqueuille had the gouernment: the former of the Castle, the other of the towne. But how many Capitaines by indifferencie haue lost both liues and places: Ricarville going out of the castle to see his F horses, is slaine, and suddenly the castle is seized on by Carcuille and Capitaine Gascon, who going from thence into the towne, take Bacqueuille, and restore the exercise of the Protestants Religion vnder the gouernment of La Crec.

Montgomery laboured with all his power to maintaine to Protestants in base Normandie, but he had the Duke of Elrampes and Matignon to encounter him. In May, hee had taken Viré, beaten downe the images, and caried away the reliques. The last of Iuly, the Catholikes awaked at this first rumour, surprize the Protestants coming from the preaching, reuenge their losses by the death of some, and hurting of others. About the end of August, La Moth, Tibergean, Auaines and Deschamps, sent by Montgomery with six-score horse, surpriseth the towne, and spoile both it and the country. The fourth of September the Duke of Estampes comes with eleven cornets of horse, they force the towne, kill Auaines, take the Castle, slay two hundred men that were fled into it, ransell and kill women and children. Tibergean, and many others ransomed their liues: so as generally there was nothing but taking and re-taking of townes, with most cruell and inciuill stratagems.

The Vidam of Chartres, and Beauvoir la Noche his brother in law, hauing assured themselves of New-hauen, the Vidam going into England, treated with the Queene to succor the Protestants: and for assurance of her men and money, deliuered the said place into her hands, with protestation, as well by him, as by the Queene, no way to preiudice the Kings soueraine authority, nor the estate of the Realme. And shee shortly yeeld it without any difficulty. According to the treaty, there arises six thousand English in Normandy, vnder the Earle of Warwicke, and are dispersed in Rouen, Diepe, and New-hauen. After the taking of Rouen, the Reingraue brought his Reistres before New-hauen: but his violence preuailed as little, as fifty thousand crownes did, with a collar of the Order, and a company of men at armes entertained, which the Queene Mother promised to Beauvoir to corrupt him to yeeld vp the town. Britanie continued vnder the moderate government of the Duke of Estampes, both for that the Queene Mother liued in suspence, and entertained both parties, as also for that the factions of Normandy had drawne away the worst affected. Those of Guienne, Languedoc, and other places, made warre against the Images and Altars, ministring occasion to shed the blood of liuely images at Grenade, Castelnauudary, and Cahors, where about six-score Protestants assembled to heare the preaching, were slaine. On the other side, Bury and Montluc (scourges to the Protestants) reuenged the beating downe of Images throughout all Guienne, with infinite murders, and lamentable spoiles, Duras hauing abandoned the protection thereof, vpon a commandement which he had receiued from the Prince of Conde, 'to bring his forces to Orleanse, which succeeded ill for him, as we shall see.

Bury and Montluc did runne vp and downe the country to crosse the Protestants designs: and those of Bourdeaux (hauing too slackly proceeded in an enterprise made against the towne and castles) caused the Parliament to search their houses, and to put them to death, who had not in time retired themselves vnder Duras Ensignes. Montluc incensed especially against them of Agen, tryed all his wits, to bring them vnder his power and command. He had against him the L. of Memy Generall of the war for the Protestants in Guienne and the neighbour country, a sickly man, and not greatly practised in such affaires: for if he had made benefit of the great forces which he had at his command, and would haue beleueed Arpajon and Marchastel, he might in shew haue cut Montluc in pieces, being much weaker of men, who knowing the cariage of his aduersary, wearied him with daily courtes and alarms, to the contempt of the Protestants, which fell into his hands, as he himselfe doth vaunt in his Commentaries, a true portraitt and table where we may read at large the horrible defolations chanced in those countries during the first troubles. In the end, those of Agen fecing their towne vnable to resist the Cannon, make a troop of about six hundred men, and retire for the most part to the castle of Penne committed by Duras to Captaine Liouran. The next day, the common people of Agen troop together, spoile and kill all they meet: Bury and Montluc flye thither, they execute many prisoners, and such as were absent they hang in picture. Duras not able to diuert this heauy accident, takes the way of Quercy, wins Lauffet by force, kils fise hundred three score and seuen men, amongst the which, nine-score and foueteene Priests were found slaine, without any respect of their Order, through this detestable warlike insolvency. For a counter-change, Montluc comes to besiege the castle of Penne, forceth the place after the death of Liouran, puts man, woman, and child to the sword, and (continuing the course of his prosperity) takes and sacks Castellanoux, Marmande, S. Macaire, Bazas, Toneins, Port S. Mary, Villeneufue of Agenois, the Castle of Duras, and Montsegur, leauing bloody trophies of an vnciuill and pitifull victory.

Lecloure, the chiefe towne of Armagnac, was at the Prince of Condes deuotion. Bugale a Captaine of Bearne and a Catholike commanded there: who by the taking of Sauuetat of Gaure, of Larromien, and of Tarraube, had assured the Protestants of his constant

A stant affection to their party. Montluc sends Captaine Pierot his sonne to suppress Bugale. Pierot treats with Bugale, and reapes the fruits which follow by his parlee. Captaine Mesmes led two hundred souldiers to fortifie Lecloure: Bugale causeth them to stay vpon the way, vnder colour to send them a guard to make their passage easie. And to this intent he speedily sends to field three hundred men at armes, and fise and forty Argoletiers, and himselfe leads other troops of foot to Tarraube, that by the weaking of Lecloure, Pierot might haue means with his men at armes, to stop the returne of the troops of Tarraube to Lecloure, and by the same stratagem cut off the passage for Captaine Mesmes, leauing him in prey at Roquebrune a poore village, from whence he passed through his enemies, being foure or fise to one, and retired into Bearne. Moreover, although Tarraube was furnished of meale and water, yet he kept his foot-men therein, that being besieged, they might more easily be at Pierot's mercy, as it afterwards fell out. And to fill vp the measure of his treacheries, soone after the yeelding vp of Tarraube, hee with a brother of his followed Pierot's Ensignes, and against his plight faith, he beheld him to cut in pieces two hundred thirty one prisoners at Tarraube, hang some, and ransome many. Montluc aduertised hereof, assembles the Commons with fix companies of foot, besiegeth Lecloure, makes a breach, giues an assault in foure places, Brimant giues him the repulse, hauing not with him above an hundred souldiers, a weake number, the which induced him in the end (together with the Quof Nauars treaty, to whom the town belonged to depart by composition. Now we must perform our promise touching the exploits of Duras in Guienne: with the first forces he had gathered together, he tried to assure Bourdeaux: but hauing failed of his designe, he chose the country betwixt the riuers of Garonne and Dordonne, to re-view his troops. S. Macaire gaue him bullets as he passed in stead of victuals, and kils some of his men. He is offended therewith, assaults the towne, forceth it, and takes his reuenge of the former outrage. Bury and Montluc pursue him, (they knew well that hauing slaine him, all Guienne vn furnished of a Commander, would be at their discretion:) they over-tooke him neere to Rozan, and charge him at their aduantage, being abandoned by the most part of his company, which were vnwarlike, and not capable of discipline. This first checke was sufficient to abandon all: yet the cause whereof he had taken the defence, did D summon him once more to trie the hazard of armes. He gathers together what hee can, assembles new forces, takes the way of Agenois and of Quercy, helps them of Agen, reuengeth his iniuries vpon Lauffet, as we haue heard, marcheth towards S. Antonin, and there fortifies himselfe with two companies of foot, led by Marchastel. His meaning was to goe into Languedoc, and to ioine with the Lord of Crusol: But the Earle of Rochefoucault inuities him to the succour of Orleanse, and for a guard, sends him Bordet, a valiant Gentleman of Xaintonge, with sixty horse, two hundred Argoletiers, and two Ensignes of foot. These troops consisting of about fise thousand men, horse and foot, march to Montauban, there they receiue men, munition, and artillery, and so turne to Xaintonge: in the way they force the Castle of Marcues, take the Bishop of Cahors, and threaten to hang him as the author of a massacre made of the Protestants within his Diocesse: fise or fix souldiers made satisfaction for this offence by their deaths.

Bordet had a spleene against them of Sarlat: they had in this passage slaine two of his Gentlemen. So at his perswasion Duras encampes before it the first of October. Bury and Montluc flye to succour it with a great number of horse, and some eight thousand foot. Duras raiseth the siege, and to lodge at ease, diuides his men into Heudreux, Ver, and other places neere: the rainy weather gaue them likewise some impression and confidence of the enemies temporizing. But they were vigilant, and fearing lesse the injury of the ayre then Duras, they came thundring vpon him. Without doubt when two armies are neere together, the first that makes his retreat giues the other an aduantage. Duras who supposed they had beene but the enemies scouts, determined to retire softly, and to lodge his men in safety: when as Bury and Montluc seeing him retire, charge him behind, and finding very small resistance, kil fise or six hundred of his souldiers, charge home to the artillery and baggage, kil 1500 seruants, & hang some prisoners, especially Ministers that followed the troops. But the booty qualifying the victors heat, gaue leisure to the first that fled, to set wings to their feet, and by a sudden flight to prolong their liues for some daies: for the most part of them that escaped, were taken againe, and led to Agen, and there hanged on a gibbet set vp exprefly, which they called the Confitory.

Battels are variable, and he is no Merchant that wins alwayes, saith the Proverb. Duras gathers together some remainders of this shipwracke, and advertised that Laumosner a Capitaine sent by sanjac to overthrow him quite, did attend him at Embowet with five hundred men, hee marcheth directly against his enemy, surprizeth him at the brake of dry, cuts in pieces both the Capitaine and his souldiers, reseruing three only to cary newes vnto sanjac, and by this foule slaughter reuengeth the disgrace which he had lately received: then most of his troops being gone, some to Rochel, some elsewhere, and hauing no man of command remaining, but his eldest sonne, Bordes, Puch, and his brother, with about forty Carabins, and eightheene hundred souldiers, halfe disarmed (his horsemen being gone before, and ioynd with Rochfoucault) hee recovered Orleance and there died vpon the conclusion of the peace. Through the absence of Duras the Protestants estate in Guienne was very lamentable, their bodies and goods left to the discretion of their enemies. Piles a Gentleman of Gascony, hearing of the outrages which Bury and Montluc committed without controule, parts from Orleance (hee came with the troops which Grandmont brought out of Gascony) and surmounting a world of difficulties, in the end he recouers his house neere vnto Bergerac, and notwithstanding the garison which the Duke of Montpensier had left there, he opens the prisons, and sets all them at liberty that were committed for matter of religion, and then retires to his house.

This new and bold attempt puts the Country into armes: all rise against Piles, who tooe to yeeld to violence, withdraws himselfe, being followed by fifteene horse, and hitheer Harguez on foot: at Montagnac hee surpriseth a Corner of sixscore light horse, commanded by Montcassin, hee kills their Leader, with fourtene others, and puts the rest to 1000; and by means of the horse which he recovered there, of good souldiers he made profitable men at armes. Piles had left la Riniere about Bergerac, a young gentleman, who (wedding the practice of armes to the study of the Lawes, from which hee was newly returned) became as soone a braue Capitaine, as a resolute souldier: for his first stratagem, hauing suddenly trooped together some twenty souldiers, and a good number of peasants with staves, he surpriseth Sainte Foy vpon Dordonne by scale, cuts the Corps de gard in pieces that was set in the market place, and commanding in the streets many and sundry things, as if he had beene followed by seuen or eight hundred men, hee slew Reau one of *Montluc*s Capitaines, his Lieutenant, his Prouost, with fourescore of his souldiers, and became absolute master of the place. Bury and Montluc chafing at this disgrace, recetued by an Apprentise in warre, lodge many troops betwixt Bergerac and Sainte Foy. But la Riniere hauing forced through the troop of Capitaine Salé, and a Squadron of horse, made his retreat, passed the River of Dordonne in safety, and went with his troop to ioyne with Capitaine Piles. Vpon the way, behold a band of souldiers encounter him being sent from his men, and as he enquired newes of Piles, they overthrow, hurt, and kill him. But passing ouer a bridge he casts himselfe into the water, recouers the contrarie brinke, and so saues himselfe at Hymet, a towne of Agnois, whereas Piles prepared for the surprize of Mucidan, the which Montluc thinking to take from him about the end of January 1563, by means of the Sneschall of Perigord, hee left the vnderaker confounded in his designe, and his troops put to flight. This successe giues courage to Piles: he attempts against Bergerac, and at the second charge enters it the 12 of March, putting three Corps de gard to the sword, and all such as could not in time recouer the Castle. The next day a tower being undermined, hauing smothered them that were within it, the Castle vnsurrounded of munition, yeelds at the victors discretion, who puts them all to the sword. Ah cruell and more then inciuill warre! What worse vylage could wee expect of straggers and barbarous people, whose inhumanity we willingly abhorre: and doe wee not tremble at the effusion of our Country-mens blood? In the Countries of Angoumois and Cognac, the Seigneur of Murron, by many murders, ransomings, and robberies, ransacking of wines and maids, and other oppressions which the war doth vially bring forth, reuenged the excess the Protestants had committed, in beating downe the images at Angoulême. In Xaintonge, Count Rochfoucault maintained their affaires, but the taking of Poitiers before described, & the defeat of Duras, caused the Protestants to be spoiled at Xaintes by Capitaine Mogret, and the exercise of their religion to be abolished at Rochel, and the neighbour Ilands, by the Duke of Montpensier. But alas, all these disorders and bloody confusions do not counteruaile the horrible furies of Tholoufa, & other places of the

A the Parliament of Languedoc. Toloufa is one of the greatest and best peopled cities of the Realme, and at that time the Protestants numbered aboute five and twenty thousand persons of their Religion, of all qualities, ages, and sexes. After the publication of the Edict of January, matters passed with great moderation vntill April. A little sparkle doth soone kinde a fire of sedition: and a small cause thrusts the seditious into furie, especially if the Magistrats (ordained rather to restrain the bloody-minded) doth countenance their insolencies. The buriall of a dead body was the Prologue to a horrible Tragedie, whereof the first act was played in the suburbs of Saint Michael, Saint Stephen, and S. Saluador: and so passed the wals, and put all the City into a mournfull confusion. The Parliament did winke at it, but the Capitols being more modest, employed their authority to quench these first flames, which must needs put all their State in combustion: foure of the most seditious being hanged, and two whipt, did make some satisfaction for the blood and death of such as were wounded, slaine, and cast into Wels. This pursuite makes the people mad. The Protestants, to warrant their liues, and to save themselves by some good capitulation, seize on a gate, and vpon the Towne-house. The Parliament stormes, calls in the Nobility, assembles the commons, giues authority to their furious armes, and by a generall proclamation, both within the City and abroad, commands them to arme, and to fall vpon the Huguenots, with warrant from the Pope, the King, and the Court of Parliament. Then they kill, they fill the prisons, they massacre many. When they find no holes to hold them, the ruer is heaped vp with carcasses: they cast them aliue out of the windowes, and if they labour to recouer the banks, they beat them downe with stones and staves. The Protestants shut vp in the Towne-house, and hauing no other hope but to despair of life, resolute to sell their liues dearly. They had Cannon, and with the thunder thereof amaze their enemies, they make many sallies with great effusion of blood on either side. They treat an accord with them: they demand an assurance of their liues and goods, with the obseruation of the Edict. It is refused: and so this vnciuill and scall combat continued many dayes. In the end, the 16 of May they grant them, To retire in safety, leaving their armes in the Towne-house. They goe forth towards night. But oh confusion! it is the best expedient to disarm an enemy with dispensation of conscience, with whom they will keepe no faith. At their going forth they imprison such as they can lay hand on, the rest escape by the gate which they held: some recouer Montauban, or other places of their partie, others are subiect to the mercy of the peasants and souldiers lying in the fields. So as aboute three thousand five hundred persons (saith the Originall) lost their liues in this mutiny.

The Catholiques are now absolute masters of the City: they beat downe the Protestants Temple, and foure dayes together they kill, imprison, and spoile. These broiles and popular tumuls haue oftentimes confounded the authors themselves, and the spoile of rich houses is a very dangerous and attractive bait. The Parliament knowes it well, and begins now to feare, lest the insolvency of such, to whom they had giuen liberty, should fall vpon themselves. They therefore leaue a sum of money to content the companies, and to void the towne of them. So Montluc and Terrides march against Montauban, Fourquenax against Beziers, Atrepoix the younger against Limoux. The Court hauing the gouernment without controule, displace two and twenty Councillors that were least partiall, and most suspected with some chiefe men: condemne prisoners, and from the end of May vnto February following, they execute by diuers manners, foure hundred persons.

This massacre of Toloufa, that of Gaillac in Albigeois against eightscore persons, and the approach of Bury and Montluc, had so amazed the inhabitants of Montauban, as they abandon the towne: but the taking of Agen, and the troubled Estate of Bordeaux (as we haue heard called away both of them for this time. In the meane time, Arpajon and Mar-chesse putting two thousand men into Montauban, had put new courage into them, when as newes comes that Montluc and Terrides came to besiege them with a thousand horse, and five thousand foot: the which made the Capitaines take a new resolution to goe to Orleance: the people are amazed, feare drives many out in confusion, the drum sounds, they issue forth tumultuously, forsake the towne, and abandon the gates. But which was the better expedient, either to die in defence of their houses and families, or to fall into the hands of the enemy, from whom they might expect no mercy? The most part being surprised in the fields, were forced to yeeld their throats to their swords that pursued them, others brought to Toloufa ended their liues vpon sundry gibbets: the Captaines and some few others recovered the towne. The 24 of May, Montluc arriues, but being content with some skirmishes, and to haue wasted the coine, hee retired to make a greater leape. He returns in September following, with nine companies of men at armes, a great number of voluntary Gentlemen, five and twenty Ensignes of foot, four companies of Arquebiers, and three of Spaniards, which made twelue hundred men, and thirteene peeces of Artillery. The partie was stronger on either side then at the first, for Duras and Marchaisel were entred, vnder hope to lead both the companies and Cannon to Orleans. So as Montluc hauing lost some six hundred men in diuers skirmishes, and refused to fight with Duras, who offered him battell, he retired the second time.

Then Duras and Marchaisel leading away the troops, vnfurnished the towne of two great Cannons, and two field Pieces, the which were afterwards lost in the battell of Ver. Montluc aduertised of the estate of Montauban by Fontgrau, one of the Captaines of the towne, hastens thither, offers a scalado, and giues the alarme in three parts. Two hundred recover the first curtaine, being followed by the two Ensignes of Bazourdan. Laboria borne in the towne and a Captaine there, beats them back, and with the slaughter of two hundred of their men, forceth them to leaue their attempt to winne it by force. The thirteenth of October, they batter it with nine peeces of Artillery, and continuing untill the 22 of the moneth, he beats downe a peece of the wall. Bazourdan will needs discouer the breach: but being shot in aboute the left pap, he could not returne with any newes. The next day they giue a furious assault: the more courageously the assailants presse them, the more resolutely the assailed defend themselves, men, women, and children, euery one in his place. Oftentimes they obtaine that vnder the Foxes skinne, which the Lyon cannot effect. Laboria might doe much to draw the Inhabitants to composition. Terrides promisseth him the government of the Towne, vnder the Kings authority, and three companies entertained. He accepts this offer. But his new proceeding brings him presently into suspect, so as hauing no more credit, and the Citizens resolute not to giue care to any Capitulation with men, who hauing (say they) no faith, cannot keepe it with any. Laboria followed by his Sergeant, retires himselfe to Terrides campe: from that time vntill the fifth of April, being the day of the publication of the peace, the siege passed in assaults, sallies, and skirmishes, wherein the besiegers lost aboute two thousand men, with a great number of Captaines and worthy Gentlemen without any profit.

Carcassonne, Castelnauary, Reuel, and Limoux were partakers of these disorders. The Protestants of Carcassonne had their exercise in the suburbs. The 16 of March, 1562 the Catholikes hauing taken view of foure or five thousand men, giue an alarm to the protestants assembled in the suburbs: they made them leaue the place at the sound of their Cannon, drums and trumpets: they pursue them, kill, hurt, hang, and ranfome them. Castelnauary was subiect to the like fortune, about fifty persons were murdered with the like fury and popular tumult. Those of Reuel hearing of the confusion at Toloufa, saved themselves at Castres, and elsewhere, leauing their families and goods to the mercy of theuees and robbers. Some being apprehended by vertue of a commission granted by the Parliament, were led to Toloufa, and condemned, some to the gallies, others were fined, and some banished. At Limoux they had an advantage ouer the Catholikes: but Pomus being entred with terne companies, and eight hundred Bandaliers, Spaniards for the most part, and the Marshall of Mirepoix being sent by the Parliament, the towne was subiect to the will of the stronger, and suffered the ordinary insolencies of conquerors, spoiles, murders and rapes. He that sees his neighbours house on fire should looke to his owne. So the Protestants of Beziers aduertised of the murder of Rassy, draw some souldiers vnto them, and ruine the images in all the Churches. Beaudiné chiefe of the Protestants troops assisted them, and by the taking of Magzlas and Espignan, strong places which did much annoy Beziers, assured the towne to their party. Ioyenze followed by 5000 men, and 12 peeces of artillery, crossed their attempts, and hauing at the second assault forced Lezignan, and taking Montagnac by composition, he tooke the way to Pezenas. Beaudiné comes against him, and might easily haue defeated him, but five hundred Crownes, which the Master of his Campe had receiued of Ioyenze, with promise of a thousand more, made him lose about six-score Souldiers, and by the rout of his companies, opened

A opened the gates of Pezenas to Ioyenze. Beziers was ready to receiue a law from him: but the sacke and murder of their neighbours, and the feare of the like vlsage, made them to shut their gates against him, and to goe to field, to force and burne Lignan, with the defeat of two companies that kept it: and then to surprize Seruiat, to force the Garrison of Casouls, scale Villeneufue neere vnto Beziers, and so to preserve themselves vntill the publication of the peace.

Beaucaire feared the like vlsage to Limoux: they therefore obtaine two companies from Nismes. S. Veran a Beauuoisin, with Sernus and Bouillargues led them, they assure the towne and castle, ruine images and altars, and then retire, leauing a company for the safety of B their companions. To encounter them, the Catholiques by twy-light bring in a great number of souldiers attired like peasants, and in the night open the gates to fifteen or sixteen hundred men, who coming from Tarascon, separated onely by the Rhone, made their coming famous by blood and spoile. The Protestants recouer the castle, and speedily call backe Sernus and Bouillargues, who returned to Nismes. They turne head: Sernus enters into the castle, and so descending into the towne, surprizeth his enemies, kills a great number, and pardons such as laying downe their armes craue mercy. Bouillargues coming from the rescue of the booty which they caried away, and weary with killing them that fled, he likewise enters into the towne, and puts all to the sword that hee encounters. Thus Beaucaire remained in the Protestants hands, vntill the Edict of peace.

C The like feare troubled them of Montpellier. The proceedings at Toloufa and other places amazed them: they fortifie themselves, raze the suburbs, in a manner as great as the towne, beat downe thirty Churches, and by these ruines make themselves able to sustaine a siege which threatened them. The enemy discharged his choller vpon certaine shut lodging in an old tower ill flanked, a league from the towne, who hauing yeelded to haue their liues saved, were notwithstanding slaine as they came forth. The like chance fell vpon the Captaine, and twenty souldiers that were in Maguelone, and deferuently, according to the diuine Iustice, hauing treacherously sold the Castle. At that time the Lords of Suze and Sommerie, the chiefe of the Catholikes army in Languedoc, had passed the Rofae with about three thousand foot, foure hundred Masters, and three Cannons, with an intent to besiege Saint Giles, a small towne vpon the Rhone. Beaudiné vpon this aduice, D parts from Montpellier, he speedily assembles six hundred horse, and eight hundred foot, vnder the command of Bouillargues, Albenas, and Grille: he is aduertised by some prisoners of a disorder in the enemies campe: he marcheth towards them, and chargeth presently. Suze and Sommerie turne their backs, their Captaines and Souldiers are amazed and run away: Bouillargues follows them that flye: not one makes resistance. Grille falls out likewise, and both jointly doe kill, what by the sword, and water, 2000 men, and win all their baggage, being richly furnished, as to a certaine victory, with two Cannons, (the Culuerin being sunke in the Riuer of Rhone) 22 Ensignes, and the Colonels guidon. This victorie makes them proud, and Grille contemning the aduice which was giuen him, suffered E himselfe within a few dayes after to be surprised and taken at Arenasses, to lose an hundred or six-score souldiers, his troops to be put to flight towards Lunel, Manguel, and Sommieres, and had it not bene for the arriual of Beaudiné, who freed him, hee had remained a trophie to his enemy.

In the meane time Ioyenze (seeing the plague to waste his men daily) retires from the Campe before Montpellier: it was rather to free the inhabitants from icalousie. He had practised certaine intelligences within the town, but the iustice of God brought two of the chiefe Merchants to be a spectacle vpon a scaffold for other crimes: who hauing confessed the treason, euen as the sword hung ouer their heads, ended Ioyenzes practices with their liues.

F His attempts vpon Agde were as fruitlesse, and much more preiudiciall vnto him: for being repulled by Sanglas from a scalado, and two assaults, Bouillargues cut off two hundred and seuentie of his men in his retreat, hauing diuided them into three bands. Hee drew three hundred Catholiques lodged within Avamon, into an ambuscado, slue the most part of them, and soon after seized on Saint Laurent in the Comtat, hee chased five and thirty Italian Lancers, three-score Arquebiers, and a company of foot. But the course of his prosperity was somewhat stayed by the death of Rays, Guidon of his company, and of Captaine Aisse, who kept the tower of Carbonicre seated in the Marshes of Aiguefortes, and did wonderfully molest the said towne, it being surprisid in an ambuscado, and they slay the twelfth of Nouember. The death of these men was recompensed with the slaughter of fourescore, surprisid and slaine by them of Montpellier, within Bourg, a small towne vpon Rhone, besides a great number that were drowned; seeking to saue themselves by the said Riuer. This happy successe inuited them to new attempts. A company of the enemies lodged in Agnanc, and spoiled the Country. Rapin Gouvernor of Montpellier, being followed by five hundred shot, and Gremians troop of horse, awaked them in the night, about Christmas, surprisid some asleepe, others in their shirts, slue the greatest number, and brought the rest prisoners to Montpellier. The yeare ended with the taking of Saint Paul and Damiette, separated by the riuer of Agout, be. B sieged, battered, and within three dayes taken from the Protestants by Pieros sonne to Montluc, with great slaughter. A Galcon Capitaine hauing slaine a Priest of purpose or other wise, made them beleuee it was the Minister: within few dayes after hee went to Castres, where the Protestants had still the better during these inciuill troubles. Let vs briefly looke into the Prouinces of Viuretz, Rouergue, Giuaudan and the County of Foix. In April the Protestants of Nonnay become masters of the towne, beginning presently to beat downe images: they opened and publicly burnt the relike which they call of Holy vertues. Doubtlesse, if man could iudge by the present what would after chance, he would restraîne his passions. For the interchange of worldly things suffers most offences at length to find a reuenge. The towne was vnfurnished of armes, and Sarras vnder C gouernor (threatened with a siege) goes forth the 22 of October: the next morning he comes at the breake of day to Saint Estienne in Forest (the abundance of armes and hardnesse that is forged there, makes the towne famous) sets fire to the Gates, and takes and packes vp such armes as he needed. But oh man! remember that thou shalt be measured with the same measure wherewith thou hast measured thy neighbour, and whilest thou dost loiter and linger behind with thy souldiers to search houses for the goodliest armes and the fairest women, thou giuist thine enemy leisure to prepare thee a portion full of bitterness. Saint Chaumont sent by the Duke of Nemours (who then made warre in Lionnois) encounters him, chargeth and takes him prisoner, hurts and kils about six-score men of his troop: and from that time those of Nonnay lay open to many outrages. He gathers D the commons together, besiegeth the towne, wanting both men, armes, and a Commander: he enters, sheds as much blood as he pleaseth, spoiles it, fires it, and burnes two and twenty houses: then vpon a brute of the Baron of Adretz approach with stronger and greater forces, he dislodgeth without Trumpet, and seemes rather to flie then retire.

The first taking of Nonnay.

About the end of the yeare, Saint Martin, by the commendement of the Lord of Crussol, and the Cardinall of Chastillon, then Gouvernors of Guienne and Dauphiné, vnder the Prince of Condes authority, came to Nonnay, repaired the ruines, and provided for the defence thereof, leauing Capitaine Prost, le Mas, and Mongroft there. S. Chaumont flies thither with foure thousand men, but visit to force places well furnished, hee treats with the Citizens, offers an honest composition as well for themselves as for their strangers. E They accept it, the strangers depart, and the same night S. Chaumont cauleth or suffereth his men to enter, who forgetting no kind of inhumanity, murder some, others they cast from an high tower, some they burne in their houses, many they make to leape out at the windowes, beat them downe vpon the pavement, stab them in the streets, sell prisoners by the Drum, and for want of buyers they murder them in the place, and burne the houses for want of present money to redeeme them: there were six-score by this meanes burnt to ashes. And to fill vp the measure of this horrible confusion, wiues and maids were barbarously rauished, corne and other things which could not be caried, was scattered about: the heads of wine-vessels beaten out, the wals for the most part beaten downe to the ground, the towers dismantled, and the gates caried away. Bonlieu a small towne neere vnto F Nonnay, did accompany it in this lamentable defolation.

In Rouergue, Valsergues one of *Montluc*s Lieutenant, and Capitaine of the Garison of Villefranche, hauing wonderfully oppressed the Protestants of that place, and the Nobility of Rouergue, those of Villeneufue, Perrouffe, Froissac, Saignac, la Guepie, Espailon, Saint Afrique, those of Brescul, Compeyre, Millau, Saint Felix, Cornus, and of Pont Camates, resolved to defend themselves, and by their constant resolution had made frustrate their enemies attempts, if two of their Captains had not by their ouerthrow shaken their

A their affaires. About thirty men led by Peigre, going out of Millau to refresh Compeyre, besieged by Vesin and others, were cut in pieces, their leader led to Toloufa, was at the instance of the Cardinall of Armagnac quartered aliue. And Saignac hauing failed in an enterprise he had vpon Villefranche, was inuited in the castle of Granes, where for want of water, hee was forced to accept his life to be saued, and theirs that followed him, being about a hundred souldiers: notwithstanding, all but six or seuen were put to the sword.

B These tempests fell likewise vpon Giuaudan, those of Ceuennes entering into Quacé, burnt the Image of our Ladie, and made a booty of two hundred and fourescore Markes of siluer, of the reliques and ornaments of the Church being molten. But this prosperitie was like a fire of straw, wherein they often confound themselves in their ouer-weening. Afterwards they campe before Mendes; and in the end of Iuly, they enter by composition, but they suffer one Copier to change his profession of a Minister to a Capitaine, to order the Treasure, and to dispose of matters of warre: who vnder this rash presumption, sends about six-score men to another enterprise, vnder the conduct of a Hosiier of Alby called La Croix, as very a nouice in matters of warre, as his pretended Colonell, Treillans the younger, sends part of his men, who surpriseth them in the field, and out of order, and kils the most part: and hee with the rest of his troope, rides directly to Mendes: he enters without any difficulty, carries away the Gouverneur, spoiles what hee pleaseth, and leaues the rest to the discretion of other bands, who laying hold vpon Copier, make him yeeld an account of his vsurped gouernment: notwithstanding some troops of his party rescued him within few dayes after, and brought him backe late and found with his companions. The Prouince of Giuaudan enioyed then some rest, when as the Barons of Guise, and Saint Vidal, Treillans and others came to molest it. They make a troope of two thousand men in the beginning of October, to ioyne with royenne at the siege of Montpellier: but the defeat of their men at Saint Giles, made them to change their designe, and to attempt Floras. Eight men onely commanded by Boissy a valiant souldier of Montpellier, kept it. The besiegers vsd both battery, scaldado, assault, mynes, and parle, and get nothing but blowes. In the end a report flying of the D coming of Beaudiné to succour the besieged, they raise their campe with confusion and disorder.

Marshallst, a Castle belonging to the Seigneur of Peyre a Protestant, had another issue. Cossart Gouverneur of Rocoles, besieged it in the beginning of February, and hauing taken it by treason, hee kept his faith with the souldiers like vnto Granes, which then was vsed as a Prouerbe in the mouthes of Protestants. Peyre afterwards incourted Cossart, slue three-score and ten of his men, and recovered his house. These confusions continued still euen after the publication of Peace: for the Baron of La Fare hauing tryed by all meanes (saith the Originall) to haue a maid of excellent beauty at his pleasure, besieged Floras the fifth of Aprill. But Beaudiné making hast to succour it, preferred both the E virgins chastitie, and the Citizens blood. The Lord of Pailles, Senechal for the King of Nauarre, in the County of Foix, fed the Protestants with words. The desolation of Toloufa made him to change his copy. So the Wolfe (according to the Fable) hauing sent away the dogges, doth then breake into the fold, and deuours the sheepe at his pleasure. Hee aduiseeth such as hee feared among the Protestants (seeing they had bene charged with the beating downe of Images and Altars) to retire themselves: else hee should be forced to imprison them. This terrour chalet many. Pailles entering into the towne, puts some in prison, and so terrifies others, as they were glad to leaue the towne. Of the prisoners, two were beheaded, two burnt, six hanged, six and twenty condemned to death, ten to the gallies, and the goods of them that were fled abandoned in prey to the souldiers: the other townes of the County terrified with his stratagem, accepted such conditions as Pailles would prescribe them.

F Onely Pamiers resisted. The towne belonged to the Queene of Nauarre, and the number of the Protestants was great. Man hath meanes to preserve himselfe from humane forces, but what harbour, what shelter can protect him from the wrath of heauen? Men make warre one against another, and two parties seeke one anothers destruction: but God with the same arme strikes both the one and the other, and it falls vpon whom he pleaseth. The Catholikes of Pamiers seeke all meanes to oppress the Protestants, and the the Protestants to crosse the practices of their enemies, when as a common scourge affires them both. The plague comes into the towne, and in few weekes takes away three thousand Citizens. But (a strange thing) of all this great number they did not account above fifty Protestants: so as subsisting in the midst of this mortality, and by this means protected from the injuries of their enemies abroad, they succour their neighbours of Castres, kill the Vicont of Seres and his brother, with the greatest part of three hundred men which he commanded, and so disperse the rest, as the way was open for them to recover their houses: where discovering a practice made by some begging Friars, to bring in Pailles and others, they made such a spoile in their Couents, as neuer after were they more scene or heard of. This bloody stratagem amazed the Priests and Chanoines. They saw themselves in the towne of Foix, where they spoile their houses and the Bishops. As one mischief follows another, the peace being concluded, in the beginning of May, a furious haile continuing by fits for the space of three weekes about Foix, cuts the corne and all greene things, so as there was no hope of fruit. The Commons murine, accuse the Clergy, being fled, to be the motives of this tempest, & were ready to fall vpon them. They auoid this popular fury, and retire to Maugency.

Let vs change our Climate, and turne into Gaule Lioinois. The last of April the Protestants were seized of Lyons at two of the clocke after mid-night, without any slaughter but of two men. The Lord of Sule had the first government. Amongst many of the Princes faction which posted thither, the Baron of Adretz (a valiant man, but proud and cruel) seized on the government. The Prince sent afterwards Poncenat and Changy: the first to command the horse, the last the foot.

Hereupon the Baron of S. Vidal and other Auernacs advanced, with three or foure thousand men, to wait the cuntry of Lioinois, whilst the D. of Nemours assembled an armie of Bourguignons, Auernacs, and Foreins, for the siege of Lyons. Poncenat with five hundred men goes to discover them, chargeth them at the first approach, makes such a slaughter, as by their rout he ouerthrowes their designe, and pursuing his victory, neere vnto Fours in Forest, he encounters with some troops of horse, which made against him: he chargeth them, puts them to flight, and presently forceth the towne of Fours, where most of them that fled had saved themselves.

Des Adretz arises, who hauing resisted the forces of Sommerive, Suize, Carres, Maugiron, and others, brought home places vnder his subiection, and amongst others Montbrison the chiefe of the Prouince. But there he blemished the reputation which hee had gotten in Dauphiné, and by his cruelty did violate the lawes of humanitie, and made himselfe odious, the which plunged him into many miseries, as we shall see hereafter. One afternoon hee tooke a delight to see many prisoners leape out of the high tower of Montbrison, amongst the which there were some Gentlemen of account. Soubize comes to Lyons, being sent by the Prince of Conde, with the title of Lieutenant and Gouernor: and did so politickely handle the violent disposition of Adretz, as he perswaded him to returne into Dauphiné, where hee did goodly exploits. But this decay of his authoritie did presently discontent the Baron: who on this first spleene laid the leaue of a speedy remede.

The siege of Lyons.

On the other side, Tanannes, approached with five thousand French, and three thousand Italians, led by the Earle of Anguiole, not with any intent to force the towne, but to binder the haruest and the vintage. These Italians had many goats, so as in detestation of this horrible medley, the peasants cast all their goats among the Carion where they passed. The Duke of Nemours arises, with the title of the Kings Lieutenant general, and for the first fruits of his armes, he recieues Vienna vpon Rhone by composition, by the fauour of the Catholikes: hee kills few, and spoiles much. The taking of this towne threatened their victuals at Lyons. Soubize, to haue means to keepe the field, calls backe Adretz and the Prouengals. He brings foure or five thousand foot, and foure hundred horse.

The Baron of Adretz arrives.

The Duke conceiuing an assured hope of victory by the weakenesse of their horse, encounters them, puts them twice in rout neere to Beaupaire, but with small losse: and if the conduct and resolution of Adretz, with the advantage of the place, had not fauoured him, he had then receiued a mate. Hauing speedily rallied his troopes, he incamps within two leagues of Vienna, holding the Duke of Nemours occupied with continuall skirmishes,

A misfines, whilst Soubize gathered in victuals. Hereupon a packet comming from Orleanse to Soubize, falls into the hands of the Marshall of Brissac. Amongst other Letters one from the Admirall contained: That he must endure the violence of the Baron of Adretz as much as he could, lest of an insolent man he should make him mad. This was a fit expedient to put the Baron into furie. Brissac hauing presently sent S. Sernin to Nemours and Adretz, causeth them to enter into strange practices one with another. Soubize (who was alwayes vigilant both at home and abroad) and had (as the History commends him) spent largely vpon spyes, discouers presently their secret intelligences, causeth the Baron to be apprehended, and by the commandement of Crussol and the Cardinal of Chastillon sends him vnder sure guard to Nismes, whereas nothing but the benefit of a peace, whereby presently followed, persued him from the danger of death. Notwithstanding the Duke making his profit of the Barons practices, drawes neere to Lyons, and by sundry skirmishes cuts off their victuals. But he that vndertakes too much, speeds but ill. At one instant he attempts both Romance and Valence. The whole body of his army was necessary for this designe: and whilst that he seeks to deuoure all at once, he loseth all. He tries all his wits, and employs all his deuices to vanquish Lyons, and vpon hope to be assisted by them of the towne that were of his faction, he attempts it by scallous in diuers parts, but all in vaine. He is ill serued both within and without, and so rudely entertained by Soubize, as he must now put on another personage. He helps himselfe with the newes C of the bataille of Dreux, and proclaimes this victory. But now he finds out a new practice, whereby he hopes to attaine his desire.

Mark Herlin, Receiver of the Impost at Lyons, had been taken in skirmish in the month of February 1563. To giue two strokes with one stone, to save his life or his ranfome, and to mocke the Duke, he giues him to vnderstand, That hee had means to doe the King a notable seruice: that they had accustomed to employ him in the guard of the towne, and to trust him with many matters of weight: that if he will grant him liberty, he will watch some convenient time, to giue him entrance at Saint Inss gate, whereby hee should bring in a sufficient number of men to make himselfe Lord of the towne. Wee easily beleue that which is plausible to our desires. The Duke accepts this offer: he frees Herlin, but as D if he had escaped of himselfe, Herlin comes to Lyons: imparts it to Soubize, then returns to Nemours, and appoints him the 7 of March following.

The cue before this pretended execution, Soubize plants his artillery in the night, to scoure the streets, lodgeth three or foure thousand shot in the bulwarques, walls and houses of approach, and appoints Poncenat with his troope of horse to follow them. The day being come, Nemours approacheth: they giue him a signe from a small tower. Three thousand foot enters into the suburbs of Saint Inss, and from thence advance vnto the gate, Herlin goes to meet them and brings them in. But being entred by the wicket, he suddenly shuts it. The artillery playes, and two or three hundred muskets and all the other shot discharge vpon them: Blacons, Poyer, Andefroy and Entreagues pursue them with six hundred choice Harguebuziers, who defeat them quite: and if the horsemen had made speed, scarce any one had caried newes of this stratagem to his companions. Four hundred were slaine in the suburbs, many without, and a greater number ended their liues flying to the campe at Vienna and other places. This disgrace did so trouble the Duke, as he continued two moneths sicke in his bed, and in the meane time a Peace was concluded.

A stratagem
of Nemours.

The first ciuill tumult in Dauphiné, was at Romans. La Mothe-Gondrin, Lieutenant to the D. of Guise in that Prouince, would haue bearen downe a house, whereas the Protestants had heard some Sermons. The Protestants troope suddenly together: and if he had not retired himselfe, they had put him in danger of his life. The second happened at Valence but fatal to the author: the 25 of April was the day of the election of new Consuls and of Councillors at Valence, La Mothe meaning his Pistoll should giue the first voice, and then to haue such named as he pleased, hee sends some horse out of the towne, either to prevent that none should come to crosse his designs, or to cut such in pieces as should seek to escape: he causeth the gates to be shut, enuiours the place of the assembly with armed men: he enters it with a fauchion in one hand, and his Pistoll in the other, the which hee discharged vpon a Secretary of his whom he findes there. The Protestants doubting that Gondrin would begin with them: a number of them retired into a house, and resolute to defend their liues.

But

But as they came to force them, they slip out at a backe doore, and recover Saint Felix gate, where discovering Gondrin's horse leaping the Plaines, they cover themselves within the gate. These horsemen encountering no man, fall vpon some Countrey-men that came to Valence, and kill some of them, whose bodies are brought to the towne vpon ladders: for with out-rage the people require iustice. The next day being Sunday, the Protestants stirre not: they feared lest by reason of others of their party which came from all parts as the report of the former daies worke, some new tumult should arise. Gondrin commends them, and with sweet words perswades them to goe out of the towne for the exercise of their religion: that in doing so, they shall shew themselves obedient to the Edict. When they are abroad, they discover, or at the least imagine, that they seeke to surprize them: some runne to the gate: others enter the towne, and seize vpon the other gates. Munday morning, the whole party armes, they besiege Gondrin's house and fire it, who being retired into the next, he was slaine with six or seven of his household seruants: his house sacked, and to appease the multitude, they hang his carcase at a window towards the street. These are the effects which the insolenencies of an armed multitude brings forth.

They proceed yet farther: the report of images beaten downe in many other Provinces, transports them to the like insolenencies: they chose the Baron of Adretz, chiefe by prouision in Dauphiné, attending a confirmation, or some other certaine nomination by the Prince of Conde. The Baron (to make the entrance of his authoritie famous) sends boldly to the Parliament of Grenoble: that they should thrust out of the towne, the second President, the Attorney General, the Advocate of the towne, the fourth Consull, and some others, whom he termed seditious, and therefore hee threatened to hang them. These men, without either commandement or compulsion, were glad by a voluntarie exile to avoid the Barons threats.

The Protestants thus freed, seize vpon the gates of Grenoble the first of May, enter into the Priests, ouerthrow Altars and Images, plant the exercise of their religion: and for the security of the towne, bring in a company of foot sent by Adretz, who to encounter Maugiron (that termed himselfe the Kings Lieutenant Generall in Dauphiné) came in the end to Grenoble with a troope of horse and foot. Their first warre was against Images and reliques, afterwards they seize vpon the castles of Bissiere and Mirebell, and burnt the great house of the Carthusians, three leagues from Grenoble. Whilest these layle in full seas with a prosperous winde, behold others suffer a most pitifull ship-wracke. The massacre of Vassy, the Italian troopes of Fabricio Serbellone, a Bolois in Auignon, and those of Prouence ioyned with Fabricio, terrified the Protestants of Auranges neere vnto Auignon, who to crosse the intelligences, which they said these troopes had in Auranges, protect themselves with six hundred men. Moreover, Fabricio writes to Sommerine: That seeing he hath an army ready, he should performe a great worke, to bring it speedily before Auranges, whether there resorted daily a great multitude of Huguenots. If they were not suppressed at their first beginning, not onely Auignon should be annoyed, but also all Prouence receiue great harme. So Sommerine and Suze march against Auranches, and at the first finde good meanes to ruine the towne. Parpaille President in the Parliament of Auranges, had beene taken at Bourg vpon Rhone returning from Lions, where he had beene to make prouision of armes, for whose rescue the troopes of Auranges, being of their neighbour towne runne to Bourg. Sommerine and Suze fortified with many companies of Dauphiné and Auignon, besiege Auranges being without souldiers, they batter, make abreach, force it, and forget no kinde of cruelty that the Victors furie doth vniuallly inuent. All are put to sword without distinction of age, sexe, quality: and by a new kinde of death practised since in ciuill warres. they cast some downe vpon the souldiers Halberds, they burne others, tyed to their hookes in chimneys, they hang men, women, and children at their windowes, they throw some with their harguebuzes, murder others in their mothers armes: and to finish this desolation, they sacke and burne the towne, castle, palace and bishops house: six weekes after, Parpaille at the instance of the Vicelégat of Auignon lost his head.

But alas! this was (as they say) but to anger a Hornet. The Baron of Adretz studies of nothing but reuenge. Hee runnes, hee cries out, hee stormes, and full of indignation and threats, beats Pierrelate, and forceth it in few houres, puts all that he finds armed to the sword, enters in fury into the Castle guarded by three hundred souldiers of the troopes of falling on of Auranches.

A of Suze; some he kills, others he casts downe, nor one escapes; with the like fury he takes the towne of Bourg. Pont S. Esprit brings him their keyes. He forceth Boulene a frontier of the Coniat, purseth the company of Capitaine Barcelasse to the sword, and threatened Auignon: when as newes came that Maugiron was entred by intelligence into Grenoble, where he spoiles, kills, and drownes. He poseth thither, affutes himselfe of Romans by the way, reduceth S. Marcelin to his deuotion, and puts three hundred of Maugiron's men to the sword. Maugiron fearing the fury of this man, retires into Sauoy, and from thence into Bourgongne to Tannier, leading with him all those of his faction: and the 26 of Iune Adretz re-enters into Grenoble, settles things in their former estate, and then hee marcheth into Forest, as we haue seene.

B Behold strange alterations: Suze and Fabricio beheld the Barons actions being in safety: his passage into Forest, draws them not to field. Mombrun makes head against them, and by the taking of Moras, doth partly reuenge the spoiles of Auranges. Suze will haue his reuenge, and comes to besiege Boulenc: but finding nothing but blowes to be gotten, hee goes and spoiles Vaurcas, in the County of Venaissin: and thinking to enlarge his limits, hee meetes with the Baron, who with a fury (without viewing or giuing him leisure to arange his troopes) doth charge him, defeats him, cuts in pieces the most part of his foot, kills him, with many Gentlemen, and wins his artillerie: but he shall not keepe it long. Then extending his victory, he vndertakes the defence of Cisteron, threatened by Sommerine, forceth S. Laurent des Arbres, and Roquemaur a strong place: takes and burnes the Castle of Pont Sorgues, kills all Fabricio's Souldiers that kept it, and the next day surprizeth Fabricio himselfe, and chafeth him euen vnto the gates of Auignon.

C As he continues his course along the riuier of Durance, and findes nothing to stay the violence of his victories, newes comes of the Prouengals ariuall at Gaillon. Hee wades through the riuier the first of September, chargeth them at the first, kills the most part, and puts the rest to flight. But in stead of going directly to Cisteron, whether hee had sent Mombrun with five hundred men, and the Cannon taken from Suze (he had some spleene against Mauvais, Capitaine of Cisteron) he takes the longer way by the Plaines: whereof D followed the ouerthrow of Mombrun, the losse of his artillerie, and the taking of Cisteron, as we shall see.

E Adretz had left the Councillor Ponnet for his Lieutenant at Grenoble: a man more capable of law, then fit for armes. Hereupon Vinay takes an occasion to attempt against the towne. Saint Mauris and La Coche receiue him so roughly, as the death of threecore of his best Spaniards and Italians, at the first skirmish, makes him to leaue Grenoble, to goe burne the peasants houses in the valley of Pragala. In the end, the course of the Barons prosperities is stayed by the taking of Vienne, and of the Castle of Piper, and by the two feuell ouerthrowes he had at Beau-repaire, whereof followed this change of sides, and the losse of the reputation and credit which he had gotten among his followers, as we haue heard. These losses caused the siege of Grenoble, whereof Ponnet (being called away by Adretz) had left the defence to La Coche. Six thousand men campe before it. But a goodly designe, and easie to be effected is often made frustrate by the discord of the Commanders. Many heads are the cause that Grenoble holds firme. They assaile it, but slowly: their victuals now growing short, after three weekes siege, pressed La Coche to capitulate, when as Capitaine Furmier, hauing assembled six or seven hundred foot, and four-score horse, passeth the riuier of Isère, surmounteth the straight of the Mountaine, forceth them that kept it, and aduanceth vnto the riuier of Drac neere to Grenoble. Meaning to ferry ouer, he sees the passage guarded by three or four hundred horse, with a great number of foot, and discovers another troope in ambush within the next wood, to charge

F him behind. He retires, & with a counterfeite feare, makes shew to turne backe: the enemy pursues him, he turns head against them, wades through the riuier of Drac, chargeth the first he meetes, breakes them, and by the resolution of his passage, in the face of so many enemies, he amazeth all the troope, scattereth and chafeth them with great slaughter: and this vnexpected ariuall, strikes such a terror in the campe, as every one abandons the trenches: every man flies, and staves not vntill they haue recovered the marches of Sauoy. Crisol had recovered Serignon and Auranges in base Dauphiné. La Coche surpriseth the Tower of Lempis, in the beginning of the yeare 1563, whilest those of Grenoble victualled viſualized their place, and prepared to endure a ſecond ſiege. About the end of February, A there comes againſt them 8000 men, foot, and horſe: two great Cannons, and three field pieces: La Coche had to make head againſt them, beſides the citizens, fix hundred good ſouldiers, nine brave Capitaines, and ſome voluntarie Gentlemen, who hauing repulſed the aſſailants at their firſt aſſault, preferred, with the points of their ſwords, both the ſack of the citie, and the blood of their citizens.

Let vs paſſe into Prouence. The Earle of Tende was Gouverneur and his two ſonnes, Sommerive (iſſued of the firſt wife) was Lieutenant for the King in his fathers abſence. Cipierre, being then very yong, borne of the ſecond wife, and the Lord of Cardet of the houſe of Saluſſes, ſonne-in-law to the ſaid Earle, were (as many others did vaunt in thoſe dayes) maſtices which did defend the Proteſtants troope. Sommerive, a violent man and too bloody, did ſuddenly incenſe all Prouence againſt them: and being armed with force, he made his government famous by a horrible and generall execution of men diſ-membred, hanged, burned, cut in pieces being alive, drawne through the ſtreets, caſt downe head-long, ſtabbed, ſtarved, and ſuch like miſeries. The Earle his father, abhorring this generall deſolation, and not able by his authoritie to diuert his ſonne from the wicked proceeding, gathers together what force he can: giues the command of the horſe to Cipierre, and of the foot to Cardet, who by their armes kept all the townes beyond the riuier of Durance (except Pertuis) vnder their command.

On the other ſide, Sommerive, after the executions of Auranges before deſcribed, C hauing taken muſter of fifty enſignes of foot, and ſome Cornets of horſe, flies furiously to the ſiege of Ciſteron, being full of many Proteſtant families, that were retired thither, and manned with eleuen companies vnder the Lord of Beauueu, nephew to the Earle of Tende, and three hundred men commanded by Furmeier. The eleuenth of Iuly, Sommerive giues three aſſaults, continued from three of the clocke in the afternoone vntill night. Moſt of the moneth was ſpent in ſkirmiſhes: the priſoners on either ſide finding no mer-cie, nor grace of the ſouldiers. In the end, Sommerive (ſearing ſome new checke by the hands of Adretz, who had lately wonne the bataille of Vourdas) he went and intrenched himſelfe three leagues from Ciſteron. Cardet approacheth, but hee cannot by any deuice draw his brother-in-law out of his trenches. So the Earle of Tende, diſtreſt for victuals, D raiſeth his campe, puts ſome of his troopes into Ciſteron, and ſends the reſt to Adretz.

The ſecond Siege.

Mambrun
deſcended.

Sommerive doubles his courage and force, and the ſeuen and twenty of Auguſt, fol-lowed by a hundred and two enſignes of foot, and many horſe, beſiegeth Ciſteron a new, on three parts, and vpon an intelligence which was giuen him, that Mambrun ap-proached to ſuccour the beſieged (as wee haue before ſpecified) Sommerive marcheth againſt him, chargeth Mambrun, kills about a hundred and fifty of his men, puts the other in rout, and wins two pieces of Cannon, which he had lately loſt. This victory was to Sommerive a foretelling of good ſucceſſe. The 14 of September hee ouerthrowes a hundred and forty paces of the wall: he planted two ſmall pieces, to batter the Friars. Three and thirty enſignes of foot, ſupported by a troope of horſe, goe to the aſſault, and continue it with a wonderfull fury vntill ſeuen of the clocke at night: that powder ſaying them on either ſide, they fall to ſtones, ſwords, and handy blowes: the greater number preuailling, the beſieged abandon the breach, retiring themſelues with great loſſe, and des Adretz re-turned into Daulphiné. Senas, Monuans, and other Capitaines, ſeeing themſelues vnr-niſhed of munition, without hope of ſuccours, charged with a multitude of men, not trained vp in warlike affaires, together with the enemies obſtinate reſolution, they pre-ferre the ſafety of their liues and perſons before the place: and in the night recouer the ſtreights and deſerts of the mountaine, and ſo come ſafe to Grenoble, from thence they were conducted to Lions, and there liued vntill the Ediſt of pacification. Sommerive at the breake of day, ſends ſome troopes after them: but the difficulty of the wayes, and feare F to loſe their part of the ſpoile, ſtayed the purſuit. So the victors enter into this aban-doned towne, and put to the ſword about foure hundred women and children, without diſ-tinction of age or religion.

Sommerive is now maſter of Prouence, leauing in all places pitfull ſignes of a bloody victory, whereof the originall notes (as principall instruments) Carce, Mentin, Flaſſans, thruſt forward eſpecially by Bagarris, Cheſne, Saint Marguerite, and others of the moſt ſeditious of the Court of Parliament of Aix, who with all impunitie gaue libertie to

Bourgongne
Duch.

A to all thefts, ſpoiles, and murders: ſo as after the Ediſt of pacification, the Kings Priuy Councell gaue Commiſſion to the Preſident Montan, and ſome Councellors of the Court of Parliament at Paris, to ſuppreſſe ſuch diſorders: who by an exem-plary puniſhment of many, cauſed the following warres to bee managed with farre more moderation. But the quality of ſome, and the credit of others, ſaued many heads which were prepared to vomit vp, in open view, the blood which their hands had too prodigally ſpilt.

As for the Duchy of Bourgongne, Tanannes Lieutenant for the King in the D. of Au-mals abſence, Ioued ſiluer better then the blood of the Proteſtants, and the Parliament of B Dijon hauing by vertue of Letters obtained the firſt of March 1562, forbidden the exer-cie of their religion, Tanannes diſarmes them, puts the chiefe in priſon, forceth ſome to depart with threats, others he expels violently. The Maior and Sheriffs proceed farther: they thruſt forth wiues, maids, and children, commanding the peſants by Proclamation the 7 of Iuly, to ſet vpon the rebels and not to receive, lodge, nor feed them that are expelled the townes: (a rigour which humanity neuer viſed the moſt barbarous) they con-demne them, as guilty of high treaſon that had caried armes, or aſſiſted them with aide or counſell: and they giue liberty to kill them all with impunity that ſhould hereafter aſ-ſemble in any other places but in their ordinary Churches. This liberty cauſed many thefts and ſpoiles, at Auſſonne, Aulun, and Beaune: yet the people are commended to C haue contained themſelues within the bounds of modeſtie. Chaalon vpon Saone, Maſcon and Belleuille, ſeized on by the Proteſtants, ſerued them for a time as a Sanctuarie and refuge. Mambrun commands at Chaalon with 500 Harguebuziers: but being ſud-denly beleagured by Tanannes, and finding not the town furniſhed or deſenſible, by a dan-gerous, and (as the Originall ſaith) a deſectable example, hee left it in prey to Tanannes, and retired to Maſcon.

Tanannes goes thither with all ſpeed, and preſents himſelfe at the gates, hoping by kind offers to perſwade the people to receiue him, but he finds no admittance. So hee gathers together all his forces, and the third of Iune beſiegeth the towne. His army conſiſted for the moſt part of Bourguignons of the county, carying openly red ſcarfes. The beſieged D countenance themſelues with this pretext, and make their profit thereof, to auoid this preſent ſtorme that threatened them. They giue the King to vnderſtand; that it was not reaſonable, they being his naturall ſubiects, and deſiring to liue in peace, vnder the obedi-ence of his lawes, ſhould be forced to open their gates to Tanannes, armed with ſtrangers enemies to the crowne, who is ſuſpected of them for many other great reaſons. This ad-monition preuailed ſome-what: for Tanannes ſtraight-wayes retired by the Kings com-mandement, but it was to prepare for a ſecond ſiege.

Thoſe of Lions ſent Entragues to defend the ſiege. Tanannes makes his trenches, wins E the ſuburbs of Saint Laurence, and the fourth of Iuly, beats downe the defences, makes a breach, and views it, but to their coſt whom he ſent. So (as if ſome important buſineſſe had called him into Bourgongne) hee raiſeth his campe, and making his account that the beſieged would follow him, he layes a ſtrong ambuſh: but Entragues had no men to loſe. Maſcon ſired from this ſecond ſiege, behold Belleuille is aſſailed. Saint Point with other Gentlemen of Daulphiné came from the ſpoiling of ſome boats laden with the value of 40000 frankes in reliques of gold and ſiluer, which two Sheriffs of Maſcon had ſent of their owne authoritie to Lions, to be conuerted to their priuate vſes. So the robbers are often robbed. This booty puts them in hope of another. The 28 of Iuly, he comes with 200 horſe, fix or ſeuen hundred ſouldiers, and the common people thereofabout, to belea-guer this little towne: but the night before, two companies parting from Maſcon, were entered into it, by whom the aſſailants being repulſed with loſſe, turned their reuenge F vpon their neighbours cattell. The retreat of S. Point, made Entragues ſeeke to extend the limits of his iuriſdiction. He beſiegeth the Caſtle of Pierredoux, forceth Montaſſat, and ſue and twenty ſouldiers which commanded there, to yeeld at diſcretion: and car-ſeth them to be led priſoners to Maſcon: but this was to feed the Fox, who in the end ſhall eat his pullaine.

During theſe broyles, Poncenat comes to Maſcon, with Suiſſes and French, drawes forth the chiefe forces, beſiegeth Tournon, and becomes maſter thereof. But what can the fury of inciuill armes forbear? Clugny forced with the ſame rage, ſees that exquiſit and and famous Library defaced : a most precious treasure, which made that Abbey to be greatly esteemed amongst others of France. Tanannes, advertised that Mafcon was unfurnished, and that Entragues, to please Poncenat, followed his ensignes, parts from Chalons with foure cornets of horse, and 800 foot, being assured of a practice which he had within the towne, whilst that his enemies, transported with their private affections, employed their forces elsewhere. The 17 of August, many waines drawne with Oxen, enter by his means that kept the keyes of one gate, being of the intelligence : they passe the first and the second gate : at the third, the first Carter overthrowes his Waime willingly, and by this policy stayes the rest. Twenty men coucht vpon their bellies behind a wall in a garden neere adioyning to the gate, runne thither : they kill some, bring in their men, overthrow a Court of guard, and become masters of the towne : the souldiers of Pierreloux are freed from prison, and cut off heads, armes and legges of the Protestants : they cast many into the riuer, spoile their houses, and ranfome the wealthiest. This Bourgongne returns to the Catholikes deuotion, and Saint Poinet had the government of Maicon, a violent and bloody man, who oftentimes glured his eyes after his meat, with the mournfull spectacle of such as he caused to be cast into the riuer.

These confusions did pitifully afflict all the Prouinces of this Realme : when on the other side, the heads of both parties, being prisoners, did sollicite the conclusion of a Peace. The Admirall, by ample Letters to the Queene, purged himselfe of the accusation laid against him, touching the death of the Duke of Guise : whereof Polstrot himselfe, in the midst of his most sensible torments at his execution, freed him. And the Queene-mother (leaving this thorne in the Admiralls foot, that she might raigne among these combustions of the houses of Guise and Chastillon) did cunningly giue two strokes with one stone : for shee made the Prince of Conde beleue, that the restraints propounded vpon the Edict of January, tended onely to content the Catholikes in some sort, and to open the way for the Protestants to haue greater liberty. Shee pleased the yong Duke of Guise with the execution of Polstrot, and his aduancement to his fathers offices : and the Constable, by the moderation of the Edict : for he had protested neuer to yeeld to the Edict of January. So the iudicious Reader may see, by the course of the History, which party did first breake it. But that which did most import Katherine in disarming her enemies, she entertained a discord betwixt two mighty families, whereby she maintained her authority.

In the end a peace concluded the 13 of March, gave liberty of Religion to Noblemen, hauing all manner of Iustice for them, their families and subiects. To other Gentlemen that had inferiour iurisdiction, for them and their families, with permission of the Lords of whom they held. In all Bailiwikes and Iurisdictions depending on the Parliaments a place appointed for their assemblies, at the election of the Prouince : besides all other places where the exercise had bene since the 7 of March. The Viconty of Paris onely excepted. Euery one restored to his former possession of goods, honours and offices. A generall abolition of all things past for matter of armes. All offences (except robbing) pardoned, and a defence to iniury one another, either for warre or Religion. This treaty did please and displease many. It reioycied such as made an account, that this sweet and pleasant name of peace should make an end of all their calamities, and restore euery man to his former estate. It grieved such, as (of three mighty enemies seeing two preuented by death, and the third a prisoner) thought that the government of the State was lawfully false to the Prince of Conde, who by consequence did derogate from his authority, subscribing to so weake and easie conditions of Peace, fore seeing also, that the secret oppositions of the Parliaments, and the violences of the most mutinous (who being armed sue dayly some of their men with all impunity) would in few yeares giue cause of new confusions.

So by this Peace, the Germanes were sent home. Elizabeth Queene of England held Newhaven, whereof the Prince had put her in possession, as a pawne and security for the money, wherewith shee had assisted his party. To make a breach betwixt her, and the Protestants, the English must bee chased away by them that had called them in. The King goes thither in person : they likewise vrge the Prince to goe with most of his party, and cause them to make the point. The place is strong, both by Nature and Art : but the fresh-water being cut off, and the plague hauing wasted about three thousand men,

A men, the Earle of Warwicke entered into Capitulation the 28 of Iuly, and the next day yeelded the place to the King. One of the chiefe motives, that induced the Prince to yeeld so easily to these conditions of peace, was the Lieutenancy Generall, which hee expected by the King of Nauarres death, and the Queene-mothers goodly promises. But to confirme her Regency, she puts the Prince from all his hopes. She causeth the King to be declared of full age, being yet but fourteene yeares old : carries his Maiestie to the Parliament at Rouan, makes him protest, That he will not hereafter endure the disobedience that hath been vsed against him since the beginning of these troubles : that his pleasure was to haue the Edict of pacification duly observed, threatened such as should oppose or make any

B leagues. And afterwards, by an admonition made in writing, by the Parliament of Paris, touching the Edict of his maiory, confirming that of pacification, the Queene-mother causeth her sonne to name her Overseer and President of his affaires : and for an answer to the Court, according to the instructions of his mother : I doe not meane (said hee) you should deale in any other thing, but with the administration of good and speedy iustice to my subiects. Vnderstand hereafter, that you are not confirmed in your offices by me, to be my tutors, nor Protectors of my Realme, nor Gouvernours of my city of Paris, as hitherto you haue perswaded your selves.

The King being returned to Paris, the Duke of Guises widow, his children, and kinsfolke, came solemnly, and demanded iustice, of the murder committed on the person of the deceased, taxing the Admirall, as the chiefe author thereof. But it was not yet time to suffer these two houses to encounter. That of Guise might recieue as much, or more losse then the other, and Katherine pretended, to make her profit of the first. To auoid this brunt, she causeth the King, to command them to forcéase this quarrell, and appoints them another time to aduise thereon. In the meane time, shee honours them with the chiefe charges, and giues them all access and countenance neere his person. The rest of the yeare was spent in the confirmation of many Edicts, touching Ecclesiasticall and ciuill causes, and then was the iurisdiction of Iudges and Consuls among the Merchants erected, and the Noraries of confiscation established.

As these things passed in France, the Prelates assembled at the Councell of Trent, D provided for the support and maintenance of the Catholike religion, namely, in this Estate. The Cardinal of Lorraine (a man greatly practised in the affaires of the Realme) doth all he can to root out the Protestants. To that end, they find this expedient, that the Kings of France and Spaine should make a strict league, and he of Spaine should giue the French such forces as were requisite for the execution thereof, and in the meane time, they should seeke all means to abolish the Edict which allowed the exercise of the pretended reformed religion : that this treaty made for the preferuation of the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish religion, should be called, The holy League. The Cardinal promisseth to employ all his endeouours and meanes to this effect, and assures the assembly of the willingness, and good affection of the Queene-mother, and the Lords of the Councell. E The chiefe of this league were the Pope, the Kings of France, and Spaine, the Princes of Italy, the Common-weale of Venice, and the duke of Sauoy. Of the Emperor, and the house of Austria they speake diuersly.

So from the beginning of February, they labour to produce some effects. Their Ambassadors come to Fontainebleau, demanded the obseruation of the Decrees of the Councell throughout all France, whereof the reading should be the 23 day of March at Nancy, in the presence of the Ambassadors of all Catholike Princes, assembled to make a generall league, against those estates that were false from the obedience of the Romish Church. They require also, that in fauour of the Clergy, the King should cause the alienation of Ecclesiasticall goods to cease, as against the law of God, and preiudiciall to his Maiestie and the Realme. That the Edict of pacification should be disannulled, and heretikes rooted out : namely such as had bene partakers of the duke of Guises murder. Behold new fire-brands to cast this monarchy into the flames of a second ciuill warre. But the fires of the first did yet smooke. And things not being so soone prepared to enter into new home bred combustions, the King answers : That hee hath granted the Edict, so free the Realme from strangers : and that he hopes henceforth to maintaine his subiects in peace, according to the institution of the Church.

In the meane time, such as were worst affected to the publique peace, attempted many things things contrary to the Edict. The Commissioners sent for the obseruation thereof, had A small credit in many places. The Estates of some Prouinces said plainly, that they could no more endure two religions, then two Sunnes: the execution thereof had small or no effect, in places where it was proclaimed: the Magistrates delayed to appoint the Protestants places for their exercises, and by their slacknesse caused many to seeke their dwell-ling elsewhere, to liue in quiet and safety.

The complaints and discontents which founded in the Kings cares from all parts, gaue Katherine (vnder colour to lead the King in progresse through the Prouinces of his Realme, and by his preference to end many controuersies, which euen then seemed to threaten him with some imminent confusions) a goodly pretext of conference with the B King of Spaine.

The voyage of Bayonne.

Charles begins his voyage by Champagne, and through Bourgogne comes to Lions, forbidding the Protestants the exercise of their Religion following the Court, yea euen in the townes that were assigned them for their assemblies, whilest his Maiesty should be resident there. The Protestants were here in great numbers, and might well fortifie themselves againe at need. To take from them all means, they build a Cittadell, and the King stirres not before it be in defence. By the example hereof many other townes receiued the like restraint, whilest on the other side, they dismantled Orleans, Montauban, and some others. The Edict of Peace is greatly impugned by an other made at Rouffillon. The C King forbid all Iustices to allow the exercise of the pretended reformed religion, but in places specified by the Edict. For the first time, hee banished such ministers as had exercised their charge, in places not comprehended in the Edict: and for the second time, punished them with death. He commanded all priests, religious men, and Nunnes that were married, to make separation, and returne to their couents: if not, to depart the realm, forbidding the Protestants all their Synods, as making Monopoles vnder that pretext, and stirring vp the greatest part of the Realme to rebellion.

Murder of Creuan.

From words they fall to deeds. Those of Creuan in Bourgogne murder many assembled for their exercise, with all impunitie. And the Kings abstinence from those places where they were accustomed to see him, caused many seditions, and mutinies: amongst the which, La Curée, Gouverneur of Vendosme, a Protestant by profession, was murdered, D by the command of Chauigni, Lieutenant to the Duke of Montpensier, as hee sought to suppress some, who vnder fauour of the troubles, had purposely murdered many men, women and children, in the country of Maine, and places thereabouts.

Of Tours.

As this insoleny increased, a licentious rage transporting them of Tours, to fall vpon the Protestants of their towne, comming from their exercise, they murder some, hurt others, and with the same rage, bringing their weapons bloody into the towne, they kill, drowne, and spoile, without distinction of age, sexe, or quality. The Marshall of Villeuile was sent to suppress the mischiefe, before it spread farther. Hee was readie to carie himselfe therein, according to the tenure of his charge: but Chauigni opposing by open force, caused all this premeditated punishment to turne into smoake, as if the exami- E nation thereof should discontent both great and small, and make things tend to new troubles. In the end, at the importunate suite of the Protestants, who complained of these horrible insolencies, and that they were forced in all places to furnish holy bread at the parish masses, to hang tapistry before their lodging on Corpus Christi day, to contribute to brotherhoods, and such other things: and at their instant suite, not to bee forced in their consciences against the conditions of the Edict, the King staying in Dauphine, commands all gouernours of Prouinces by his Letters, to enterraine and to cause the Edict of pacification to be duely obserued, and to haue a care that no mutinies should grow within their governments.

Proces against atheists.

This voyage of Bayonne is famous, by that notable suite of those which with a pre- F sumptuous and partiall title, termed themselves of the societie of Isleu, decided in the Court of Parliament, Stephen Pasquier pleading against them, for the Vniuersitie of Paris: a vehement and most graue Advocate of so rare a cause, and Master Peter Verfore for their company: their pleadings are read, and their beginnings, and first entry into France, their advancement, and all that concerns their sect, is so learnedly exprest in an Epistle of the fourth booke of the said Pasquier, and in his pleading, as it is needlesse to insert them.

This

1564

A This new yeare bred new troubles at Paris, and was likely to haue stretched farre. The Cardinall of Lorraine comming from the council of Trent, accompanied with his Nephew, and a number of men with Harguebuzes, contrary to the Edict, and followed at hand, by the duke of Aumale his brother, went to Paris. The conclusions of the Council, and this carying of armes, did much disquiet the Protestants. It is giuen out, that their meaning is to offer them violence: they fly to the Marshall of Montmorency as gouer-nour of the Isle of France, a wife-man, and louing the publike peace. Hee intreats the Cardinall not to enter in this manner. This request neglected, he resolues to vse his authority.

B The Cardinall growes obstinate, and offers to enter with all his force. But the Marshall (as the Kings Lieutenant) opposeth himselfe, being followed by the Prince Portein, and about forty gentlemen of account. The Cardinall growes amazed, saues himselfe with his nephew in the next houses: and after some dayes of stay at Paris, he goes into Champagne to attend the Kings returne from Bayonne. Hereafter there is nothing but associations, leagues, and conferences. They must be reuenged of this affront. But they find too strong a party: for the two houses of Montmorency and Chastillon (most straightly allied by consanguinity) doe likewise vnite their wils in this defence. The Marshall assisted by the Admirall his cousin, contains the Parisiens in peace, and makes the Parliament and the Kings Councill to approue this act. The Queene-mother (feareing lest this mutinie C should hinder the effects of the voyage of Bayonne, and by that meanes the fulfilling of her desires would be made frustrate) makes the King to command by his letters patents, such as were not yet entred into Paris, not to approach any neerer, and to such as were there, to depart vntill that his Maiesty had ended this quarrell, after his returne out of Gascony.

Now the Court was full of complaints. The Protestants accused the Catholikes of violence and breach of the Edict. To content them, the Queene assigns them deputies at Tolouise: but they returne without any other satisfaction, but a discovery that they meant no good vnto them. There it was concluded, that all Princes and others, of what qualitie soener, (whereof many were very farre engaged by their promise in a certain league made D in France without the Kings pssuury) should renounce all confederations, both within and without the Realme, and should binde themselves by oath to the King vpon paine of rebellion. This was the aduice of Montluc. But the difficulty was to draw the articles, for to make a soueraine Prince to enter into association and company with his subiects, Was it not by a pernicious consequence to blenish his royall authority, and ouer-throw that which should serue as a fundamentall law, for the quiet of the Realme, and the obseruation of the Edict?

Aroyall league.

In the end, the King hauing visited all Aquitaine, he arriues at Bayonne in Iune, and thirter comes his Sister Elizabeth, wife to King Philip of Spaine, to meet with him, accompanied with the Duke of Alua and others, to the end (said she) that the matter should bee E lesse suspected, and that their league might take sure hold. But the most cleare-sighted did attribute it to ambition, lest the Spaniard should seeme to vse any submission. Howouer it were, the holy league was confirmed betwixt the two Kings, by Elizabeth means: For the establishing of the ancient Religion, and extirpation of the new. And for that this Doctrine did extremely afflict France, the Spaniard did promise the French such aide and succours as he could, and the French to the Spaniard (for that hee did see his estate of the Low-countries to hatch a great confusion, which the following ages did bring forth) the like assistance according to his power: but both doe promise ioyntly, to maintaine by all meanes the dignitie of the Catholike religion, to cut off (as much as in them lay) all lets, and speedily to seeke all occasions profitable for this designe, beginning first with the F heads.

This businesse was not so secretly managed, but the Prince of Conde, the Admirall, and other Noblemen of that party had intelligence. They stand vpon their guards, aduertise their men, and for this time preuent surprises. The end of the yeare brought the King home, much satisfied with the ioyfull entertainment his subiects had made him, plunging himselfe with yong brethren, in masks and delights, whilest the Queene his Mother, with her Councillors, gouerned France at their pleasure, and laid plots, which shall soone breed as dangerous stormes as the former. Whilest our Christian many at Malta.

The Furies

Princes study by their enter-view and league, to kindle horrible combustions in their estates, they give the Turkish armie the better meanes to land in the Ile of Malta, to besiege and take the fort of Saint Elme, lately built by the Pryor of Capoua, and by this victory to make the siege of Malta more easie. Let vs observe three notable things, before we conclude the year. The first was that braue attempt of Peirot, the eldest sonne of Montluc, who weary to liue idle, rigged out some ships, with a good number of Gentlemen, Souldiers, and Mariners, to make a voyage into Affrica: he took and sackt the Ile of Madagascare, but with the losse of his life, leaving his troope excluded from all returne into France, by the pursuit the King of Portugal made, demanding satisfaction of the outrages done to his subiects. The Earle of Sanzay was sent to pacifie him: and euen then was treated (but without any effect,) the mariage of Marguerite, Sister to Charles, with the said King. The second was the death of Ferdinand the Emperour and King of Hungary, deceased in September, leaving his sonne Maximilian for his successor. The third was that of Pius the fourth, in whose place was chosen to the pontificall chaire, Michel Gesileo a Iacobin, Cardinall of Alexandria, and tooke vpon him the name of Pius the fifth.

The death of the Pope and Emperour.

The first fruits of this year were very commendable, and if they had giuen hope of the like proceeding, the harvest had bene very happy: but such as trust not but vpon good cautions, take not all kindes of money for payment, growing very suspitious, by reason of the conclusions taken in this voyage. To make it more glorious and lesse suspect, the King calls an assembly at Moulins, of the greatest Personages of his Realme, as well for the government of Iustice, as for other causes concerning the good and quiet of the State, whereof followed that great volume of statutes, of which they rightly say; That they were as iust and holy, as it is observed. Those of the houses of Guise and Chastillon were called. The quarrell of Paris inuited the Marshall of Montmorency, and the Admirall, hauing purged himselfe by oath of the crime whereof they pretended him to be principall motiue (the King had already pronounced him innocent by his letters Patents) the King, the Queene-mother, the D. of Auion, brother to the King, the Cardinals of Bourbon, Lorraine and Guise, the Constable, the Marshalls of Bourdillon and Villedieu, the Bishops of Valence, Orleans and Limoges; Thou and Seguir first and second Presidents of Paris, Dalis the first of Toloufa, Laguerhon of Bourdeaux, Truchon of Grenoble, Le Feurs of Dijon, Fournenau the second President of Prouence, and many other Noblemen assembled to that effect: besides the aboue-named Statutes, made the reconciliation betwixt the two houses, whereof followed imbracings, protestations and promises not to attempt any thing whatsoeuer one against another. But the issue will verifie the saying: that there is no trust in a reconciled enemy.

A Parliament
at Moulins.

In the meane time the resolutions of Bayonne appeared manifestly, the moderations they made of the Edict, the insolencies they committed in many places with all impunity, the threats they gaue the Protestants amazed them on all sides. The Prince & Admirall were vigilant, observing the countenances of their enemies. The preparations of Spaine against the Low-countries, made them to foresee that this enterprise would in like sort prejudice their partisans in France. The Prince of Roche-sur-yon had before his death discovered many particulars: they complained, that about three thousand persons had perished of violent deaths, since the Edict, without any iustice, and their complaints had no other satisfaction, but goodly words and gracious letters. To conclude, the winds (said they) which did blow at Bayonne, must needs cause a strange tempest.

Causes of the Protestants
discontent.

So the causes of their discontent some were manifest, others secret, and consisted in the dismantling of some townes, to take from them the meanes, in the building of Cittadels in some places of their exercise: in the ordinarie murdering of their men, in the massacring of men of account without punishment: in the ordinarie threats, That shortly they should not lift their heads so high: but especially in the leauy of six thousand Suisses made vnder a faigned pretence, to guard the frontier against the coming of Don Ferdinand Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua (who marched against the Protestants of the Low-country with a mighty armie) whom notwithstanding they caused to enter farre into the Realme, and by some letters intercepted, being sent from Rome and Spaine, they had discovered many practices made for their ruine. And the intelligences they had from one in Court well affected (yet secretly) to their party, that it was decreed in a secret Councell to seize vpon

A vpon the Prince and Admirall, to put the one to death, and keepe the other prisoner; at the same instant to bring two thousand Suisses into Paris, two thousand into Orleans, and the rest into Poitiers: and then by the abolishing of the last Edict, to establish one quite contrarie. All these considerations made the chiefe heads resolute to stand vpon their defence, and to observe foure things in this new taking of armes. To seize on few townes but of importance. To bring a gallant army to field. To cut the Suisses in pieces, by whose fauour the Catholikes should be alwayes masters of the field: and to chase the Cardinall of Lorraine from Court if they might, as the chiefe firebrand of the confusions which would consume the whole estate. Man purposeth, and God disposeth: and of many resolutions few haue their desired end. The pleasure of God often disappointeth the designs of them which are most practised in knowledge, valour, discourse and wisdom: and some enterprises little or not at all premeditated, doe often fall out very successfully. For the execution of the first point, diuers considerations had made them to name three townes, Lions, Toloufa and Troyes.

But a great designe, imparted after the French manner to many meane persons, and vncapable of such actions, turne them easily into smoke. Not one of them that vnder-tooke the charge could effect it. For the second, the Protestants being first armed, were in the beginning masters of the field, but within six weekes the Catholikes forced the Prince and the Admirall to fly to the Germanes, which the Duke Iohn Casimer brought them, as we shall see. Their proiect against the Suisses was likewise discovered, and the forces which should haue met at an appointed day, failed in their expedition. The fourth succeeded, but it imported least of all: but this separation was but in shew, and not in authority, nor credit.

The King is much incensed against them. He was at Meaux, and prepared to solemnize the Feast of Saint Michael, according to the custome of the French Kings. The Prince approacheth with 500 horse, and by this attempt forceth the King to retire with some amazement to Paris, in the midst of 6000 Suisses, and a good number of horse, the which had bene in danger, if a hundred and fifty horse coming out of Picardy, and the Harguebuziers on horsebacke which attended the Prince, had adriued betwixt Paris & Meaux, at the day appointed. At the same time the Protestants party arme on all sides: and this generall taking of armes vnlooked for, with that bold enterprise vpon the Suisses, and the taking of Orleans, Soissons, Auxerre and some other places, had wonderfully amazed the Catholikes. But that which augmented this alarm, the Prince being too weak, loth to ingage himselfe in this forest of halberds, pikes and shot, went to lodge with his troopes in Saint Denis, where some others arriuing, in few dayes made vp the number of 2000 horse, and foure thousand shot.

Meaux.

The King assembles his troopes, and had already ten thousand men. But this sudden approach to Paris might perswade them, that the Prince expected speedy and great forces, and that he had good intelligences in Court and at Paris. Paris was the chiefe object of his armes. The Parisiens were not accustomed to fast: taking their victuals from them, he hoped of two things to effect the one, either to force them to fight, or to draw his enemies to a more assured pacification then the first. To this end he sends d'Andelot with 500 horse, towards Poissy and Pontoise, to seize vpon the passages of Seine beneath Paris: and other troopes to seize vpon such places as were about the towne. Some companies were sent to ioyne with the forces that came out of Guienne, who should come to Orleans, being lately surprised by la Noue. Hee and the Admirall with about 800 horse, and twelue hundred Harguebuziers keepe Saint Denis, and intrench Saint Owin and Aubertilliers, to curb Paris on that side.

The beginning of the second troubles.

But how could so many excellent Captaines vnderake so painefull and vnlikely a designe? May an Ant assaile an Elephant? How many mighty armies haue in former times lost their labours, thinking to effect such an enterprise: To remaine idle, had impaired their reputation. They were suddenly drawne into it, and they must for their honours sake attempt that which occasion seemed to present vnto them. Their men being fresh and full of resolution, made difficult things easie. One thing onely stayed the course of their successe. Such places as the Prince hoped to surprise vpon Marne and Seine (whither if he should be forced to abandon Saint Denis, he meant to retire himselfe and attend his Germans) there were two onely seized on, Laigny and Montereau. On the other side, the the Constable, Lieutenant general for the King in this army, resolved (having increased his troops) to force the enemy to fight. The great advantages he had, invited him unto it. He had fiftene or sixtene thousand foot, and two thousand Lances: hee was furnished with artillery: hee had a commodious place for a battell, and fit to lodge his troops and Cannon. The Parisiens were prest by famine, and were much grieved to see such tenants in their farms. And many cried already against the Constable, as a great temporizer, and as firme a partisan to his Nephewes, as to the King his master.

The battell of Saint Denis.

They were to blame: for hee was no sooner aduertised of the error the Prince had committed in dismembred the body of his army, as we haue heard, but he presently embraced the occasion, sends seuen or eight hundred Lances, followed with some shot for their retreat, to discover the certainty of the protestants forces: and the next day, the 10 of Nouember, he goes to field, with all his army, and giues him battell. The Constables footmen, for the most, did little good, and the Princes very much. The horsemen on either side shewed great resolution and courage. In the end the Protestants are forced from the place, and followed about halfe a league, and it may be, but for the Constables hurt (whereof he died within few dayes after) they had bene chased more hotly: but the night fauoured their retreat, and parted the battells. To conclude, the Catholikes were masters of the field, and had the spoile of the dead: and by consequence the honour of the battell, the which shall be blemished the next day with a great disgrace.

The Princes
retreat.

This advantage seemed to inuite the Catholikes to perfect their victory the next day: C but the losse of the Constable kept them within their wals. The Prince attended a second charge, not thinking his enemies would haue taken it for a repulse: hee therefore sends speedily for d'Andelot, who comes to Saint Denis at mid-night, sorry to haue lost his part of the battell.

Having rested a while, the Commanders conclude to make an attempt to abate some of their aduersaries glory, gotten the day before. They bring their small army to field, present themselves before the suburbs of Paris: stand there some houres in battell, and burne a village and many wind-mills, to vrge them. But no man comes forth. They bury their dead, dresse their hurt men. The Captaines view their Cornets and Companies and will hazard no more. What should the Prince then doe, being encamped before Paris with a few men? The losse of one man did impart him more then an hundred of his enemies: and to stay there were his ruine. Hee dislodgeth, marcheth to Montre-reau, and there augments his army with the forces that came to him from Orleans and Estampes.

The death of this incomparable old man (but farre more happy in his age, if hee had shed his blood against the stranger, enemies to this Crowne, the which hee had so freely employed, during all the course of his life, and not against his country-men, yea against his owne blood) gaue the command of the royall army to Henry duke of Aniou, the Kings brother, a Prince of sixtene yeares of age, vpon whose head we shall see the Crowne after his brothers decease. He sought the opportunity to fight: his elder Captaines prest him forward, taking the Princes retreat for a kind of flight, and grounding their advantage vpon the great forces newly arriued of twelve hundred horse, and two thousand foot led by the Count Artemberg, one of the famous Captaines of the Low-countries. Moreover, if the Protestants did ioyne with their Reistres, the warre was like to continue long, or else to make the chance of a battell doubtful. But they diswaied him, weighing the importance of their Generall, and the constant resolution of the contrary party: who (said they) had then no other Councillor but Despaire, and no other wealth or riches, but their armes and horses.

To withstand the leauy of the Protestants Reistres, the Duke of Aumale was sent into Lorraine to receiue the forces which were brought to the King by Duke John William of Saxony, the Marquis of Bade and other Commanders; and young Lansac into Germany, to diuert those of Duke John Casimer, which were leauied in the Princes fauor. The Prince had ioyned with the troops of Guienne and Poictou, consisting of eight cornets of horse and three Regiments of foot, vnder six and twenty ensignes: and advancing towards Lorraine, he forceth Bray and Nogent vpon Seine to open their gates, and to giue him passage, and seizeth on Espernay vpon Marne, where he assembles the body of his army.

Experience teacheth vs now, that all policies and deuices are allowed in warre. To coole

A coole the heat of such as fle to the ayd of strangers, to stay them, and (it may bee) to surprise them. Vnder this pretext they begin to speake of a peace, in the which the chiefe of their party are imploied: and the better to conferre (said they) of the points propounded, they agree vpon two suspensions of armes, either being of three dayes. But whilest the Prince thought to enioy the benefit thereof, he had almost fallen into a pitfall. The Duke of Aniou approached, and the Prince remained nere vnto Chaalons, in a bad lodging farre from his troops, and had it not bene for the rout of the Captaines, Blais, Boller, and Clerg, defeated by the Earle of Brissac during the truce, the Prince himselfe had bene in apparent danger.

B Misfortune is good for something. This fury of Brissac teacheth the Prince not to trust his enemy, but vpon good assurance. And notwithstanding the iniuries of the Aire, and the difficulties of the wayes, leauing the Duke twenty great leagues behind, he makes him to lose all desire to follow him, and goes on into Lorraine to learne some newes of his Reistres, the which he receiued at Pont a Mousson. From hence Duke John Casimir, the younger sonne of Frederic Count Palatine of Rhine, Elector of the sacred Empire, being chiefe of this army, protests by writing vnto the King before he enters into France, That he comes not for any profit of his owne, or priuate respect: but only to assist those who afflicted for the same Religion, had required his helpe. And if it please his Majesty to assure them liberty of conscience, and free exercise of their Religion, he is ready to retire himselfe.

C Hereupon they renew their treaty of peace pretended the yeare before. The Queene-Mother comes to Bois de Vincennes, accompanied with the Cardinals of Bourbon, Lorraine, and Guise. For the Prince there came the Cardinall of Chastillon. Hee lets her vnderstand, that to settle a peace in France, the King must receiue all his subiects into grace, impart his fauours and the offices of the Realme indifferently vnto them, and giue them conuenient liberty of their Religion. Katherine answers, that such matches are not to bee allowed: that the Prince and those of his party should before all things countermand their Reistres, lay downe armes, and come and yeeld the King a reason of the enterprise of Meaux. The Cardinall replies, that they only defend themselves, that they oppose these succours to all sorts of strangers called in by the Catholikes, and cannot fend them backe, D but they must presently subiect their throats to their enemies swords: that they are ready to disarm when they shall see the Realme freed from Swisses, Flemings, Italians, and Germans, which were come to spoile them, and matters restored to their former estate. As for the enterprise of Meaux, their intention was only to beseech the King (from whose presence the violence of their enemies depriued them of all access, but by force) to reuoke that cruell sentence, which some determined to execute against all their party, being ready to proue by armes against all those that would maintaine the contrary, that they had neuer any other will against their Soueraigne, but as his most faithfull and obedient subiects.

The treaty of peace renewed,
but in vaine.

During this negotiation, the Duke of Aniou fought for the commodity which he had lost to fight with the Prince, and the Prince receiued his strangers with a wonderfull contentment to the whole army, fearing lest the heauinesse of the Germans, should make them attend long in Lorraine. They expected a hundred thousand crownes at their entry, but they which had so suddenly drawne them to horsebacke, must haue leisure to make money. At last they make a vertue of necessity. And what might not two Commanders, (whereof the one by his natural pleasantness, and the other by his grauity, tempering the excessive chollier of some, and the exceeding suspition of others) obtaine of their men, amongst whom they had so great credit. The Prince by their example summons both great and small: the Ministers in their Sermons moue men, and the Captaines prepare their souldiers. Euery one contributes, some for zeale, some for loue, some for feare, and some for shame of reproach. They gather, what in money, plate, chaines, gold and Jewels, some fourescore thousand Franks, and by this voluntary liberality satisfy the first and greatest hunger of their Reistres. Being ioyned, the generall opinion was to make waire about Paris: an apparent meanes to haue a peace. Orleans was their nurse, neither could they from any place else recouer artillery, munition, and money, so commodiously. They therefore take the way to Beaulieu, and for their first beginning they defeat some troops of Italians and French, that came to charge them in the reere-vard vpon their passage of the Riuer of Seine. They force Itancy, and passe ouer the Riuer of Yone, Loing, and la Cure:

Cure : they draw diuers commodities from all the small townes opposite to their passage, A alwayes assailing and alwaies assailed, and still with the losse of the one party or the other.
 Whilst this companie(hauing the mighty army of the Duke of Aniou opposite vnto them) marched into Beaufie, they fall to armes in other parts in fauour of their party. Affier, Sipierre, and others in Languedoc, Prouence, Daulphine, and Gascony, make diuers as-semblies, seize vpon Nismes, Montpellier, and many other places. Ponçenet and Verdelay leauy troops in Bourbonnois and Auvergne, whereas the forces of Guienne which marched towards the Duke of Aniou, incounter them, breaks them, and for that time makes their attempts fruitlesse. Moreover, the Duke of Neuers, with an army of fourteene thousand French, Suisses, and Italians, besieged Mafcon, battered it, and tooke it by composition, B but being incountered by fourescore horse, and some foot, ished out of Antrain, vnder the commands of Captaine Beauvais and Bourgois, as he aduanced with an hundred horse, to visit the Duchesse his wife, he was shot in the knee with an Harguebuze, which made him lame all the remainder of his life.

Moutluc, Pons, the Bishop of Tullis, and many other Catholikes in Guienne, being followed with foure thousand foot, and seuen hundred horse, surprise and kill about foure hundred men, spoile the life of Re, attempt to besiege Rochel: but too long delays makes their designe fruitlesse.

In the meane time the Viconts of Bourniguet, Montclar, Paulin, Gourdon, Mouuans, Rapin, and other Protestants, aduanced with seuen or eight thousand men, of the bands C of Gascony, Prouence, Daulphine, and Languedoc. Saint Heran Gouvernor of Auvergne, Saint Chaumont, Gordes, Prife, the Bishop of Puy, Harefeuille, Brefieux, and others, assemble a troop to stop their passage, and runne as to a certain victorie, forbidding expressly all the neighbour towns, To receive any one that flies, what liuery sooner he beares. The which shall cost them full deare. The Viconts charge these horsemen, kill a great number, and of the chiefe, vpon the place: put the rest to rout, and makes them seeke their safety by flight.
 But the Pelants armed with the former prohibition, know no man, neither do they spare any man, but make of their country-men as great a slaughter as the victor did, & by this indiscreet stratagem, open the way for the Viconts to recouer Orleans. Being arriued, they stay the inroads which Martingange, Richelieu, and others made, euen to the gates of Or- D leanse : they take Baugency, attempt Blois, and take it by composition. The Gascons doe not easily forget their hands, and the souldiers of Richelieu, who were retired thither, could not free themselves from the sword.

Chartres besieged.

Hereupon the Princes army comes into Beaufie. Chartres is one of the chiefe store-houses of corne for Paris, and being taken would much auaille the Protestants. Liquieres was made Gouvernor for the King there, and two and twenty companies, fortified vpon feare of a siege with a Regiment of foot. The Prince besiegeth and batters it, but to small purpose : five Cannons and foure small Culuerins preuailed little against so many men of warre, being intrenched with great aduantage. They found out a place of small strength, where a breich gave hope of victory: but the Lord of Valette, a great Captaine, E comes to succour the besieged, with eightene cornets of horse. The Admirall is aduertised:
 and not to faile of his prey, hee made choice of three thousand five hundred horse, marcheth towards them, chargeth Valette, overthrowes part of his troops, carries away foure cornets, and puts the rest to flight. The Duke of Aniou encamped beyond Seine, and leeth to hazard a battell, left Chartres in apparent danger. But Katherine knew how (or so she did usually vaunt) with three sheets of paper to effect more then her warriors with their armes.

A good peace was no lesse necessary then wisht for. The Protestants did generally beleeu, that the Catholikes would disarme with them, and the Nobilitie were particularly moued with a great desire to see their houses (it is a desire whereof we can hardly stay the F effects in them that are voluntaries.) Many whole cornets had already taken the way of Xaintonge and Poitou, they would not lose the season of their vines : many other pretend the lacking of their houses, where their presence was necessary: the footmen of some Countries lying farthest off, slip away daily, their purses were empty, and no man payd.
 It was in Mar-ly when as armies are accustomed to goe to field, and their French forces decreasing visibly, had driuen them in short time to stand vpon their defence : their enemies were whole and strong. To diuide their strangers into townes, were to dismember them.

A second peace.

A themselves. These considerations and others, made the heads of the Protestants to accept of a second Edict of pacification, concluded in Loumeau, saying : That those of the pretended reformed Religion, should purely and simply enjoy the first Edict, and that it should be executed according to the tenour, notwithstanding all restrictions, modifications, interpretations, and declarations made since the day of the date thereof, untill the publication of this second Declaration made the three and twentieth day of March.

This counterfeit peace caried Iohn Casimir with all his forces home into Germany: the Prince, and the Admirall, with all those of his party, retire euery man to his home. But diuers breaches of this Edict, did suddenly open the gate to the third ciuill war: and whilst B that euery one impures the cause of this sudden reppall of armes to the third ciuill war: and whilst the Catholikes grounded their discontentes, for that many townes refused the restraint made by this last Edict. Sancerre, Montauban, and other townes of Quercy, Viurets, Daulphine, Languedoc, and elsewhere, would not absolutely submit themselves to his Miesties good pleasure. Rochel refused to receive the garison sent by Larnac their ancient Gouvernor: they continued their fortifications before begun, neither did they restore the Catholikes to their offices, goods, nor religion : they armed out ships to keepe the Seas, without the Kings allowance. They refused the ayde and subuention, which his Maiesty required for the affaires of his Realme. Many Captains (without the Kings commission) led souldiers to the Prince of Orange, against the Duke
 C of Alba, to draw afterwards (said they) the Protestants of Flanders into France, and iointly to oppress the Catholike Religion.

The Protestants on the other side complained, That in stead of enioying the Edict and liberty of their consciences, they gaue them declarations vnder the Kings authority, to hinder the exercise of their Religion : That hauing dismissed their men, both strangers and French, with the least oppression of the people that might be; and deliuered into the Kings hands the townes and strong places which they held: yet they reuolued the Suisses, they entertained many companies of Italians, they did distribute their horse and foot into such townes as did most import the Protestants, Tours, Orleans, Amiens, and others, to the end (said they) to take them like Partridges in a net, being retired to their houses. That they sued in the Court of Rome for leaue to sell the temporal lands of the French Clergie, to the value of an hundred and fifty thousand Franckes by yeare, the money to be employed to the rooting out of their party: That this counterfeit peace ruined more of their D men, then the rigours of warre : That they guarded townes, bridges, and passages of ri-uiers. These grudgings were openly published, when as another occasion makes them both to speake boldly, and to take armes.

The complaints of the Protectants.

In a manner all the Duke of Anious horse stayed about Paris, with five or six thousand foot, vnder colour to fortifie the guards of the King, the Queene-mother, his brethren, and the capittall Citie : and Tauannes sent towards Bourgongne with many companies, made them suspect that it was to beset and surpris the Prince at Noyers, a little and weak E towne of his owne, and the Admirall at Tanlay, a Castle belonging to his brother d'Andelot. Some acquainted with his practice giue them aduice : they complaine to the King of the iniustice is done them, beseeching his Maiesty to quench the fires kindled in his Realme by the factions of the Guisens; and to free themselves they take Rochel for their Sanctuary.

This braue prey being thus escaped, Katherine and the faction send forth Commissions, and appoint the rendezvous for the troops in Guienne and Poitou. The Duke of An-iou prepares : and for a reuenge of Meaux, he chafeth away the Protestants. The Queene of Nauarre, accompanied with three Regiments of foot, and eight Cornets of light horse (notwithstanding the endeouours of Efcars and Montluc) retires to Rochel with the F Prince her son, (who succeeded afterwards to this Crowne) and the Princess her daughter. The Cardinall of Chastillon is forced to leaue Beaumoulin, and to saue himselfe in a small Barke in England. The Nobility of Poitou arme with the fist, and repaire to Rochel. The Earle of Rochefoucault was armed some dayes before. d'Andelot marched with a thousand good horse, and two thousand foot, gathered together in the confines of Maine and Britany.

The Duke of Martigues, Gouvernor of Britanie, going with three hundred Lances, and five hundred braue shot to Saumur, to the Duke of Montpensier, hee is aduertised that many tants are.

many of the enemies troops are lodged in his way. He sends to discover them; and finding them lodged at large, after the French manner, passeth brauely through them, with the losse but of twenty men, and with the gaine of an Ensigne, and the slaughter of aboue fourescore of his enemies: and recouers Saumur, whilst that D'Andelot, la Noue, and other Commanders toynd with the Prince. If the Dukes of Aniou, Montpensier, and Marignies, who assembled men from all parts to oppose a mighty army against the Protestants, had in time fore-seene, that those which d. lodged in so great haste, went to seeke their fortunes farre off, and had sought to crosse their designs, the Prince and all his part had in all shewes beene coopt vp in Rochel. But behold, of poore vagabonds in two moneths they become masters of Niort, Fontenay, Saint Maixent, Xaintes, Saint Iohn d'Angely, Pons, Cognac, Blay, Angoulême, and are strong enough for the continuance of a long warre. While the Dukes arme, the King begins the warre against the Protestants by the Pen. He declares by his proclamation, that the Edict of Ianuary had beene but prouisionall, vntill he were of fullage: that now he forbids all exercise of the pretended reformed religion, in all the territories of his obedience: forfeits both the bodies and goods of them that shall breake it: commands all Ministers vpon great penalties, to depart the Realme within fifteene dayes. And by another, he suspends all officers making profession thereof, from their offices and charges, commanding them to resigne them into his hands within fifteene dayes.

The Protestants make their profit of these Edicts, and send them into Germany, Eng. C land, and to the Suisses of their Religion, to prone, That they are not purified as Rebels affecting the Crowne, (crimes by the which their enemies would make them odious.) And in truth these Edicts were spurs to hasten the leauie which the Duke of Deuxpouins shall bring the next year, and for the heads of Dauphine, Prouence, and Languedoc, to goe and oppose the forces of the said Provinces against the Kings army, which was ready to fall vpon the Prince. To this end, Acier, Mouuans, Pierre Gourde, and others, draw forth sixtience or seuenteen thousand floure, but few horse: seeming with this multitude of men to haue vn-peopled all that Climate. But as they did fortifie the Princes affaires on the one side, they did weaken them on the other: for after their departure, the Catholikes seized vpon many places, the which they might well haue held, lodging halfe their forces in them, then marching in troop close and speedily, they might haue arriued safe where their presence was most profitable and necessary.

But the presumption of equality, doth commonly engender a pernicious ieaousie among great men: and the opinion one conceiues of his force, and of his owne valour, with an obstinacy not to yeeld vnto another, is a dangerous plague in an armie. Mouuans and Pierre Gourde, finding themselves annoyed by strait lodging, as they had done till they came neere to Perigueux, they meane to lie more at large at Mensignac, not discouering that the Duke of Montpensier approached, who at his arriuall puts in rout two Regiments, and kills a thousand souldiers at their Colonels feet: who filling their liues dearly, forye the Dukes troops, as they could not charge Acier: yet they were amazed by the fearful report of such as were escaped, who made the Dukes forces exceeding great, beyond all truth, who retiring to Chastelleraud, made the way open for Acier troops, which remained of this shipwracke, to fortifie the Protestants army, and to make it able, not onely to endure the shooke, but to attempt something against the Catholikes. The Prince did misser his army aboue eighteen thousand Harguebuziers, and three thousand good horse. The Duke had ten thousand foot, beside Suisses, and foure thousand lances: the souldiers of both armies were well experienced in warre.

He that takes not the French in their first heat, they are easily broken: the chiefe sinewes of warre failing, might greatly coole this new vigour: and Winter approaching, withdraw the greatest part of them. The Prince therefore seeks to fight: the number and courage of F his men inuities him. He comes within two leagues of Chastelleraud, and by his approach annoys the Duke of Aniou: the Duke moued with the like desire, and grieued to see so many men at the Princes deuotion, knowing also that the forces of Germany would be ready to march in their fauour in the Spring, seeks to diuide his enemies power, and to overcome them by peece-meale. O. r. first motions are sudden, but they doe not alwayes bring forth effects premeditated. To come to a battell, was properly to cut away the sinewes of the Realme, and by their mutuall weakning, to inuite the forraigne enemy to the inuaſion

A inuaſion of this Estate. The ſoueraigne Commander of battels did ſhew at this time a ſigne of his accuſtomed fauour to this Crowne, taking from both the Generals the ſharpeſſe of their iudgements, and making them to loſe in one day a notable occaſion for either of them to preuaile againſt his enemy, as we ſhall here.

The Prince had intelligence, that the Duke camped in a place of aduantage, vnder the fauour of a meadow, intrenched on diuers parts: ſo not able to draw his enemy to fight, he diſlodged, and goes towards Luſignan. The Duke takes the ſame courſe, and one not acquainted with the others deſignes, the Marſhals of both Campes meet in a manner at one inſtant at Pamprou, ſix leagues from Poitiers, a great village furniſhed with victuals, and B in a very good country. They chaſe and re-chaſe one another, but loath to diſpute this Rendezvous with more hazard, they both leaue it (yet with an honourable retreat of either ſide) to put themſelues in battell, a quarter of a league from the place. The Admirall and D'Andelot his brother, ſupported their men with ſix Cornets of horſe, ſet in order vpon a ſmall hill, to keepe the Catholikes from viewing the valley, and to giue them ſome apprehenſion of greater forces lodged there. The Prince was a league from thence, and aduanced with great ſpeed. On the Dukes part there appeared ſeuen or eight hundred Lances, commanded by the Duke of Marignies. Being approached within Cannon ſhor, the Admirall cauſeth a Capitaine of Argoleſiers to aduance alongſt a hedge, who more valiant then diſcreet, ſals preſently to ſkirmiſh, and their cornet marcheth to ſecond them.

C Marignies thinks that they meane to fight, and ſends forth three or foure ſquadrons of Lancers: the Admirall and his brother grieued they had not prevented the indiſcretion of their Capitaine, who ingaged them to fight vnaduiſedly, and contrary to their charge, calls back theſe ſkirmiſhers, and with an aſſured countenance couers the weakneſſe of their troops. Marignies taking a troop of ſeruants for a battalion of Harguebuziers which appeared behind a village, ſtays his Lancers, and for want of footmen, loſeth the opportunity to fight. In the meane time the Enſignes of foot, and troops of horſe arriue from all parts: the night approaching, gaue them leiſure onely to ſkirmiſh with the Duke of Anious fore-ward. The Dukes fore-ward was too weake to endure the ſhooke: the Commanders deuiſe a policy, whereby they perwade the enemy, through fauour of the night, D that all their forces were preſent: their Drums ſound after the Suiffes manner, they double their guards, make great fires, caſt many matches amongſt the buſhes, keepe their men cloſe without any ſkirmiſh, leſt ſome priſoner ſhould diſcouer the truth, and after they had reſrefied themſelues, they diſlodge without any noiſe, ſome marching to Iaſeneuil, where the Duke lodged with the battell, the reſt to the village of Sanſey. So holding one another in ſuſpence, they loſe the opportunity of a great aduantage, the firſt in the Duke, the ſecond in the Prince. Mans counſell without God preuailes nothing, and, The actions of great men, are in his power, as thoſe of the meaner. So ſaith the Oracle. For the next day many things chanced more by hazard then by counſell. This retreat giues them courage to fight: to this end the Admirall follows them at the heeles, and the Prince marcheth after.

E ter. There were two wayes; one led to Sanſey, the other to Iaſeneuil. At the breake of day there riſeth a great miſt, which cauſeth the Princeto ſtray: after he had marched two leagues, he finds himſelfe in the front of the Dukes armie. Neceſſity giues him reſolution: he puts his Harguebuziers before, which were aboue twelue thouſand and forced to make ſome ſhew of fight, ſalutes the Duke with his Cannon, ſkirmiſhes with diuers volleys of ſhot, ſends to learne newes of his fore-ward, and wiſeth the Admirall to make haſte.

He had already turned head vpon the noiſe of the Cannon, but the Sunne ſetting at his arriuall, preventing a generall fight, cauſed all to paſſe in ſharpe ſkirmiſhes, with loſſe on either ſide: and after a daies breathing either part retired, the Duke to Poitiers, the Prince to Mirebeau.

F Few dayes after, they both returne to their firſt reſolution to fight. The Duke goes to field and recouers Mirebeau. But he doth not obſerue the compoſition, and giues D'Andelot cauſe for a reuenge, to cut in pieces the garriſon he finds in S. Florent, an Abbey neere vnto Saumur. The Prince held Loudun. It was in the Dukes way, and enioying it, he held a fertile Country from his enemies, which might feed his armie a moneth together: and there was no reaſon the Prince ſhould hazard his forces for the keeping of a weake place. The Duke approacheth: the next day he hath newes that the Prince puts his army in battell alongſt the ſuburbs: he likewiſe arangeth his: the Cannon playes on both ſides, and passeth through their squadrons doing some harme. About forty thousand men almost all French, beheld one another in the midst of a champion field, without any advantage, and with an equal courage and countenance attend but the signe of battell. But the outward cold did quench much of this inward heat: the frosts were great, continual mists, and the wayes full of slippery, as no man could hold his footing. It was dangerous for the first that charged, the slippery wayes stayed their horses, and the maine ditches (made to diuide the lands) serued them as trenches. So as either of them being loath to hazard any thing stand firm, beholding one another, expecting when the most rash should begin the charge. Such as got to the skirmish, either brake or put some member out of ioynt: their fals hurt more then the shot. Three dayes passe in this sort, the fourth the Duke retires to warme his troops benumbed with cold, and for the most part lodged in the open aire (of twenty yeares there had not bene felt so sharpe a winter,) in his retreat three companies were cut off in a village, one of Suisses, and two of French, and the sickness falling among the souldiers, diminished both the armies of eight thousand men. This fruitlesse abode caused a generall murmure, and both Nobility and souldiers on either partie did threaten, if they were not lodged in safe and well fortified places, they would provide for themselves, notable to endure the extreame frosts and cold without any effects. The two Commanders agree. The Duke goes to winter beyond the riuer of Loire about Saumur, and the Prince at Thouars, Monfrucil, Bellay, and places thereabouts, either hauing some secret practice against his enemy, but with small effect. This retreat gave the Prince leisure to deuise meanes for the maintenance of the warre. The goods of the Clergy of Poitou were engaged and sold to them that durst buy them: The Rochelois contribute foure score thousand Frankes, and the Queene of England sent an hundred thousand Angels, six Cannons, powder and shot, for the which shee was paid in Salt, Wooll, and Bell-metall, for the most part at the Catholikes cost.

St. Michael besieged.

The Abbey of Saint Michael alone, amongst all the other places of base Poitou, bridled the Protestants. They besiege it, batter it, and take it at the third assault, and cut foure or five hundred men in pieces which defended it. Martinengues, Entragues, and la Chastre Governours of Guienne, Orleans, and Bourges, besiege Sancerre, giue many assaults, lose many men, and finally tyred with many sallies, leaue this small towne in quiet, to be hereafter a myrrour of singular patience in the perseruacion of their liues and families. But those of Sancerre, seeking to enlarge themselves, and to build a fort vpon Loire, suffer themselves to bee surpris'd, lose both fort and some fifty men, and are enforced to shut themselves within their walls.

During the sharpnesse of Winter, and this small surceasing of armes, the Vicounts of Bourniquet, Montclar, Paulin, Gourdon, and others, with seuen thousand shot, and some horse, made war, especially against them of Tolousa. Montauban was their chiefe retreat, and experience had lately taught them; That it were better to defend the Province and their Country, menagins Montluc and their enemies, then transporting their armes into a strange County, to leaue them againe in prey. Piles was commanded to perswade them to ioyne with the Prince. At their refusal, he armes twelue hundred shot, and two hundred horse, takes Bergerac and Sainte Foy: passeth into Perigord, burning all the Villages: and to purge the death of Mouuins and Pierre Gourde, hee kills all that were suspected of their ouerthrow: and so he marcheth towards the Prince.

The Prince had now taken breath, and hearing that the Duke marched towards Angoulême, fortified with three thousand foot, & some horse which the Earle of Tende brought him, and two thousand Reistres led by the Reingraue and Balsompierre, hee retires along the Riuer of Charente, to view the Dukes countenance, and to fortifie the places of his obedience: but with the prejudice of his army. The Duke comes likewise to Chasteauneuf, a towne vpon the Riuer of Charente, and at the first takes a castle by composition, which was kept by a Scottishman. The Admirall likewise arriues, followed with seuen or eight hundred horse, and as many Hargubuziers: and to hinder the Dukes passage, he lodgeth two Regiments of foot nere to the bridge, seconded by the horse: charging them to vex the enemies guards with continuall alarmes, to make them thinke, that all the Princes vanguard was lodged there, and then he retires to Bassac, with the rest of the vanguard. But this commandement wrought no effect. They had forgotten the manner of camping, every one would lodge, liue, and forage at his ease: so as the most

A most part going to quarter elsewhere, and leauing the passage vnfurnished of men, make the passage easie for the Duke. The Duke, through the care of the Lord of Biron, repairs the bridge, makes another of boats, and in the night passeth the riuer of Charente. At the brake of day, fifty horse being in guard, a quarter of a League off, discouers the enemies troops that passed, and aduertise the Admirall: (the Prince being a League beyond at Iarnac) the Admirall sends for his men disperfed in their lodgings, to come vnto him, and to make their retreat together, and in the meane time hee attended them at Bassac.

In a great action all delayes are dangerous. He spends three houres to attend them, and might easily haue retired, if his troops had bene ioynd. Hee had nine corners of horse, and some Ensignes of foot. Montgomery, Acier, and Punnault were Colonels, whom hee was loath to lose. Being all ioynd with him (except Acier, who could not arise in time with his six thousand shot) he finds all the Dukes army past, making shew by their skirmishes, that that day, being the 13 of March, should not passe without a battell. The Prince was aduanced halfe a league in his retreat, but he was too well bred to see his friends engaged, and to fight in his absence. Hee turnes head towards the Admirall, with those few horse he could suddenly draw out of his battell: for he camped not, but his armie was disperfed into quarters. The Admirall making his retreat, encounters a small riuer, which could not be passed but in two or three places. Then the Duke sends forth the flower of all his horse, being seuen or eight hundred, who at the first, overthrow foure Corners, take la Nene, and la Lone fighting, vanquish Punnault, charge D'Andelot, but with the death of Montsales, and fifteene or sixteene others of account.

The battle of Brillac.

In the end the Prince and the Admirall see themselves in a manner engaged betwixt all the Dukes forces and the riuer of Charente: they goe to the charge, suit the Admirall and then the Prince, and at the first make them turne their backs that were before them: and now they endured a second charge, more fierce and of longer continuance. But suddenly all the army fals vpon them, their horsemen are in rout, the Princes horse slaine, and he overthrown vnder him, abandoned by his troops, and prisoner to the Lord of Argence, to whom he had yielded, but he was shot in the head with a pistol by Montsieuur a Gascon, and Captaine of the Princes guards. A lesson for great men, and a maxime of warre: That a Generall should not fight, but being forced, for that in the losse of his person consists the ruine of his army. This Prince hath left this memory of him, to haue yielded to no man of his age, neither in courage nor courttesie, eloquent in speech, liberal, affable to all the world, and a most excellent Commander in warre. The Protestants lost in this battell nere foure hundred men, most horsemen, and few footmen of account: la Tour a Poiteuain Sea, Captaine, young Chasteliers, Portant, Chandenier, Mesanchere, Brandanier, the eldest of the Bessons, the younger of Tabariere, Barrete, la Messeray, and a great number of other gentlemen of diuers Provinces, many wounded, and many prisoners: the amazement and disorder being so great, as they could not flye fast enough. Of Catholikes there died about two hundred, amongst the which were Montsales, the Barons of Ingrand, and Prunay of the house of Billy, the Earles of Mirandole, of Morete, Montcature, Linieres, and some others of marke.

The Prince of Conde slaine.

Many Protestants would haue gathered together againe, but they pursued them too nere, and the Reistres arriuing in the pursuit, so hastened them that fled, as night surpris'd them in the midst of their flight. The Admirall and d'Andelot not able to pacifie the amazement, nor repaire the disorder, tooke their way towards Saint Iean d'Angely, and gaue the rendezvous for them that escaped at Xaintes, whither the young Princes of Nauarre and Conde were retired. The body of the army was entred into Cognac. The footmen with their Commanders, Acier, Beaudin, Blagons, Chellier, Mirabel, and many others; and of the horse, Montgomery, Chaumont, and others. To dislodge them from Cognac, the victorious Duke sends to besiege it: but his attempts against Cognac, his intelligences within Saint Iean d'Angely, and his fruitlesse threats that hee vsed against Angoulême, stayed the course of his victory.

In the meane time the Protestants gather together the pieces of this shipwrack: the Admirall led the Princes to Tonay. Charente, he tooke view of the horse: Henry Prince of Nauarre was declared Generall, and Henry Prince of Conde an assistant, foure thousand masters tooke the oath, d'Andelot gathers the foot-men together, provided for money, and stayed the enemies courtes, when as a burning feuer took him out of this world the 27 of May in Xaintes, leaving for euer a surname purchased by him of a Knight without feare. After did succede him in his charge, Beaumont la Noelle had his company of men at armes, but the Admirall the care and government of the whole army, with the managing of the chiefe affaires which concerned the Protestants estate. The Dukes army did ouer-runne Xaintonge, Angoulmois, and Limosin, vnder the conduct of the Earle Brissac, Colonnell of the Infantry of France. Having recouered Aubierre, and some other places from the Protestants, he attempts Mucidan, being vigorously battered, and valiantly defended. In the end it is burnt to ashes, the castle endures some assaults, the most worthy men of the Regiments of Brissac, Montluc, and Escars, lose their liues there, and finally Brissac himselfe approaching to view the breach and the defences, is shot into the head and slaine vpon the countercarpe, leaving a wonderfull grieue to them that knew him, being now but six or six and twenty yeares old, and might in time haue proued one of the valiantest and greatest Captaines of his age. Yet necessity forced the besieged to a composition, to depart with bag and baggage. But the impatience to haue lost their Colonels, and so many brave souldiers, made most of them to be slaine, issuing out of their wals. Piles recompened this losse by the taking of the Isle of Medoc betwixt Bourdeaux and Rochelle, the spoile whereof enriched all his troop. Then Wolfgang Count Palatine of the Rhine, and Duke of Deuxpoints, brought vnto the Princes about six thousand Reistres, and five thousand Lansquenets. Ciuill warres alwayes make the way open to a neighbor stranger, the which he durst not attempt without the support of one partie. The difficulty was to ioyne with the Princes being farre off, and without a French conuoy it could hardly be done: but see what chanceth vnlook for.

Mory, Ioules, Morilliers, Pequiers, Espremy, and others, had in the beginning of this third inciuill warre, assembled five or six hundred horse, and two thousand harguebuziers, whom the difficulty to passe into Guienne had transported into Brabant to the Prince of Aurançes; Count Lodowike his brother, and Count Volrad of Mansfield, who hauing for a time entertained the warre with a variable successe against the Spaniard, passed the Meuse and offered battell to the Duke of Alua: but he sought onely to consume them for want of victuals, whereof they were so scantied, as necessity casting them backe into France, they came to Vitry, and so stricke vp into Germany, and by their arriall gaue Wolfgang the helpe he desired. Wee must now begin anew. The Duke of Aniou leaues Guienne, and takes the way of Berry, to keepe the Duke of Deuxpoints from ioyning with the Princes: but it had bene better to haue prevented his entry into the Realme. To this end, the King commits two armies, the one to the Duke of Aumale, the other to the D. of Nemours (neither of them being fortunate in war) both strong in footmen, but weaker in horse then the Germane. They aduance vnto Sauerne: coast the Germane Duke, who crost through Bourgongne, presse him on the flanks, and behind with sundry skirmishes, and oftentimes encounter goodly and fauourable occasions, which they let slip for want of iudgement and good correspondency, the true bond of the brauest exploits that may be practised in warre. But was it not a want of iudgement in these two great Commanders, fortified with twelve hundred horse and foure thousand foot sent by the Pope, to leaue la Charite vnfortified of men, knowing well that the Protestants could not passe the Riuier of Loire, without getting by force, or surprizing some of the passages thereon? Wolfgang attempts la Charite, presse it, terrifies it, and takes it, before that any succours can come, and thereby shortens his way about threecore leagues, where hee must haue passed at the head of Loire, and frees himselfe from a passage full of wood and mountains, whereas the horsemen would haue bene but an incumbrance.

The Admirall could by no means fauour these succours (for he had the Duke of Anious army in front) and holding it as a matter impossible for the Reistres to get a passage vpon the Riuier of Loire, he attended hourly newes of their rout. But aduertised of the successe: Behold (saide he) a good sene: let vs make it absolute by our diligence and resolution. So the Princes aduance towards the marches of Limosin, to keepe the Dukes army occupied, whilst that their Reistres marching through the Country performed the funerals of the D. of Deuxpoints, who being lately deceased of an ague, left the command of the army to the Earle of Mansfield, and in the end of Iune both the Protestant armies ioyned, the which vnited together made about six and twenty thousand fighting men: and in the

A Kings, they numbred about thirty thousand. The Country of Limosin is vnfruitfull, and the fertility of the soile forced the troops to lie dispersed, the which might easily cause some surprize: but the Admirall desired rather to prevent then be prevented. The Dukes army camped at Rochebeille. To surprize him they march, resolute to giue him battell, and are in view of the enemy before he hath taken any alarme of them.

Three hundred Harguebuziers of Colonnell Striffes kept the principal approach to this lodging, being strong both by situation and nature: and happy were they to bee lodged in a place of defence. At the first brunt Striffes relieues them with five hundred others who the space of an houre held good against foure thousand of the Princes foot, while the dukes army was put in battell. This passage being vncafe to force, the Admirall sends forth foure Cornets of horse which renew the charge: they breake vp certaine palizados which cornered Striffes Regiments, kill two and twenty Captaines, and five or sixe hundred men vpon the place: take their Colonnell (without whole resistance the Princes foreward had passed euen vnto the Cannon without any lett) put the rest to flight, and nothing but the raine that fell hindred the successe of a great victory, the which was continued the next day by a skirmish against two hundred Italians, and some horsemen of the Duke of Nemours, whereof many slue some, tooke others, and chased the rest, being mounted vpon horses of aduantage fit for such a retreat.

After this encounter, the Duke sent to refresh his troops vntill the beginning of October, in the garisons neere to Guienne: giuing the Princes by this meanes leasure to seize vpon many places, both by force and composition: Tiuiers, S. Suplice, Brantonne, Chasteau l'Eucisque, La Chapelle, Confolant, Chibannes, S. Genais, and others. Whilst the Duke rested, the Earle of Lude, Gouvernor of Poitou, promised wonders; but more in words then in effects. He had five thousand foot, and some cornets of horse, whereof hee had toure ouerthrowne by La Noue, neere vnto Niort: the Princes absence encouraged him to besiege Niort: where Puisault entred in despite of the assailants: hee sustained three assaults and some scaldadoes, forcing Lude after the losse of five hundred men to raise the siege. In the meane time the Princes approached neere to Poitou, and at the first had taken Chastelleraud by composition the 12 of Iuly, and the 21 following, Lucignan, D. Courré, Sinfay, Viuonne, and other small places about Poitiers, to cut off victuals from the townes. At the same time, the subiects of the Queene of Nauarre had their part in the Cake. Terride gouernor of Quercy, had accepted the Commission, to summon the Queene and the Prince her sonne to leaue the party of the pretended Reformed Religion: if not, to invade the countries of Bearn, Foix, and Nauarre. So accompanied with Nigrepelisse, Saincte Columbe, and others, hee had easily reduced all to the Kings obedience, and held Nauarrin besieged, the onely strong place that remained to the Queene.

The Princes send the Earle of Montgomery to encounter him, who with a small army of five hundred horse, and foure thousand foot, forced Terride to raise the siege, and to retire himselfe into Orthex. His men were dispersed, and to prevent him from gathering E them together, the Earle pursues him, besiegeth him, giues an assault, forceth the towne, and makes a great slaughter: and to beat Terride with his owne armes, he suddenly plants the Cannon he found in the towne against the Castle. Terride vnquished with these terrible stratagems, yeelds vpon composition, to depart with their liues and goods: Saincte Columbe, the Baron of Pordiac, Gohas, Tanas, and some others of the Queenes subiects, were excepted in the Capitulation, and as guilty of treason (hauing seized vpon her places, and stirred her subiects to rebellion) were put to death. This resolute repulse of Terride, and the execution of the aboue-named, did suddenly reduce all the other places to the Queenes obedience, and the Earle hauing manned the townes of his new conquests, came to Nerac, made warre a while with the neighbour Garisons, and so came to the Princes P armie. Let vs see the progresse of their armes. La Charite gaue the Protestants meanes to annoy the Prouinces on this side Loire, and taking this place from them, then the Duke of Aumale should recouer many commodities to refresh his armie.

To this end he appoints Sansac, who was yet a Notice in Commissions of such importance. Yet he gathers together out of the Garisons of Orleans, Bourges, Chartres, Neuers, Gien, and other townes, about seuen thousand foot, and five or six hundred horse, besiegeth La Charite, being yet but weakly fortified, changeth and re-changeth his battery, ouerthrowes a great part of the wall, and sends to the assault, the which was so resolutely resolutely defended, that of an hundred of the assailants scarce five returne to the campe: and vpon a false brute, that the Princes came to succour it, the besiegers display their Ensignes, and without any farther inquiry, recouer their Garisons, after amonethis figne, and the losse of aboute an hundred men. Within few dayes after, Blosset, Bois, and others, disbandd from the campe to visit thir families, fortifie the towne, spoile the Country, and by the taking of Douzy, Pouilly, Antrain, Saint Leonard, and other small townes, they made the way open to Berry, Niernois, and the neighbour Countries. The siege of Poitiers was lesse fatal, and of as small successe for the Protestants. The Admirall held opinion to force Saint Maixent, then Saumur, and to fortifie it speedily, to haue a passage vpon the Riuer of Loire, nere vnto them, and to transport the warre towards Paris in the time of haruist. Poitiers was then very well furnished: the Dukes of Guise and of Mayenne had put themselves into it: many Capitaines and companies both of horse and foot shewed a great resolution for the defence thereof vnder the ensignes of the two young brethren: these great and spacious townes being commonly the steeplechre of armies: yet all these reasons were of no force. The Nobility thereabouts preferring profit before honor, vrged the contrary: That Poitiers was indeed strong of men, but weake of defence, and to be forced: That this place taken, would be the conquest of all Poictou, a rich Prouince, the which would disspoint the Duke of Aniou of an assured retreat. But the hope of spoile was an enticing bait to draw them vnto it: for the more men are within it (saide the Nobility) the greater shall our booty bee. Yet the respect of their priuate profits made them forget the constant resolution of such as had vnder taken to guard it, the great means they had to defend themselves, and their small prouision of artillery, munition, pioneers, and other things necessary for the siege.

In the end, plurality of voices caries it. The Princes losse some weekes before Poitiers. The towne is commanded by hils, which as moyed them: but their slow batterie giues them time to fortifie the breach, and force the assailants to make new attempts elsewhere, and with the like successe. Hunger oppressed the Citizens, hauing lost many Capitaines, with a great number of souldiers: and the plague afflicted the Princes campe: those within find a good meanes for their liberty: and the Princes an honest cause to dislodge. The Duke of Aniou vnderstanding the extremity of the besieged, and that the Protestants arme began to dissolue, propounds two things to the Commanders, either to free Poitiers, or to suffer a place of that importance to be lost, in the which were many of their confident friends. Hec besieged Chastelleraud, and makes a breach: the French will haue the point: the Italians contend for it. In the end, the chance of the dice giues it them. They come brauely to the assault: the French disdain to follow them, and they within defend the breach. They overthrow the most resolute with a furious volley of shot, and force the rest to retire in confusion, leauing five Ensignes vpon the breach, about two hundred and fifty souldiers, and a great number wounded, whereof many died. This was the 7 of September. They prepared for a second attempt, when as the Princes taking this second assault for a lawfull occasion, raise their figne, where with they were no lesse troubled to depart. Hec besieged the honour, then the besieged were prest with extreme necessity. The Duke hauing no compleat army, and seeing his designe succeed, dislodgeth all night, retires to Celle in Touraine, passeth Vienne and Creuse, lodgeth his troop, and artillery in a place of aduantage, gathers together all his dispersed bands: and now the way is prepared for a second battell, and a notable victory.

The Princes being aduertised of this sudden retreat, take it for a kind of flight: march all night after them, passe the riuers, put themselves in battell, to force the Duke, or to make him retire to Tours, where the King then remained. Both the armies are in battell: but betwixt them is a small riuer, which makes the country moorish and very vnfit for a generall fight, so as they could not ioyne their battells, and had no meanes to bring the Cannon without hazard to lose it. The Duke who was lodged in Celle, a village well entrenched, flanked and gabioned, couered on the one side by a Riuer, and on the other with a wood, could not by any skirmishes be drawne to fight, vntill he had vnited all his forces. The Princes for want of victuals repasse Creuse and Vienne, and lodge at Eysie la Vineuse, and from thence (the Country being spoiled, and ill to lodge in) passe to Montcontour, a lodging of aduantage, both for the situation and commodity of victuals. The Duke pursues him, and by his speed deceiued the enemies. His foreward led by Biron meets

A them vnlooked for at Saint Cere, chargeth Monty, who made the retreat with 300 horse, and two hundred Harguebuziers, kills about fifty men at armes, and almost all his footmen, so amazeth the Princes army, as they all begin to wauer, and had not a freight been, where onely twenty men might march in front, the whole army had then beene in rout. The Admirall makes hast to repaire this disorder, and by his presence renues their danted courages. They charge and re-charge twice or thrice at this passage, and not able to bee forced, the two armies campe within shot of Musket, leauing it betwixt both. The Duke had eight or nine thousand horse, leueneene or eighteen thousand foot, French, Suisses, and Italians, and fiftene pieces of artillery. The Princes had six thousand horse, French and Reistres, ten thousand Harguebuziers French and Lanquenets, and eleuen pieces of Cannon.

As these armies beheld one another, two Gentlemen following the Dukes campe, present themselves to the first they meet of the Protestant party. Aduertise the Admirall (saide they) that he forbear to fight, for the succours newly arriued haue greatly fortified our armie: let him temporize amoneth onely: it is the time the Nobilitie hath giuen vnto the Duke, with protestation to serue him for that time, but not afterwards, then shall he bee forced to a peace to your aduantage. Of two Counsels those which happen to their owne time do commonly follow the worst. They aduertise the Admirall herof, he apprehends it, and desires to follow it, so doe the most modest, and that at nine of the clocke at night they should take the way to Eruaux, putting the riuer, that runnes there, betwixt the two armies. Others of a more boyling humour, inferre: That these nightly retreats terrifie them that make them, preiudice their reputations, augments the enemies courage, and that they must doe it onely at the point of day. Moreover, this might bee a practice to amaze their troopes, and that coming from suspected persons, accustomed to deceiue, it was also suspect, and to be reiected.

This diuerfity of opinions troubled the Admirall, but see what afflicted him more neerely. The Reistres did mutine for want of pay, the Lanquenets refused to march: three or foure French regiments of the most remote Countries, had already asked leaue to depart, many Gentlemen were retired to their houses, and the Duke approached. The Admirall then beseecheth the Princes that were at Parthenay to come to the armie, that by their presence they might containe them in obedience. They bring 150 good horse. But whilst the Admirall labours to pacifie the mutiny of the Germans, two houres are spent, so as the troopes cannot recouer a place of aduantage nere vnto Eruaux, where they could hardly haue charged them.

These broyles appeard, the army takes the way to Eruaux the third of October, and discouers the Dukes which aduanced. They cause the Princes to retire, being yet too yong (but vnder colour to conduct them with more assurance, many retire with them) and arrange themselves in a valley, being couered from the Cannon. And vpon the approach of the Dukes foreward (consisting of nineteene Corners of Reistres in two Squadrons marching directly against the Admirall) the Admirall sends to Count Lodowike who led the battell, to send him three Corners. The Earle obeyes, but he lends them himselfe: who hath no sooner left his place, but hee remains engaged in the skirmish, the which continued three quarters of an houre: the Admirall was hurt in the face, and his horsemen being ouerthrowne, leaue the field. The battell makes a great resistance, but vnurnished of a head, it is forced to yeeld to the greater number: part of the footmen are cut in pieces, and part disperfed here and there, the artillery lost, and the ensignes caried away: all fly, euery man saues himselfe. Count Lodowike retires with three thousand horse in one company, turning head still against them that pursued, and recouers Parthenay, the refuge of the remainders of this shipwrecke. Foure thousand Lanquenets dyed in this battell, 1500 French souldiers, about three hundred men at Armes, many horses, seruants, and Lackeys of men of marke, Puigrefrier, Biron brother to him that led the foreward, and Saint Bonel, Corner of the Admirals company. La Noue was prisoner againe, with Aster and others: the Reistres baggage was spoiled, that of the French being more aduanced towards Niort and Parthenay, was saued. The Duke lost few foot, but five or six hundred horse, and twice as many hurt, whereof the most perished, as the eldest Reingraue, the Marquis of Bade, Clermont of Dauphine, and few others of quality.

A treaty of Peace.

The army tyred with labour, and prest with want of victuals, and other discommodities, dislodging from Saint Jean d'Angely, gave the Princes leisure to determine of their voyage: and the King retiring to Angiers, assigned the Princes deputies thither, to begin the following year by the continuance of a treaty of Peace begun in the month of November. Beaunais, la Noüe and Teligny come thither in February, and returne with no other answer to the Protestants, but a liberty to live within the Realme free from search in their houses, and for their safety two townes, which Biron should name vnto them, in the which they might doe what pleased them, not impugning the Kings authority, nor the quiet of the Realme: his Maiestie offering to restore them to their charges, except such as had been dismissed by the order of Iustice, and the money (growing by the sale thereof) received by the Kings commandment: but forbidding all exercise of Religion, but of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish: banishing all Ministers out of the Realme, and requiring them to disarme, to send backe presently their foraine forces, and to yield vp all townes held by the violence and force of armes. In the meane time posts fly into England and Germany, and to diuert or stay the succours which the Protestants might expect from thence, the brute flies that a Peace is made in France.

The Princes and Admirall thinking they were but deuices to hinder their affaires, euery one prepares againe to put on hamesse: their forces were dispersed into diuers Princes: those about Bourges had an enterprize vpon the towne, by the practice of a soldier, who by treacherie makes them to lose thirty men at the entry, and as many prisoners. So he that thinks to take, is often taken himselfe. The reduction of Poitou, had likewise brought Marans and the Castell of Beauvoir vpon the sea to the Kings obedience. Angoulême and Rochel onely remained to the Protestants. They had lost Lusignan: but Blay, Taillebourg, the Isles of Xaintonge, Marennes, and Brouage, were yet at their deuotion. To try Rochel the King threatens them by his Letters, and by promises he seeks to win Pardailhan and Romegon, the Gouvernours of Blay and Taillebourg. They answer (saith the History) the King wisely, and Lausac courageously: You cannot bee more grieued (said Pardailhan) to attempt to force me in this place: then I shall be, for the shame, losse and confusion, which I shall cause you to receive, or any other that shall attempt it. Romegon speaks in the same sence. The effect was more to be feared then words: yet Lausac attempted nothing against them. The Islands had much annoyed the siege of Saint Jean d'Angely, and the Lanquens escaped from Montcontour, were dispersed there. The Earle of Lude, Puigalliard and la Riviere Puitaille, Gouvernours, the one of Angiers, the other of Marans, with eight cornets of horse, and twenty ensignes of foot, force the said Islands, and make such a slaughter, as there remained not about three hundred fighting men.

La Noue the Princes Lieutenant in Guienne, studied to recouer Brouage, a place of great importance for the Rochelois, when as the Baron of la Garde attempting vpon Tonne Charente, made both their enterprises to proue vaine. Rochel is now blockt vpon all sides. Lude and Puigalliard had an armie in Poitou: la Riviere Puitaille the elder, held Marans and other places thereabouts: the younger commanded in Brouage. Landezean Vice-admirall held Olone. The Brittons & Bourdelois cut off the Rochelois victuals by sea. La Garde, then Generall of their gallies, did runne offensives euen into their haven: but to presse them on all sides, he would gladly haue beene master of Tonne Charente. La Noue had undertaken the defence thereof: who vnderstanding the Barons practice, so planted his shot, as at his enemies first landing, hee slue their Commanders, and many others, gaue liberty to the flauces, and became master of the galley: and if he had not too soone transported them, the rest comming to enter into Charente, and resolute to land, they could not haue escaped death or prison. This galli did afterwards serue Romegon to beat the Catholikes in many places. And if la Garde prevailed nothing by force, his policies were of as small effect. So as he lost his time, men, and money, and did nothing of moment.

Contrariwise, the defeat of some troops at Nouaille by the harguebuziers of La Noue, vnder the leading of Scipio an Italian Ingencer, and the recovery of Marans by La Noue, from Chaperon Gouvernour of the place, after the death of the elder Puitaille lately deceased,

A ceased, was the cause of the winning of ten or twelue other places thereabouts, and gaue the Rochelois meanes to enlarge themselves. The spoile of Olone did enrich them, furnished them with forty good vessels, with some armes and Cannon, and a good number of prisoners, and diminished their enemies strength of about 400 fighting men. This requiring caused Puigalliard and Fernagues to make enterprises vpon Langon and Gué of Nelyure, and by the recovery of Luslon to molest Marans and Rochel againe, if that la Noue had not speedily taken this fort from them that came to seize on it, and slue Sforza a valiant Gentleman, Captaine of a company of Italians, who were come to charge him behinde in his retreat.

B The Tower of Moric, the Castle of La Graue, Talmonde, and the Castle of Chiffé, being taken againe by Puigalliard, recomended the losse of Luslon: and the conquests of Puigalliard, were at the same time crost by Puissault Gouvernour of Marans, by the death of Captaine Dante, who scoured all Poitou, by the rout of their company, and wounding in a manner, of all the members thereof, and by the ouerthrow of Chaumont and Gouliere, issued out of Angoulême with two cornets of horse: by the death also of Guiti- nieri Gouvernour of S. Jean d'Angely: the ouerthrow of young Riniere Puitallé, the route of his men, and the losse of two Ensignes. But the death of Captaine Herbelote, commanding a company of French, and two of Italians, and the defeat of his troopes by Coignes issued out of Angoulême, which then held for the Princes, made the mid-may famous, a season when as the second parle of peace was renewed.

Time brings many changes, now it fauours the Protestants, reuiues their courages, The Protestants fortified, fortifies their hopes, and the Catholikes are new to beginne; the King was wearied with this variable continuance of warre, it drew his subjects from his obedience, ruined his Prouinces, wasted his treasure, and consumed his forces. The Queene-mother, since the enterprize of Ateans, did still nourish in her breast a fire of reuenge. She was wonderfully discontented, that the Protestants in the beginning of the first troubles had so violently opposed against her desire to rule, by the mutuall ruine of the one and the other. But there was paine and perill to suppress the heads of the Protestants: many murderers, and many prisoners, offered themselves, but the most part drew backe when it came to the effect. Moreover, the Princes grew in age and iudgement, they framed themselves to affaires, they began to know the friends and enemies of the Common-weale. And on the other side, many Noblemen of either party, laboured to temper the humors, both of such as were best affected to the publike quiet, and of those that during these vniuall confusions, made a way for their ambitious designs: whilst that Biron and Teligny chief Deputies, the one for the King, the other for the Princes, labour about Peace.

Let vs see what course the Princes tooke since the battell of Montcontour vntill the peace. A small ball of snow rowled from a high mountaine, grows great in a short time, and becomes able to endure a great force. So the Councell whereby the Princes resolved to retire farre from the Conquerors armie, did much auale them: for they assured their men, fortified themselves with new troopes, and consumed their enemies, in the taking and retaking of places which they had possessed.

But still the poore people suffer for great mens follies. Aginois and Queray serues now as a good retreat for the Protestants. They finde there a fat and fruitful Country, where by the spoile of the contrarie party, they refresh their persons, and make a new bodie. There is nothing but inroads, spoiles and robbings of the enemy: but there was violent warre against Tholousa, and horrible fires in their houses which belonged to the Court of Parliament. They haue bene (said the Protestants) very violent to burne them of our Religion, beheaded Captaine Rapin, who caried them the Edict of Peace from the King, and to commit many other insulencies, whereof opportunitie now cries for vengeance. Doubtlesse the Iustice of God doth oftentimes send a wished encounter to be reuenged of an indignitie receiued. The Marshall of Danuile, La Valette, and some other Commanders of quality, made some sallies, with diuers variable euents, but not straying farre from their walls for feare of surpris.

Carmain, Oriac, la Faye, Lesbos, Montefrue, and generally all they besiege (except Saint Felix, from whence the Gascons were repulsd in the assault, with the losse of fifty men, and the Vicount of Montclar hurt whereof he dyed at Castres) is forced, and the garisons cut in pieces. crosses of Ecars, Pompadour, la Vanglion and others commanding three thousand men) A being fortified with five or six hundred horse, brought from Rochel by Beaudiné and Ren-ty, send Piles into the county of Rouffillon, where hee did spoile and greatly annoy the Spaniard, whilest the Kings deputies conferred neere vnto Carcassonne, with Teligny, Beauvais and la Chastetiere, who going afterwaies to his Maiestie, concluded what wee shal see in briefe. Languedoc, Viarez & Dauphine, hauing fortified the army with about 3000 Hargubuziers, most of them mounted at the countrey-mens charge, in stead of those which Neubrun (through fauour of the fort which hee built vpon Rofic right against Pulin) led away to refresh themselves in their countrey, hauing surmounted the difficulties of the mountaines, and the Admirall being freed from grieuous sicknesse, which B had brought him to deaths doore, at Saint Estienne in Forest, the army comes into Bour-gongne, where being fortified with 1500 light-horse, come from la Charite and the neighbour garisons, vnder the command of Briquemaule, they encounter a good occasion to aduance the peace.

It seemed to the Protestants a matter of some difficulty, to obtaine a peace, vnlesse they approached neere vnto Paris: and to that end, the Admirall had suffered almost all his footmen to furnish themselves with horses, and aduanced by great iourneys into the heart of France, whilest his troopes were fresh, and lusty, and free from diseases. But hee had before him, the Marshall of Cossé, the Kings Lieutenant in the absence of the Duke of Anjou: who, to hinder the Princes approach to Paris, seeks meanes to fight with them. They incamped at René-le-Duke, a place not very strong of situation, from whence they thought to dislodge them with their Cannon, whereof the Princes were vnfurnished, and by diuers volleys of shot, to make them leaue certaine passages which they held. The Marshall la Palette, Stroffs and la Chastre, come with all speed, charge and recharge them, and at the first, they force them to a passage. Briquemaule, Marshall of the campe, Montemery and Jenlis, endure the shooke; they kill, hurt and take many: and by this firme resolution, make it knowne, that their lodgings are not to be forced. So the Marshall founds a retreat, and the Princes, to whom all stay was preiudiciall, being strengthened with new companies drawne out of Sancerre, la Charité, Antrain, Vezelai, and other places of their party, and furnished with some artillery: they turned head towards Paris. But a truce of ten dayes, stayed all exploits of warre, betwixt them, and the Marshall: while the Baron of la Garde, Puigailiard & Riniere Puisseille, chiefe enemies to the Protestants, laboured to become Masters in Guienne, and the neighbour countrey. To that end, after they had overcome the troopes of horse and foot, led by la Noue, Soubize and Pruvauts, and by a shamefull chase shut their companies into Rochel, they recover all the forts and places which had beene taken from them since the surpris of Marans. And the more to restrain the Rochelois, they build a fort at Lulon, vnder the command of Captaine Masclaron. They hoped this fort should bee a bait to draw the Protestants to field, but hauing built it without contradiction, Puigailiard tries another stratagem. Hee retires his forces into high Poictou, and giues out, that the Princes had gotten a great victory, and that he must by the Dukes commandement, lead away his troopes with all speed: that by a strong ambush and turning head suddenly, hee might charge the Protestants, and defeat them at their first approach. Notwithstanding, La Noue and his companions keepe themselves quiet, giuing their troops (amazed by their last fight) time to take breath, the which causeth Masclaron to slacke the guard of his fort.

Lulon besieged

La Noue being aduertised, that the fort was to be forced, goes out of Rochel with some cornets, eleven ensignes of French, and 300 Lanquenets, which remained: Puigailiard gathers together speedily what troopes he can, which now began to leaue him: and to shut vp la Noue betwixt Marans and Lulon, makes them to march two dayes and a night to Saint Gemme, halfe a league from Lulon, but with one light repast. Here his second policy of warre preuailes as little as the first. He faines himselfe sick, and giues out, that a burning ague detained him in his bed: then vnder colour of the deliuey of Ronsiere a Gentleman of Poictou, and others whom Pruvauts had lately taken in an encounter: he sends a trumpet to assure them of this pretended sicknesse, and to discouer the strength of the besiegers. But this spy was not cunning enough: he trips in his answers, and by his faintnesse discouers his matters practices. Puivauts extorts the truth by force: then shewing them, that they had to do with men that were toiled and broken with their great march,

1570

A march, they dislodge from S. Gemme, to ioine with La Noue. Puigailiard is aduertised that the enemy flies, and retires in disorder to Marans. Hee approacheth, enters the Bourg, and finding nothing but the nest, some runne to the victuals, others to the spoile. But they haue a contrarie aduice; That the enemy is neere and in battell. La Noue had lodged his men by the fauour of the ditches, hedges, and bushes, which compasse in the vines of that countrey, whereas Puigailiards horse could not passe but by small companies. La Noue commanded to the charge, Saint Estienne and Brunciere beginne it, against 150 masters, of the chiefe troopes of Puigailiard, and makes them to stagger. Puivauts forceth through them, kils some, and amazeth the rest. Puigailiard and those that were best B mounted, fly vnto Fontenay, foure leagues from thence: the footmen hemmed in on all sides, and broken by the horse, presently giue way, and remaine at their mercy, without mercy, namely, of the Lanquenets, who reuenge vpon them the blood of their countermen, shed neere to Montcontour: Sixteene Ensignes, and two cornets were taken, 500 old souldiers slain vpon the place, and thirty men at armes, with many Commanders and Officers of Regiments and Companies. Seven or eight hundred prisoners were sent away with white wands in their hands. The fort being valiantly assailed, and yielded by Masclaron, added foure companies to the victory, and this victory caused the conquest of Fontenay le Coete, from whence the besieged retired to Niort: La Noue hauing lost his left arm in the siege.

Lulon.

C Oleron, Marenes, Soubize and Brouage, yielded to the victors, where as the death of Riniere Puisseille, recompensed La Noues hurt. So as by the recovery of all that which the King held about Rochel, the Protestants coopt vp the Catholics within the walls of Saint Iean d'Angely. The Prince Dauphin of Auvergne came into Poictou, to repaire Puigailiards losses, and to strengthen the forces of the Earle of Lude, for the making of some new attempt, when as a peace concluded betwixt the King and the Princes, stayed the course of their triumphs, the eleuenth of August, and caused a suspension of Armes, to renew it againe two yeares after, with a more vnworthy and horrible proceeding.

By this third Ediſt of Peace, they had foure townes of safety, Rochel, Montauban, D Cognac and La Charité, to be held two yeares in the Princes names, and the Princes, with the chiefe Commanders of the Protestants, attending the full execution thereof, retired to Rochel: the armies were dismissed, and the strangers conducted into Lorraine. Soone after, the Emperour Maximilian the second, gaue his eldest daughter in marriage to Philip King of Spaine (so the Vncle married his Neece, but the House of Austria hath oftentimes obtained such dispensations) and for Charles in the towne of Meziens in the end of Nouember, tooke to wife Elizabeth the younger Sister, a wife and vertuous Princeesse.

The third
Ediſt of Peace

King Charles

daughter.

There was a Peace concluded, but no full obseruation of the Ediſt: whereupon the Princes sent Briquemaule, Teligny, Beauvais la Noue and Cannanes to Court. The King at their instance, sent Commissioners throughout all the Prouinces of this Realme. But there were some amongst them, who (not many yeeres before) had condemned the Admirall to be hanged. Amongst others, the Marshall of Cossé, and Prontiere Master of Requests, were at Rochel, to consult with the Queene of Nauarre and the Admirall, about the meanes in generall, to maintaine the Realme in Peace: and particularly to treat of a marriage betwixt Henry of Bourbon Prince of Nauarre, and Marguerite of Valois the Kings Sister, and then to conferre with the Admirall touching the warre which his Maiestie seemed to pretend against the Spaniard in the Low-countries, to the protection whereof, he was greatly sollicitied. The Kings good countenance, and the gifts hee gaue to the Deputies, namely, to Teligny, who seemed to be greatly in his Maiesties fauour and F likewise might doe much to perswade his father-in-law to come to Court, makes them at their returne to Rochel, to extoll the Kings singular loue and affection to the Queene of Nauarre, the Princes, the Admirall, and to all the rest of their party, and to assure them by his commandement, that he will not onely maintaine the Peace, but also confirme it by the alliance of his owne Sister, and that he desires to conferre by mouth with the Admirall, touching this new expedition of the Low-countries, and therefore they should make hast to goe vnto him.

And the better to confirme them in this beliefe, the King sends Biron after them with the same charge, and that hee would procure the Queene his Mother, and the Duke of Anjou his brother, to moderate their spleenes and discontents, and would worke a reconciliation betwixt the Duke of Guise and the Admirall. The apparant meanes to confirme a publicke concord did please the Admirall, beleiving this marriage should bee the ground of a most happy peace, and the Queene of Navarre feared lest delay should alter the Kings good meaning. But the accomplishment of the marriage was hindered by some less. The Pope made some difficulty to dispencc therewith, as well by reason of the consanguinitie of the parties, (the one being petty-Nephew, the other grand-child of Francis the first King of France) as also for the difference of their religions. The Queene of Navarre likewise made some scruple of this disparity of religion, of the ceremonies, and of the place of the solemnity. She would not have the marriage celebrated after the manner of the Catholike Church, and feared the City of Paris, as most affected to their religion, and of long time an enemy to the House of Navarre.

Pretences for the Low-country warres.

Contrariwise, the King would have Paris to bee the Theater, where this notable act should be solemnly celebrated in view of the capitall City of his Realme, without changing any thing in forme of royall marriage. In the end, the respect of civill reason prevailed. As for the motives of this warre pretended in the Low-country: (they were goodly in shew) for besides this hereditarie hatred of the French against the Spaniard, being reuived by the outrages and warres made in France by Charles and Philip his sonne, the remembrance whereof was yet fresh, they renewed the ancient quarrels of many possessions in the Low-countries, depending vpon this Crowne. Moreover, they pretended new causes, which seemed lawfull to breake the alliance betwixt the two Kings. That his Maiestie had most certaine intelligence of poison giuen by Philip to his wife, the Sister of our Charles, vpon some discontents and filthy ialousies. These reasons had a shew of truth, and the Admirall to the end the French (who cannot liue long together in mutuall concord, and that by a long use of warre breathed nothing but warre) should not seeke some new seeds of civill diuision, held it good to direct this vehemence heat against some stranger and nation as farre off. Many necessary considerations fortified this civill council. The forces of the Prince of Orange, and his brethren, who spoiled by the Spaniard of many rich possessions both in the Low-countries, and in the country of Bourgogne, had long time sought to recouer it by armes. The credit and fauour of the Low-country men in Germany, by reason of the exceeding crueltie of the Duke of Alua, Lodowike of Nassau, brother to the said Prince, a man of great courage and resolution, prest it forward, and his presence was a spur to the Admirall. Moreover, to the end it should seeme this warre was managed with the Kings consent, his Maiestie did suffer the Prince of Auranges Fleet to ride about Rochel, annoying the Spaniards and Portugals, which failed vpon that coast for the trafficke of the Low-countries: and for Count Lodowike, to sell the booty hee had taken from the enemy freely and publickly at Rochel.

So the Admirall, a widower by reason of Charles of Lauall deceased in the second troubles, after he had espoused the Countesse of Antremont in Sauoy, at Rochel, and giuen his daughter Louise to the Lord of Teligny to wife, he comes to Court, relying vpon the Kings assurances, so often confirmed by messengers: and especially by the Marshal of Cosse whom the King had sent to accompany him, presuming the Admirall would giue more credit to the Marshals words, by reason of their familiarity.

The King receiued him with all Demonstrations of loue (those of Guise leaue him the place, not to yeeld any thing vnto him, but to returne soone after with greater authoritie) and to take from him all ialousies and distrusts which were giuen him from all parts, the King at the first doth recompence the losses which the Admirall had sustained during the former warres, by the gift of a hundred thousand frankes, and grants him for one whole year, the reuenues which his brother the Cardinal of Chastillon enjoyed (being lately deceased in England.) He giues him a place in the Priuy council. Doth oft-times conferre with him touching the warres of Flanders, and makes shew to bee governed therein by his aduice and council: hee honours him with that plausible name of father, and treats with him so familiarly, as the country tooke this familiarity for a scale of his Masters affection to the Admirall, and the people beganne now to murmure, that Charles not onely fauoured the Huguenots, but would shortly himselfe become

A become a Huguenot. A cunning bait to free the Admirall from suspition by the aduertisements which had beene giuen him to the contraire. He could now tast no admonitions, his spirit was so transported with the Kings countenance and words.

Doublelesse the wisdom of man failes euen in the wisest, when it pleaseth him that giues it, to weaken the strongest spirits, and (by a iudgement incomprehensible to man) to cast a vayle before his eyes, and to make him vnable to conceiue the Iustice and horror of the iudgement which he meanes to display. For the better advancing the enterprise of the Low-countries, the Admirall thought it fit the King should make a Peace with Elizabeth Queene of England. They might treat it with a very honest colour, to the prejudice of the Spaniards. Elizabeth was not married, and Henry Duke of Anjou had no wife, the dignity of so high an alliance was honorable for the Duke, and the quality of a Kings brother was not to be contemned by a Queene: hauing also in his young age purchased great glory and reputation. This charge is giuen to the Marshall of Montmorency. But the issue did shew, that besides this negotiation of Peace, their meaning was to abuse both the Admirall and all others whom it was expedient to abuse for the execution of the council of Saint Cloud, and by the same practice to send the Marshall farre from Court, left by his ordinary conuersing with the King, hauing a good iudgement, and smelling out the plots of this pitifull Tragedy, hee should discouer them to the Admirall his cousin: and by meanes of this new peace, the English in the midst of this indignitie, should be refrained from attempting of any thing in fauour of the Protestants, as it chanced. During this time the Admirall retires to Chastillon: and in the meane season they prepare a Fleet at Bourdeaux and Brouage, vnder the command of Sirey, Landeran and the Baron of la Garde. The pretext was the warre of Flanders: yet had they expresse commission to attempt vpon Rochel, and by open or secret practices to get it into their owne power.

The Admirall hauing founded the foard, vpon his assurance to the Queene of Navarre of the Kings singular affection to her and to all her house, in the end shee goes to Blois, where as the Court remained. Hereupon falls out an accident, which made the advancement of the said marriage more easie: the death of Pope Pius the fifth. Gregory the thirteenth, succeeded him: whereupon the King sent the Cardinal of Lorraine to Rome, to assist at the new election, and to procure for his successor a necessary dispencc, for the accomplishing of the solemnitie.

Some letters of the Cardinall of Pelue (sometimes a scullion in the Colledge of Montaignu, and then seruant to the Cardinall of Lorraine during this study, and afterwards growne to be a Cardinall) written vnto his Master, being intercepted by the way, containing amongst other things: That the Court of Rome did wonder greatly at the familiarity the King vsed to the Admirall, during his abode nere his Maiestie: that it was fit to use such policy, attending the execution of the Priuy Council, the which discouered sufficiently that which was generally spoken of throughout all France. This had beene concluded at S.

Cloud nere vnto Paris, amongst few, but it was common in many mens mouths: and Lignerolles, Gouverneur of Bourbonnois, one of the D. of Anious mignons (for that he had blabed out some thing which he had learned in secret of his master) did expiate the rashnes of his licentious tongue, with the price of his blood. But we shall see in our dayes a more strange effect of Gods iustice, for that the last of our Kings of the race of Valois, shall end his life miserably in the same chamber where the fatal council had beene held in his presence. Neither could the aduice of Pelue, nor any other, stay the Admirall from comming to Paris as soone as the King: being solicited by his Maiestie, by many and sundry Letters, to conclude fully of the marriage, (besides they treated the marriage of the Prince of Conde, with the Marquesse of Lisle, the yongest daughter of the House of Neuers) and F of the voyage of Flanders.

The Queene of Navarre, to whom this long delay was very troublesome, prepared all things necessary for so famous an act, but she falls sicke of a quotidian feuer, the fourth of Iune, eightene dayes after her arriual, and dyeth the fifth day after her sicknesse, growing (said the Physicians) of an extraordinary hardnes of the Lungs, with a great impostume, augmented by the great heat of the season, and her continuall trauell in the time of her health. A Princess of a notable courage, inuincible in aduersitie, of a ready wit, iudicious, absolute in her actions, capable of council, comprehending things with a great viacity of spirit, and deliuering her minde with an admirable grace, either by word or A writing: of a Ionall complexion, and very pleasant in conuersation. But happy chiefly in this, that she left vs a lawfull heire for to inherit this Crowne, to redeme it out of the hands of the flanger, and to preferue it with happinesse and prosperitie.

Supposed to be poisoned.

Many are amazed at this sudden death, as an assured foretelling of some future mischiefe. The King, the Queene-mother, and all the Kings House shew a wonderfull sorrow: and to take away all suspicion of poison, Charles commands the body to be opened, and to search the causes of her death. The Physicians report, there is no shew of poyson, but her braine was not opened. Some hold opinion, that an Italian, the Kings perfumer presented her with a paire of Gloues, which presented her from beholding of that pitifull B and bloody tragedy, which shall bee shortly acted. The continuall messages sent from Charles, had likewise drawne the Princes to Court, and this death did seeme to aduance the marriage, for the gaue vnto her sonne the kingdome of Nauarre, and now he beganne to enioy the title of King, and all his mothers succession. The Popes dispensation was necessary, without the which the Cardinall of Bourbon vncle to Henry, who was appointed to marry them, refused to proceed therein. In the end it comes, and the day of the consummation is appointed to be kept the 18 of August.

Beginning of the warres in Flanders.

Such were the actions of the Court, whilst that Cont Lodowick, La Noue, Sanconrt and Ienlis, to whom the King had giuen chiefe Commissions for the Belgicke warre, had by the taking of Monts in Hainault, drawne all the Duke of Aluaes forces against them. C Flushing had slain their Gouverneur, with the most part of the Spanish garison, and repulled those the Duke had sent to recover the towne. Many other townes of the Low-Countries followed the like example. Holland and Zelant hunted after their libertie. Beginnings which seemed to draw after them a long continuance of great consequence: and the authoritie the King gaue to the aboue named to prouide for the succour of Monts, and for the continuing of other like exploits, induced the Admirall to beleeue firmly, that the King embraced this businesse without dissembling. According to this authority, Ienlis led fure hundred horse, and foure thousand foot, whereof the Duke of Alua being aduertised, he surprised him suddenly, defeated his troopes, tooke him prisoner, with many others, and slue many of his men.

Ienlis defeated.

The King seemed displeased with these newes, hee sends to Monducet his Ambassadour of the Low-countries, to procure the libertie of these prisoners: and he sends the Admirall to send such succours as hee could, to ioine with the armie of Reiftres which the Prince of Orange had leauied: hee caused money to bee made ready for the entertainment of the foot, which they esteemed foure regiments, and thirty companies of men at armes. The Ambassador of Spaine was gone out of France. The Queene-mother likewise playing her part, seemed to bee ignorant of the Kings designs, and being informed thereof, shee seemed ready to retire from Court. These reasons did still confirme the Admirall, Theligny, and the rest in that belief; that the King concurred with the Admirall in one will, to send the warres farre off into the King of Spaines countries, the which hee had before kindled in the foure corners, and in the heart of this Realme, pretending to entertaine it there, and to maintaine himselfe with the shipwracke of this Crowne, and to seize thereon in time, as the attempt of his designs in our dayes haue testified.

The Marshall of Montmorency returned from his Ambassage, bringing a mutuall league offensive and defensive, with, and against all men, not naming any one: but the marriage whereof hee had charge remained fruitlesse: which made many beleeue that it was but a meere fiction, fit for the season, where they prepared a scaffold, on the which they should soone present a horrible spectacle. The Marshall either not to bee a spectator nor counsellor, or doubting to be engaged in these publike and private furies, F retires himselfe to his house. Rochel was in the meane time beleaguered, fouldiers arised hourly, giuing terrible threats against the towne, who beganne to cry to the Admirall for succours. In other townes they heard secret murmurings, which terrified the most cleere-sighted amongst the Protestants. These aduertisements sound continually in the Admirals eares. But hee continues alwayes like vnto himselfe, constant in the middest of all motions, and grew resolute against all such as laboured to call him from Court, either by mouth or writing. As for the house of Guise (saith hee) whereas they

A they will put me in feare, the King hath taken order, making vs to sweare before him to continue friends: and as for them of the Religion, the marriage of Madam Marguerit, whom his Majesty giues not to the King of Nauarre alone, but as it were to all those of the party, to ioine himselfe vnto them by an indissoluble union, is the finishing of their quiet and safety. To conclude, he will be no more troubled touching the Kings ill meaning, nor the Queene-mothers, the duke of Anious, the Guisens, nor any others.

And that which settles the Admirall the more in his conceit, hee finds the King, (after the death of Sigismund King of Poland) to effect the pursuite of that Crowne in fauour of his brother. Charles was cleare-sighted in affaires of State; hee was yong, yet of quicke B and ready wit, and (if bloody and furious counsels had not peruerted him) without doubt he might haue brought forth better frutes, and this Monarchy had been freed from the miseries which haue since ruined it. His brother had great credit generally in France: his mildnesse made him pleasing to his Mother, and his liberalitie, to the people. He desired rather to see him command farre off then nere. And the Admirall, who knew the D. of Aniou to be an irreconcilable enemy to the Protestants, supposed that the King would by his absence settle a firme peace: that Henry being confirmed in Poland, his adherents would grow more milde: that the house of Guise disappointed of this support, would feare the Kings looks, the which sometimes appeared terrible: and that Charles would soone discharge the Queene his mother from the government of affaires, and take C it wholly vnto himselfe, as already he made shewes of his intent.

Negotiation of Poland.

The Admirall seeing Iohn of Montluc, Bishop of Valence, a man of iudgement, and practised in negotiations, employed in this Ambassage, he fed himselfe with new hopes. And contrariwise, Montluc (fore-seeing the imminent storme,) was very glad to be neither a Counsellor, nor a witnesse of the miseries that were like to fall vpon the Protestants. And indeed he had before counselled many of the chiefe amongst them, not to meddle in this imaginary warre of Flanders, but to retire in time to their houses, and not to trust ouer-much in the goodly shewes of Court, considering the enuy of the great, and the ill will of the people of Paris. But thus God confounds the iudgement, and blinds the vnderstanding of such as hee refuses for an example to their posterity. Oh France, D my haire stands vpright, and I tremble, to enter into the relation of so inhumane a Tragedie! And shall wee neuer be satisfied to heare the lamentable and continuall slaughter of our country-men? what man would not be troubled? what minde would not be oppressed with heauinesse and griete, to see so much blood vnprofitably spilt in our Cities, which should be carefully preferred for the defence of our country against strangers and common enemies? yet let vs passe this dangerous passage: the course of times inuities vs to proceed.

A great number of Noblemen, both Catholikes and Protestants, repaired from all parts, to the solemnizing of this marriage. Those of Guise come, bringing with them a great traine of men of all qualities faithfull vnto them. The water which moues by little E and little, the birds which houer about it, and the ayre colder then of custome, foretell a storme to come. So the common murmurings, the stirring of the quarter-masters, and other Captaines of Paris, the Kings guards dispersed through the City, the ordinarie threats against the Protestants, were certaine testimonies, that this marriage should be seasoned more with blood then water.

The day appointed comes: the Cardinall of Bourbon maries the parties vpon a high scaffold, built before the doore of four Ladies Church at Paris. Four dayes are spent in plays, feasts, dancing and masks: the which finished, the King protests to the Admirall, that he will answer and satisfie the Protestants requests. Euery one of their Churches had their Deputies in Court, for many affaires, wherein the Admirals authority was very necessary. F They ought a great summe of money to the Germanes, due for their entertainment in former warres: for the payment whereof, the King had suffered them to tax themselves to the fifth part of their estates. The Commissioners and Receiueurs prest the collection, being desirous to make an end of that businesse, the day of payment being past. Hereon the Admirall treated with the Priny Council, on Friday the 22 of August, where the Duke of Aniou in the Kings absence was President.

The marriage solemnized.

At the rising of the Council, the Admirall hauing attended on the King, who went to play at Tennis, he retired himselfe to his lodging at dinner time, being accompanied with fiftene or sixtene Gentlemen : and reading a petition, when as being about a hundred A paces from the Louvre, a Harguebuze shot from the window of a lodging neere by, belonging to Villemur, sometimes Schoolemaster to the Duke of Guise, carries away the fore-finger of his right hand, and wounds him in the left arme. They breake downe the doore of the lodging : they finde the Harguebuze, but not him that discharged it. This was Mauruel (vnder a counterfeit name of Bollan one of the Kings guards) a fit man for such murders : who mounting vpon a Genet of Spaine which was prouided ready for him, fled by Saint Anthonies gate to a place of safety.

The King played, and vpon the first report of this hurt : Shall I neuer haue quiet (said he) shall I daily see new troubles. And casting his Racket to the ground, hee retired to the B Louvre, and swears with an execration to the King of Nauarre, and the Prince of Condé (who were come vnto him to complaine of this outrage) to take such exemplary iustice of the offender, his fauours and adherents, as the Admirall and his friends should haue caused to be satisfied. He presently commands to pursue him that shot (but they goe flow-ly after him) he appoints three of the Parliament to make informations against the offender, Thon, Morfan, and Viole : hee leaves only two gates open with great guards, vnder colour to search for such as were priuy to this outrage, putting the whole city into armes.
The Queene-mother seemes to be discontented. They do great wrong vnto the King (cries she :) if he should suffer this crime unpunished, they would in the end attempt against his owne house. These counterfeit speeches retaine the King of Nauarre, and the Prince of Condé, C who had desired leaue to retire themselves, but then they made no more mention of leauing the Court. Charles himselfe, and Katharine his mother, come in the afternoone to visit the Admirall. The Admirall shewes vnto him the miseries which the breach of the Peace would bring vnto France : he beseecheth him to chafe away these mutines, and to maintaine his promised faith : whereupon hee was come to Court, and to prouide for the preferuacion of the Realme. But the Queene-mother knew well how to prevent him, left hee should acquaint the King with some secrets, touching the preferuacion of his Estate.

Treachery in a King.

The King protests againe to bee exceeding forie : that this act toucheth his honour, and that hee will be reuenged, so as the memory thereof shall remaine for cuer. Hee per- D suades the Admirall to suffer himselfe to be caried to the Louvre, for the safety of his person : that it was to bee feared, lest the multitude stirred vp by the authors of his hurt, should fall into some greater mutinie. Hee also aduiseh the Gentlemen, Protestants, to lodge about the Admirals lodging, lest (said he) that being disperfed through the citie, they should receive some wrong. But to shew that hee would not forget any thing that might concerne the Admirals safety, seeing the griefe of his wound would not suffer him to be transported, he command Coffins Captaine of his guards, to giue the Admirall as many of his guard as he pleased, and to suffer no Catholike to enter. And lest any man should grow amazed hereat, the King writes to the Governours of the Prouinces, to the chiefe townes, and Magistrates, That he would take such order, as the authors of so wicked E an act should be knowne and punished. And to his Ambassadors with foraine Princes : that they should make it knowne to all the world, that this outrage doth displease him. The Queenemother writes in like manner, but this was onely to keepe every bird within his nest. In the meane time the dukes of Aniou and Guise, tooke counsell of that which they had to doe the night following. Saturday in the morning, it is bruted throughout the citie, that the Protestants did threaten the house of Guise. Hereupon the Dukes of Guise and Aumale goe vnto the King, and say vnto him : that of late they haue found their seruice to be little agreeable to his Maiestie : that if he were pleased to see them retired to their houses, they were ready to depart. Goe (saith Charles vnto them with a frowning countenance) where you please, I will haue you at all times, if you be found guilty of the Admirals F hurt. So making them to be discontented, they goe to horse, and many with them, yet meaning to lye in Paris.

Paris was a pit-fall to intrap the chiefe of the Protestants : they being dead, the baser sort of that party, would in all likelihood remaine quiet. The time now offered a fit opporunitie of reuenge, the which should not be lost. The counsell was taken after dinner at the Tuilleries, by the King, the Queene Mother, the dukes of Aniou, Neuers, Retz and Tauannes.

The

A The King of Nauarres life, with the Prince of Condés, were put in balance, the wars had beene managed in their names : If they liue (said one) they will serue as an Ensigne, to reuiue those Huguenots which shall remaine in diuers Prouinces, and shall euery day minister motiues of confusions. Contrariwise, the Admirall and the principals being taken away, it shall be easie to restrain these young Princes, not onely not to attempt any inno-uation, but also in time to winne the Kings good fauour by their seruices : also the indignity of the fact would purchase an inuoluptable hatred amongst strangers. God disposed the hearts of the Councell to this second aduise, so as they will embrace the Catho-like religion, and liue vnder the obedience of his Maiesty. As for the rest (whom the fury B of their armes should touch) they might with a goodly pretext, leaue to the ancient quar-rell of the Guisens against the Admirall, and take for an excuse, the feare they had lest the Huguenots should seeke a reuenge for his hurt. To lay all the hatred vpon the Guisens, they giue the charge of this businesse to the Duke of Guise, they appoint him the meanes, the time, and the ministers of the execution.

The night being come, the Duke calls vnto him the Captaines of the Swisses, and other companies (whom to that end they had drawne into the Citie) and deliueis his charge vnto them, which was, to root out the Admirall and all his partisans. He exhorts them to blood and spoile, and disposeth his troops in some speciall places. Then hee giues aduise vnto the Prouost of the Merchants, the Sherifis and quarter-masters : that throughout C all France, the like should be done to the Huguenots as at Paris. That the Palace bell ringing at the breake of day, shall giue the signall : and the marke of these executioners should be a handkerchiefe tied about their arms, with a white crosse in their hats : that they should put their men in armes, and bee at midnight in the Towne-house, to receive order what they had to doe.

They assemble at midnight, and place many guards in the streets. Some Gentlemen lodged neere vnto the Admirall, rise at the noise of their armes, and the light of their lamps, and going into the streets, they enquire of the first they meet, what this assembly of armed men meant at so vnseasonable a time. A doubtfull answer being giuen them, makes them to repaire to the Louvre, to discouer more. Here the guards goe from words to D blowes, and fall vpon them. The Duke of Guise parts from the Louvre, accompanied with the Knight of Angoulesme, bastard to Henry the second, the Duke of Aumale, Coffins, Sarlabout, Goas, Attin a Picard, Hansfort an Auvergnac, and Besnes a Germane, with some Harguebuziers of the Kings, and all the Duke of Anious Guard. The alarme-bell rings at Saint Germaine Auxerrois, and they publish throughout the Citie : That the Huguenots had conspired against the King, the Queene mother, and all the chiefe in Court.
Coffins knocks at the Admirals gate : he enters at two of the clocke in the morning, the fourth and twentieth day of the month, slabs him that comes to open it, forceth the doores of the lodging, enters with feuen or eight armed. Besnes a household seruant to the Duke of Guise, offers the Admirall the point of his sword. Hereupon the Admirall being risen E vpon his feet, and covered with his night-gowne, said : To euengman, thou shouldst haue respect vnto my old age and infirmities, but thou shalt no way shorten my dayes. Hee thrusts him through the body, and then doubles it on his head. Attin shoots him through with a pistoll : and when as these three wounds were not able to ouerthrow him, Besnes wounds him on the legge ; every one of the rest giues his blow, and thus they cast that body miserably to the ground, whom liuing and in health they durst not looke in the face. The D.
of Guise hearing the noise of their armes in the base Court, enquires if it bee done, and commands them to cast him out at the window : who yet breathing, layes hold on the pillar : but these butcherly murderers hurle him downe headlong, where the duke wiping his face with a handkerchiefe, I know him (saith he) it is the very same : and so spurnes him F with his foot : then going into the street ; Courage companions, we haue begunne happily, let vs proceed to the rest, the King commands it. An Italian of the household of the D.
of Neuers, cuts off his head, and carries it to the King and Queene mother, which causing it to be embawled, sent it to the Pope and to the Cardinall of Lorraine, for an assurance of the death of his most capitall enemy.

The palace clocke strikes, and the people flye to the Admirals lodging like mad men, one cuts off his hands, another his priuy members : and for the space of three dayes, they dragge this poore carcase with all indignity through the streets, and then they cry and hang

hang it by the feet at Montfaucon. His lodging is spoiled, his household seruants murdered. Those which attended on the King of Nauarre and Prince of Conde, are driven out of their chambers, (they were in the Louvre, where the King had lodged them, to the end (sayd he) that (those of Guise hauing the people at their deuotion) they should not in like manner feele the effects of their violence) and murdered in the base Court: the Noblemen and Gentlemen lodged in the Admiralls quarter, vndergoe the like fortune. The like fury oppresseth the other Protestants throughout the city and suburbs, of all ages, conditions, and sexes, men, women, and children, rich and poore. There is nothing to be heard in Paris, but a horrible noise of armes, hortes and harguebuzes: a lamentable cry of people going vnto death, a pitifull complaint of such as cried for mercy, and the pitifull shouts of murderers. The streets are strewd with carcases, the pauements, market-places, and riuers died with blood. One day alone (by the murderers laying) hath ended the quarrell, which neither pen, paper, decrees of iustice, nor open warre could see determined in twelue years. About ten thousand soules makes this Sunday famous for euer, polluted with the spoiling of goods, and the effusion of their blood that were sleepe, disarmed, and at such a season as they thought themselves most safe. And doubtlesse the horrible catastrophes happened since to our Charles, to his brother and successors, and to the brethren of the House of Guise, in the last acts of their liues, and generally to all this Realme, euen vnto our dayes, forceth vs to confesse; That mans blood violently spilt, when as the manner of it may not lawfully be qualified with the name of Iustice, cannot please his sight, who hath created them to his owne image and likenesse, and fels them deadly to the authors of this effusion.

The fame of this massacre had already passed from the city to the suburbs, when as the Earle of Montgomery, John of Ferrieres Vidame of Chartres, Beauvais la Noelle, Fouencay, and many Gentlemen, lodged in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, perceiving a number of men to crosse the river, to make them equall with their companions: they abandon their baggage, goe suddenly to horse, and saue themselves with speed, being pursued halfe a dayes journey by the Duke of Guise. But he that should haue brought the keyes of Saint Germaine gate, hauing mistaken them, gaue them some leisure to get the advantage.

The King lends for the King of Nauarre, and the Prince of Conde, and giues them to vnderstand, That hauing bene crost many yeares with a continuance of warre, hee had in the end found an assured meanes to cut off all moriues of confusions to come: that by his commandement they had slain the Admirall (the pernicious author of forepassed troubles:) that now they did the like to others in the City, that were infected with the poison of heresie, and the ministers of his wickednesse: That he remembered well the discomforts he had receiued by their two meanes, making themselves the heads of a troop of desperate men: That now the cause and opportunity giues him meanes to be reuenged of such outrages: but notwithstanding he doth pardon their offence, by reason of consanguinity and their young age, beleeuing that all had bene committed, not by their fault and counsell, but by the Admirall and other wicked subjects, who now haue suffered and doe suffer a iust punishment due to their deserts, so as hereafter they reparaire their faults past, by fidelity and obedience; and renouncing the doctrine of their prophane superstition, they cleaue to the Catholike Religion, and returne into the communion of the Church: That hereafter hee will haue but one Religion within his Realme, euen that which he hath receiued from his Ancestors: That they should aduise whether they would obey him in this point, if not, let them resolute to yeeld their heads to the like punishments of their companions.

The King of Nauarre beseecheth his Maieesty to remember his promise, and the alliance lately contracted, and not to force him in the religion which hee hath learned from his infancy. The Prince of Conde answers: That the King hath giuen his faith to all of the Religion, and that he cannot perswade himselfe he will breake so solemne an oath. As for the obedience (saith hee) you require of me, I haue faithfully performed it vnto this day, neither will I hereafter stray in any thing from my duty. But as for my religion, my Liege, I am resolute to continue constant and (with the hazard of my life) maintaine it to be true: you haue granted me the exercise thereof, and God hath giuen me the knowledge, to whom I must yeeld an account, leauing my body and goods to the disposition of your will. This resolute answer puts Charles into choller, who full of threats,

A threats, giues the Prince but three dayes liberty to aduise, whether hee would soone lose his head vpon a scaffold. In the end, both abjure the doctrine they followed, and by the intercession of the Cardinall of Bourbon their Vncle, they obtained pardon of the Pope, and were receiued into the bosome of the Church.

After the massacre, those of Guise, according to the conclusion of the Councell, should retire themselves into some one of their houses out of Paris, and Charles should expressly charge and command the Gouernours of Prouinces and Townes, to obserue the Edict of peace, and to punish the breach thereof severely, to the end the people of France and their neighbours, should impute all the fury of this massacre, to the ancient quarrell of those of Guise, with the house of Chastillon. But the foolishness of the fact might heape vpon them and their posterity, the hatred of all men, with whom humane society and vertue is in recommendation. For they had not spared an infinite number of learned men, of reuerend old men, honest virgins, honourable matrons, women with child, chaste maidens, young schollers, and little Infants hanging at the breasts of their mothers. Among themselves therefore with the peoples loue, they refuse to goe out of Paris, handling the matter so politically, as they cause the King to auaunch all that had beene done. So Charles writes other Letters to his Ambassadors and Gouernours, aduertising them, That the tumult which had happened concerned not religion, but the preuention of his Estate, his House and Person, against the practices of the Admirall, and some other seditious persons; who had joyntly conspired his death, his Mothers, and his bretherens, and therefore he would haue his Edict of pacification religiously obserued. Yet if any Huguenots (moued with these newes of Paris) should assemble in armes, they should root them out, as perturbors of the publike peace, referring the surplusage of his will, to the credit of the bearer. And the better to authorise this approbation, the fix and twentieth day of August, Charles with his brethren assists in Parliament, all the chambers being assembled, where sitting in his seat of Iustice, he declares openly, that those things which had chanced in Paris, were done by his owne proper motion and commandement, yet making no mention of the cause. Christopher of Thou, the chiefe President, commended his zeale in the name of all the companie.

The Admirall accused of conspiracy.

D But to what end did he write the contrary the next day to his Officers and the Magistrats of Townes; That to his great griefe the Admirall his cousin, and some others of his party, had bene slaine at Paris: commanding them to prevent all mutinies and murders, and to proclaime, that euery man should remaine quiet in his house, without taking of armes, or giuing any offence: and to giue order that his Edict of pacification bee exactly obserued: and yet the same day to publish a declaration of the former tenure, containing, that by his expresse commandement, the Admirall and other his complies had bene slaine, not for matter of Religion, but to prevent the execution of a wicked practice made by them against the Kings person, the Queene-mother, his bretheren, the King of Nauarre (this was for a colour of excuse, to such as would obiect, Why then was this Prince saued from shipwracke, and it may bee for loue of him, the Prince of Conde his cousin) and generally against their Houses, and the House of France?

Doubtlesse there was small likelihood, that a little troop of men, dispersed some in the suburbs, others within the citie in small numbers, should presume to attempt any thing against the Estate. Charles had both night and day his ordinary guards, French, Swisses, and Scottishmen: the most of the Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen of the Realme were in Court to honour the marriage. Those which had accompanied the King of Nauarre and the Prince of Conde, had no other armes but their swords: and for a gage of their innocency, had brought for the most part their wives, children, sisters and kinsfolkes, studying only to shew themselves at the Tilt and Tourney.

F The accusation made no mention of time, place, or adherents, neither of the meanes, or any witnesses of this conspiracy. If it had bene plotted since the Admiralls hurt, three hundred Gentlemen vnarmed, which had accompanied him, could they haue effected any thing vnder a Commander, tied by both the armes, and ready to see the one cut off by the aduice of the Physitians and Chyrurgions, in a mighty city, and against about three-score thousand men, ready to be opposed at the first alarme? Moreouer, the King of Nauarre and Prince of Conde, who had bene still present at Councels, would they haue blemished their honors and Houses with so great an infamy? And if their innocency had freed freed them from the common danger, the consultations of the Admiral and his followers, A had they not bene very childish at such a time, in such a place, among so many naturall French-men come with him, who had neither goods, kinsfolke, pleasure, nor content without the Realme? Besides, if the Admirall were suspected of this attempt, might they not have committed him presently to a safe prison, in forme of his practices, and take such conclusions as the crime might deserue according to the lawes? To conclude, admit the Admirall after his hurt, or else his friends had giuen forth some bad speeches, must the same punishment deuoure so many persons, who conuersed onely with their books and papers, with their trafficke, and with their worke, so many women, who dreamed of their husbandry, so many virgins and infants, whose age and condition kept them from the B conference of any counsell?

As for the attempt against the King of Nauarre, that accusation is frivolous. Had not the Admirall him in his power, for the space of three yeares? what benefit should he reap by his death? Haue they not conuersed long together with an humble and sincere respect of the Admirall towards him, and a perfect loue of the sayd King to the Admirall: but omit all other reasons that might refuse this slander: let vs onely obserue the testimony which Montlie giues in the seventh booke of his Commentaries, vpon this subiect. The Queene-mother (saith he) did me the honour to write vnto me, that they had discovered a great conspiracy against the King and his Estate, the which was the cause of what had happened. I know what my belief was, it is not good to offend ones master. The King did neuer forget how the Admirall made him retire in haste from Meaux to Paris: wee lose our iudgements suddenly, and doe not dreame that Kings haue greater hearts then we haue, and doe sooner forget seruices then offences. And a little aboue: My Lord the Admirall was ill aduised, to thrust himselfe into Paris, to shew that hee gouerned all. I wonder, that so aduised and wise a man should commit so grosse an error. He payed dearly for it: it cost him his life, and many more.

The particularities of such as during this horrible butchery haue shed their bloods for Religions sake, at Meaux, Troyes, Orleans, Bourges, la Charité, Lions, Tholouza, Bourdeaux, Rouan, and other townes, in villages, and in the open fields, as they sought to saue themselves without the Realme, haue bene obserued in other workes that are extant, and the blood of these murdered persons, which amount to aboue thirty thousand, hauing dyed the earth, and made the waters red, haue cryed so loud, that the heauens haue continued their vengeance ouer great and small, for so many yeares, as there remains scarce any one of the authors of this violent fact. Britan and Picardy remained reasonably quiet: Champagne and Bourgongne shed little blood, through the policy of them of Guise, that all the blame might light vpon the King (as also they had saued many of the chiefe Protestants in the midst of the fury of this Parisien euen-song.) In Auvergne Saint Heran put more money into his coffers, then he shed blood in his government. In Dauphine there were some murders committed. In Provence, the humanity of the Earle of Tende restrained the hands and sword of the bloody-minded. E

In the end, the people (glutted with the blood, and cloyed with the spoiles of the murdered Protestants) grow quiet, and the King appoints an extraordinary Iubile with general processions, where his Maiesty assisted, with the Queene his mother, his brethren, and the Court, of purpose to giue thanks to God, for that which had so happily succeeded. There were yet some thornes stuck in Charles his feet: Rochel, Sancerre, Montauban, Nismes, Aubenas, Milliaud, Prias, Mirabel, Andure, and other small townes of Viurets and Seuennes serued as a Sanctuary for the Protestants that were escaped, to keepe them from danger. Rochel was not to be dealt withall, and it seemed that industry and secret practices should preuaile more then open force. Stroff and La Garde will relieue the inhabitants with men to keepe it, and vn furnish them of victuals, requiring a quantitie to refresh F their army. But they had men enough, a great number were fled thither, and many Protestant Souldiers whom the hope of the voyage of Flanders entertained in the kings army, slipped howeily into their towne. Their priuiledges likewise did free them from garison, and as for victuals, they had for their prouision, but could not spare any. Stroff and La Garde spent both time and money in vaine about Rochel: they therefore send Biron vnto them for their Gouvernor, with expresse commandement to receiue a garison. They answer, That they cannot beleuee that that charge comes from the King, who commanded the striid

A strict obseruation of the Edict, and grants them the vse of their ancient priuiledges vnder his obedience. And for a testimony they produce the Kings Letters of the 22 and 24 of August, whereby his Maiesty layes the motives of the sedition vpon them of Guise, saying, That he had much adoe to preserve himselfe in the midst of his guards in his Castle of Loure. As for the reasons which made them to auoid all the surprisles and baits of such as Biron sent to treat with them, they vsed the meanes which politicke wisdom doth usually furnish in such accidents: offering notwithstanding to accept Biron, so as the troops may be retired from thence; the exercise of their Religion to remaine free, and that hee bring no forces into the towne.

B Biron summons them by vertue of his authoritie, and vpon refusal proclaimes warre against them: and euen then, vnder colour to giue the army at Sea meanes to disperse it selfe, he labours by all meanes to cut of their victuals and prouisions, and to weaken them of their men. The King by his Letters patents of the 8 of October, calls home all that were fled out of diuers townes, saying, That as a good father of a family he had pitie of his poor subiects, being out of their houses: and for not coming did seize and declare their goods forfeit. Yet the excuses which the King made vnto the Pope, to the Duke of Alua, and to the Ambassador of Spaine, that the brutes of the Belgicke warre, and all the former counsels had tended to no other end, but to the ruine of the Huguenots: that his intent was to liue in peace and good correspondency with the Catholike king: and the Commissions he had sent to the Gouvernors of Prouinces to degrade all Protestants from their Offices and publicke charges, although they were ready to renounce their Religion, except such as advanced to meane offices, were continued by the King, abiding according to a forme set downe by the Colledge of Sorbonne, and to search for all Protestants, that during the troubles had had the command of armes, or townes of warre, made this repeale of Charles to be wonderfully suspected.

Hereafter they vse all acts of hostilitie against the Rochelois: such as they know to be of the towne are kept prisoners, and put to their ranfome: ships that failed towards the port were stayed: all merchandize belonging to the Rochelois seized & confiscated. They therefore hasten the succours which the Count Montgomery, the Vidame of Chartres and D others prepared for them in England. The 25 of October they set saile; but not able to approach, they returned backe. Those of Sancerre hauing refused to receiue a Gouvernor and Garison from the hands of La Castre Gouvernor of Berry, were beleagured in the beginning of October: Cadaillet Groome of the Chamber, and the Kings Huntsman, very well knowne in the towne, as an ancient seruant to the Earle of Sancerre, was sent to conferre with them: he brought the inhabitants to that point, as some desiring and others refusing the Lord of Fontaines being a Catholike, his brother perswaded the Castle by the means of some inhabitants, who shut themselves into it with him: but the resolution, and the greater number of the Protestants displaced them within foure and twenty houres, as Fontaines came to their succours. So as La Castre prepares now for open force, wherof wee E shall see the progresse in the beginning of the following yeare.

This vnworthy and strange proceeding against the Protestants, had made the French name hateful to strangers, especially in Poland, and did much trouble the negotiation, in fauour of the Duke of Aniou. Moreover, the Protestants both within and without the Realme, layd plots which in short time might produce dangerous effects. To make the Bishops negotiation more easie, and to croise the proiects of others, they obserue hereafter some forme of iustice against any that were found after the fury of the massacre. Brigue-mant a Gentleman of threescore and ten yeares old, and Cauaignes Master of Requests vnto the King, (both inward friends vnto the Admirall, and of great reputation) were of the number. They threaten them with an extraordinary torture, if they set not downe vnder their hands to haue conspired with the Admirall, the death of the King, his brethren, the Queene mother, and of the King of Nauarre, promising them pardon, if they demand it, in aduowing that wherewith they are charged. Wee will neuer (saide they) accuse innocents, nor our selues for so execrable a crime. The Commissioners not able to extort from them any such confession, they were both by sentence of the Court, as guilty of high treason, vnworthily hanged the 27 of October, in the presence of the King, Queene mother, her two other sonnes, and the King of Nauarre. To the same execution was added the like decree against the Admirall. His body had bene taken from Mountfaucou and ferrely

cretely buried, the which the greatest search of his enemies could neuer discover. They therefore make the forme of a man, dragge it through the citie, and then cause it to be hanged. Moreover, the King commands by his Letters Patents, That those of the pretended Religion should be maintained in safety in their houses, bodies, goods, and liberty of consciences. And to excuse what was past, they cast abroad many libels, defaming the memory of the Admirall and his followers. They giue new charges to the Ambassadors being in Germany, Poland, England, Suifferland, and other foraine countries, to iustifie the actions of the King and Catholikes, to the confusion and dishonor of the Admirall and his partie. But all these proceedings were meane to discover the iniquitie of their pernicious counsels.

For the intent of this Declaration in fauour of the Protestants was presently discouraged by the tenor of the Letters which the Duke of Guise did write vnto his wife, the day that Briquemaults was executed: The King (said he) hath decreed in Councell utterly to root out this sed. tissue vermine. But few would be taken, and the practices against the Prince of Averages and others being discovered by this Letter, vanished into smoke.

In the meane time, they continued their attempts against Rochel: and Esflars being chosen chiefe of the war for the Rochelois, having taken one of the Baron of la Garde galleys, who had approached too neare vnder colour of bringing a Letter to the whole body of the towne, caused Biron to publish the Kings Letters patents, giuen the sixth day of the month, and to make open warre to the Rochelois. But Charles was not willingly drawne to armes: he sees well that he had kindled a fire which hee should not quench when hee would. Henow tries the last stratagem. La Nune sent home by the Duke of Alua, after the taking of Monts in Hainault, had great credit among the Protestants, as one of the chiefe Captaines which remained. The King solicites him to be a meane to bring the Rochelois to composition. The impossibility of the thing, (answers he) and my conscience, will not suffer me to aduise the Rochelois to offer their throats to them that will cut them. Yet the Kings authority makes him to accept of this charge: but rather with an intent to serue the Rochelois, and to retire himselfe from Court, then to hurt them of his religion. After he had giuen an account of his Ambassage to Biron, who was then at Saint Jean d'Angely, he returns to Rochel, where he performed his duty fo well and carefully, that he acknowledged him for one of the chiefe instruments of the preservation thereof during the siege.

A Comet.

Then appeared there a new starre in heauen, hauing the forme of a Lozenge of foure points, and continued (beginning the ninth of Nouember) the space of nine months, immoueable (by the saying of the Astronomers) the first three weekes resembling that which serued as a guide to the Wifemen that came out of the East to worship Iesus Christ in Bethlem. The nineteenth of the said month, the King by another Edict, called home all his subjects to their houses, vpon paine of losse of their goods, and solicited the Protestant Sinists, to chafe away such as were fled to them for succour. But the Ambassadors instance was of no force, and the taking of Sommiers by the Marshall of d'Anville from the Protestants, the perswasions of Gondes to draw into the bosome of the Catholike Church Montbrun, Mirabel, and Les Digneieres (who euen then made shew of a most valiant, most wife, and most happy Captaine for their party, and shall hereafter haue a good share in our History) the assurance he gaue them, That the King was resolu'd to suffer but one Religion within his Realme, with all the preparations for the destruction of them in diuers Prouinces, tooke from them all desire to returne.

Seeing then that no Edicts can draw them home to their houses, and that Rochel, Sancerre, and other places (being threatned) prepare for defence, they must at the least take from the Protestants such refuges as they haue within the Realme. To shut vp Rochel, Biron enters into the Country of Onis, in the beginning of December, with seven cornets of horse, and eightene Ensignes of foot. Those of Sancerre runne yet at liberty: but the opinion of their chiefe Commanders, that they would attempt some other thing, and the vaine presumption they had of the situation of their hilly place, made them the more negligent, both to furnish it with victuals, and to reparaire the necessary fortifications to endure a siege, against the which they should haue foreseene the small hope of succours and the constant resolution of the assailants. Let vs consider of these circumstances, and prepare our selues to see the greatest resolution of men, led by Captaines to whom the necessity

A necessity of the time, gaue more credit, then their beginning gaue them authority. Martignon, Pilard, Marinac, La Fleur, Chaillos, Montauban, Buiffon, Paquelon, La Minee, and Dorsial commanded there ouer 650 men, and for Collonell they had Andrew Iouneau Bayliffe of the towne. An hundred and fifty strong labourers in the Vines, wrought great effects with their slings (which were called the Pistols of Sancerre) for the seruices vpon the wall in assaults, scaling's, and sallies.

In Ianuary La Chastre Lieutenant for the King, in the gouernment of Berry, and General of his army, came before it with about 500 horse, and 5000 foot, sixtene Ensignes of Pioners, and a great number of peasants gathered together: at the first hee offers a reasonable composition to the besieged, if they will accept it. As the beginning of this General was courteous, so was the proceeding of the besieged inciuill, disdainfull, and contrarie to the law of the Nations. They retaine the Drum, and make no answer. To make his approaches, La Chastre builds a fort about foure hundred paces off the towne towards Fontenay, another vpon the way of S. Thibault, a palisado in the field of S. Ladre: intrenched the approaches and wayes about the towne, planted ten pieces of artillery in the field of S. Ladre: and fixe others at Orme au Loup: (it is a high mountaine vpon the South side of Sancerre, which commands the towne) he floors against the walls and houses at random; and spends in two monthes about six thousand Cannon shot (and yet the besieged lost not about fife and twenty men) giues an assault, but with the losse of many that were

C flaine, and a great number hurt.

The 15 of March, La Chastre, by a second battery in three diuers places, beats down the defences both of towers and wal, makes a breach of about three hundred paces, giues a general assault, presents a scalado on another side, mynes and saps on the third, that the Sancerrois (wearing with so many difficulties) might shrinke vnder their burthen. But well assailed, and well defended, the besieged with the losse of seuteene souldiers, not only repulse the enemy, but also make them leaue about threecore of their most resolute men flaine in the ditches, about 200 wounded to the death, and as many maimed for cure; this cooled their heat, causing them to change this hasty fury of Cannons and assaults, into a longer, but more violent warre. They make many forts nearer vnto the Towne, and

D notwithstanding the sallies and ordinarie skirmishes of the Sancerrois, they furnish them with artillerie and men, sufficient to cut off all reliefe; so as being shut vp on all sides, they begin to want ordinarie victuals in the beginning of April: they eate their Asses and Moyles, then fall they to horses, Dogs, Cats, Mice, Moles, and Leather, and in the end to Parchment, Hornes, trappings of Horses, Girdles, and wild roots. And in the end of Iune, three parts of them had no bread to eate; some make it of flax-seed, others of all kinds of herbs mixt with bran, beaten and ground in Mortars, and others of straw, of Nut-shells, and of Slates: greafe and tallow serued for pottage, and frying; yea, some (a strange thing and neuer heard of) laboured to encounter the cruelty of their hunger, by the excrements of horses and men. But a horrible thing to see, the 19 of Iune, a labourer in the Vines

Sancerre in great extremity for victuals.

E and his wife satisfied their hunger with the head and intralles of their yong daughter: about three yeares old, being dead in languishing, giuing no other graue to the members of this poore carcase, but their bellies. But the Magistrate aduertised of this inhumanity, did for examples sake shorten their dayes, finding them guilty of other crimes: neither were they forced hereunto by any extremitie, seeing the same day they had bene relieved with pottage made of herbs and wine, whereof there was store in the towne. To conclude, fourecore men dyed by the sword at Sancerre (saith the History) but of hunger both within and without about fife hundred. And euen now the King began to fee his threats to take effect: I will make them (said he) eat one another. They were hopelesse of all humane helpe: such as they sent out for succours, either fell into their enemies hands, or

F died by the sword, or returned no more, or could not re-enter. So as they could not hope for any helpe, but in despairing of helpe, when as the prouidence of God brings them a strange and farre-bred Nation, to giue them the libertie of the fields, and the vlt of bread.

The Estates of Poland had chosen Henry Duke of Aniou brother to our Charles for their King (as we shall see in the end of the siege of Rochel) but with a promise and oath taken by the Bishop of Valence, and Lansac in the name of the King, their Master: That all the townes and persons in France molested for the cause of Religion should be set at libertie.

bertie. At the request thereof, the Ambassadors of Poland, this poore people languishing for hunger (yet resolute to die one after another, rather then to fall into their enemies hands, who threatened them with a generall massacre) the 19 of August they obtained of La Chastre in the Kings name: To depart with their Armes and baggage: impunitie for such as would remaine still, permission to dispose of their goods, promise to preserve the honour of women and maidens, and to pay la Chastre 40000 frankes by the Inhabitants that were absent. So La Chastre entering the last of the said month, dismantled Sancerre, beat down some houses, tooke away the Clocke, Bels, and other markes of a towne: but the other points of the capitulation, were reasonably well observed: the Bayliffe Jonneau was massacred the 12 of September nere vnto La Chastres lodging.

Now follows one of the most memorable sieges that hath been in many ages. A siege where many of the Commanders, and most part of those, which were noted to haue forced the Admirals lodging, began the butchery, and committed so many murders at Paris and else-where, came to seeke their graues. The Kings army was held to bee 50000 men by land and sea, and threecore pieces of artillerie. The besieged had a good number of Gentlemen and horsemen, eight companies of Inhabitants, nine of strangers, one of the Mayor, one of voluntaries, consisting of twenty Musquetiers, five and twenty armed with corslets of prooffe, and thirty Harguebuziers: the two thirds thereof, were Gentlemen, and such as had charge in the former warres. Yet the mildest way is the best. And therefore Biron in the beginning seeks some meanes of an accord: but the Rochelois discouering every day some new practice, beleueed that their preservation consisted in distrust. And a gentleman being in Rochel, reuealed the intelligences which Biron had with him for the surprizing of the towne, hauing already drawne into the towne some souldiers of Puigalliards and S. Martins companies, and was ready to draw in the most resolute Captains, if the Mayor and Councell had not held it more fit by a small exemplary execution, to break off a great and dangerous enterprise.

To encounter the enemy, La Nue is choise chiefe of the forces within the town, without any diminution of the Maiors rights and authoritie in other things. Montgomerys succours could not passe: La Nue sends new Deputies into England to the same end, but the league confirmed of late yeares betwixt our Charles and Q. Elizabeth, now againe renewed by the baptism of the Kings daughter (whereof Elizabeth was God-mother with the Empreffe) seemed to withdraw the affection which was wont to come from beyond the seas for the reliefe of the Protestants, whilest the sallies and dayly skirmishes at Rochel, inflame both the one and the other: where by the reason of the nearnesse of the retreat, they doe greatly wast the number of the assailants.

The D of Aniou comes to campe

The eleuenth of February the Duke of Aniou comes to his armie, accompanied with his brother the D. of Alançon, the King of Nauarre, the Prince of Condé, and the Dauphin of Auvergne, the Dukes of Longueuille, Bouillon, Neuers, Aumale and Guise, the yong Earle of Roch-fou-cault, the Grand Prior, and many other Noblemen, bringing with them a great traine of men, who for the most part would haue beene grieved, they should haue taken this Sanctuary and succour from the Protestants. This siege was great, and seemed to be of long continuance. Euery man runnes thither, euery one will haue his share. They prepare things necessary for the battery, and in the meane time make many skirmishes: before they come to their greatest force, the Duke sollicit the Gentlemen and inhabitants by Letters, containing both promises and threats. They humbly shew vnto him the necessitie of their defence, knowing no fitter meanes to preserve their liues against the enemies of the Peace, then to oppose force against violence, & to retire themselves into well fortified places, vntill it should please the King to provide for a lawfull assembly of the Estates, & a free council. The King on the other side, protesting of his sinceritie in matters lately passed, and laying the fault of the outrage hapned vpon the pretended conspiracie of the Admirall and his partisans, hee summons the Rochelois to open their gates to Biron, or to any other hauing charge to enter into the towne, as they ought to maintaine his Royall authoritie, and so to order it as the place may be no more at the disposition of mutines. Which doing, he grants them exercise of their Religion, with the like liberty as he had granted by his Edict of pacification, and withall he takes from them all hope of succours from England.

Biron, Streff, Villequier, and the Abbot of Gadaigne, carie the Kings promise to the Rochelois.

A Rochelois: which now neglected, hee would neuer bee perswaded by any intreaties or requests, considering how much the King abased himselfe vnto his subiects. They shewing the equity of their defence, and the tyrannous iniustice of the Baron of La Garde and others, accept the Articles offered by the King: but they request that the Edict may not only be maintaine d for their priuate respect, but also generally for all of their religion in France. But these were words without effect on either side. The Rochelois are aduertised, how the enemy approacheth with two and thirty pieces of battery, and that after dinner they should keepe them in skirmish. They preuent them, they fall forth at noone, kill and hurt in one skirmish of six houres, an hundred and fifty men, amongst the which were many Captaines. La Nue had two horses slaine vnder him, three Captaines, five souldiers, and twenty hurt. Thus their courages are set on fire, and the battery begins: the one prepares to assaile, and the other to defend. The chance fell vpon Claude of Lorraine D. of Aumale, vnto the Duke of Guise, slaine behind a gabion, with a picce planted vpon the bulwarke of the Euangile: and the Town-men issuing forth at the end of the battery, kill many, and coole the enemies heat.

The Duke of Aumale slain.

In the beginning of March they try againe, whether they may winne the Rochelois without combat. They offer them the exercise of their Religion within their towne, but abolished in all other places of the Realme. Those of the party might haue held them for double-dealers. One day of parle was more hurtfull vnto them then many weekes of warre. They resolute therefore to prefer a iust warre before a dishonorable and doubtful peace.

The battery is renewed: about 13000 Cannon shot spent in that moneth, shakes both the fortifications and wals: many skirmishes are made: euery one studies to surprize his enemy, and La Nue (seeing his presence of no import to the besieged, where hee must yeeld all, or in a manner all, to the popular government) comes to the Dukes army, where he effected more in fauour of the Rochelois being absent then present, as they afterwards confessed. The ordinarie sallies of the besieged wasted the Dukes troopes dayly, losing in few weekes about twenty good Captaines. The battery continues in April, and with such violence, as a long wall from the old fontaine vnto the end of the bulwarke of Euangile, was beat downe to the ground, the bulwarke vnarmed, and the Tower of Cognes beaten downe. In the cuning the enemy casts a bridge of wood into the trench, aduancing euen vnto the bulwarke, they come to the assault, and win two casemats. But they dislodge them from the one with the Cannon; from the other with a furious charge: some of them remaine for a gage, the rest save themselves by flight. Two hundred rondaches and Corslets passe by their bridge of wood, and the Cannon playing without intermission, seemed to keepe the besieged from their defence. But the women and maids, running with an incredible resolution to cast wildfire and stones, inflamed the courage of the souldiers. They kill and wound, and in the end force them to abandon the trench, but they lose about threecore men, and some Captaines.

E Hereafter there is nothing but thundring of the Cannon both by land and sea, furious assaults, showers of shot, planting of ladders, ruines of bulwarkes, faps and fynes, most fatal to their authors: and vntill the end of May, all the attempts that might be deuised in a mighty and obdurate siege. On the other side, men, women, and children, without feare, endure the rough charges of the enemy, fill vp their breaches, ouerthrow the first that mount, beat back their enemies into their trenches, follow after them, and fight with variable successe: but most commonly to the aduantage of the town-men, hauing endured nine assaults no lesse courageously, then valiantly giuen.

Vicuals began to grow short in the towne, the Cannon continued the battery dayly, the number of the souldiers decayed, they had no meanes to refresh them, and many refiring themselves, bred an amazement in the towne. Some of the chiefe win many men to their wils, and already there were three hundred men, who weary of the warre, will haue a peace of what price soeuer. Others deuise to seize vpon a gate to depart when they please. These murmuring and diuisions cause new parleys, the D. of Aniou being desirous to retire with honour. But before the Ambassadors of Poland arrive, they must try their last force. The 12 of Iune the assailants giue a fierce escalado, at the little breach nere to the old fontaine. About an hundred or sixscore Gentlemen mount with targets and courtclaus; some get to the top of the mount, and view the trench and the counter-earpe gabioned within the trench. A volley of shot overthrowes fiftene or twenty vpon the place, and makes the rest retire. The Duke himselfe is in danger, but the providence of God reserved him for a more exemplarie end.

Peace of Rochel.

As he beheld the breach made at the old fountaine, a souldier shootes at him from the towne: but De Vin the Master of his horse, seeing the fire in the cocke, steps before him, and with the willing losse of his life saues his masters. In the end the Ambassadors of Poland come the 17 of Iune, to carie away their new chosen King. God vseth this meanes to deliuer Rochel, being vnsumished of victuals, of munition for the warre, and of many hundreds of their men. The King by his Articles of Peace made in forme of an Edict, grants to them of Rochel, Montauban, Nismes, and other townes which had maintained themselves, free exercise of their Religion, and to others permission to lue in their houses without search, to solemnize Christnings and Mariages after their manner, without any greater assembly then ten persons besides the parents: but the said exercise was forbidden in Court, and ten leagues round about. Another meanes did greatly ease the besieged, the diuision in the Dukes campe, and the aduertisements they received from their friends following the armie. So the end of this siege, being of exceeding charge, and the graue of about twenty thousand men slaine in skirmishes, encounters, surprizes, assaults, and dead of hurts, hunger and diseases, caused the King to make great designs for the repairing of many errors, into the which the priuate ambition of some, abusing the youth and the violent passions of this Prince had drawne him: but too late for him, for hee sees his Realme inflamed with the same fire, which they perswaded him should haue bene wholly quenched with the blood that was shed at S. Bartholomewes, and the warres of ciuill diuision vtterly extinct. So the feeling hee had in himselfe of these actions wherinto they had drawne him, shall soon lodge him in the graue of his Predecessors.

The other exploits of warre done elsewhere in diuers Prouinces of the Realme, require some place in our History. The Baron of Serignac, a wise man, virtuous, and louing martiall discipline, with some others of Quercy, Foix, and the neighbour Prouinces, hauing caused Montauban to resolute to armes, goe to field with their troopes, put a garison into Terride, wherof Serignac named himselfe Baron, tooke Buzet vpon Tar, three leagues from Toloufa, by scalado, assure themselves of Villemur, seize vpon many other places, fortifie those they had held during all the former troubles, assure the passages; then at an assembly held at Realmont in Albigeois, they made a diuision of their charges & governments. The Vicount of Gourdon had a part of Quercy towards Cadenac; and Serignac the other towards Montauban and Gascony; the Vicount of Paulin, Lauragais; the Vicount of Panas and his brother, Rouergue; the Vicount of Caumont, the County of Foix, and the mountaine country.

They were equall in their commands: but to auoid iaculouse, they decreed that one of them wanting succour, the other Commanders should succour him with all their forces, and be commanded by him. So they all retire to their governments, euery one giues order for the preferuation of their estates. Serignac occupies some neighbour places, then hee campt with two thousand shot, and some horse before Monticou, makes a breach, giues three assaults and one scalado, and is repulsed with losse. Viole and Reaillie make him recue the like disgrace, and kill many of his men. But he is reuenged to the benefit of one of his Captaines, besieged in a Village with fourescore men, hee slue about two hundred men, and put the rest to flight.

The Earle of Villars, Admirall of France and Lieutenant for the King against the Protestants in Quercy, and the Countries thereabouts, gathers together his troopes, dispersed into garisons, besiegeth and taketh Saint Geniez in high Quercy, caries away the Lord of the place, notwithstanding the composition made to depart with their liues and goods; who was now prisoner to Cahors. It is better to hunt asfarre off, then neare at home. The pursuit of many, against whom hee had made cruell warre, brought him to a scaffold, as a spectacle and triumph to his enemies. Brisemel in high Rouergue had a capitulation better obserued: but the Admirall lost in counter-change, in the moneth of May, Soreze, Montequiou, two leagues from Toloufa, Lodeue a Bishopricke, and rich in the mountaines of Languedoc, and Mas Saintes Puelles, neare to Castelnadaury. The Marshall d'Anville did likewise arme against the Protestants six Cornets of horse, and ten

A ten thousand foot, with foureteene pieces of battery, pretending to besiege Nismes, and then Vzez, but the surprize of Sommieres, neere to Beziers and Montpellier, called him from his enterprize. He besiegeth it, makes a breach, and giues two assaults, which were defended to the losse of the besiegers. The Earle of Candale, brother-in-law to the Marshall, ariues with an hundred horse, and twelve companies of Gascons, who desire to haue the fore-ward at the first assault: but with the losse of three hundred of the most resolute. This checke amazeth the Earle. What fools are we (saith he to the Marshall his brother-in-law) to cause our selues to be beaten, murdered and slaine, for their pleasure, who haue murdered our kinsmen, friends, and allies, and will one day pay vs with the same money?

He had reason, and the issue will teach vs soone the effect of this true diuination. And if the Marshall of Montmorency had been present this fatall 24 day of August, the same fury had interred him with all his house vnder this common ruine, as many others, yea Catholikes suffered the like violence by the practices of their priuate enemies, to whom the time and force gaue meanes to reuenge their priuate quarrels vnder another pretext. There were foure moneths already spent at this siege, about 5000 Cannon shot had beaten the wals of Sommieres to powder, victuals failed, and the besieged demanded nothing but composition. But the Marshall would haue it by force. He exhorts his brother-in-law to reuenge the death of his Captaines and Souldiers, who suffers himselfe to be
C perswaded, but as he goes resolutely to the breach, performing the duty of a braue Commander, and of a resolute souldier, he sees the place couered with a great number of his men, and himselfe in the end overthrowne dead vpon the carcases.

This hant-roult might haue been the sepulchre of many more, but Gremian (to whom the honour of the taking and keeping of Sommieres is chiefly due) after they had performed the duties of valiant men, accepted the composition was offered by the Marshall: To depart, their Drums sounding, ensignes displayed, their matches light in the cocks, with seuen dayes liberty to carie away their baggage, and to retire where they pleased. So the Marshall seeing the resolution of them of Nismes, and hauing lost two thousand, five hundred of his best men, dismissed his troopes, & proceeded afterwards against the Protestants, by seizures and sale of their goods within his government. The Admirals armie had another successe. Terride, Flaignac, and generally all which the Protestants held beyond the riuer of Garonne, recompensed the losses hee had received. But Causse stayed the course of his victories, and made him vnable to doe and thing worthy of fame. La Motte Paillois kept the towne with six hundred Harguebuziers, and the repulse the Admirall received after a great losse of his forces, caused in the end the ruine of his armie, the which the Vicount of Gourdon shortned of a company at the passage of Dordonne, chasing the rest which marched to the siege of Rochel. The King of Nauarre had lately inuited his subiects of Berne to returne into the bosome of the Catholike Church. They answered their Prince with excuses, thinking it proceeded from some other motion then
E his owne: and protest to other Churches of that party, to perseuer and maintaine themselves with them in the same religion: See now the effects of their protestations. The Baron of Grandmont, marcheth into Bearne to plant the ancient religion. They troope together within the Countrie, retaine him prisoner, and cut the most of his men in pieces. Saint Romaine was chiefe of the Protestants in Viuauez, Montbrun in Dauphine. The first held Villeneuve, the last seized vpon Orpierre, Serres, Meuse, and by diuers courtes became terrible in the Diocesse of Die, and the neighbour mountaines.

These new broyles thrust their neighbors into like results: and the King who thought by the abolition of the Edict of the year 1570, at the least by the departure of his brother into Poland, and a Peace granted before Rochel, to enioy an assured rest; finds himselfe
F incumbered with new and generall combustions. Those of Quercy, Languedoc, and their neighbours, planting an order and rule for the warre, and the administration of Iustice, protest against this Edict, rearming it capitious, and a fore-runner of new massacres. Our capitall enemies (saie they) the authors of fore-past disorders, remaine the onely counsellors and gouernours of the King and his estate: all the Churches of France, are deprived of the publike exercise of Religion solemnly granted: and now by this Edict abolished: all the contents of this last pacification, and whatsoever else is promised vs, are but words without effects: it is a generall abolition of what is past, the murderers are absolued,

This checke amazeth the Earle. What foole are we (saith he to the Marshall his brother-in-law) to cause our selues to be beaten, murdered and slaine, for their pleasure, who haue murdered our kinsmen, friends, and allies, and will one day pay vs with the same

B money? He had reason, and this will teach vs soone the effect of this true diuination. And if the Marshall of Montmorency had been present this fatall 24 day of August, the same fury had interred him with all his house vnder this common ruine, as many others, yea Catholikes suffered the like violence by the practices of their priuate enemies, to whom the time and force gaue meanes to reuenge their priuate quarrels vnder another pretext. There were foure months already spent at this siege, about 5000 Cannon shot had beaten the wals of Sommiere to powder, victuals failed, and the besieged demanded nothing but composition. But the Marshall would haue it by force. He exhorts his brother-in-law to reuenge the death of his Captaines and Souldiers, who suffers himselfe to be
C perwaded, but as he goes resolutely to the breach, performing the duty of a braue Commander, and of a resolute souldier, he sees the place couered with a great number of his men, and himselfe in the end overthrowed dead vpon the carkases.

This hansomt might haue been the sepulchre of many more, but Gremian (to whom the honour of the taking and keeping of Sommiere is chiefly due) after they had performed the duties of valiant men, accepted the composition was offered by the Marshall: To depart, their Drums sounding, ensignes displayed, their matches light in the cocks, with seven dayes liberty to carie away their baggage, and to retire where they pleased. So the Marshall seeing the resolution of them of Nismes, and hauing lost two thousand, five hundred of his best men, dismissed his troops, & proceeded afterwards against the Protestants, by seizures and sale of their goods within his gouernment. The Admiralls armie had another successe. Terride, Flaignac, and generally all which the Protestants held beyond the riuier of Garonne, recompenced the losses he had receiued. But Causse stayed the course of his victories, and made him vnable to doe and thing worthy of fame. La Motte Piquet kept the towne with six hundred Harguebuziers, and the repulse the Admirall receiued after a great losse of his forces, caused in the end the ruine of his armie, the which the Vicount of Gourdon shortened of a company at the passage of Dordonne, chasing the rest which marched to the siege of Rochel. The King of Nauarre had lately inuited his Subjects of Berne to returne into the bosome of the Catholike Church. They answered their Prince with excuses, thinking it proceeded from some other motion then
E his owne: and protest to other Churches of that party, to perseuer and maintaine themselves with them in the same religion: See now the effects of their protestations. The Baron of Grandmont marcheth into Bernero plant the ancient religion. They troope together within the Countie, retaine him prisoner, and cut the most of his men in pieces. Saint Romaine was chiefe of the Protestants in Viuzare, Montbrun in Dauphine. The first held Villeneuve, the last seized vpon Orpierre, Serres, Meuse, and by diuers courses became terrible in the Diocesse of Die, and the neighbour mountaines.

These new broyles thrust their neighbors into like results: and the King who thought by the abolition of the Edict, of the year 1570, at the least by the departure of his brother into Poland, and a Peace granted before Rochel, to enioy an assured rest; finds himselfe
F incumbered with new and generall combustions. Those of Quercy, Languedoc, and their neighbours, planting an order and rule for the warre, and the administration of Iustice, protest against this Edict, reuerring it captious, and a fore-runner of new misfactions. Our capital enemies (saith they) the authors of fore-past disorders, remaine the onely counsellors and gouernours of the King and his estate: all the Churches of France, are depriued of the publike exercise of Religion solemnly granted: and now by this Edict abolished: all the contents of this last pacification, and whatsoever else is promised vs, are but words without effects: it is a generall abolition of what is past, the murderers are absolued, ned, and no mention made of any justice to be done against them: All Ecclesiasticall discipline being forbidden vs, they will plunge vs into Atheisme. This reary is but coloured by some private persons without any generall aduow; whose approbation cannot preiudice the vniuersall body, neither ought they to yeeld to any thing without the common consent of our Churches. These complaints and protestations cause them to assemble at Millaud, and afterwards at Montauban, and there diuiding Languedoc into two gouernments, they make Montauban chiefe of the one, and the Vicount of Paulin Gouernour in that part, and Nismes of the other, for the nearnesse of Seuennes and Viarez, vnder the command of S. Remaine: but both subiect to the authoritie of the Estates of the Country, who giue them counsell, and furnished them with money, being chosen in either gouernment of the worthiest men of the country, yet in such sort, as the particular estates of euery Diocesse, did in matters of importance, confer by their Deputies with the Estates of the whole gouernment; and according to their conclusions, the gouernour shall cary himselfe, and receiue money from their hands. To fortifie this order, they decree: That the souldiers should be content with their entertainment, without spoiling of the country: that the townes and villages of the contrarie party, should be taxed and forced to contribute for the entertainment of garisons, to the end their labour and reaping of their fruits might be free. The reuenues of Benefices was appointed to make a stocke of money, to be employed in their greatest affaires, the which they had leifure to effect: for the election of the King of Poland busied the Court and Councell in feasts, dancing, C and pleasures. So they man many places, from whence they might at need draw forth almost 20000 men, and by seizing on the Clergy lands, and the contribution which came from all parts, they weaken their enemies. Many Catholikes otherwise discontented, growing familiar with them, and beginning to ioyne their forces together, lay great designs, which shall soone breake out in all parts.

Their persons as I amonious to UOLING

Matters thus handled, giue a beginning to the first troubles in France: but before it brake forth, the Protestants of Languedoc sent their Deputies to the King. They humbly thanke him for the affection he had seemed to haue to the maintenance of Peace within his Realme, and necessary means to restore an estate threatened with imminent ruine: they protest of their obedience, but they beleeue his Maiestie not to finde it strange, if they assemble to preuent the pernicious attempts of wicked Councillors, who by their fraudulent and violent practices, had induced him to declare himselfe, both by his mouth, and his Letters Patents, to the great blemish of his reputation among strangers, the Author of the massacre committed at Paris, the which he had few dayes before disauowed. That they cannot beleeue he should willingly condiscend to so bloody effects: and the feare they had to fall into the like, forced them to seeke all means they could to warrant the misdeeds, with the losse of their companions blood to vniustly shed.

They request therefore: That for the effect of the Peace, those of the religion should in those Townes they held, and in two others of euery Prouince, chosen by four Deputies, haue Garisons entreated at the Kings charge, the exercise of their religion free and publike, to all such as would demand it, the obseruation of their Ecclesiasticall discipline, the buriall of their dead, without distinction of times, and of Churchyard: the exemption of contributions for the Cerenomies of the Romish Church: reception of their children into Colledges, vnder Tutors of their owne religion: Legitimation for such as should be borne of the marriage of Priests conuerced to their doctrine. Erection of a new Court of Iustice in euery Prouince, composed of Iudges of the same Religion. The Tithes which they paid to Priests, to be referred for the maintenance of their Ministers. Punishment of the authors, counsellors, and executioners of massacres, as theues and disturbers of the publike quiet. Morcouer, they demand, that the Admirall, with all those that had bene murdered, and that were then liuing, should be reputed to F haue bene, and to be faithfull seruants and subiects to the King and his Estate, innocent of rebellion, and guiltlesse of conspiracy. A nullity of all acts made against them as calumnious. Restitution of goods, honours, and offices, to the heires of them that were murdered. Abolition of all infamous monuments, and generall processions instituted in memory of so execrable a day.

These were the principall points of their propositions, amongst other Articles concerning the gouernment. But they treated partly, as humble seruants, partly, as armed sub- jects,

A iects, like vnto such as begge for almes with their swords in their hands. And as a new alteration flies easily and suddenly from one Prouince to another, so those of Prouence, Diuelphine, Lionnois, and others, ioyne with the first: and by the mouth of a Deputy, present their Petition and admonitions to the King. The King sends him to certain Commisioners, to conferre thereof: and promisseth, that after hee had conducted his brother out of the Realme, he would doe all things necessarie for the contentment of his subiects.

This hardy resolution taken in Languedoc and the neighbour countries, made our Charles to change both his countenance and his speech. He sees well, the more he hasted, the more impatiently they did beare his brothers departure: namely, the Queen mother, B the Duke of Guise, and the Clergy. Henry himselfe desired rather to beare the title of Duke of Aniou in France, then King of Poland: neither was he greatly pleased, to make so long and so crosse a pilgrimage. His most confident seruants would willingly haue discontented the Polonois in their answer, either to haue sent them away ill satisfied, or to winne time vntill the Spring. But there was no remedy: Charles could no more containe himselfe amidst the complaints which came from so many parts of his Realme, but sometimes giues out threats against them which had abused him, making him beleeue, that after the execution of the foure and twentieth of August last past, hee should raigne free from confusions. Strangers reproach him openly with the irreparable wrongs hee had done to himselfe and to his subiects: and accuse him, that in stead of a father, he had C bene a butcher, and a hang-man of his people: or at the least taxed his honour with this title, by the induction of the principall authors of this horrible disorder. The delays of his brother displeased him. Henry by his first affabilitie won the peoples hearts. The affection which Charles noted of long time in the mother, to his aduancement as her best sonne, the credit which the house of Guise had in him, or at the least seemed to haue, and the hope which the Clergy grounded vpon his authority (they had already recomended these agreeable seruices which he had done them, with a present of three hundred thousand Crownes, and had much augmented it, if Rochell had been taken) made him to bee suspected and fearefull to the King his brother, who euen then would willingly haue found the means to chastise such, as vnder the shadow of his name, had opened the way D to so great iniustice, and such enraged furies. But during these garboyles and confusions of affaires, he found not any one of his Councillors of State, that did teach him to dissemble, and to containe himselfe, vntill that opportunity should giue him means of reuenge. So his complaints and threats were carefully obserued, and bitterly digested by such as it concerned. The Queene-mother, not able any longer to deferre the departure of her sonne Henry. Goe (saith she) my sonne, you shall not continue long there. And as Charles goes before vnto the frontier, pressing his brother to follow him, he is suddenly staid by a great sicknesse, at Vitry in Champagne, giuing occasion to his most confident seruants to thinke: that about two attended the issue of his infirmite: and to speake disgracefully of the Queene-mother, the new King, and their trustiest seruants, E whereof some retired from Court, and went to shroud themselves in Brittain, seeing that the vigour of the Kings youth, had expelled the venome of his discale, by his head, necke, and visage. The King of Poland building vpon his mothers promises, departed in the end of October, being assured of the loue hee bare him about the other two. She feared the humors and threats of Charles: and Francis D. of Alancou did not greatly affect the House of Guise, neither had hee approved the massacre. The male-contents, who with a lesse odious name called themselves Politicks, find credit with him, thinke him fit to reduce the affairs to a better course, and make him to repine at the final account is held of him: they let him vnderstand how small a proportion was allotted him for his maintenance: the distrust they haue of his faith, the opposition of the Queene-mother, F to keep him from the Lieutenantcy of the Realme (who gaue the King to vnderstand, that by means of his male-contents, he might stir vp some factious mutinie hauing the forces at his command) the search was made of him, and the means which were offered vnto him to restore the Realme. Katherine was well acquainted with these practices, but she cunningly makes her profit of them all, during the Kings sicknesse, to auoid the danger when hee pleased, and to ruine one by another: at need, as hereafter we shall see, they will do their best. During these alterations, those of Languedoc fortified themselves. To keepe them at a stay, vnder hope of some content, they appoint a generall Parliament at at Compeigne : the Prouinces prepare the remembrances, some Deputies were on the way with instructions and Commissions, to speake boldly, namely, against the authors and counsellors of murders. The Queene-mother and her followers fearing the touch, obtaine a reuocation of the States; and labouring at the first to pacifie these deputies by promises and words, in the end they change their countenances, they vse threats, and doe so terrifie them, as they returne home onely with a vaine hope, to receiue satisfaction shortly to their demands, and permission (especially to them of Languedoc) to assembl againe for the drawing of new Articles, concerning the preferuation of themselves and their associates: the which they did afterwards at Millaud in Rouergue, and those of Rochel entred into association with them, forced vnto it by the practices and deuices of Puigillard, Landereau, the Baron of La Garde, and others, attending to surprize them: but ended with the yeare, and the liues of some that vnderooke it, being publicquely executed.

The fourth troubles, begun with the massacres, had some respite by the peace of Rochel : but now this last conspiracy discovered, and the practices to surprize them of Languedoc, with the secret leauies of men, to assaile them suddenly, giues an entrance to the fifth. The Protestants alledge for the ground of their arming, the infinit outrages which haue beene done them within few months, and send aduertisements and admonitions to the Princes, Nobility, the Parliaments, and the Estates. The Male-contents, and such as were most inward with the D. of Alangon, fore-seeing the shortnesse of the Kings life, yet not daring to complaine of it, but in shaking of the shoulders, and holding downe the head, sollicite him to get the Lieutenantenay generally to represent the Kings person; or if they will imploy him against them of Languedoc, that he should seeke to saue the Realme from the violence of such as by the death of Charles, and the absence of Henry would seeke to seize thereon. He makes request vnto the King, being at S. Germaine in Lay, and the King doth acquaint the Queen Mother, and the Marshall of Montmorency with the dukes desire. To deny the Duke his request (saith the Marshall) were to doe him wrong, and to call his sufficiency into question; seeing the same place had been giuen to the D. of Anjou without demanding it. But the Queene-mother, and those of Guise, desired it rather for the D. of Lorraine, whom soone after she called to Court: and in the meane time seemes to beleue, that they be practices of the Marshalls of Montmorency and Cossé, at the persuasions of the King of Nauarre, and the Prince of Conde, to the end the Kings furie might ruine both one and the other.

She therefore takes counsell to assure her selfe, and to ruine such as would follow any other party but her own: and euen then did the trouble the Kings head with an exceeding feare and distrust of his household seruants. The Duke of Guise would gladly haue vnder-taken the House of Montmorency: but it was to no purpose, if all the foure brethren were not taken in one net. The Marshall of Anuille was in Languedoc, and determined to ioyne with the Protestants: yet the death of the eldest might make the rest easie. So the Duke of Guise one day picks a quarrell in the base Court of Saint Germaine with Ventabran his household seruant, and for a slight cause, being resolved to kill him, hee drawes his sword. Ventabran flies directly to the Marshall of Montmorencies chamber, which hee finding shut, he mounts higher to that of the Constables Lady and widow: where finding Thore, hee slayes, and there receiues some blowes, but it was slayings with his sword. This tragick act (turned to a iest) sent the Marshall out of Court: but he shall soone returne to receiue a great disgrace. The Duke of Alangon resolves likewise to leaue it, and to leade the King of Nauarre with him: but the execution was of great difficulty. To aske leaue would breed too many scruples and ialousies in the Kings head: to goe without leaue, was to accuse himselfe of some plot, and to be pursued as a fugitiue. Hee therefore stirs not, but lets passe a troope of two or three hundred horse, assembled in Normandy, to saunoe (as the common brute was) the Duke of Alangons retreat, or as others would haue it; (but without any likelihood) to murder the King, his Mother, and his Councell. This leaue terrified the Court, and brought it to Paris: They presently charge the Duke of Alangon, and the King of Nauarre. To purge themselves, they publish a Declaration the 24 of March, touching the fact of S. Germaine: they protest of their good affection to the King, and they offer their seruices against all Rebels.

Hereupon the Marshall of Montmorency is perswaded to come to Court. Hee is no sooner arriued, but they appoint him the Bastile for his lodging, and for companions in prison

A prison the Marshall of Cossé, La Mole, Cocornas, and Tourtay, seruants to the Duke of Alangon, whereof the three last lost their heads at Paris, culpable onely to haue beene acquainted with some of their masters Councels to abandon the Court.

During these broyles in Court, the Protestants and their associates make their profit in Vioarez, Dauphine, Languedoc, and Poitou. And the Marshall d'Anuille, hauing by Letters surprisid, discovered the practice against him, conferred now with Saint romaine Gouernour of Nismes, but seizing on Montpellier, Beaucaire, Lunel and Pezenas, hee giues the Protestants some cause to suspect his defences. The Politicks of Poitou hauing ioynd with La Nue, seize vpon Saint Maixant, Melle, Fontenay, Lusignan and other places. The B checke vpon the Normans: Montgomery, Lorges, and Galardon his children. Columbiers, Sey, and others with troopes of horse and foot, had secretly taken Saint Lo, Carentan, and Valongues: but Matignon and Fernaques ioynd with the forces of the Count Thorigni, (who already camped before Saint Lo) shut him into Danfrone, a weake place, and ill furnished, with threescore horse, and fourescore Harguebuziers. They batter the Castle, make a breach of fise and forty paces, and hauing been vigorously repulsid from a sharpe assault, the Earle abandoned by his people, (whereof the most part were gone to his enemies, and the rest watering, being vnfurnished of munition, water and succours, perswaded by the Lord of Vassy (for he held it farre more honourable to dye vpon the breach, with a pike in his hand, then to fall into the Queene-mothers power, to end his dayes ignominiously on a scaffold:) he did but capitulate (but not without a grievous apprehension of Columbiers, desiring rather to dye vpon the breach, then to serue as a spectacle at the Greue at Paris,) to depart with their liues, and to carie away some furniture with their swords and daggers: vpon condition notwithstanding, to remaine some time in the hands of Matignon, and Vassy, kinsman to the Earle, with surety of his life. A capricious and fraudulent composition: the obseruation whereof must needs be broken. The Earle goes forth, and was led away by Matignon and Fernaques at midnight: but his company remaine at the enemies deuotion, who force the Castle, kill some, spoile the rest, & put them al to ransom. Then Vassy appointed by the two Commanders, led the Earle to Paris: where since we did see him goe a mournfull scaffold, and expiate D by his death (to the Queenes content) that of King Henry her husband. In the meane time the Duke of Montpensier made warre in Poitou, but slowly: and except the Castle of Talmont which hee tooke from the Protestants by composition, hee did not any thing worthy of memory.

The taking hereof was encountered with two great disgraces, the one neere to Saincte Hermine, in the defeat of his company by Saincte Effienne, Captaine of Fontenay, (who slue many Gentlemen: led away fiftene or sixtene prisoners, got great store of baggage, and the Dukes plate:) the other at the siege of Fontenay. Some thinking to reuenge a disgrace, doe oftentimes increase it. Hee got nothing but blowes, with the losse of the most resolute of his troopes: and then an honest colour, the Kings sicknesse, called him from this siege, to attend new Commissions and forces. At that time the Prince of Conde did recreate himselfe in Picardy, wearied with the turmoyles of the Court. Being aduertised of diuers practices layed to seize vpon his person, hee flies into Germany, with Thore, ill beloued by reason of the Marshalls of Montmorency, and d'Anuille, his brethren, and the counsels giuen to the duke of Alangon. Being at Strasbourg, hee exhorts the Protestant Churches, to rely vpon his loue and zeale for their reliefe, and Thore perswades his brother d'Anuille, to open his eyes, and to embrace the occasion that was offered. This Marshall held the Wolfe by the eares: for on the one side, the Protestants of Languedoc might greatly crosse him, if hee had banded his forces directly against them: and on the other side, he feared the King, and the Queene his mother, who to keepe him in awe, caused his eldest brother to bee safely guarded, as a sure pledge for his yongers adions. Hee must therefore assure himselfe on all sides, and according to the course of the market, entertaine both the one, and the other, expecting a Catastrophe of this strange and horrible tragedy, which was acted in Court.

The King declined in the meane time, and decayed visibly in the prime of his age: and since the King of Polands departure, hee seemed more changed in minde, then in body, being incensed especially against the authors and counsellors of the massacre (as hee made knowne by his speeches, to some of his Court, being enemies to iniustice, and by Letters written out of the Realme) for whom he prepared a strange potion. if the providence of A God had not referred them as scourges and ministers of that punishment he meant to inflict upon this Realme, to the end that seeing him afterwards to cast these rods into the fire, we should confesse: that it is not now alone that hee sheweth himselfe the garden and Protector of this Monarchy. At that time Charles lay taken both hand and foot, his chiefe servants were dead, disgraced, and absent. The motives of new troubles did much disquiet him. He did foresee infallible seeds of combustion in the coloured captivitie of his brother, and brother-in-law: in the imprisonment of the two Marshals: in the exile of the Prince of Conde, in whose favour the Germans began to arme. He sees his subiects cruelly armed one against another, and the fire of diuision ready to waste the Realme. B His infirmities had some intermission during winter, but in the end, after hee had languished the moneths of February, March and Aprill, tormented with many pangs, hee kept his bed: and the thirtieth day of May, he slept his last sleepe, in the Castle of Bois de Vincennes, after great effusion of blood, which issued out by all the passages of his body, the last two weekes of his sickness, during the which he endured all the violent assaults and combats which the vigour of youth might suffer in the extreamest pangs of death. His successor could not come so loone from Poland. Katherine therefore to assure his authoritie during his absence, had obtained on the nine and twentieth day, letters of Regency from the King, directed to the Governours of Prouinces: and the better to fortifie this nomination, to restrain the Princes of the blood, and to maintaine her selfe in the midst of confusion, she causeth Letters Patents to be sealed by the Chancellor of Birague, her servant, and by this meanes doth abolish the fundamentall lawes, the order of the Realme, the priuiledges of Princes, the authoritie of the generall Estates, and the prerogatiue of the Parliaments.

Charles was born the 27 of Iune 1550, and began to raigne the 5 of December 1560. A Prince of a very active disposition, inconstant in his thoughts, violent in his enterprises, impatient, ready of conceit, the which he did expresse in good termes, a diligent observer of other mens natures, cholerick, secret, a dissembler, cruell and a blasphemur. But let vs impute these vices and others, not to his naturall inclination, but to his gouernours and schoolmasters, amongst the which the History doth especially note Mariques and Laffes, D who with the consent of the mother corrupted this yong Prince, and made him take the habit of Vices and infections, wherein they dayly plunged him. They might haue pruned this yong plant better, to haue brought forth better fruits. At the beginning he was open, courteous, studious, sober, and little giuen to women. His speech was pleasing: hee loued musike and poetry: we reade yet good Verses compiled by him in French. But the pleasure of hunting transported him wonderfully, and the blood of wilde beasts, which hee flue with singular delight, made him with long continuance, as it were greedy of mans blood.

But let vs tremble in this death, vnder the Iustice of Gods iudgements, who suffered (after so horrible a butchery committed and commanded during his raigne) him to bee surprized with a great debility in his latter dayes, to wallow in his owne blood, vomiting it out pitifully by all the conduits of his body, as a iust iudgement for him that barbarously shed it, throughout all the Prouinces of the Realme. Doubtlesse God loues not the Prince that thirsts after his subiects blood, for the subiects blood is the very blood of their Prince.

HENRY the THIRD,

The 62 French King.

T is a great comfort unto mee (saide Charles some few houres before his death) that I leane no heires males lawfully begotten, for leaning him yong, hee must endure many crosses, and France hath need of a man. But alas! we shall now see one advanced to the Crowne, whereunto the fundamentall law of State and Honour doth call him, installed with a confused beginning, and afterwards by an Edict of pacification, to reduce and retaine his subiects happily in their obedience, vnder a raigne as lasciuious and voluptuous as the other had bene cruell and bloody: vntill that the House of Guise (seeing the King barren, and his successor confined in shew beyond the riuier of Loire) shall discouer their ambition, and cause (but in the end with losse of the liues of two of the chiefe motives of confusion) the people to breake out into a blind, vaine, and treacherous rebellion, being too ready to second the ambitious designs of great men, and to runne at random vnder the libertie of a turbulent raigne, and for the last scene of this Tragedy, they stirre vp a monstrous Monke, traiterously to murder him, and by his death to extinguish the name of Valois, and vnwittingly to set the Crowne of France vpon the head of Henry, the first of the branch of Bourbons, whom wee shall see happily called from beyond the riuier of Loire, miraculously to take the helme of this Estate, and valiantly to encounter the dangerous attempts of his enemies, who had already proclaimed a triumph before the victory; wisely to quench the fires of diuision kindled in his Realme, and to raigne most happily, and by the admirable fauour and blessing of heauen, to gouerne his people in concord, D peace and loue. This is the man whom France had need of, to pacifie the diuisions both of great and small; to restore their generall and priuate ruines; and vnder fo gentle and milde a command, to preserue them from the proud Empery of Strangers. Doubtlesse France cannot be gouerned but by a Frenchman, as we shall see, hauing observed the beginning, progresse, and pittifull end of this Prince, vpon whom depended the estate of this great and mighty Monarchy.

Posts fly with speed to carie newes to the King of Poland, of the death of his elder brother, whilst the Queene-mother (attending his comming) made a truce with them of Poitou, to the end shee might with lesse opposition supply the warres of Normandy: and to stay them of Languedoc and other neighbour Prouinces, the perswaded the Duke E of Alancou and the King of Nauarre, to aduertise them of the death of Charles, and sollicit the gouernours to write vnto the new King, touching their zeale to his seruice, and desire (vnder her regency) to obserue the like fidelity to him, as they had done to his Predecessors. Maignan laboured in the meane time to take Saint Lo, and Carentan from certaine Gentlemen Protestants, whom the breach of faith to the Earle of Montgomery, had made resolute in the defence of such places as they held.

Colombiers hauing escaped from Danfron, puts himselfe into Saint Lo with a small troope of men, where hauing endured three assaults, and slaine nine or ten of their enemies Capitaines, with three hundred of their men, in the end hee is stricken dead with a shot: the which daunted his souldiers, who (vnfurnished of a Commander, F that might encourage them with the like authoritie, toyled with long fighting) leaue the breach, and in their retreat abandon both the place and the liues of two hundred men, to the mercy of Maignons souldiers, to make satisfaction for the death of their companions. Carentan might likewise haue interred many Catholics vnder the ruines of her walls: but Guiri and the chiefe of his company, seeing themselves alone in Normandie without any hope of succours, went out by composition on horsebacke, with their swords, and the souldiers vpon condition to serue the King where he should employ them.

Hereupon Letters Patents come from Henry, entitling himselfe King of France and of Poland, dated the 25 of Iune, bearing confirmation and amplification of the Queene-mothers Regency and government of the Realme. Having therefore taken the oath of all the Gouernours, and published the Kings Letters Patents, to make the way for her sonnes returne out of Poland, she calls for the Nobilitie, assembles the foot, makes leaues of Reistres and Suisses: sends to the Prince Dauphin sonne to the Duke of Montpensier, and to Gordes (who made warre in Dauphiné:) That they should doe their best endeouours to ruine the country which the Huguenots held: and chargeth the duke of Vzcz, and the Lord of Ioyezuc, to be watchfull ouer the Marshall D'Anville, with whom shee had small credit in Languedoc. The imprisoning of his elder brother, the exile of the two younger Atern and Thori, and the Regents letters being intercepted, had incensed him: yet did he swim betwixt two streames, and maintaining himself betwixt both, he did nothing trust the Catholikes; and not louing the Protestants, hee applied himselfe vnto them as he had need of their helpe. These proceedings bred some ieaousie in them: of Tholouza: but especially the truce he made with the Protestants, the assignation he gaue for the assembly of the Estates of the Prouince at Montpellier the 2 of Iuly, and the ordinary reference he made in that towne. So this Parliament by two Decrees of the 19 of Iune, disallows the truce, forbidding all persons within their iurisdiction, to goe or send to these pretended Estates, appointed without the Kings permission, vpon paine to be declared rebels, and breakers of the lawes.

with the regent.Warre in Dauphiné.

Moreover, the Protestants (perswaded by this truce, which gaue them some hope of peace) began to allow of their Gouernours actions: and (notwithstanding the aduice of some who condemned this association, as threatening the ruine of their party by this conjunction) they vnite their forces with the Politikes, offensive and defensive againt all that would assaile them. These enioyed some rest, whilst that Montbrun cuts in pieces a regiment of the Prince Dauphins forward, and couers the bridge of Royans with foure hundred of the bravest of his armie, slaine vpon the place. For a reuenge, hee besiegeth Alais a small towne, batters it, makes a breach, giues an assault, and is repulsed: but the besieged being vnable to maintaine it, retire into the Castle: the Prince surpriseth them, casts some downe headlong, and burnes the rest that were within it. Ote was the second of his triumphs: but Luzan stayed his course. The successfull sallies of the Townes-men, and the ordinary courses of Montbrun, who descending from Loriot, did still keepe the Prince in alarm, makes him to raise his siege, and to put his men into safety.

In Viunraiz.

In Poictou.

The Protestants being freed on this side, they were fortified on the other, by the taking of Vieux, a small towne in Viunraiz by Bocheude. Perigourde takes Chalengon, and S. Romaine Nonnay for their part. La Noue (not to approue Katherine's regency, but rather to lecond the Prince of Condes forces which were prepared in Germany) was at truce with the Regent, for the monthes of Iuly and August, in the Prouinces of Angoulmois, Poictou, and Xaintonge. But the Regent hoped to subdue the Protestants of the said Prouinces, before her sonne should ariue. For the effecting whereof, shee assembles men from all parts, to surprize them suddenly: that being rooted out, the King should haue nothing to doe with them of Dauphiné and Languedoc. So the D. of Montpensier, Chaugny, Puigallard, Richelieu, Buffy of Amboise, and other Commanders, meet at Saumur with ten thousand men, and eightene pieces of attillery. The Protestants fly speedily to armes: those of Lusignan in the beginning of Iuly ouerthrow the Gentlemen of Poictou: and those of Fontenay nere vnto Nantes, ouerthrow 500 Harguebuziers, almost all younger brothers of the Gentlemen of Britany.

Fontenay
surprised.

These two checks thrust the D. to the siege of Fontenay le Conte. Saint Estienne, commanded there, with about twenty Gentlemen, and foure hundred souldiers, who after some fauourable sallies, hauing valiantly maintained two sharpe assaults, and one scalded, the sixteenth of September, after fiftene dayes siege, beginning to treat of the composition before in question: behold Capaine Masseuasse, either through feare, or desire to prouide for himselfe, or being too confident, for that they were vpon termes of capitulation, giues entrance to some of his acquaintance: the rest runne thither by heapes, they see the breach being ill guarded, and become masters of the towne: they kill some souldiers, ranfome others, strip the rest, and chase them away with a white wand in their hands:

A hands: but they vse the towne with lesse rigour then a place taken by assault. The Baron of Serigne, otherwise called Terride, recomenced this losse at the same time by the surpris of Castres in Albigeois, and the slaughter of two hundred Italians being in garison: and Langoyran Gouernor of Perigueux for the Protestants, by the absolute defeat of two hundred Harguebuziers, whereof sixe onely escaped, to cary newes to the rest of their partie.

Then Henry escaping secretly out of Poland, approached the Realme, where his new crowne attended him, deuising a farre off to ruine the Huguenots and to plant the only Religion of his Fathers throughout the whole Realme. There is no sin so great (saide the Emperor Maximilian vnto him) as to force mens consciences: and such as thinke to command men, supposing to winne heauen, doe often lose that which they possesse on earth. The like admonitions were giuen him in all places, in Austria, Venice and Piedmont: they exhort him in all places to pacifie the troubles of his Realm. But comming to Lions, they cause him to commit a great error, in making war in stead of peace.

The Queen mother, the Dukes of Guise and Neuers, the Marshall of Retz, the Chancellor Birague, and some other new-bred Frenchmen, disposed of the affaires at their pleasure in the secret Councils of the Cabinet. The King did willingly giue them authority (and what might be expected of men who gladly would people France with new Colonies of Italians, Lorraines and Piedmontois) carying onely to Court Ladies, from the C which he had beene sequestred almost a yeare, with this nation which is lesse lasciuious then ours. These pernicious Councillors cause him to protest by sundry proclamations of his loue to the good of his subiects, and to abolish what was past, so as they lay aside armes, deliuer him all his townes, and liue quietly in their houses, without any search, constraint or molestation for matter of conscience. A policy practised by them, to entertaine the fire of ciuill dissention, to rule in this confusion, and to fortifie a third party, which in the end we shall see will oppresse the King, & bring the Realme to a very miserable estate. The Protestants stood then the more vpon their guards: they are full of ieaousie, distrust, doubtr, and feare. All those Proclamations made no mention of liberty of their Religion, neither of a Parliament, for the politike government, nor of a nationall Council, for matters of conscience. And what was it to grant vnto the Rochelois liberty of conscience, and to forbid the exercise of their Religion for a certaine season, but to keepe their party at a gaze, whilst by their great preparations which were made in all parts, they should be able to put a mighty army to field, to ruine them without hope of rising?

So they arme on all sides, especially in Poictou. The Baron of Fontenay (afterwards Lord of Rohan in Britany) being followed by three score gentlemen and six hundred good souldiers, puts himselfe into Lusignan, which the Duke Montpensier threatned, and according to the leasure he gaue him, he provided for the fortifications and all things necessary to maintaine a memorable siege, which might by the means of some succours consume an army before the Castle. About the beginning of October, the Duke encampes before it, and with a battery of about 2300 cannon-shot, thinks to draw the besieged to a composition. They importune them; but they answer, they will attend a general peace for all them of their religion. He spends 1250 cannon-shot more, makes a breach, giues an assault, and is beaten back with great losse. Five daies after, the besieged sally forth, and to reuenge the blood of 7 young gentlemen, 16 souldiers, & 20 that were hurt at this first assault, they cloy 5 cannons, fire their powder, kill 9 captaines, and many souldiers, bring away many enignes, and retume laden with spoiles, armes, and prisoners. This disgrace caused him to rest all Nouember. In December, the duke fortified with 1200 Reistres, and 600 French foot, presteth Lusignan againe, & batters down a mill which did furnish them with meale. So (their hand-mills not able to suffice) they began to want bread. To ease them of some superfluous moutthes, they craue a passport for some Gentlewomen and other persons vsite for the war, to returne to their houses, or other places of safety. But the hatred this Prince did beare to the Protestants, had more force in him then the ordinary courtesie which Frenchmen beare vnto Ladies. He supposed the wiues and children should bee an vrgent sting to draw their husbands and fathers to yeeld speedily. Now their horses serued them for food, the souldiers (almost starued) took away the bread violently as they caried it from the ouen: they break into many houses in the night, to seek for victuals, they had no wood but moueables and the ruines of houses, ill clothed, ill lodged, and no cleane linen, toyled toyled with continuall trauell, to defend themselves both above and vnder ground, to frustrate the mynes which the Duke caused to be made, two of the which in their ruines buried many of the assailants, and gaue the besieged courage to continue firme in their resolution.

The 23 of the moneth they begin to thunder with eigheteen cannons and foure culuerins, and the next day they continue the same fury with fife and twenty peeces. After dinner they come to the assault: the showers of musket-shot comming from sundry flanks, makes the enemy retire, and to leaue the breach full of dead bodies. The greatest force was against the ravelin of La Vachery, which being won by the assailants, makes them retire to the Castle that had it in guard. At the first port of the Castle every man did shew his resolution: all fight in the midst of the thunder, fire and smoake, and fife houres together dispute it with a doubtfull and bloody fight. In the end, both the one and the other (being tired with so furious an assault) take breath, the besieged remaining masters both of the towne and Castle, being reduced to fourescore cuirasses, and foure hundred and fiftie harguebuziers, resolute to lye and dye both in the defence of the place, and of their quarrell, hoping that La Noue would find means to send them some reliefe.

yesidels.

Not courage, but force failed them. So as Fontenay, the fife and twentieth of January, accepted the Articles of composition which the Duke offered vnto him by Colonnell Sarricieu: himselfe and his gentlemen to depart with their armes, horses and baggage, the captaynes and other Commanders, every one with a curtall, if they had any, their armes and baggage: the souldiers with their Harguebuzes, their matches out, and their Ensignes wrapt vp: the gentlewomen, and all others that would depart, to bee conducted in safety to their houses, or else to Rochel. Thus it was concluded. This siege caused about twelue hundred men to be slaine, a great number to be maimed, and ruined a mighty army. They endured about ten thousand Cannon shot, with many assaults, and lost fife and twentie Gentlemen, and about two hundred souldiers. And the Duke for a memory of his losses, caused the castle of Lusignan to be razed, being in former times one of the goodliest fortresses in Europe. Such conquests were of more difficulty in Daulphine: the Protestants had more places, and more Captaynes at their deuotion. Poussin, Liuron, Primas, and others did greatly hinder the traffike of Marceilles and Lions: and some running into Piedmont had charged the Kings baggage returning from Poland. To reuenge these insolencies, the King sends the Prince Daulphin to besiege Poussin: eigheteen thousand men besiege it on either side of the riuer of Rhone, in the beginning of October: foureene great Cannons batter it, and make a breach: Rochegade and Pierrevegnarde, defend it with a wonderfull slaughter of the enemy, and so terrified the rest of the army, as all were ready to trusse vp their baggage: but suddenly the wall shaken with the artillery, and overcharged with earth cast vp for the trenches within the towne, falls downe to the ground. So the towne lying open, and the ruines not to be repaired during the siege, the place being too strait, Saint Romane, after many inroades and sharpe skirmishes, enters into it, and iudging that in the end it would be forced, he drew out of it, men, women, and children, and putting them into Primas in safety, hee abandoned and left Poussin to the besiegers mercy, who entering by heapes, spoyle, sacke, burne, and make the place desolate: and by the taking thereof, they recouer a part of Vivaraiz; Grane, Loziol and Roinac (being vnable to endure the Cannon) made easie the approaches of Liuron. But let vs view the estate of Languedoc.

Poussin besieged

guedoc.

The Queene mother, and those of Guise, desired infinitely to dispossesse the Marshall D'Anville of his government, for he crossed their aduancement with all his power, and stayed them from proceeding (as gladly they would) against his elder brother being a prisoner. But yet if he had not fortified his estate with the Protestants party, who were then strong in Languedoc, hardly could hee subsist amongst so many and so mighty enemies. He therefore in open assembly of the Estates at Montpellier, ioynes himselfe with them, and according to the declarations lately published by the Prince of Conde, and the people of Languedoc, he sets downe the causes of this his new and forced taking of armes. The Vicont of Turenne his sisters sonne, doth likewise publish his, of the same substance. Thorié and Mera brethren, and the Earle of Vendadour (brother in law to the said Marshall) ioine with him. The Duke of Alençon seems to fauour it: but the euent will shew, whether it were fraudulent, or with a sincere intent.

This

A This reuolt amazed the Court, and to stop the course thereof, the Queene-mother doth presently, by gracious letters, inuite the Marshall to some agreement. But giuing the Protestants but a simple liberty of conscience, she debars them of the publicke exercise of their religion. The Marshall protests of his affection to the common good of this Realme, and assures the like desire to be in his associates: but withall he shewes, that the Councellers, who by that horrible and infamous massacre the foure and twentieth of August, had caused the deceased King to breake the last Edict of pacification, gouerning at this day the helme of the affaires; it was very difficult to settle a firme peace, the which cannot subsist, vnlesse the exercise of both religions may be indifferently allowed within

B the Realme.

So this treaty of peace remaining fruitlesse, the Queene-mother changeth her countenance, and labours by diuers practises (but in vaine, the alliance being yet too fresh) to sow diuision betwixt the Marshall and his associates, and yet by sundry messages continues this pretended parlee of a generall peace in France. But it could not bee concluded with such conditions as the King required: that all his townes should first be yielded vnto him without exception; and then would he grant his subjects peace. The Prince Daulphin, having left the command of the Kings army to the Marshall of Bellegarde, he comes in the middist of December to campe before Liuron. Rosiers a gentleman of Daulphine commanded there, with about foure hundred men, but full of resolution and great valour, in

C a shilly place, strong of situation, but then of no fame amongst the other townes of Daulphine. Foureene companies of the Kings guards; eleven Ensignes of Suisses, twelue Ensignes of Harguebuziers, Prouencals and Daulphinois, nine Ensignes of Piedmont, three hundred men of the old bands, foure companies of men at armes, and eight cornets of Reiffres besiege it on all parts. Two and twenty great peeces of battery, planted in three parts, doe batter it, and after eleuen hundred Cannon shot, make a breach of six hundred paces. The Marshall was not satisfied with this ruine: he will haue all battered downe, and with a generall ruine fill vp the trench. They make a greater breach with a new battery of foureene hundred cannon shot. He recouers the trench, and makes defences for his men. All this doth nothing amaze the besieged: but contrariwise, to shew that they haue

red with a second siege.

D force to defend themselves, and that they must haue great dexterity and resolution to take them: they tie to the end of a pike, a horse-shoe, a paire of mittens, and a cat; they lift vp the pike, as if they would say; Marshall, this Cat is not taken without mittens. Such was the estate of Liuron, when as the King iourning at Auignon, being distrest for money to supply his excessive charge and prodigality, Charles Cardinall of Lorraine (labouring the marriage of Henry with Lewis of Lorraine, daughter to the Earle of Vaudemont his kinswoman, and to furnish this excessive and stately pompe, aduising the King to sell for an hundred thousand crownes in benefices) was surprised with a fever, and falling from a fever into a frensie, he died the 23 of December, in the midst of a cruell tempest, and violent whirlwind, which vncovered the houfes, and loosened the barres of iron in the Carthusiens Couent, in the suburbs of Auignon.

Cardinall of Lorraine dies.

E Some impute this death to the smell of a certaine precious purfe which was giuen him full of rare peeces of gold, with the Queene mothers priuety: whom the foresaid treatie of marriage, which the Cardinall did practise, made remember the crosses she had suffered after the marriage of Francis the second, her eldest sonne, foreseeing that this new alliance tended but to restore the House of Guise to the same authority they had enioyed vnder the reigne of the said Francis. Others did attribute it to the blowes the Cardinall had giuen himselfe vnder colour of deuotion, in the company of them that beat themselves in the sharpest time of winter. Others applied it to the iust iudgement of God vpon this Prelate, who drawing all his greatness, and all his meanes from the Clergy of France, would yet perswade the King to so pernicious an alienation of goods appointed for the vse of the Church, whatsoever it were. Notwithstanding the strict familiarity which the Queene mother had with the Cardinall, yet did she giue this testimony of him after his death; that the three and twentieth of December a most wicked man was dead. And the people both far and neere said, that this extraordinary storme in the ayre, noted that this man, hauing by cursed practises filled his house with exceeding wealth, sackt and torne France in peeces with intestine warres, did then feelee the iust reward of his actions. Doubtlesse such as the life is, such is the end.

Whilest the King becomes a new brother of these tormentors of themselves, otherwise called Penitents, and the Court busied sometime in the processions and ceremonies of this new brotherhood, the Estates of Languedoc, fallen from all hope of peace, battered Saint Giles neere to Aignion, and became masters thereof, the Courtiers making no shew to succour it. Montbrun on the other side keeping the field with his horse-men, did still catch vp some that were farthest from the campe. But Liuron was a Churchyard for the most hardy of the assailants: every man defends his goods and his life: men, women, and children, all labour in the fortifications, to repulse their enemies, and vnder the command of La Hay (a young Gentleman about three and twenty years of age, valiant and pleasing to the souldiers of Rosiers, hauing bene slaine at the breach with Francis and Bon- B nier Captaines) strew the ruines of the walls with carcasses, cast many into the trenches, dead, wounded, and languishing: and finally, (after many assaults, and infinite Cannonnadoes, fortified with two and fifty Souldiers) they force the enemy to found a retreat, and to couer themselves from the shot, pikes, swords, stones, and such armes as necessity could yeeld to the besieged. Thus those of Liuron withstood the fierce assaults of their enemies: the armie diminished, and a certaine disease hauing wasted most part of the Piemontois, crept in amongst the other Nations: when as the King iudging of the rest by this small towne, found that he must seek out some other meanes to reduce his subiects to obedience: who were so resolute to arms, as a simple offer of liberty of conscience might soon make them fall away. Many conquests cause but sleight triumphes. A more stately crowne attended him his coronation called him, and the taking of Aiguefmortes, a sea towne and of great importance for the Protestants, inuited him to stay the course of their prosperity by some negotiation of peace.

Henry therefore packing vp his baggage, the thirteenth of Ianuary, and approaching neere to Liuron, stayed some houres in the campe. Here the souldiers cries and exclamations against him, and especially against his mother, gaue him to vnderstand, that the horrible disorders and vnworthy government of the latter yeares, had withdrawn that loue and reuerence to their Kings, for the which the French Nation had bene so much commended: and so altered the minds of the greatest part, as their iust griefe transported them beyond the bounds of reason and modesty. Ab murderers! (cried they with open throat) D you shall not stab vs in our beds, as you haue done the Admirall and the rest. Bring vs those Mignons with their rustes and perfumes: let them come to looke on our wounds, they shall teach them whether it be a praye easy to carry away. A lesson for a Sovereigne Prince, that if any diuerty of religion diuide his subiects, yet is he a common father to them all. As no reason doth allow of the sonnes ingratitude to the father; so all lawes doe abhorre the inhumanity and impiety of a father to his children.

The Campe being dislodged, the rest of the Piemontois repasse the mountaines. The Dauphinois afhamed of the disgrace they had receiued at Liuron, disperse themselves here and there: some cornets of Reistres follow the Marshall of Rez into Prouence, the rest with the Suisses are giuen to the Duke of Vzez, to make warre in Languedoc: a government wherewith the King had lately honoured him. Strange alterations. The duke of Vzez is now armed against them, for whose protection hee had often fought during the former wars, and the Marshall D'Anville lately their capitall enemy, now supports them. E These great men play with Religion, fitting themselves to that party which they thinke may most auail them whatsoever it be: and the people is still the anville, whereon all sorts of hammers strike. But the Marshall did little remember the obseruation of the Articles sworne in the association. And dissolutions creeping in amongst the Protestants, could not but preface a speedy ruine of one of the parties, or of both together. Yet he entreated himselfe with them. So likewise did the Duke of Vzez, and protesting that he would make no warre but against the Marshalls faction, hee promised to reconcile all the Protestants to the King, if they would sequester themselves from the Politikes their associates. But he would haue bene glad, that in ruining the one party, they should haue ruined themselves. During these contentions betwixt the Marshall and the Duke, the King was crowned at Rheims, the fifteenth of February: and soone after hee sent home Elizabeth of Austria (widow to Charles the ninth) to the Emperour Maximilian her father, but with a lesser traine then her quality required. Then hee married Louise the daughter to Nicholas Earle of Vaudemont in Lorraine, who they supposed should haue been the wife of ronation.

A of Thore the Constables youngest sonne. Practices of the Queene-mother, to maintaine the authority she had gotten in France, about a Daughter in law of meaner quality then her selfe: and to fortifie her selfe with them of Guise, against the Houses of Bourbon and Montmorency.

This marriage should haue caused as chaste and as vertuous a bed on the Kings behalfe, as the was chaste and vertuous whom he had now espoused. And it seemed the dissolutions and excesses of Court were come to their height in the reigne of Charles the ninth. But hereafter both King and Court (for the subiects doe frame themselves to the Princes humour) plunge themselves into more horrible dissolutions, then the best Schoole-master B of corruption and filthinesse could inuent.

The Court is drowned in delights and excesses: but they are at blowes in Languedoc, Viuraiz, Daulphiné, Perigieux, Auvergne, Xaintonge, and elsewhere. D'Anville hath an enterprize vpon Beziers: but hauing failed, he employed his forces against fourefcore and ten villages thereabouts. He takes Alais, a towne and castle: and the Duke of Vzez, Saint Ferreol, a small towne neere vnto Vzez, to annoy his subiects, and to force them to acknowledge their Lord. The forces on either side encounter often, fight, and by their common defeats weaken one another, whilest the Protestants keepe the stakes and view the sport. Those of Viuraiz surpris the towne of Beys and the Castle of Poussin, and kill the Captain and his garison. Montbrun runs through Daulphine, and becomes master of C many places. The Vicont of Turenne adds to the victories of his party, Perigieux, Brioude, La Gaillarde, Vzerche, and some other places.

The Xaintongois and those that lay neere vnto Rochel, began to hold vp their heads, and to goe to armes. The Prince of Conde filled all his party with great and speedy hopes. All rife, all dreame of new forces. They must therefore deuide by force practice to quench this great flame which was like to set the whole Realme on fire. Katherine amazed with this prosperous successe, hastens the Deputies of the Prince of Conde, of Xaintonge, of Daulphine and Languedoc: they come to Paris the tenth of April, they present Letters to the King from the Prince and Marshall, and demand free exercise of their religion throughout all France: new Chambers in the Parliaments for the administration of Iustice, punishment of the murderers, ease of imposts, a free assembly of the general Estates, and an assurance for the entertainment of the pretended peace. Fifteen dayes are spent in disputes, words, and discourses.

The King promiseth to content them all: but he will haue them referre these demands to his will. Finally, he grants vnto the Protestants, to remaine where they pleased within the Realme: safety for their persons without any search for matters of conscience, liuing in peace and modestly vnder the obedience of his Edicts: exercise of their Religion in those places they held, except at Montpellier, Castres, Aiguefmortes, and Beaucaire. The like priuiledges for Lords of fee, for themselves, their household seruants, and all other in their houses. And as for other Gentlemen that haue no such fees, exercise for them and E their families, but without townes and suburbs, ten leagues from Paris, and two leagues from Court. Too weak articles to content them who saw their affaires so successfull, or to stay such as seeking innovations were transported with future hopes. The Councell feared it: neither were they other then words without effects. And vpon refusal made, to giue vnto the Deputies a copy of the Kings answer to the Petition and Articles presented by them, to the end they might shew them to the Assembly of the Confederates, the treatie vanished into smoake, and serued onely to bring forth motiues of new confusions. Rochegade begins in Viuraiz. Those of Lions had recovered Andance, a small towne vpon the Rhine, and fearing lest Nonnay would likewise be lost, he marcheth to supply it with men. Vpon the way he encountreth the enemy, chargeth them, and puts them in F rout, but he gets a great and a deadly wound.

This death, and the approach of the Duke of Vzez to the siege of Beys, troubles them of Viuraiz more then before. Pierregerard succours them, and with the ayde of an hundred and fifty men giues meanes to the Gouvernor of Beys to defend the towne against the Duke that besieged it, vntill the beginning of May. The Duke hauing left it, they within the towne issue forth: they kill about three hundred, and nothing stayes them but the resistance made by the Suisses, from carrying away or cloying of his Artillery. If the Dukes forces and threats preuailed little against these men, his money Y v v 3 and and promisses did lesse. Hee shippes his Artillery vpon the riuer of Rhone, raiseth his campe, and by the houles which hee burnt to ashes, hee gets the ill will and curse of the people both farre and neere, for that he grew so bitter against them, whom lately hee defended so courageously.

Confidant at Marsailles.

These parties thus diuided, bred new seditions. At Marsailles the people being risen against the Customers and Toll-gatherers, runne to the Custome-houle, take their books of accompts, registers, waights, and measures, and cast them into the sea. Some other townes of Prouence followed this example. Some, called the shauen, (being a troop of malecontents, shauen after a certaine manner to be knowne) arme against treasurers and receiues. The Baron of Alemagne, Orezon, Establon, and other heads of the Protestants, held Lourmarin, Riez, Seine, and some other small townes in the Prouince. To conclude, there are so many factions, so many parties, as one destroyes another. The Lord of Vins goes to field, and reduceth to the Kings obedience all these last conquests, except Seine, and some other places thereabouts. Montbrun, on the other side, made his forces fearefull in Dauphine, but his too great lenity to his souldiers, made him to purchase much ill will and many enemies. Chastillon, a village, neere vnto Die, strong by reason of the Castle, did annoy it. Francis of Bonne, Lord of Des Diguieres, (who commanded in those parts,) resolves to pull this thorne out of their foot. Gordes Gouverneur of Dauphine for the King, makes haste to crosse his attempt. Montbrun possts thither, through the mountains, and descending into the plaine, hee chargeth Gordes thrice. The night comes and ends the conflict, Montbrun hauing lost eight men, and Gordes six and twenty.

Des Diguieres approacheth in haste, but the next day, the thirteenth of Iune, Montbrun not satisfied with this advantage, forceth his enemies to fight, and puts them to rout: Gordes saves himselfe within Die. Two and twenty Ensignes of Suisses which hee had drawne from the Duke of Vcey after the siege of Boys, performe wondrous feats of armes: they make it good, and rather die then giue backe; but they are encountred by a generous resolution, who no lesse courteous of glory, then they were enemies of a shamefull flight, strewes the place with nine hundred carcasses, carry away eightene Ensignes, and by the death of Frenlich their Colonell, and of sixteene braue Capitaines, Montbrun wins an absolute and famous victory. Du Bar and Gouernier his Lieutenants, second him by the defeat of the whole company of the Earle of Beine. Such is the daily change of humane things, which makes him by a pitifull catastrophe to fall suddenly, who lately seemed to be raised vnto the highest degree of honour. Gordes being preft within Die, calls for all the forces of the country. Montbrun charged the first that shewed themselves, in a straight: whereof part being slaine, and part flying, they giue the alarme to the whole armie. But whilst the Argolctiers of Montbrun are busie at the spoile, a huge troop of horse entuiron him, where (vertue yielding to the multitude) after a long conflict, they force through his troops. His men being disperfed, flie, some here, some there. Himselfe thinking to leape a ditch, his horse falls and breakes his thigh. So being forced to yeeld, Rache fort his cousin, and Prebe, who commanded the troops, sware to saue his life, and cause him to be caried to Crest. Hee lost in this hot skirmish two and twenty men: Du Bar amongst the rest, a braue and gallant young gentleman: the others lost two hundred, whereof some of them by their great valour, left a wonderfull griefe to them that suruiued. Two and thirty prisoners were taken with Montbrun, the which were fired for their ransomes: but hee being araigned by the Parliament of Grenoble, (after a double charge from the King and Queene-mother) not according to the law of armes, but as one guilty of high treason, ended the remainder of his life vpon a scaffold, whom already the griefe of his hurt had halfe mortified. The History commends this Gentleman to haue beene valiant, modest and iust, not courteous, no exactor, but (as we haue noted) too milde to his souldiers, who for an vndiscreet reuenge of his death, did afterwards commit wonderfull spoiles about Grenoble.

Des Diguieres
chere in Dauphine.

The wisdomme, valour, age, and happinesse of the Lord of Des Diguieres, hath since giuen good testimony, that they had reason to choose him to succed Montbrun, and to be Lieutenant to the Prince of Conde. For the first fruits of his government, hee restored martiall discipline, as much as the time would suffer him, provided for the Garisons, and by composition, surpises, and force, brought many new conquests to the party.

Xaintonge was likewise disinembred by the enterprises and ordinary courtes of two parties.

A parties. Among others, Landerneau had gotten the Isle of Ré: but losing it the same day, he gaue the Rochelois meanes to enlarge their limits. Such were the confusions which diuided both the Prouinces and the affections of this Realme.

But the time now calls vs to a strange consideration, happened either by policie and of purpose, or else accidentally, as it chanceth often in worldly affaires, whereof the wife of this world can make their prouident commodity, to draw forth all such fruits as mans wisdomme giues them hope to produce at all euents. But he that sounds the bottom of mans heart, laughs from aboue, and when he pleaseth (euen when as man dreames not of it) hee confounds the wisdomme of the wife, the fooles in their folly, and the malicious in B their owne malice.

The Duke of Alancou seemed to liue in great familiarity with the King, since his returne from Poland into France. Katherine laid, that this reconciliation of the two brethren was the meanes to maintaine the Realme in peace. But the counsels, practices, and negotiations, tooke another course then was expected. The Prince of Condes affaires prospered on the other side the Rhyne. Those of Languedoc preferred the defence of their liberties with the hazard of their liues, before the yoke of a doubtfull and dissolayl peace.

Wherefore to ruine at once the generall forces of the Protestants, which threatened most dangerous effects to come: the Court (a good Schoole-mistresse of dissimulations) C must take another accustomed habit. Doubtlesse Katherine gaue many of these instructions to her children: and the issue will shew vs, that there were many of her deuices in the managing of the following affaires. Suddenly the Duke of Alancou seems discontented. He cannot (saith he) haue iustice of the outrages which were done him in keeping him prisoner: they disdain him; those of Guise are preferred by reason of the Queene their cousin the Kings wife; his presence seems offensive to the King, who can endure no companion, nor any great man neere him. Thus it is bruted in all parts, that the Duke of Alancou is in very bad termes with the King. These horse-leeches of the Court, who by publicke troubles advanced their priuate affairs, buzzed in his eares: hee beleues them, and many of the Nobles ioyne with him: the King and Queene mother, and the Council seeme to be amazed therat: In the end hee leaues the Court, the sixteenth of September, and meeting many Gentlemen halfe a league from Paris, hee retires to Dreux: thither repaired daily vnto him new troops of the Nobility of both Religions, and amongst many, some inward seruants to the Queene mother, namely, Buffy of Amboise, a bloody, wicked, and a furious man.

This departure causeth new broiles and murmuring in Court. Every man thinks, every man speakes according to his owne imagination or desire. Some beleue verily the two brethren are at discord: that the Duke not able to endure the brauadoes of them of Guise (whom hee abhorres and loues not, as the authors of publicke confusions) goes to ioyne with the Protestants and Politikes, to augment his portion, and by their common E forces to plant a peace in France. Most of the Protestants were filled with pleasing hopes, promising themselves a golden world vnder this pretended Reformer. But the clearesighted remember what was past, and by the present estate iudge of the future. They know well the strong and variable humour of the Mother: and say that shee vseth the dissimbling of her children as a Last for all fact: that hauing preuailed little with the Lyons skinned, she will now put on the Foxes: that shee finds the Duke fit to intrap them, seeing that both Protestants and Politikes seeke him jointly, to vnderake their quarrels, and to make him their head: that being young and of small iudgement, neither greatly careful of Religion, or the reformation of the State, there was no likelihood hee should runne this course without their instruction, who had kept him so long in their power.

F Thus men discouered: but wee commonly beleue that for certaine, which we most desire: all other aduice is reiected. They hope from the Duke of Alancou both the safety and the protection of the Realme. He to maintaine so commendable a reputation, giues an account of his actions by a publicke declaration, protests to employ his forces, meanes and life, to banish the troublers of the publicke quiet, to pursue iustice for all robberies, thefts, murders and massacres, to restore Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others, being prisoners or wrongfully banished, to their goods, offices, and honours, to abolish all taxes, imposts, and extraordinary subsidies, to maintaine the ancient lawes of the Realme, to defend defend the Nobility and Clergy, in their priviledges, freedoms, and liberties, and by a general Assembly of the three Estates, to confirme a good, firme, and sure peace in France: he takes all naturall Frenchmen of both religions into his protection, and (vntill that a holy Councell may decide the controuersies which diuided their soules) he exhorts them to liue in brotherly loue, and to suffer euery man to enioy the exercise thereof. This declaration is followed by Letters to the Prince of Conde, the Marshall D'Anuille, to the Earle of Ventadour, Vicont of Turenne, and to the chiefe amongst the Protestants: the most part of them receiue leaues of paper for an vndoubted oracle. Whereof some said, they should shortly haue all things at their will: but it was without effect and contrary to promises.

Germane succours: omitted to the Prince of Conde.

The Prince of Conde laboured then for great succours in Germany. This publication comes happily to dispose Frederic Elector and Cont Palatine, to make a league with him: That they should not lay aside armes vntill the King had giuen the government of Metz, Thoul, and Verdun, to duke Iohn Casimir his son, the places and reuennues depending on the said Bishopricks for the entertainment of necessary garisons vnder the Kings authority, and free exercise of the reformed Religion: That the King should giue him an honourable entertainment, and to the Protestants of Languedoc an annuall pension of six thousand crownes: and a mutual protection both by the heads of Germany and France, to do their best endeavor for the good of France. All this must needs feed the people with hope to preuent all future troubles. But the Prince had some horse-leeches about him, who employing their companions purses, filled their owne coffers with golden Crownes: and the Protestants employed many persons in the affaires of their Religion, who had neither faith, piety nor religion.

The Court was wonderfully disquieted. The King sends many postes to the gouernors of Prouinces, comiures them to keepe their faith, accufeth the Protestants and Politikes, to haue withdrawn his brother from him, forbids his subiects to giue any ayde, fauour, or support to the Duke of Alangon: calls the Gentlemen together, and besides his bands of Ordinary, he makes new cornets of horses, and for their entertainment hee imposts new taxes. And to moue the people, and retaine them in obedience vnder the shew of deuotion and piety, he ordaines processions, fasts and prayers, and makes vowes and pilgrimages. D but being returned to the Loure, the Ladies, and his little dogges (which hee kept very daintily) made him to forget the care of affaires, and to leaue the managing thereof to his Mother and some Councellors.

The Queene-mother goes to the Duke of Alangon.

She makes a journey to the Duke her sonne, to reconcile him (said she) vnto the King. But the suspicious held, that her going was to furnish him with new instructions: that being declared Generall of these troops, both foraine and French, and of diuers Religions, and hauing ratified (as he did soone after) an accord made with Casimir, she might agree at her pleasure with him, and so disappoint the great designs of the army. After this parle the Duke marcheth into Poictou, the Earle of Ventadour comes vnto him with three hundred horse, and twelue hundred Harguebuziers: many great Noblemen and Gentlemen E repaire vnto him.

The protests of the House of Guise for a third party.

During these confusions, the Duke of Guise and his House deuise to lay the foundations of a third party, the which we shall soone see breake forth. For the present, hee assembles twelue hundred masters in Champagne, vnder the Kings authority, and Stroff twelue thousand foot: the Duke of Vzez sends vnto them the rest of his horse, and the Duke of Montpensier sends his troops of Poictou.

The Marshall D'Anuille had required some cornets of Reistres from the Prince of Conde, to fortifie him in Languedoc: but seeing these last designs had called away the Kings forces, to keepe the Germane army from entering: the Councell decreed, that attending Casimir comming, these Reistres appointed for Languedoc, should goe to the Duke of Alangon, being already chosen to be their chiefe and Generall. This did weaken their party, and the first check brought the most part of his Councellors into a bad reputation, and confirmed the Protestants in the ialousies they had conceived of the Duke of Alangon. There led these troops, being about fiftene hundred: some French Gentlemen ioyned with him, with six hundred shot. The Dukes of Guise and Mayenne, Biron, Ferragues, and others, compasse them in. Some retire and cry for money: some fight, imitating the French; but the greater number preuaile. Haffing the Colonell, with his

A his Lieutenant and some Reistres, and French, are slaine vpon the place: the rest flye.

Clement and many others being taken, with some cornets, serued as a triumph for the Duke of Guise: five hundred Reistres ioyned with his troops, he himselfe (following them that fled) receiued a shot with a pistoll in the cheeke, and by his fall gaue meanes to many to escape the fury of his victorious armes. There led the remainder of this shipwracke to the Duke of Alangon, being taxed as a bad man of warre, and not capable of counsell. This wound is a ladder for the Duke of Guise to climbe to wonderfull credit with the Catholics: the Kings actions both publicke and priuate beginne to displease him. The King (say they) takes his ease, and drownes himselfe in delights and pleasures: his brother troubles all France, and the House of Guise beames the burthen of the affaires of the whole common-wealth. And vpon these fauourable repinings, the Duke hereafter grounds most terrible designs.

His forces were not able to encounter the power of Casimir. The King therefore calls for Mansfield, Schomberg, Bassompierre, and other Colonels, who promise to bring him eight thousand Reistres within sixe weekes, giuing them three hundred thousand frankes downe, and fourteene hundred thousand when they were entered. The King was wonderfull needy: all was spent in vnprofitable sumptuousnesse, and vnworthy dissolutenesse: and part of this money could no where be so easily found as in the Parisiens purses. To induce them therunto, they iobaine Bulls from Pope Gregory the thirteenth, and foure Churches appointed within Paris to obtaine pardons for many yeares, vpon condition to ayde the King, to root out heresies. And to draw the Parisiens by others example, they giue it out, that Piennes sold his inheritance to lend the King foure hundred thousand frankes: and that the Italians of Paris did furnish the like summe: and the Duke of Neuers, the Cardinall of Ferrara, Gondj, and Birague, nine thousand frankes. Neither the first nor the second bait, could make the Parisiens to bite. They say, that within fiftene yeares their Citie had contributed twelue millions of gold, not comprehending the loanes and extraordinary imposts leauied at Paris, and throughout the Realme: that these ciuill distractions waste both their men and money: they beleeue him, that (according to the notable aduertisements of Saint Lewis, to his sonne and successor) hee would maintaine his subiects in peace and concord, by the bonds of piety and iustice. Hee must haue money, and not words: and that by force, seeing loue cannot preuaile. Paris therefore is suddenly inuaded with garisons: the King of Nauarre at Saint Cloud, the Duke of Guise at S. Denis, the Duke of Neuers in the suburbs of Saint Germane, Biron at Montmartre, the Marshall of Rez at Pont Charenton, and Bois de Vincennes. Thus the Parisiens are restrained of their victuals, and force extorts from them the money, which kindeesse could not win. In the meane time the pretended Reistres were farre off, and Duke Casimir marched with the Prince of Conde.

To diuide the Duke of Alangon from these two heads, and frustrate the designs of the Prince of Conde, the Queene-mother comes againe to the Duke: she treats a suspension of armes for six moneths: and during the same, she giues him for hostages, the townes of Angoulême, Niort, Saumur, Bourges, and la Charrie: and for the Prince, Mezières. The King doth ratifie this truce: but the Gouernors of these places, for the most part refuse to yield them: neither will the Prince allow of it, for already there marched tenne thousand horse, six thousand Suisses, two thousand Lanquenets, three thousand French Harguebuziers, with foure great pieces of battery, and sixteene leffe, the which threatened to make their passage easie. This army made chiefe account of the money which Languedoc should furnish, and the Marshall D'Anuille had promised the Prince to meet them with good troops, & to bring the pay vnto the army: but no man appears, neither is there any newes of money. An affront which then had made them yeeld to any passible conditions of peace, if they had bene offered it in the beginning of these first confusions, and might haue transported the men of warre beyond the bounds of modesty and reason, if by a good and commendable discipline the Prince had not restrained the fouldiers insoulenes.

At their entry, those of Langres (seeking to crosse their passage through their territories) did presently see the Reistres to spoile all, to load their carts, and to burne the neighbour villages to ashes. Those of Dijon made some sallies, but they were fatal to some: others were content to salute them with their cannon, shot into the ayre. Cisteaux-Gilly, Murmuring against the king.

The Queene-mother sends voyages to the Duke.

A Germane army for the Prince of Conde.

Gilly, a Castle depending on the said Abbey, and Nuis a small towne in Bourgongne, A were the first conquests of the Reistres, the Prince, and Lanquenets : where they learned by the slaughter and spoile which was made at Nuis, how troublesome a thing it is for a Prince (enemy to blood and spoile) to bee mastered by the greater number, being strangers in his armie.

The Reistres

At Loudron the Reistres threaten the Prince to take another party, if he give them not ready money. Having contented them with hopes and good words, the armie passeth Loire, marcheth directly to the River of Allier, and takes Vichy by composition, a small towne vpon the passage. Thus these strangers did forage, whilst the King by a propo- B sition, gaue hope of a future peace, and to prevent surprisles, he studied to fortifie the places about Paris, whither the whole army threatned to come : for the effecting whereof he finds his ordinary lett, which was the want of money. The Parisiens remem- bered with what violence the King had lately forced them to yeeld to his demands : they now promise for their contribution fourteene hundred thousand frankes.

The Queen mother pursues this suspension of armes, she furnissheth the Duke of Al- ançon with very exquisite meats, sends him his great horses, and cauterh them to be proclai- med traitors, that would not yeeld to the Duke her sonne : amongst others, the inhabitants of Bourges and la Charite, offering Tours and Blois in exchange of the said towne. Those of Guise have their designe apart. He speaks boldly, that France hath no need of a truce : that they will fight with their foraine foe, and vpon this hope published, they build the pro- C ceeds which we shall see them shortly to vndertake. Amidst these common diuisions, a new confusion troubles the Court.

The King of Navarre escapes from Court.

The King of Nauarre, vnder colour of hunting, escapes from Paris with a small traine : and writes to the King from la Fere in Picardy (a towne belonging vnto him) That the apprehension of a new captivity, and the ordinary slanders of his enemies, are the causes of his retreat. The King excuseth himselfe, and would haue him returne : but hee had the fields at liberty. And seeing this proiect will not preuaile, he must trie another. Some bad Councillors, which gouerned the Prince of Conde, aduised him to passe the River of Al- lier, and speedily to ioyne with the Duke of Alancçon, leaving Duke Casimir on the other side the river, who should follow his ordinary march.

In the meane time the Duke of Mayenne attends them at the passage with the Kings army. This trick left the Reistres to the slaughter : but Casimir an aduised and courageous Captaine, lodgeth his men with aduantage, and attends the enemy. The Prince discou- ring their designe, turns towards them, and makes the Kings troopes retire to their lod- ging. The Auvergnacs fearing lest this army should passe the rest of the winter vpon their marches, make them to take the way of Bourbonnois, giuing them an hundred and fiftie thousand frankes. Here began the first parle of peace : and to this effect Letters and instru- tions were sent into Guienne, Languedoc, and Daulphine. Charoux a little towne in Bourbonnois, besides money lent, payed the charges of some dayes that the army stayed there, whilst they made question to yeeld.

The Duke of Alancçon is of the army.

The eleuenth of March, the duke of Alancçon comes to the plaine of Soze, where in a general muster they numbred thirty cornets of Germane horse, ten of French, seuenteen ensignes of Suisses, seuen of Lanquenets, eight of French, and the Prince of Conde, de- liuering the white cornet into the Dukes hands, according to the articles of their Capitu- lation, he was solemnly proclaimed Generall of this mighty army. The King in the meane time, with the Queene mother, and their Councillors, omitted no practices to corrupt Duke Casimir, and to breake the treaty betwixt the Prince and the Duke. On the other side, the French, Reistres, Suisses, and Lanquenets, demanded nothing but battell, or to march towards Paris : but the duke of Alancçon was already assured of the best part of his demands : and the armies without any memorable exploits of warre, did onely spoile and D destroy France.

At length the Queen mother seeing matters almost brought to a desired end, she comes to the army the seuen and twentieth of April, where after diuers ambassages and contesta- tions, she granted in the end to duke Casimir a company entertained of an hundred men at armes, forty thousand frankes yearly pension, and two thousand crownes for the en- tertainment of a certaine number of horses. In consideration whereof, he did renounce the Article concerning Metz, Thoul, and Verdun. That of cleuen million of Frankes that

A that were due vnto him, he should receiue two millions within six weekes, and a sufficient pawne of Jewels for the rest, and the reuenues of Chasteau Thierry. The Duke of Alancçon should haue for his part, Aniou, Touraine, and Berry, for an encrease of his portion.

The Prince of Conde should haue the gouernment of Picardy, the towne of Peronne for his abode, and two hundred souldiers in garison, free exercise of the pretended refor- med religion throughout the Realme, attending a free and generall Councell : Chambers in the Parliaments of both religions, for the administration of iustice : and at Montpellier for Languedoc, leaving them eight townes in guard, for the assurance of these articles, and of their persons : Aiguemortes and Beaucaire in Languedoc, Perigueux and le Mas of Verdun in Guienne, Nyons and Serres in Daulphine, Issoire in Auvergne, Seine, with the great Tower, in Prouence. Restitution to the King of Nauarre, Prince of Conde, Marshall D'Anville, and diuers others, of their goods, offices, and honors, which they en- joyed before the foure and twentieth of August 1572. Moreover, the King did auow by a solemne declaration, That the Massacres of the said yeere had bene committed against all right and law of armes. He ordained, That the children of such gentlemen as had been murdered, should be freed from all charges of warre : and such as were no Gentlemen, should be eased of subsidies for six yeares. He disannulled all iudgements giuen since the deace of Henry the second, in hatred of Religion : and lately against the Politiques. Hee freed the Admirall, and all others murdered, from infamy : restoring their children to all C their goods. He restored La Mole, Cocornas, and others, executed or condemned for contempt, to their honours. He aduowed the taking of armes by the duke of Alancçon and his associates, as taken for his seruice, giuing him the towne of La Charite for two yeares. He appointed a Conuocation of the Estates at Blois, in November following. He cleared the Marshalls of Montmorency and Colse of all accusations, held them for innocents, restored them to their former liberty, and acknowledged them for faithfull seruants to the King and officers of the Crowne. The Edict contained many other articles depend- ing vpon the former, and was allowed by the Parliament of Paris, the 14 of May.

So the Queene mother granted much to many, to giue nothing to any, but to the duke her sonne, who alone got more then all the rest together. Also Duke Casimir had no sooner turned his backe from France, but they began to find this peace to be counterfeite, be- ing made onely to disarme them, and to diuide the Commanders. The Prince of Conde did first feele the breach of these promises. They deny him his gouernment of Picardy : some seize vpon Peronne, and put in practice a strange piece of worke. Diuers enterpri- ses vpon the Princes person, make him to leaue the Duke of Alancçon, and to retire into Guienne to the King of Nauarre, whom those of Rochel receiued into their towne, with much honour and great triumph, the eight and twenty of Iune. All such of his traine as they suspected, were executed.

Vpon deniall of Peronne, the King granted to the Prince the towne of Saint Iean d'An- gely : but the inhabitants had a watch-word, and a mutuall oath (after the example of a private league made by threecore Gentlemen of Poitou, who would haue no exercise but E of the Catholike religion) to maintaine one other, and not to giue access to any one, of what Religion soeuer, to the end their quiet might no way be disturbed or molested. The Prince seeing himselfe to haue this repulse, hee caused some Capitaines to enter secretly, and then assured himselfe of the place. It was then found very weak for the assurance of his person against so many enemies as sought his death. He therefore discouers a certaine practice against him, but fatal to the author alone.

In the end of October he takes Brouage, a strong place neere vnto Rochel. The Ca- tholikes murmure against him, and accuse him as a disturber and breake of the peace. Con- trariwise, he demanded iustice against them that had seized on Peronne, as troublers of the F publicke quiet, and guilty of treason. The Protestants likewise complained vnto the King, That in diuers places they are disquieted in the exercise of their religion granted by the Edict : That many Preachers moue the people to sedition : That the Chambers of both Religions are not erected : That iustice is denied them : That both great and small ban- die against them. And they produce ample and certaine proofes of these complaints and grieues.

Then those of the House of Guise studied to discouer those terrible proiects which they had long hatched. The cloake of Religion was a plausible and fauourable pretext to ad- uance

Practices of the House of Guise.

uance the designs of their pretensions. They had of many yeares (especially vnder Francis the second) disputed of their beginning, and of the rights which falsely they pretended to haue vnto this Crowne. Charles and Henry were become odious: the first by his violences, the last by his dissolutions. Francis Duke of Aniou, (for hereafter he shall carie that title) had lately troubled France, and was taken for a turbulent Prince: a title vnto the people. The diuision for matters of conscience, seemed sufficient to keepe backe the chiefe Princes of the blood: the rest were weake both of age and power. Those of Guise in the meane time, had neither forgotten bounty, courtesie, nor shew of zeale in piety, to winne the Catholikes hearts. The Queene Mother vied them for a purpose, that by the mutuall ruine of the one and the other, shee might maintaine her authority.

But their fauours within the Realme were not available. The Protestants crossed them infinitely: they must seeke a foraine support. They find it sitly at Rome, and in Spaine. The Pope gouernes Catholikes consciences, and great men doe still find in Religion a wel coloured pretext to trouble the State. The King of Spaine feared, lest the peace of this Realme should breed him warres. The Prince of Auranges, and many townes in the Low-Countries cast themselves already into the Kings protection, against the Spanish tyranny. They sollicite the Duke of Aniou instantly, and propound conditions vnto him, which make him to open both eares and mouth: and already many Gentlemen and Captaines armed for this quarrell. So both the Consistory at Rome, and the King of Spaine might well countenance these designs, grounded especially vpon the defence of the Catholike religion: the one for the zeale he caries to the rooting out of heresie: the other for the profit he reapes by our common diuisions.

And therefore those of Guise send their Agents to Rome, with instructions, and shew, That by the negligence of Kings issued from the House of Valois, descending from the line of Hugh Capet (in the which there appeared none but were dull, or heretikes) the Catholike religion decayed in this Realme: whilst that the Race of Charlemagne honored with the blessing of the Romane feate, which subsists not but by that Race (from the which they will make the world beleue, that they are descended in the direct masculine and lawfull line) remains despised, although it be ready to serue the Church faithfully, and that there liue at this day Princes of that Race, commendable for their vertues, ready to spend their blood and meanes, to augment the dignitie of the Church, and for the destruction of heretikes. And therefore they beseech the Consistory to approve and fauour their designs. Their chiefe designs were to ouerthrow the succession brought in by Hugh Capet, in the full assembly of the Estates, and to make the naming of a successor subject vnto the said Estates: to cause the Princes of the blood, that should oppose against the decrees of the Estates, to be declared incapable to succeed vnto the Crowne. And the residue, of what quality soeuer, Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others, degraded of their dignities: the money growing of their confiscations, to bee employed for the warre, and their bodies to be executed. A reward to be appointed for them that should root out such as could not be apprehended. To make the Estates protest to liue and die in the faith, set downe by the Councell of Trent. To cause it to be signed in the open Parliament. To reuoke and disannull all publike Edicts in fauour of the Protestants and their associates, and to pursue them to the death that should hinder the extirpation of heresies. To cause the King to reuoke the promises made vnto the Protestants, and to prescribe a certaine time vnto their associates, in the which they should present themselves before the Ecclesiasticall Iudges to be absolved, and then to be sent vnto the King, to purchase pardon of the crimes committed against his Maiestie. To cause the King to name a Lieutenant general, a Prince capable, of experience, and fit to encounter the rebellion of Princes, that should seeke to hinder the effect of the precedent articles, and who neuer had had part, society, nor communication with Heretikes, to whom both he and his ancestors had euer bene professed enemies: and to require his Maiesty to honour the Duke of Guise with that charge, being inued with all the perfections requisite in a great Captaine, and worthy of that Commission. To cause Iudges to be appointed to examine the crime committed by the Duke of Alençon, declaring himselfe chiefe of the Heretikes, authorizing the exercise of heresie: and forcing his Lord and brother to augment his portion. To cause the said Duke to come to the Court, with the King of Navarre and Prince of Conde: and by ordinary

A ordinary and extraordinary forces, to seize vpon the Duke, King, Prince, and all others that had accompanied them, and followed them in their enterprises. To cause such Capitaines as the parishers should giue to the Duke of Guise, to put all Protestants, their adherents and complices, to the sword, both in the country and in walled townes. To subdue by force or intelligence the revolted Prouinces: to be masters of the field, to blocke vp the townes that were opposite, and to put all to fire and sword that would make head against them: and after this goodly and infallible victorie, hauing wonne the loue of the Clergy, Nobility, and People, to take exemplary punishment of the Duke of Aniou and his complices, then by the Popes consent and permission, to put the King and Queene into a Monastery, as Pepin his Ancestor did in former time to Childeric: and for an acknowledgement, and in fauour of the Romane Sea to abolish the liberties and priuiledges of the French Church.

These high and great proiects were hearkned vnto, receiued and fauoured in the Court of Rome, and from that time those of Guise did not cease to drame of the meanes to aduance the effects. But this was to reckon without their host. They haue compassed some of their conclusions, but the end proued quite contrary to their intents: wherein wee admire a most singular prouidence of the King of Kings, whereby he hath vnto this day miraculously balanced, and in the end by his singular grace fetled the Estate of this Realme. The Articles of this association were first drawne at Peronne in Picardy: but disguised with goodly shewes, to blind them: that would examine them more exactly: which were to maintain the Law of God, to restore the holy seruice thereof: To preserve the King and his Successors in the Estate, dignity, seruice, and obedience due vnto him by his subjects: To restore vnto the Estates of the Realme, their rights, preeminences, and ancient liberties.

And for the execution of these articles, a certaine forme of oath was propounded, insinuating paines of eternall damnation to the Associates, that for any pretext whatsoever should withdraw themselves from this League, and a bond for such as should be enrolled, to employ their goods, persons, and liues, to punish, and by all meanes to ruine the enemies and perturbers thereof, and to punish them that should faile, or make any delayes, by the authority of the head, as he should thinke good.

This done, there were nothing but Postes carrying the first newes of their designs. They cast many libels throughout the streets, in many good townes: they murmur that they are too much supported by the Edict: they practise some to serue as fire-brands to kindle a new warre: and vnder this plausible and commendable title of the name of the Church and diuine Service, the people (a fit matter to nourish ciuill diuisions) giue care to such as seeke to thrust them into mutiny. The King was daily aduertised of new complots. He found that this match did kindle a fire of perpetuall combustions: within his Realme. On the other side, he hated the Protestants, and would ruine them by degrees, but not by such instruments as wrought without his authority. His mother likewise hated them to the death, and greatly desired the ruine of the heads, being well content that these confusions should still diuide the French, so as holding the staffe in her hand, she might terrifie her children, and maintaine her authority, make warre, and giue peace whensoever she pleased. Thus the cause of the Duke of Alençon to come to Court, and the King to entertaine his subjects of both Religions, in hope of better concord, by meanes of this reconciliation: and to cut off all new factions, he deferred the generall Assembly of the Estates vnto the 15 of December following. He presumed likewise, that all his subjects, abhorring the ruine of townes, the desolation of Countreies, and the spoile of strangers, would gladly prefer the entertainment of a peace solemnly sworn, before the continuance of war: and by this meane, he should prevent all turbulent persons, and bridle the Protestants, whom he meant to consume otherwise then by open warre: whereby neither his predecessor, nor he himselfe had gotten any honourable triumphs.

The day (appointed for the Estates) comes, the King himselfe begins it. Hee laments the calamities of his Realme, whereof the tender age in the which his brother and himselfe were in the beginning of the se ciuill warres, may well iustifie them, that they were not the authors and mortuaries. He protests to haue no designe nor desire, but for the safety and quiet of his people, whose miseries he would redeem with the yce of his life. the lands of the Crowne, engaged for above an hundred millions of gold : to vnite themselves firmly together, to root out al seeds of partialities, to reform abuses, establish iustice, and to restore the Realme to the ancient dignity. Birague the Chancellor addes the rest : but the two maine points of his speech were to iustifie the Queen-mothers government, and to demand money. Peter d'Espinae Archbishop of Lions, and the Baron of Senecy are Speakers, the one for the Clergy, the other for the Nobility : and both conclude a public exercise of one onely religion in France. Peter Perforis, Aduocate in the Court of Parliament at Paris, Orator for the third Estate, insists especially for the vnion of all the Kings subiects in one religion, but by mild meanes, and without warre : he beseecheth the King to maintaine his people in peace, to reconcile his Princes, and exactly to examine the bad government of his treasure.

The King seemed to encline only to alter some articles in the last Edict of pacification, and not to abolish it quite : but he was needy, and feared that wherewith they threatened him : That no man would assist him, but vpon condition to make warre against the Huguenots. Thus the perswasions and promises of the Clergy and Nobility, prevailed more then those that preferred peaceable proceedings before violent ; making him resolute to armes, to root out all other exercise of religion but the Catholike, to banish all Ministers, Deacons, and Overseers of the pretended reformed Religion : and yet to take all his other subiects of the said religion into his protection, attending, that by better instructions they might be reclaimed to the bosome of the Church. But the King of Nauarre, the Prince of Conde, the Marshall of Montmorency, d'Anville, and other Noblemen both of the one and the other Religion, had well foreseen these conclusions, and refusing to assist at this pretended Parliament, concluded a nullity of all that should be decreed to prejudice the Edict of pacification, protesting that they were resolute to maintaine themselves in the rights, liberties and freedoms which the last Edict had granted them : That the troublers of the public quiet, and the sworn enemies of France, should find them in a iust defence, and they should answer before God and Men for all the miseries that should ensue thereby. For answer, it is ordained, that men should be sent to winne some to the Catholike Church, and all to the obedience of the Kings new Edict, tending to maintaine the Roman Religion, to root out all other exercise, to defend the King, and to preferre his people. The King thought by this opposition to stay this new faction which fortified it selfe daily. It was a great indiscretion to countenance an association and league, which vnder the ashes of the last warre, being yet hot, covered the coales of a generall flame. The King of Nauarre beseecheth the Estates, by the Duke of Montpensier (who was sent vnto him) not to infringe the Edict of peace, and to suffer then of the Religion to enjoy that which had bene so solemnly granted. He offers to submit himselfe, if they will shew him how he erres : But hee intreats them, that in a matter of so great importance, they will giue him time to thinke seriously thereon, and to attend the opinion of an Assembly of those of his Religion, and of the Catholikes associates, which shortly shall bee made at Montauban.

The Prince of Conde answers more sharply : That he doth not acknowledge them that are assembled at Blois, for the Estates of the Realm, but a conuenticle of persons corrupted by the sworn enemies of the Crowne, who haue solicited the abolition of the Edict, to the ruine and subuersion of the Realme : That if they had bene lawfully called, he would haue assisted for the sincere affection he beares to the Kings service, and the quiet of his Country : That he will neuer giue his consent to the counsels of the aurohrs of so many confusions which he foresees, whereunto he hath already knowne the Kings disposition to be repugnant, and a friend to vnion ; being the sure and principal meanes to preferre his Crowne : That he hath alwayes honoured the Clergy and Nobility, and will maintaine them with all his power : but he pities the people, whom these pretended Estates of Blois seeke to ruine.

The chiefe of the Politikes protest, That they do not cleaue to any other Religion then that of their fathers : but as touching a generall peace, they cannot allow of his resolution : To take from the Protestants the public exercise which had bene so solemnly granted them. The Duke of Montpensier (being returned) perswaded to haue the Edict confirmed. The third Estate presented a new petition vnto the King, beseeching him to vnite all his subiects in one religion, but without violence. Doubtlesse a king may wel ruine every priuate

The Prince of Condes answer.

The declaration of the Politikes.

A priuate man, but not all mankind in generall. One succeeds another, and the children, (whose age and innocency doth naturally free them from the rigor and violence of armes) doe inherit the humours, passions and quarrels of their fathers.

The Protestants jointly beseech the King, not to suffer this assembly (which they cannot allow for a generall Parliament) to consult vpon the point of Religion due vnto a free Councell. The Estates (said the King) should neither be free, nor generall, if I should make this prohibition. And as they may demand what they please, so may you doe the like, and I promise you in the word of a King, and of an honest man, that whatsoever I ordaine, shall be for the contentment of all my subiects, and the quiet and peace of my Realme. In the meane time they consult how to leaue money for the warre. The King giues notice to his Gouvernors, and publisheth by his Letters patents ; That he is resolute to grant the Estates their requests, touching the exercise of one onely religion. And Villegier is sent to the Princes of the Empire, to diuert some from their affections to the Prince of Conde and his adherents : and to obtaine from others a leaue of Reistres. Thus the warre begins in Guienne.

The King of Nauarre attempts vpon Marmande, a town of his government, but without effect. The Duke of Mayenne comes for the King : and whilst he is the strongest in field, he batters, takes, and sacks, Thone-Carante, Marans, and other places thereabouts. During the Parliament, the Deputies of the Low Countries came to demand succours of the King, and the Duke of Anjou for protector of their liberties and priuiledges, against the tyrannous government of the Spaniards. He is now declared the Kings Lieutenant general. They giue him a mighty army, with the which (contrary to the oath taken by him in the obseruation of the accord and promise past with the Prince of Conde and the Duke Casimir) he besiegeth and takes La Charite by composition, and Ysire in Auargne by force, where the blood of the inhabitants, shed without pity by the Duke of Anjou, confirmed the Protestants in the bad opinion they had conceived of him.

Rochel crossed the practices of the contrary partie : whose happy exploits caused the Duke of Mayenne to lend forth a Navy to sea, vnder the command of Lausac : which presenting it selfe before the Isle of Re, retired, seeing the Islanders resolute to fight if they approached. The Rochelois, to encounter them, arme seuen ships, those of the Islands sue, and entreat the Estates of Holland and Zeland, vpon good assurance to ayde them with some great vessels, to withstand the force of this Fleet. The Nobility, by their example, inuite all others, and of all qualities, to charge themselves willingly for the maintenance of this army. The Duke of Mayennes first conquests make him proceed. And to make his enterprises vpon Rochel more easie, he comes before Brouage the 22 of Iune. It is a small square towne built in a marsh recovered out of the Sea, fortified during the third peace, & at that time ill furnished with men, victuals and munition : and besides, ill beloued of the Islanders about it. Those of Rochel, whom it doth greatly import for the preservation of their Estate, did greatly endamage the assailants, and cut off about 600 of their men in E short time. But a dissension happened, and was cunningly maintained betwixt the Nobility and the Rochelois : the Prince of Conde hauing vnder the conduct of Clement Admirall for the Rochelois) lost some vessels, being runne on ground, the rest being dispersed, and thereby the Isle of Oleron lost ; the Kings approach to Poitiers, the supply of Suisses in the campe ; Lausac comming into the Rode of Chef-de-By near vnto Rochel (where he burnt one of their principall ships, and tooke another, but without the losse of a man,) the death of Sore chiefe of the besieged, slaine with tenne or twelue others in a fall by night ; the number of sicke and hurt which they had to feed, the ruine of their forts, the enemies approach, the want of victuals, and the threats of the Duke of Anious comming, who would intreat them as he had done the inhabitants of Iffoire : all these considerations made them enter into capitulation, by the which they departed on the 28 of August with their armes and baggage, leaving the place at the victors deuotion.

This happy successe should haue made the Duke of Mayenne aduance with his armie : but the progresse was dangerous for the Kings Estate : who to maintaine himselfe must proceed after another fort. His manner of life was contrary to the violence of armes : hee was of a soft and delicate nature, impatient of labor, a friend to rest, feasts, dancing, & other pleasures, which peace brings to them that are giuen to delights. So the peace which had bene plotted during the siege of Brouage, was concluded at Poitiers, and was received in the end of September, with so great ioy of either party, as the Prince of Conde caused A it to be proclaimed by Torch-light in Rochel the same night it came: although it was not so beneficiall for his party at the first. This last Edict cut off some articles of the former: made no mention of strangers: left their consciences free, yet without exercise, but in townes and places whereas then it was publicly vsed in Gentlemens houses that had high Iustice and Sees, in what assemblies they pleased: for others of meane qualitie, a certaine number, and in euery Bailywicke a fit and commodious place for the publike exercise of the pretended reformed Religion. So the proud designs of the Duke of Guise were made frustrate for this time, and stayed for some yeares, vntill that by the death of the Duke of Aniou, we shall see them reuiued, but in the end to the authors confusion. B

Articles of said execution.

The partialities and leagues made within the Realme, in the which many, both great and small, had farre engaged their goods and reputations, were the cause of great difficulties, in the execution of the Edict. Those of Languedoc especially (from whom the Marshall d'Anille had estranged himselfe) did ioyntly, with the other Prouinces, sollicite the King of Nauarre, to obtaine an explanation of many ambiguous and doubtfull articles. So a whole yeare was spent in instances, pursuits, and declarations.

The conference at Nerac betwixt the Queene mother and the King of Nauarre, decided many difficulties: but their spleenes could not be so easily tamped, and sometimes in one Prouince, sometimes in another, the Edict was diuerfly and many wayes broken. The most factious were very loath to lay asides armes: The Politikes did daily diuide themselves from the Protestants: the Protestants fought to keepe themselves from surprisles, and full of distrust, maintained themselves quietly in the midst of many stormes which threatened them. C

As for the King, experience hath now taught him, that the power of man cannot force mens consciences: that spirituall diseases must haue spirituall cures: that faith is not planted in the heart by violence: that we must attend from heauen the conuersion of them that are strayed, and that the Prince is a patterne whereto his subjects willingly conform themselves. He therefore shewes himselfe in publike, for a mirror of reformation and pietie, and as a testimony that his greatest desire is to conforme the diuisions in his Realme, he builds many Monasteries, Chappels, and Oratories: vndertakes many pilgrimages on foot: confirms the Brotherhood of Penitents, erects the Order of Hieronimites, is daily conuersant with the Capuchins and Feuillants, called Iesuits; and by their instructions & directions erects many Companies, he carries a Crucifix and Beads in procession, with a whip at his girdle: he causeth many bookes of deuotion to be printed. And to conclude, he leads a life more besetting a Cloyster then a Royall Court: and following the example of Lewis the eleuenth his Predecessor, hee institutes the Order of the Knights of the Holy-Ghost, binding the to conditions which carie a strict bond to the Church of Rome. D

The Order of the Holy Ghost created.

He pretended to giue diuers blows with one stone: to vnite great men by an inuolable concord and amitie, for the good of themselves, the State, and their country: To please the Clergy-men, and to lead all the Clergy in a leash: to winne the peoples hearts who are fed with shewes: to suppress the grudging and the ill will which the intolerable oppression of his subjects bred, to remedy the extraordinary expences of his Court in vnuall excesses, and for the entertainment of a number of minions and horse-leeches, to whom they must rather weigh then tell money: but chiefly to pull downe the Protestants, to vndermine them, and by this lure of worldly greatnesse, to withdraw the chiefe heads, who could not attaine to this high and stately degree of Knighthood, but in renouncing of their Religion.

Henry (for trumpets of his deuotion) had the Fathers of the Capuchins, Feuillants, and Iesuites. Don Bernard Feuillant, and Edmond Anger a Iesuit, gaue him publicly in their Sermons, and primarily in confessions and companies, the testimonies of the most religious Prince, the most courteous, and the most careful to vnite his subjects, first in their obedience to God, and then to him, that euery France hath knowne in many ages. But wee shall see in the end most of their tongues sold for money: and others, who making profession to come into the Pulpit to instruct the people, shall basely contradict and controule these goodly Oratours, and by a contrary language, suborne the peoples affections, subuert their senses, and as it were with little linkes of gold, draw them after them, tyed by the nose, tongue, and eares.

The

Mortue of the hellion against the burg.

A The feasts, masks, stately mariages, sumptuous pastimes, and the new impositions to maintain them, led the first dance of rebellion. The Queene mother, and those of Guise, seeing the King drowned in these delights of Court, did willingly entertaine him in that humour, that either busying himselfe to number his beads, or to tread the measures of a dance, they might hold the reins of government, and dispose of affaires without controule. But he knew well the ambition of these men. He was ialous of his royall authority, and in the midst of his delights and pleasures, their preference was suspect vnto him. He was more pleased with the familiarity of meane men, whom hee had aduanced to exceeding greatnesse: and still he set some minion in sentinell, to watch if they should attempt any thing against his royall dignity. Those of Guise are not idle, they watch for occasions, they receiue such as are male-content, they practise men of their owne humours and dispositions, and fit for their designs: and can cunningly promise cure and help for those vicers and sores which the people of France doe generally complaine of.

These first discontents of subjects, oppressed with insupportable charges, and the impatience of the Clergy, who see their enemies to enioy a firme and solid peace, which did newly strengthen and close vp that old wound which had lately imbrued all France, made them easily to reuiue the league of Peronne, and vnder two goodly pretences (religion, and the ease of the people) to discouer the designs which they had long before conceiued. All encounters made the way easie both within and without: within, their hearts disposed to reuolt: without, the Spaniards greatnesse, who had now invaded the Realme of Portugal, and by this vlsipation had a firme meanes to disperse his Indian gold in France. And the Duke of Aniou made war for the Estates of Flanders and other vnited Prouinces, which had called him to free them from the tyranny and domination of the Spaniards. But these discourses belong to the Spanish, Portugall, and Flemish Historiours, and may not enter into this Volume, which inuies vs to an end.

The last Edict (as the former) accorded some townes vnto the Protestants, for hostages and sureties of his word, during the terme of six yeares. Now the King summons them to deliuer them, seeing the time prefixed was almost expired. But the peace had bene so often broken, as so short a time could not quench the fire-brands of warre, nor giue a full execution to the Edict. To content them, the King grants a prolongation for the retaining of these townes for some yeares. This grant serues the Princes of the league for a new motiue of troubles and disobedience. They giue it out generally, That the King fauours Heretikes, and that he will bring in heresie. They consider not, that he could not but by force (the cunct whereof was doubtfull) recover the said places, being strong and peopled with numbers of Protestants. The King of Nauarre sees asafare off, that the heauens are ouer-cast, and foresees that this storme doth threaten his Estate with a horrible tempest: they sollicite him to ioyne with this party: they make him goodly offers in shew, but all was but to lull him asleep, or to cast vpon him all the causes of the future miseries, and to make him more odious and detestable. He giues the King intelligence thereof, and puts him in mind of the aduertisements hee gaue him in the year 1576, vpon the treaties of the league in Spaine and at Rome. He sees this myne is ready to breake, and that it is now time to think on his affaires. He assures himselfe of the amities and friendships of England, Denmarke, and Germany.

But suddenly there falls a new accident, which breakes vp all the bankes that restrained the ouer-flowing of the League. The Duke of Aniou, whether his riot in the Low-countries, or grieue to see his designs ouerthrowne, or the wicked practices of Saleado (drawn in peeces since by foure horses) or some other secret attempt against his life, had shorned his dayes: he dies at Chasteau-Thierry. Whatsoeuer it were, such as were employed to free this man tortured, and to discouer the secret intentions of his master, were afterward vnworthily entreated, and ransomed by the chiefe of the league.

Aniou dies.

This death aduanced the King of Nauarre one degree. The King suffers the Court of Parliament to receiue the Roles in May, that were presented vnto him, (according to the custome of the Princes and Peeres of France) in quality of the first Prince of the blood, and first Peere of France. Most part of the Realme cast their eyes vpon him, as the Sun-rising.

This on the one side doth amaze the authors of the league, and on the other side, it presseth them to trie their fortunes now, whilst the King remains alone of his Line, X x x without without hope of issue, and the King of Nauarre farre off, as it were exiled, and in shew excluded from euer passing the Loire.

They assemble the heads of their Houfe at S. Denis, and presently make the seeds of their counsells to appeare in Picardy, Champagne, and Bourgogne. They make the towns to abhorre the Huguenots yoke, which (say they) the King of Nauarre prepares for them. They talke not of the King but with contempt: they cast forth Libels and shamelesse Pasquils: they disgrace him in companies as a Sardanapalus, and idle Chilperic, drunk with prodigalities and dissoluteness, and for a third crowne (his deuice shewing that hee attended the last in heaven) they were ready to shauie his crowne, like vnto a Monke in a cloister. The people being corrupted and drawne from their obedience, by the disorders of the Court, suffer audacious mutinies to creepe into their hearts. But let vs in few words see the conception, the deliury, and the growing of this league in Paris, which shall cast forth store of branches into all the quarters of the Realme. Roche-blond a Citizen of Paris, a turbulent and factious man, the first Tribune of this League, encouraged by some great men, and supported by the chiefe ministers thereof, ioynes with Preuost the Curate of S. Seuerin, Bucher Curat of Saint Benoist, and Lannoy a Chanon of Soissons, sometimes a Minister, but fled from Sedan for adultery. These foure Arch-leaguers hauing banded all their wits to ruine the Houfe of Bourbon, and to aduance that of Guise, sow a pernicious seed of rebellion throughout the City and frame a petty Councell of the chiefe Citizens, who take the charge of the sixteene quarters of the city and suburbs, to practise all they could, and to entertaine them with discourses grounded vpon the malice of the time, full of schisme, heresie, and tyranny. This petty Councell, compounded of Roche-blond, Compans a Merchant, Cruce a Proctor, La Chapelle, Luchart a Commissary, and Bussy le Clerc a Proctor, brought their deliberations and proiects to the grand Councell, which consisted of Doctors, Curats, Preachers, and other men of marke.

In short time they make a great brotherhood, and finding themselves strong, they aduertise the Duke of Guise, of the affection of good Catholikes of Paris (that is the name which the Leaguers challenged to themselves) and their zeale to the preservation of Religion, and the rooting out of the contrary, and the ruine of tyranny. Hee confers with his brethren, and sends both to giue and to take an oath in an Assembly held in Rheims place, at Paris. Then the most factious are sent to the townes and Prouinces of the Realm, with good instructions, to ioine new confederates to their body, vnder a pretext to fight against heresie and tyranny. Then might we haue seene the chiefe pillars ouerthrowne that support a Prince, loue and authority: and hatred and contempt to supply their places. The Preachers publicly in all places did tearme the King a tyrant, and fauourer of heretikes. The people did applaud them: and from this deadly hatred which they had conceiued against the King, his Councell and fauourites, sprung that fury which was soone after dispersed ouer all the body of France.

The better to countenance this league, they present it to Pope Gregory the 13, that hee might bless it, and declare himselfe the Godfather, as made for the ornament and support of the Catholike and Apostolike Romane Church. Gregory was well pleased they should attempt any thing against the Huguenots: but he did not approue those popular rebellions which were made against a most Christian and Catholike King, neither would he be the firebrand of a war which he could not quench. And so hee sent the Deputies backe without any answer. The League impatient to attend the resolution of Rome, layes open his designs, and makes them plausible, causing one of the chiefe Princes of the blood to be an actor, and to cary the bable. They publish, that the King (dying without children) hath no heire nor successor but the Cardinal of Bourbon, a Prince broken in years, without hope of issue, or to suruiue the King, who was found, lusty and young. But they secretly seale on the simple peoples minds, with that vnjust usurpation of the Capets, vpon the heyres of Charlemagne: they print books, cast forth diuers libels, yea some Preachers make it the text of their Sermons. Two principall fire-brands inflame the League. The Assembly made by the King of Nauarre and the Deputies of that party at Montauban, to resolute the means to maintaine themselves, if the League (abusing the Kings name and authority) should seek to offend them. And the voyage of the Duke of Espernon to the King of Nauarre, to confer priuately with him in the Kings name.

The chiefe of the League presume, that the King meanes to arme, and to employ the

A King of Nauarres forces against them. They seek to preuent him, and to that intent they send forth many Commissions: but lest any should controule them, they cloak them with the Kings name, wherewith they maintaine themselves to be well allowed, as a thing done for his Maiesties seruice. The King in the end of March disauowes them, and forbids all leauies of men of warre. To iustifie themselves and their rising, they publish the moouies of the Cardinal of Bourbon (who notwithstanding seru'd them but as a cypher) with the Princes, Noblemen, Townes and Catholike Commonalties, to oppose themselves against heretikes. That they had contemned the resolution of the Estates, to make warre against heretikes, and to disannull all Edicts made in their fauour. That the succession of B the King of Nauarre (whereof he hath conceiued a great hope since the death of the D. of Anjou) would cause great confusions within this Realme. That preparations were already made both within and without. That by an accord made at Madebourg the fiftenth of December last past, the troops of the King of Nauarre, the Prince of Conde, the Queen of England, the King of Scots, the Count Palatin, the Dukes of Saxony, Pomerania, and Wirtemberg, of the Landgrau of Hessen, the Swisses and other Protestants should jointly enter into France, before the fiftenth of April next following. That the Huguenots would not yeeld vp the townes which they held for the assurance of the last Edict of peace. That there is great abuse in the prouision of offices, in the leauies of money, and in the inuention of exorbitant imposts.

C Then they complain of the minions in Court, who abusing the Kings name and bounty, keepe the Princes and Noblemen that were truly Catholike, from all access to his Maiesty, perswading him that it is necessary for the preservation of his Estate, to diminish their authority: they braue the Nobility, dispose of governments in fauour of their followers, waste the treasure, oppress the people, restrain the liberty of Iustice, ruine the Clergy with tenths and extraordinary charges. And then they declare, That these iust moouies, and the suddennesse of the mischief had thrust them into armes: the small credit they had with the King, hauing no other means to let him vnderstand their complaints: and in the end they protest, that their taking arms was only to restore the Church of God to her true and ancient dignity, vnder the exercise of one Religion throughout the D Realme and Commonwealth: To restore the Nobility to their honour and freedome: to ease the people of extraordinary charges inuented since the reigne of Charles the ninth, and not to employ the money leauied thereby but for the Kings seruice: to require the King to provide for his succession against the publike and priuate calamities, which the pretensions and contentions for the same might cause: and to chafe from Court such as abused his fauour and authority. In the end, they protest and vow, not to lay downe arms vntill their proposition be fully executed: and that his Maiesty had prevented the danger, the feare whereof hath made them to take armes. These false impressions had wonderfully incensed the people: but when as they talke to them of a Synode held at Montauban, and of a Diet in Germany, where they comploted to inuade France, and to chase away both E Masse and Priests: they take the words of these passionate men for Oracles of truth. They presse to enter into the League, such as demanded nothing but change, bankrupts, men indebted, malefactors, wicked and notorious persons.

To conclude, such as had need of ciuill war to liue vpon the Common, follow the Guisens Ensignes: the double pistolets of Spaine begin to shine, the Captaines arme and goe to field. But the Huguenots are at Rochel, in Languedoc, Guienne and Dauphine: and they goe to seek to them in Picardy, Champagne, Bourgogne and Prouence. Marfeilles is surpris'd the ninth of April, by the practices of Daries the second Confull: but suddenly recovered, and Daries hanged. Mandelot seized on the Citadell of Lions the second of May. Orleans shuts her gates against the Duke of Montpensier, sent by the King, to assure himselfe of the towne. The other townes rise: the factious worke, and the army of the League marcheth towards Paris: euery day they are fortified with some new troope, and euery day some towne declare it selfe enemy.

The King in the mean time made no warre but by writing, thinking by mild and gentle means, to pacifie them that spake too proudly. Hee shewes by his declaration, the zeale he hath alwayes borne to the Catholike Religion, and the necessity that forced him to a peace, finding all the Estates of his Realme tired with the calamities past: that peace was the onely means to vnite his subiects in one religion, to establish iustice, to reforme abuses and and manners, to ease the Clergy, honour the Nobility, and to free the people from oppression: that he giues no benefices but to Prelates indued with learning and piety. The Nobility should be reconciled, leaving their spleene and distrusts. The people freed from denouncing warre, should eate their bread in peace: and yet many both impudent and rash, more hypocrites then religious, gather by this peace, that he secretly fauours heretikes: the which neuer entered into his thoughts. That he neuer fauored the succession of a King, who may prejudice the Catholike religion. But to vnder take a quarrell for the royall succession, whilest he is yet aliue, and in hope to haue issue: that were to distrust of Gods bounty, and (as it were) degrade him from the estate whereunto God hath called him. That hee hath honoured (with the greatest and worthiest offices of the Crowne) those Princes that B complaine to bee debarred his fauour. (And indeed the Duke of Guise was Lord Steuard of France, Gouvernor of Brie and Champagne, and euery one of the same House advanced to a government.) Then hauing promised to restore the Church to her beauty, to giue content to the Nobility, and to ease the people, he entreats, coniuers, exhorts, and commands all Clergy-men, Gentlemen, Parliaments, and Townes corporate, to separate themselves from that which may hinder his intention, to abandon all leagues and affiliations, and to write themselves vnder his obedience.

Moreover, the King writes to the King of Nauarre, That he should containe himselfe with patience, to the end the people may know whom to blame, as the motives of these new combustions: assuring him of his loue, and that hee will neuer forget his interest no more then his owne: against them who (vnder goodly shewes, attempt against his person and Crowne, to make them great with his losse, and the whole ruine of his Estate. C The King of Nauarre obeyes, and letting passe all occasions to arme, he protests notwithstanding, That (seeing the sword ready to strike his Lord and Brother) he will prevent the danger.

And whereas he is accused of heresie, he answers; That he was borne vnder the toleration of two religions in France: that hee will eaue that wherein he was bred, when by a lawfull Council they shall shew him another truth then that which he beleues: and therefore he is no heretike, nor yet relapse, seeing he was not fallen from his first opinion. That he is no enemy to the Catholikes, for that when the Edicts had granted liberty of conscience, he presently laid downe armes: that in all places hee maintaines his subjects in the same liberty as he found them after the decease of his mother: that at the pretended accord of Magdebourg, which the Preachers of the league publish in their pulpits, as an imaginary assembly, and fit to be spoken by a Montebank, the deceit appears plainly in that they name (in the extract published by them) the Ambassadors of the Elector Palatine, and of the Prince of Anranches, when of the Elector was deceased about a year before the terme they specified, and the Prince slaine at Delfe foure moneths before: that hee hath requested of the King a prolongation of the townes which hee holds for assurance of the last Edict, and will deliuer them before the time, so as the League lay aside armes, and yeeld vnto the King the places they had seized: that whereas they declare him incapable of the Crowne, it toucheth him very neare; yet doth he thinke least of it, hoping that God by his bounty will long preserve the King, for the good of his Realme, and will giue him issue, to the griefe of all his enemies. That those which by their declaration terme him detrac- D tion of the Kings death, a troubler of the State, and an enemy to the Catholikes, haue falsely and wickedly liyed, beseeching the King to giue him leaue to end this quarrell with the Duke of Guise, one to one, two to two, or ten to ten: without further troubling himselfe or afflicting any of his people: but no man vnder takes this lye, no man accepts of this challenge. Against this first insolvency of the league hee should oppose other armes then a pen; another Cuirasse then a Penitents weeds, another countenance then doubtfull and trembling. The authority of an assured brow, the constancy of a manly courage, a resolution fit for a royall Maiesty, should haue dispersed this warre of Gyants, and suppressed these mutinous Legions. But the Queene mother (accustomed to fish in a troubled stream) winkt at the Duke of Guise. She was well pleased with these broyles: she was contented the Duke should terrifie the King, to make him abandon the Protestants, and to force him to banish his new minions from Court, who had brought her in disgrace with the King her sonne: (he had now sequestered her from a great part of the affaires, he held her, as it were confined in her houses without the Loure) to the end she might be fought vnto, to auoid

A auoid the blowes of him that was ready to strike. Her ambition moued her thereunto, rather then any desire she had to aduance the Duke: to crosse both the King and Duke, and to bring disorder and confusion into the State; and to stand alone in the midst of these furious tempests.

The League might easily haue beene ouerthrowne. In the beginning they had but a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot in field, and the greatest part knowing that these troubles concerne the King and his Estate, retired themselves in time. Most of the townes wauered betwixt obedience and rebellion: some remained in their fidelity, the rest might haue been assured with small force. But Katherine terrifies him most of all. You haue (saith she) to doe with the Pope, the Emperor, the King of Spaine, the Duke of Sauoy, with B some Princes of Germany, with the Catholike Cantons of the Suisses, who renounce your alliance, and with all the House of Lorraine. They number five and twenty Prouinces, and great Commanders in this party: your best townes are engaged, all are resolute to hazard goods, persons, and liues, to saue religion from shipwracke. Thus this poore Prince is terrified: he thinks the Duke of Guise is at his heeles, and holds the Capuchins Cloister to be more safe for him then his Loure. He is not the same man that vanquished his enemies at Iarnac and Montcontour, he wants courage, he desires nothing more then to purchase the Dukes fauour: and promiseth, that for a peace hee will giue them a good part of his kingdom. The Duke of Guise, a Prince of great experience, discrete, valiant, C and worthy to be numbred amongst the bravest Captains, knows the King is full of feare, and sees that the lustre of his armes shines out all. His courage swells through the Kings childish feare: he continues his course, and begins to hope for more then hee had pretended. He therefore demands much, and his request ioynes his owne private interest with the publike: he beseecheth the King to make an irrevocable Edict, for the extirpation of heresies, to take away the townes held by the Huguenots by force, to renounce the protection of Geneva, to allow of their armes, and to ioine his vnto theirs. Which was as much to say, of a King to make himselfe a partisan.

The Duke of Guise fortified
by a peace

The King makes a counterfeit peace with them, and by his Edict of the 18 of Iuly, reuokes all other made in fauour of the Protestants: he commands their Ministers to depart D the Realme, and to all his subjects within 6 moneths, to make profession of the Catholike Religion, or to auoid the Country. Hee approves the Leaguers armes, as leaued for his seruice, allows of their pretexts, and by secret articles concluded at Nemours, contents them in all matters; onely with this condition, To leaue the League, and instantly to lay downe armes: a trap whereby they should in the end be taken. As for their security, they left it to the Kings good pleasure; yet would they haue in their powers, the towne of Chalons, Thoul, Verdun, S. Disier, Reims, Soissons, the castle of Dion, Beaune, Rue in Picardy, Dinan and Concq in Britany: they caused to be payd to the King 20,000 crowns, and two third parts for the strangers which they had leaued: they had a discharge for a hundred six thousand three hundred and forty crownes, eight solz, and three deniers, which they E had taken vpon the generall receipts. They obtained an hundred thousand crownes to build a Citadell at Verdun: and entertainment for guards on horsebacke for all the Princes of the League.

To conclude, the extorsions, robberies, burnings, profanations, and other insolencies which such armes draw after them, deuoured more flesh in three moneths than this warre continued, wasted more far, and sucked more blood from the poore people (for whose ease they had so often protested to haue taken armes) then the ordinary charges could haue consumed in many yeares. This outrage was the cause of seuen and twenty Edicts, to discharge those millions of gold which this fury had wasted, to the peruerting of Iustice, policy, and the treasure.

F A rash enterprise ruines it selfe when it finds resistance, but if the attempters find that they are feared, their impunity grows confident. This peace had made a great breach in the King authority: but they had extorted it by force, not three dayes before hee had proclaimed them rebels and guilty of treason: they might then easily iudge, that he would hatch an egge whereof should spring some notable reuenge. Doubtlesse Henry determined it: but the three brethren, who were the chiefe Architects of this conspiracy, kept themselves apart, and could not be caught in one net: and to maintaine themselves, they had no better expedient then by armes. They make the King resolute to war against against the Protestants: they shew him the facility thereof, three mornings (say they) will end it: We have the assistance of all Christian Princes, the Germane forces will march no more for the King of Navarre, a poore Prince, without money and without credit. The Queen of England shall have worke enough to resist the Spaniards attempts (the Spaniard prepared then that great army against England, which wee shall fee dispersed with small resistance, like a puffe of winde) and their strongest places will parlee at our first approaches.

Warre against the Protestants

Let vs make warre (saith the King) against them in Gods name. I will entertaine three armies: one in Guienne, another about mine own person, and the third vpon the frontier, against the Huguenots whom the Huguenots expect out of Germany, there wants nothing but money: the charge amounts to foure hundred thousand crownes a month. I have by your aduice broken the peace (saith he to the best of the Clergy, of the Parliament, and of the Citizens of Paris, being assembled at the Louure) assure me now of means to make warre. And afterwards he said to the Cardinall of Guise: The heads of the Clergy are they which haue most importuned me to warre: it is no reason I alone should beare the charge of that which redounds to the publicke. I assure my selfe you will not faile to assist me. And to the first President (notwithstanding the Parliament had lately verified the Letters patents, whereby the King condemned the authors of this rebellion as traytors) I haue found so much zeale and affection in you, to cause mee to reuoke the last Edict of peace, as I assure my selfe you will find reasons sufficient to perswade them of your faculty to forbear their entertainments, so long as the warres shall continue. And then to the Prouost of Merchants he said: The city hath shewed it selfe most affectionate to the breach of the Edict: they must be as willing to contribute to the charges of the warre. Goe presently, and assemble the body of your city, and make mee an imposition of two hundred thousand crownes.

Without doubt euery one of these was very willing to haue warre, but loath to feele the discommodities it brought. They begin to find that the most preiudiciall peace is better then the most triumphant and victorious warre. Yet the League will haue war: and euen they, whose forefathers were wont to cary it beyond the seas into Asia, Africa, and to the end of the world, doe now nourish it in their owne country. But the authors thereof could not stand but in the midst of a general confusion.

The King of Navarre seeing this cloud ready to breake vpon his party, complains that the King without consideration of the priuate interest he hath in this last reuolt, hath made a peace with his enemies, and hath armed them with his own forces and authority, against his Estate, his blood, and himselfe. He layes open by a publicke declaration, the causes which moued the League to take armes, the vanity of their pretexts, the fruits which all France may expect by the treaty of Nemours: & then with the Prince of Conde his cousin, the Marshall D'Anuille (hereafter Duke of Montmorency, by the death of his eldest brother, and in the following reigne Constable of France) and other Noblemen, Gentlemen, Prouinces, Townes and Commonalties of both Religions, he protests, by a lawfull and necessary defence, to maintaine the fundamentall lawes of Families, and the Estate and liberty of the King and the Queene his mother. Was it not sufficient for these Princes to haue the King and League against them, but they must bee charged with a new assault from beyond the mountaines? Sixtus the fifth, a more violent man then his Predecessor, casts out his lightning against these two Henries, King of Navarre, and Prince of Conde: he excommunicates them, degrades them and their successors from all dignities, namely their pretensions to the Crowne of France, exposeth their Countries and persons in prey to the first that should seize on them.

The Popes Bull
and of no effect.

The Court of Parliament finds this act to be rash, insolent, strange, and farre from the modesty of former Popes, and sayes vnto the King, that therein they find nothing like to the Apostles successor. The Registers of the Court, nor yet antiquity did not teach them, that the Princes of France were euer to seeke iustice at Rome, or that subjects did euer take knowledge of their Princes religion. Seeing then the new Pope, in stead of instruction, studies nothing but destruction, and that he changeth his sheepe-hooke into a fearful fire-brand, to ruine those wretches whom he should winne vnto the Church, the Court could not admit of this Bull, so pernicious for all Christendome, and derogating from the Sovereignty of the Crowne of France. The Princes likewise protest against the said Bull, and

A and appeale from it, as abusive and scandalous, vnto the next free and lawfull Councell: they will proue (sayd they) that Sixtus the fifth, calling himselfe Pope, terming them hereticks, hath falsely and wickedly lyed. This opposition was set vp in Rome the sixth of Nouember. Thus the Parliament grew resolute against this Bull: but it yielded easily in other matters which did but impair the affaires. For the fifteenth of October they allowed of the Kings Declaration, which imposed confiscation of body and goods, against such as without the warrant of the Catholike Princes had opposed their forces against the League: and reuoked the terme of six moneths granted by the Edict of Iuly, to fifteene dayes after the said Declaration.

B To crosse this Edict, the King of Navarre, by a Declaration of the last of Nouember, doth feize, and gives commissions to sell all the fruits, rents, reuenues, mouebables, debts, and all other profits whatsoever, of the inhabitants of townes, where the Edict of Iuly, touching the six moneths, and of October, touching the abbreviation to fifteene dayes, had bene receiued, published and executed: and likewise of Gentlemen and others carying armes with the Leaguers and their adherents: as also of the Clergy resident in the said townes, or contributing for their party, and to let out their lands to them that would giue moft. His words and deeds were all one: for presently his people lay their hands to worke. Saint Mesmes keepe the Marshall Matignon in breath. Laul chargeth him in Xaintonge, and raiseth the seize of Taillebourg, where the Ladies of Tremouille (the mother and the C daughter) were besieged. The Vicont of Turrenne ouer-runes Limosin, and for a gage of his inroades takes the Bishopricks of Thules. The Duke of Mercœur, on the other side, thinke with two thousand men to doe wonders in Poitou: but there must be a proportion betwix him that forceth, and him that he means to force. The Prince of Conde makes head against him, and not onely driues him from Fontenay, but also makes him, for his better safety, retire farre into Britany with losse and disgrace. Being freed from this incumbrance, he besiegeth Brouage, and had already brought it to that necessity, as the most resolute were ready to yeeld when as newes came vnto him, that three Captaines, du Halot seruant to the King, Le Fresne enemy to the Earle of Brisack, Gouernor of Angers, and Rochemorte, partisan to the King of Navarre, had seized on the Castle of Angers, one of the strongest places of the Realme, guarded by a Captaine and twelue souldiers. The enterprife was well made, well executed, but not so well continued: for Du Halot came too soone into the towne, protesting that he had taken the Castle for the Kings seruice. They detain him prisoner, and besiege the castle, whither the whole country comes.

Open warre.

Angers.

At night they demand to parle with Fresne. He as ill aduised as the first, comes forth vpon a little bridge. A Harguebuzier makes an offer to shoot at him: Whereupon hee seeks to returne: but Rochemorte with his company, fearing to bee forced by the multitude that came running, drawes vp the bridge. Le Fresne hangs by the chaines to pull it downe: but the townsmen cut off his hands, and he falls into the ditch, where he was slain by a Saggie they kept there. Du Halot was presently executed within the Towne. E These two being dead, they demand of Rochemorte for whom hee holds? For the King of Navarre, said he. Hereupon they cast vp a trench against the Castle, attending the Duke of Joyeuse the Kings brother in law. During these broyles and troubles Rochemorte (slumbering one day in one of the windowes of the Castle) was there slaine with a Harguebuzier shot.

The Prince aduertised of the surprise of the Castle, and of Rochemorts answer: but not of that which happened since, leaues Brouage: and to oppose sufficient forces against the League, he marcheth with about eight hundred masters, and twelue hundred Harguebuziers on horse-backe, passeth Loire at Roiffers, betwixt Saumur and Angers, chargeth home to the suburbs, forceth some barricadoes, and spends a whole day in skirmishes: but he heares no newes from the Castle, neither for the alarme in the towne, nor the noise of his troops. No man appears: no answer, no signe is made: the actors were buried in their enterprife, and sixtene souldiers remaining, had already capitulated. Doubtlesse too much courage, and too little consideration (a dangerous oversight in any great Commander) had engaged the Prince on this side the Riuer of Loire, amongst many armies of enemies, hauing no bridge at his deuotion, without boats to repasse, or any hope of succour. Then that cheerfull hope which had brought that little army, turns into confusion and disorder: for the Duke of Mayenne had passed the Loire at Orleans, with fifteene hundred died horse; Reistres and French, to cut off the Princes way, if he repassed the water. The Duke of Epiernon and the Marshall Biron kept Beaulieu towards Bonneau, to meet with him. La Chastre had drawe up the mills and boats, and kept the passages of Loire. The D. of Ioyeuse marched at his backe. Entragues Gouverneur of Orleans came to crosse him, and all the commons did rise.

The Prince of Conde in rout.

On the other side, the Princes troopes were tyred. Hee failes of two or three passages vpon the river, whereof he made account, betwixt Blois and Amboise. The amazement encreaseth, and his number decreaseth: such as had friends in Beaulieu, Dunois, Perche, Vendosmois, or Mayenne, scale away. The Lord of Rohan (advising him not to thrust himselfe into an apparent ruine) had turned head towards Britany. All the foresaid enemies forces would within few dayes charge him. Being nere to Vendosme, he leaues the chiefe charge of the retreat to Clermont, and Saint Gelas, ordereth the companies; provides for his household seruants, and at eleven of the clocke at night, he parts, accompanied with the Lords of Tremouille, Auentign, and few others. Finally, after infinite toyle and dangers past, he recovered the Isle of Greneze, lying in the English Seas, and so London, being receiued by the Queene with all honour and fauour he could desire: and then by her commandment accompanied with a good number of the Nobility, and men of warre, in ships well appointed, he repassed the Seas, obtaining a sufficient conquest to haue faced himselfe, and a rich spoile to haue returned with his head to Rochel, rather then to the Greue or the Hales at Paris.

Saint Gelas, Bois-Dury, Antigny, La Tiffardiere, and some others, are commended to haue wisely preferred these broken troops nere to the forest of Marchenoir, diuided into small companies, of twelue, and fiftene, whereof (notwithstanding the townes of Orleans, Blois, Amboise, Tours, and others thereabouts, were straitly guarded) many repassed the Loire, Saint Gelas and others, taking the high way to Paris, crossed many companies dispersed in Beaulieu, and hauing wandered long in the forest of Orleans: in the end they passed the River nere to Gyen, and at last recovered Rochel, where the Prince, the chiefe of the army, and the most part of the troops were already in safety.

Another complainte of the king of Nauarre.

The lightnings of Sixtus, and the second Edict of October had wonderfully moued the King of Nauarre. Now he complains to the Clergy, to the Nobility, to the third Estate, and to the Parliament of Paris, of the breach of the last Edict of peace, and that they had caused the question of succession to a King yet liuing, to be decided at Rome; that they would make a Prince of the blood of France subiect to the Pope; that they suffer the Consistory to giue that which belongs not vnto it; and that the Pope disposeth of Realmes and Principalities at his pleasure. Then he sheweth the miseries which these vniuall warres will breed: he exhorts them, not to serue as instruments to the Leaguers, to ruine the King and his Realme. And finally, seeing they are so ill aduised, hee protests as before: That both he and his, will vsf all lawfull means, to resist the violence of their enemies, and cast all the miseries that shall ensue vpon the authors thereof.

Intercession of foreign Princes.

Strangers deale earnestly in the cause. The Princes of Germany make intercession to the King, at the King of Nauarre instance, that he would be perswaded, at the humble petitions of his neighbours, and that opening his eyes at the teares, and his cares at the complaints of his subiects, he would maintaine his owne good, quiet, honour, and faith, his Crowne and reputation, and preserve a body wounded vnto death. But those of Guise kept him in awe.

He speaks not but by the mouth of the League. I make and change (said hee vnto the Ambassadors) my Ordinances as necessity doth require, for the good and quiet of my subiects: and leaue the care to all soueraigne Princes, to gouerne their people as they shall thinke fit. I haue the feare of God liuely graven in my heart: neither will I doe any thing against the honour of my conscience, and the fatherly care I haue of my people.

The Duke of
army.

This pleased the League: they are now on horsebacke. The Duke of Mayenne marcheth with about two thousand horse, French and Reistres, twelue regiments of foot, and fix thousand Swisses. He must bring the Princes of the blood prisoners to Paris in triumph, their Captaines chained, and couer the fields of Xaintonge, Poitou, and Guienne with their slaughtered souldiers, retourne victorious, and bring to the King the conquest of all the places that made resistance. But what exploits? what triumphs? The wrath of God ruines his men in those Countreies. Hee besiegeth, batters, and takes some filly places, 1586

A places, which are scarce noted in the French Mappe, as Montignac, Beaulieu, Gaignac, Castels, and Saint Bazille vpon Garonne: Montégur, Castillon, Puynormand in Perigueux, and the most part by composition, (but badly ordered) leauing behind him Egeac, Cadillac, Cajor, the Houses of the Vicont of Gourdon, Montfort, Bergeac, and Saint Foy, places of importance, all held by the Protestants. The difficulty of passages, the ouer-flowing of Riuer, the vehemence cold, the continuall raine, want of money, munition, victuals, and supplies of men, with-draw him from this warre, to goe and winter at Bourdeaux, there (in the middelt of his losses) to make some enterprise vpon the castles, to the preiudice of the Marshall of Matignan. So the most of his souldiers (detained long without either honour or profit) disband of themselves, and the Duke brings from this voyage a more famous spoile, the heyre of Caumont, being but twelue yeares old, to giue her to one of his sonnes. He had before time done better in Dauphine, where keeping his faith inuolable, he had happily preferred his reputation and credit. Indeed hee then liued onely vnder the Kings lawes and obedience, and now he spends much time, labour, and money to effect little in Guienne. In the meane time the Prince of Conde renued the warre, assisted notably by the Earle of Laual, and Saint Gelas, who commanded about foure hundred and fifty men, and by the new conquests of Dompierre (a castleneere vnto Saint Iean, belonging to the Marshall of Rez, where the booty repaired the losses late suffered by the souldiers) of Royen, a strong place nere vnto Brouage; of Soubize, Mor-nac in Allouert, Mondeuis, and others, defaced the griefe of the former conflicts. In the middelt of these prosperities he tooke to his second wife, in Taillebourg, the sixteenth of March, Charlotte-Katherine of Tremouille, sister to Claude of Tremouille Duke of Thours, &c. by whom hee had Henry of Bourbon Prince of Conde, the first Prince of the blood at this present, and first Peere of France.

The Prince of
condemning.

Within few dayes after, Tiercelin with his regiment of about six hundred and fifty men, returned from an enterprise which Saint Luc the Governor of Brouage had made (but in vaine) against the Isle of Oleron. The Prince aduertised of his passage, follows him, with La Tremouille his brother in law, La Boulay, Antigny, and some thirty others: hee chargeth them in the rere, nere vnto the suburbs of Xaintes, and kils thirty or forty of his men: the rest put themselves in battell through the fauour of the hedges and the high way. The Earle of Laual comes gallopping, with about five and thirty horse of his company, which had bene lodged a little from thence: and seeing the Prince and therest of his company engaged in the combat, he goes directly to the Colonels Ensigne, couered with a battalion of pikes: he breakes them, fights with him that caried it, puls it from him, puts him to flight, kils three-score souldiers vpon the place, and chafeth the whole Regiment. Tiercelin saued himselfe, carying to Xaintes a hurt in the arme, and many others being maimed. Tremouille had a horse slaine vnder him: and some were hurt, but the Earle lost Saills and Rieux his brethren. Tanlay was lately deceased of sickness at Saint Iean: and himselfe surprised of a feuer, and wonderfully grieved for the losse of his three brethren, followed them to the grave within a few dayes after, and all foure were interred within the Castle of Taillebourg.

Tiercelin Regiment defeated.

The death of four brethren of Laual.

But what did the King of Nauarre in the meane time? He hath vntill now maintained himselfe vnder the obedience of the Kings commandments: hitherto there hath bin nothing but mutual writings, Edicts, Declarations, commandements, directions to the officers of the Crowne, for the execution thereof. Hereafter hee displays other armes then paper and inke.

The Marshall of Matignan had besieged Castles in February: the King flies thither with about three hundred Masters, and eighthe hundred Harguebuziers on horse backe: he raiseth the siege, disposeth of his affaires in Berne, comes to Nerac, and assures the town: F passeth the Garonne at Saint Bazille (notwithstanding the Duke of Mayenne, who lay within two leagues of his passage) crosseth Perigord and Angoulmois, and so comes into Poitou, where the Marshall Biron, with about twelue hundred horse, and foure thousand foot, molested and troubled the Country nere vnto Rochel, and besieged Marans. The arrival of the said King, and the resolution of the besieged, commanded by La Iarrie, made the Marshall to passe the riuer of Charente, and to leaue Marans to the free exercise of both Religions. The King of Nauarre went to Rochel to visit the army at Sea, and by a palisado, to keepe in them of Brouage.

Yyy

1586

The Cardinall of Lenoncourt, and the President Brulart, were sent the yeare before A from the King, to assure the King of Nauarre of his Maisties loue : and to exhort him againe to vnite himselfe to the Catholike Church, as well for the good of his confidence, as also to make his way to the succession of the Crowne more easie: to shew vnto him the causes that had moued him to breake the peace, and to intreat him to yeeld the townes of surety. The time would not suffer these propositions to take effect: but contrariwise, after the example of the league (said the King of Nauarre) we should demand better townes. So the Ambassadors ended their charge, beseeching the said King, to enter into some tratie, wherein the Queene mother should deale to his content, so as he would stay the leaue of Reistres, Lansquenets and Suisses, which Cleruant, Segur, and Guitri, had procured. B He accepted of this conference, the which breeds a truce in the end of the yeare, but with protestation, not to stay the good will of such as in so important an occasion, and extreme necessity, had gone to field: that (raising the Kings authority troden vnder foot, by the breach of his Edict) they might preferre him from the foraine invasion of the League. He was better affected to a good peace, then to a bad truce. But the Queene mother telling him that the King would make no peace nor truce with him, vnlesse he would become a Catholike, she made this conference altogether fruitlesse. She lets him vnderstand, that this conference would bring him in grace with the King, leauing to court a Maior of Rochel, whom he did not command absolutely. But this Prince had his cares too much beaten with this proposition, and could not yeeld thereunto, but by due forme, which was by a holy and lawfull Councell. And the Duke of Neuers, thinking to add some more periuallous reasons then the rest of the Assembly: You cannot (saith he) leauy any impo- post there. (A Prince doth what he will, when as he wils nothing but what he ought.) You have reason (answered this Prince, being free and of a quicke conceit) for we haue no illians among vs.

This conference bred a ielousie among the Parisiens. They were more inclined to a reuolt then euer. The Duke of Mayenne aduertised that the Queene mother advanced towards the King of Nauarre, to incite an accord, he makes haste to Paris to reproch the King, that this negotiation was contrary to his Edict: that such a peace could not be good, breeding effects in Religion contrary to the tranquillity of Catholike confidences. Being arriued there, the six Arch-leaguers impart vnto him their secret articles: to suppress herefie, reforme the Court, and the insolency of Mignons; and for a fatal wound to the Estate, to seize vpon the Kings person. He allows of these Councels, and founds their designs, but finds the execution difficult. So the Rats in the Fable found this expedient to be very good, to be aduertised of the Cats approach, and to save themselves, to hang a bell at his care: but none durst undertake to doe it. The Queene mother aduertised of this desperate humour, took her way to Court. Her arriuall, with the irresolution of the Commanders, left the Parisiens waivering, in the midst of so dangerous an enterprise. The Queenes departure kindled the warre in Poitou. The King of Nauarre goes to field, takes Chisay by composition, sayes by assault: forceth Saint Maixant to yeeld: reduceth Fontenay to his obedience: besiegeth Mauleon, and during the battery takes it by escalade.

They of Dauphine seeing all Guienne in armes, would not be the last to make it known that they had interest in this cause. Des Digueires perswades himselfe that he shall reduce this Prouinceto the King of Nauarres deuotion: with this designe he caused Iohn Baptista Gentil (issued from the noble Family of the Gentils in Genoua) to come from Fleuerac in Gueaudan to Serres, a man prompt in warlike conceptions, hardy in enterprises, and happy in executions: and commands him, if it might be, to deslowe the Virgin of Dauphine. This Virgin was the Towne and Archbishopricke of Ambrun, for during F the ciuill warres all the townes of Dauphine had bene held by the Protestants, except that, being built on the toppes of a Mountaine, and fortified with a Citadell by the Duke of Mayenne. Gentil views it by night, and reports that there is meanes to take it. They march with three hundred horse and nine hundred Harguebuziers during the longest nights of winter, when arriuing by foure of the clocke in the morning, they find the town in armes, and the inhabitants ready to entertaine them, for one of the townsmen had slipped from the troops, resting that night at Chorges, & giuing aduertisement to Gessen gouernor of

A of the place. Notwithstanding all this, Gentil advanced with Corbierre, la Riviere, Masse, Bagard, and other Captaines. Des Digueires follows him with Saint Ian his cousin, fifty men armed, and fifty Harguebuziers, Morge commanding the rest, and Parbault the shot. The S. tenell hearing the noyle of their armes, cries, Who is there? Iu (sayd Gentil) Monsieur Des Digueires that comes to petard you. The Petards worke their effect. And the third blow they enter into the base Court of the Citadell, pell-mell with them that are assailed, they force them to quit the place, and to flye vnto a plat-forme towards their cannon. They chase them, kill some, and force the rest to cast themselves desperately from the wals into the towne. They of the dungeon defend themselves courageously. B Gentil threatens to blow them vp with his Petard, the which hee planted at the doore of the store-house where their powder lay, wherat they grew amazed, and yeelded to haue their liues saued. Gessen intrencheth himselfe to stop their descent into the towne, but day being come, it was forced, and he being retired into a tower of the Archbishops palace, made his composition to haue his life saued. Thus the Virgin in Dauphine was deslowed.

The taking of Ambrun opened the passage of the mountaines of high Dauphine, and the towne of Guillestre gaue entry into Piedmont. Gentil views it, and undertakes it in the hottest of the inhabitants alarme, hauing made many fires in their ditches and rauelins, to discouer such as should approach. Foure Petards force three gates, and break down a draw-bridge: the townsmen fight valiantly to hinder their entry, they kill and hurt many; Pranieres Lieutenant to Des Digueires had a dangerous blow on the head with a stone, yet they were forced to receiue a law from the stronger.

Saint Iulian a good place in high Viarez was also surprised by Gentil at the instance of the Seigneur of Chambauld. Montfaulcon in Vellay was more painful, for their guide hauing lost his way by reason of the darknesse of the night, they could not arriue before the breake of day, but there happily fell a great mist to couer their approaches. The Sentinels were euen then gone downe to assist at the opening of the gate: when as behold an unexpected thunder of Petards taught the townsmen, that a place enuied is in great danger when as the guards leaue their wals at the breake of day.

D These happy exploits did winne Captaine Gentil much reputation. From henceforth they attempt not any thing but they desire to haue him a principall actor. The Earle of Chastillon desired to reuiue that which hee had vpon the towne of Puy in Auvergne, wherof he had failed by the bad conduct of Captaine Saint Martin (otherwise called Villars of Gueaudan) who through indiscretion or otherwise, had lost some wax in the tiller-holes of his Petards, so as they could not take fire at need, yet had hee happily set them to without any discouery, so as the Earle being discontented, returned with all speed with nine hundred foot, and foure hundred horse. Whilst he treated with Gentil touching this attempt, he had some lett which stayed him in Language: during the which Gentil had leisure to goe and view Lions, the capricious inhabitants hauing newly demanded E that Citadell: which hauing found pregnable, Chastillon, Des Digueires, and Chambauld, ioyne their troops together vpon a pretext to besiege Nonnay in Viarez, perswading themselves to carry it vpon the assurance which Gentil gaue them, if the King of Nauarre had not commanded Cont Chastillon to goe and ioyne with the army of Reistres, who made preparation to muster vpon the plaine of Strasbourg, and Gentil to accompany him, to open such passages as should be needfull.

Whilst the King of Nauarres armes prosper in Poitou, and the Duke of Mayenne treats with the leaguers at Paris, and the mouth of his mutinous Preachers, disgrace the Kings authority with the people: the Duke of Guise continues to make war against them of Iametz, the which he had begun against the Duke of Bouillon, from the first beginning of the league. Sedan and all that principality serued as a retreat for the neighbour Protestants, and as a port for strangers to enter into France. These are the pretexs wherewith he couers his designs, but he had another principall motiue: from Sedan the King had intelligence of all that was practised in Champagne and Lorraine, in the yeare 1585. When he sees himselfe master of Douzy, Rocroy, and Raucourt, he passeth the Meuze, and enters into the Soueraignty of Sedan, afflicts the Countmen with all the cruelties that war could imagine, whilst the famine presseth them within the towne. To diuert this storme which threatened Sedan, the Duke of Bouillon causeth Schelandre Gouernor of Iametz, to set vpon Verdun, a towne on the frontiers of Champagne, which had tumultuously run into the league: the Duke of Guise runnes to succour it, and by his absence giues the duke of Bouillon meanes to succour Sedan. Thereupon the Queene-mother, at the request of the D. of Montpensier, vncle by the mothers side to the Lord of Sedan, procures a truce for fifteene dayes, betwixt the two Dukes, during the which the enterprise vpon the castles of Lametz, for the Duke of Guise, prouing fatall for the vndertakers, disposed their wills to a second truce of a month.

This fell out happily: for the Germane army, whereof he was named Lieutenant General vnder the Duke Iohn Casimir (who substituted in his place the Baron De Onaw, the minority of the Elector Palatin nephew and pupil) to the said Duke, hindring him from marching in person) prepared to make their musters in the plaine of Strasbourg. So the Duke of Bouillon goeth into Alsatia with foure hundred horse, and eight hundred Harguebuziers to make them aduance: and the Duke of Guise comesto the King to Meaux, to receiue (said he) his Maiesties commandements, in so great and so important a cause: but in effect, to complaine, that since the reuocation of the Edict of peace, he had followed the warre against heretikes with small fauour, as the King had suffered them in their houses to enioy their goods and estates peaceably: That in stead of selling and employing them to their ruine, he caused the reuenues of the Cardinall of Pellevé to bee seized on (a man borne in France, but Espaniolized at Rome) for that in open Consistory hee had vertuously maintained the iust motives of the taking of armes by the Catholike Princes against the Huguenots: That this warre had more aduanced the Mignons than ruined the Heretikes, and that the money raised by the subvention of the Clergy, serued to entertaine the said Mignons, that neither the Kings Councill, the Parliament of Paris, the inferior Iudges, nor the Prouost of Paris had sworn this last Edict. That the towns which had demanded the extirpation of heresie, and the reuocation of the last Edict of peace, were treated like enemies. That he had caused the Citadels of Lions and Mafcon to bee beaten downe, surprised that of Valence, disgraced Brissac, Crusilles, Gessan, Entragues, and others, and peruered the assignations, which he had giuen him, to bee repaid the money the which he had disbursed in this last leauy of men of warre.

But the King knew well how to counter-balance these complaints of the League, with their owne breach of the Articles of Nemours. He had well obserued, that their insolent passions aspired to some greater designs then the articles made mention of. Those of Guise had demanded towne of assurance against the Protestants in those Prouinces where they were not at all to be feared. The Duke of Anjou had newly surprised Dourlans and Pontdormy, but he had failed of Boullen through the fidelity of S. Maria. They had lodged in their Citadell of Vitri Le Franco an Italian at their deuotion, and tooke an oath of many Governours to hold their places for the Duke of Guise.

But the Kings meaning was to lue and reigne: yea though he did buy a good peace to the contentment of both parties. But the contrary designs of the King of Nauarre, and the Duke of Guise, could not bee reconciled: and hee had no meanes to subist betwixt both, but must leane to the one or the other side, nor oppress the one without raising of the other. To conclude, not daring to shew himselfe a King, he suffers all the chiefe of the league to become counterfeit Kings. He exhorts the Duke of Guise, not to expose the Estate in prei, to procure the contentment of his King, the liberty of the Clergy, the dignity of the Nobility, and the peoples ease, by other meanes then that which destroys the honour of the Soueraigne, spoiles the Churches, suckes the Gentlemans blood, and driues the people into despaire: and inuities him vnto peace, by promises of aduancement for his House and party. But a warlike mind will haue nothing but war. The Duke could neither endure the search nor the cure thereof. Thus peace is banished. The Duke seeks all meanes to ruine the Huguenots: and beleeueth the King to stop the army of strangers, which were euen now vpon the frontier, that they might not returne into Germany, with a victory ouer France, and a triumph ouer the Catholike Church.

Still must this venerable pretext of Religion serue to colour the wicked passions of men. Hee procures many Commissions, especially for his brother the Duke of Mayen in Dauphine, for the Duke of Ioyeuze in Poitou, and for himselfe against the Protestants army.

If the King had not shewed the like care on his part, the people would haue said, that as long

The Duke will haue warre.

A long rest doth dull the courage of a horse, so since the Duke of Ioyeuze marriage, the pleasures and delights of Court, and the solitarinesse of Vicennes, had much decayed his accustomed generosity. He therefore diuides his forces into three armies. The first at Chaumont in Bassigni, consisting of five and twenty companies of men at armes, twelve ensignes of foot in the Regiment of Esfclaux, six of launnes, six of Gie, with many other blanks signed for other commissions, at the will of the Duke of Guise, who encreased this army with foure hundred Lances, and two thousand Italian foot, sent by the D. of Parma, and the Duke of Lorraine, (suffering himselfe as the eldest of the House, to be caried away with the vaine hopes that were giuen him, of a good portion in the pretended succession of Charlemagne) held also goodly and great forces vpon the frontier, at the D. of Guises deuotion. The duke of Montpensier commanded the second, at S. Florentin, neere vnto Troyes: the King with his presence honoured the third at Gyen, stretching along the Riuer of Loire, to keepe the King of Nauarre from ioyning with his strangers on this side the Riuer. The duke of Ioyeuze presuming of an assured victory, lead another army into Guienne against the King of Nauarre, and the other heads of the league, armed euery one of them by himselfe.

The army that came for the Protestants, consisted of five thousand Reistres, five thousand Lansquenets, twelve thousand five hundred Suisses in three Regiments, eleven companies of French, ten companies of Harguebuziers on horse-backe, the which in all were about thirty thousand men. The King of Nauarre assembled his forces in Gafcony. The Prince of Conde, the Cont Saiffons, the Vicont of Turenne, the Cont of Rochefoucault, the Lord of Tremouille, and others, made great preparations. The Lord of Chastillon gathered an army in Languedoc: Des Dignes held himselfe ready to passe at need.

Thus this poore and miserable Realme, is ready to serue as a prey to people differing in tongue and manners. Without doubt men iudge of the offence by the punishment. The witchcraft and diuination (whereof some make open profession) blasphemy vnpunished, lust, dissolation, prodigality, ambition, discord, and cruelties: but about all, impiety, licentiousnesse, atheisme, superstition and iniustice, the root of miseries which are crept into France, haue filled vp the measures of her iniquities: and now she is ready to drinke euen vnto the lees.

In former ages the Court was a Schoole of vertue for the French Nobility, now it abounds in dissolutenesse, disorder and excessse. The most modest grow insolent, the excessse of great men breed it in the meaneft. And doe wee wonder if the same scourges, whereby the fearfull wrath of God iustly kindled, haue ruined more flourishing Estates then this, doe now waste our fields?

The army of strangers euen now enters into Lorraine, whose errors at their entry will cost them deare that commit them. The Duke of Bouillon is young, little respected, and ill obeyed. Cleruant, Guitri, Beauvais La Noelle, Digoin, Montlouet, Vezines, and others assist him, but most of them are more fit to cary an ambassage, then to vndertake a charge. The chiefe of Germany is but a meane Gentleman, valiant out of doubt, but too weak for so great a charge, hauing no reputation but what he hath gotten vnder Duke Casimirs authority.

In the beginning of August, discord (a dangerous plague) bred a great confusion in their proceedings: the Duke of Bouillon would haue employed this army to victual the places of his Soueraignty: the Generall of the Germanes desired to haue a Prince of the blood to march before him: the Reistres and Suisses lose a goodly occasion at Pont Saint Vincent, to fight with the league, who made a shew to ioyne with them: the Lansquenets are commended to haue resolutely cast themselves into the water, to passe and come to battell. Some would spoile Lorraine, others would cary their reuenge into the heart of France. The Germanes choose the way along the Riuer of Seine, and so to passe into Picardy. The French had more reason: that they must ayme at a passage ouer Loire, and fauour the King of Nauarres approach. In the end, the way of Loire was refused. They fire some villages in Lorraine: the Countries lying vpon the passage are wasted, the army findes neither mills, nor ouens standing, which bred a generall discontent amongst the Reistres and Suisses. As the army passed through the country of Barre, and Giniuillos, newes comes that the Lord of Chastillon is beset in Greffille in Lorraine, with four hundred horse, and fifteene hundred Harguebuziers : the Duke of Bouillon makes haft to vngage him. The Earle of La Marke his brother so toyles himselfe in this action, that hee falls sicke, and dying, leaues the conduct of the fore-war to the Lord of Chastillon : the army is tumultuoyed with continuall raine, they want victuals, and the grapes and other fruit being not ripe, breed many fluxes : yet did they surmount all these difficulties, and having passed the rivers of Marne, Aube, Seine, La Cure, and Yonne, they approached neere vnto Loire.

The army approaching to ioyne with the Prince of Conde, the garison of Perreufe being abroad, caried away some Reistres : the Earle of Chastillon sent to demand them by captain Gentil, and vpon refusal, threatens the Towne with the rigours of warre.

The Admirall (said they) was more dangerous then his son, yet passing neere vnto vs with great armies, he neuer had the heart to besiege vs. Poore soules, who trust in the strength of their armes, and the bounty of their walls ; and yet haue no meanes to resist the violence of an Engine that is portatue. Chastillon calleth the Regiments of Languedoc to march. The Lords of Mouy, Montlout, Esternay, Lieramont, Rully, Langres, Brofles, and others, doe accompany him. They plant about one thousand eight hundred Harguebuziers at the defences of the ports, to shoot as soone as the Petard had plaied. Gentil prepares his rousing bridges and makes fast his Petards through the fauour of the night : they beat downe the ports and draw-bridges, and at the sixth blow they become masters of the townes ; where they retire their Reistres, and suppress their insolency that spake so proudly, teaching the Inhabitants that the law of armes doth bind them to answer for their actions whom they bring for in their guard.

Two Strangers
second complaints.

Here the Reistres and the Suisses make a second complaint : the King of Nauarre appears not, the water is low, but the Kings forces are lodged vpon the riuers side, and threaten to fight with the first that shall approach : the ruine of the strangers army was to keepe the King of Nauarre from ioyning with them : and therefore, the duke of Ioyeuse staid the said King with an army, strong with men, munition, artillery, and other meanes. For their first exploits, the King of Nauarre had defeated some companies which had advanced too farr into the country. And Charbonieres and Bori remaining with their regiments, at La Mothe Saint Eloy (being beaten by the fauour of the captain of the castle, who lent some peeces, to breake their barricadoes : against the oath which he had giuen, not to commit any act of Hostility) were defeated by Ioyeuses troopes.

D

The taking of Saint Maixant, was the second of his triumphs : Thonne-Charente the third : both, by composition. But the defeat of the companies of Pucelles, (where some being taken after the fury of the fight, others yeclding vpon their enemies faith, were in a manner all insolently slaine in cold blood) together with the foule warre at Saint Eloy, shall bee dearly sold vnto the victors, who hauing added the Abbey of Maillezay to his first conquests, he left Laurdin to command the army, and returns to court, to demand a triumph of his victories, and a supply of greater forces, the plague hauing much wasted his army.

The captain of the Duke of Ioyeuse in Poitou.

In his absence the King of Nauarre defeated three of his companies of men at armes, took their cornets, and many gentlemen prisoners : pursued Laurdin vnto La Hye in Touraine : chased the Duke Mercœur, and by the conduct of the Vicont of Turenne, tooke all his rich baggage : then at his returne he receiued the troopes which the Cont Saiffons brought, and those of Normandy led by Colombieres.

This respite gaue the said King meanes (as we haue noted before) to gather together his forces in Galcony, and so to ioyne with his army in Xaintonge. On the other side, the Duke of Ioyeuse, supplied with horse and foot, repasseth the Loire, and with twelue thousand fighting men, comes to encounter the King of Nauarre. The King of Nauarre had two riuers to passe, to come to Xaintonge, Drougne, and L'Isle.

The Duke of Ioyeuse, drunke with prosperity of a hasty aduancement, who of a priuate Gentleman was made a Duke, and of a Duke, brother in law to the French King, and charged (but not so much by the King, as by the League, whereof hee was a partisan, hauing married the Queenes sister) to giue battell at all euents, would cut off these passages, presuming that hee which passed first, should haue an advantage ouer his enemy.

The

A The King of Nauarre knew it well : yet, did he not lose any time in curling his haire.

The nineteenth of October, accompanied with the Prince of Conde, the Cont Saiffons his brother, the Vicont of Turenne, & other good Commanders, he takes his lodging at Coutras, to passe the riuier of Drougne at a ford. The Duke supposing to haue him at his deuotion betwix two riuers, giues the Rendez-uous to all his forces the next day, betwix Roche-Chalais and Coutras, and there made choise of his place of battell to his best advantage, halfe a league from Coutras. Being lodged there, the King of Nauarre commands the Duke of Tremouille to passe the riuier and to lodge at Chaudredon two little leagues from Coutras. He doth it, and then sends the Baron of Saint Surin one of his Captaines of light-horse with his company, to learne certaine newes of the enimie.

The Battle of Coutras.

Soone after, he brings him word that he marched directly to his quarter. About midnight, the Duke takes the field which hee had viewed at his going to lodge, whither hee was no sooner come, but Bellegarde Gouvernour of Xaintonge (who led the Duke of Ioyeuses fore-war) comes vpon him with sue of six hundred horse and 400 shot on horse-backe. He aduertised the King of Nauarre that the whole army aduanced, and by the aduice of Vinans Master of the campe to the said horsemen, hee retires slowly, turning still head towards the enemy, and skirmishing with them in many places. This hee did of purpose ; for by this stratagem he kept the enemy occupied vntill eight of the clocke in the morning, and gaue the K. of Nauarre meanes to passe the Riuier with his troopes and

C Cannon, and to make choise of his place of battaille. The King of Nauarre and his fouldiers had sweet more in skirmishes, then in Tennis-courts, and did take more pleasure in the dust of their enemies chafe, then in feasts. The inequality of the number doth not amaze them. He marcheth before : resolues his men to fight, makes them to fall on their knees and pray to God, puts his horsemen into four squadrons, his owne, that of the Prince, the Earles, and Viconts. The fouldiers inflame their courages by mutuall skirmishes, and reprochfull speeches : from words they goe to blowes. The King of Nauarres artillerie thunders first, at eight of the clock, and at the first volley sweepes away seuen Captaines of the regiment of Picardy. The Dukes answers him, but without effect. The ignorance or malice of canoniers hauing planted it so low, as it fell vpon a little hill betwix both armies. The Dukes horsemen led by Laurdin, Saint Luc and Captain Mercœur, discharge their first fury vpon the Duke of Tremouille as the first object of their armes, and being double in number, they passe through them at the first charge, and ouerthrow Vinans Master of the camp (who was fore hurt) with some others, like vnto a querellic which ouerturnes all that it encounters.

And whilst that the Duke of Tremouille (hauing rallied his men together) went and planted himselfe before the King of Nauarres troope, who marche to the combat, they encounter the Vicont of Turenne, who aduanced to second the light-horse-men. They kill his horse with their Lances, and put his troope in disorder. But hee is remounted before the enemy could doe him any more harme, being loth to quit his part of the cake for so light a checke.

The Duke presuming by this first good hap, to obtaine a totall victory ouer three chiefe heads of the House of Bourbon, aduanceth resolutely, flanked with two hedges of armed men to charge with the Lance. The four Commanders and the Colonell of the light-horse march euery one in the head of his troope, first easily they pace, then they trot, and after in their full carriere. They charge and breake them. This conflict (which consisted for the most part of leaguers) was almost as soone dissolued, as it was resolved on : it beganne at nine of the clocke, and at ten not any of the Dukes men had any offensive armes : some are ouerthrowne, some taken, and some seeke their safety in flight. The victors pursue them three leagues, and strew the fields with men, horses, and armes.

F Duke of Ioyeuse retired towards his footmen and artillery, his horse being hurt in the thigh with a shot, hauing not any one with him but Breze who caried the white Corner, wandering thus in the midst of the field where the battell was fought, a Gentleman followed him, with whom another ioynes : They take him and demand his name ; the which hee tels at the first summons. Five or six other men at armes arise as they were leading him to the King of Nauarre, and seeke to take this goodly prize from them. In this contestation one of them foreseeing, that if the prisoner were once in the Kings hands, hee should bee in safety, and they frustrate of their pretensions ; or (as some say) reproaching reproaching him with his breach of faith at Saint Eloy, and at Croix-Chappeau, against the company of Penibbes, he shoots him b. hind with a Pistoll through the head, whereof he fell dead to the ground, losing both life and meanes, to try with the rest with what moderation and clemency the King of Nauarre could vse his victories. It is a pittifull thing for great men to fall into the hands of petty companions, who neither can nor will respect their qualities.

H. is brother S. Sauveur, Brezé who carried the white corner, Roussy the younger brother of Pierres guidon to the Duke, the Earles of Suze, Gaurvel, d'Antoux, the Lords of Fumel, Neufui the elder brother of Perigord, yong Rochefort, Craieste, Gurat, S. Fori, guidon to Saint Luc, du Bordes his ensigne, de Vaux Lieutenant to Bellegarde, gouverneur of Xaintonge, Montignis Ensigne, Tiercelin master of the campe, Pluviant, La Brangery, Campels the younger, La Vallade, Bacullard, with many other Capitaines, and a great number of men of account and qualitie, with about halfe of the army, made the battell of Coutras famous by their death, as the most memorable of all that have beene giuen for religious cause in France. Many rich prisoners, and a very rich spoile. All his cornets taken, his Cannon carried away, and his baggage seized on. At their returne from the pursue, thanks were giuen to God vpon the place of battell died with blood, and conered with carcases. But that which honoured the King most: in the midst of this fo commendable moderation of this victory, hee shewed himselfe no lesse milde and courteous to the prisoners and the wounded, then wife and valiant in heate of the fight. Hee caused the dead to be buried, cured the wounded: sent home almost all the prisoners without ransom, gratified most of the Commanders, caused the Ensignes to be deliuered to Montigny aboute the rest, commended him to haue behaved himselfe valiantly in the battell: where-by he began to purchase fauour with the King of Nauarre, and afterwards got great reputation with him for his valour and fidelitie, when as hee vained both crownes into one.

The Prince of Conde, at the first charge had a blow with a Lance on the side, and being engaged vnder his horse, it did so preiudice his health, as the griefe thereof did soon hasten him to his end. This is the greatestt losse of the Protestants army in this comate, in the which there was a very small number slain, and not one of account. The K. of Nauarre is now freed from the snares that were laid for him: now he aduanceth towards the head of the riuier of Loire, and giues aduice of his designe to the army of strangers, which then was in Hurepois about the lands of the Lord of Chastillon.

The King camped vpon Loire betwixt Cosne and Neufui, and by aduice of the Duke of Neuers hee cloyes the passages with trees, stones and other hindrances where the horses should passe. The second cause (next to God) of the ruine of this armie, to whom they thought the King at this enuie would haue presented a blanke to prescribe what they pleased. The Duke of Guise followed them at the heeles, and the Duke of Mayenne on the one side: and yet both of them could not keepe them from surpriuing of some small towne to refresh their armie. But when as they see themselves frustrate of all hope to ioyne with the King of Nauarre, or to passe the riuier of Loire, that they must either retire, or march forward to meet with the King of Nauarre, or engage themselves farther within the Realme, to seeke bread for themselves, and forage for their horses, or else march on the left hand and wander into vnkowne countries, they grow amazed, they mutine, they faint.

Some Frenchmen attempt La Charité: but their enterprize succeeds not. In the end they lead the army in Beniffé, where they should find meat both for man and horse. The seuen and twen ieth of October they lodged at Vimorri, and places thereabouts, neere to Montargis. To take from them this lodging, the Dukes of Guise and Mayenne (taking advantage of the passages of the riuier of Loing) come at supper time with fifteene hundred horse, and nine thousand foot, and charge the Baron Donneau, being lodged in Vimorri with seuen or eight cornets of Reistres: but they had almost verified the saying of the King of the Epirots who vanquished the Romane army; We are vaine if we get such another victory, for three hundred horses of baggage, the Barons two Camels, and the death of fifty souldiers with an hundred seruaits, was not sufficient to recompence the blood of forty braue and gallant Gentlemen, and two hundred good souldiers slaine vpon the place by the Reistres, who speedily repaired to their cornets, whilst the

Dukes

A Dukes men were busie at the spoile. The Duke of Mayenne receiued two pistoll shot on his caske by the Baron, and in exchange, the duke gaue the Baron a wipe on the fore-head, with his Courtlas, but with small hurt.

The Duke of Guise hauing failed to surprize the Reistres lodging at Vimorri by the Lions force, he now employes the Foxes subtilty, and the malice of a treacherous man who heretofore had vowed fo great affection and fidelitie to the King of Nauarre; who iudging another by himselfe, and not able to imagine that so treacherous and detestable a thought should euer harbour in the heart of a French Gentleman, whose quality should be free from all treason: had sent instructions to the Duke of Bouillon General of this armie, touching the seruices which he expected from this Champenois. As the D. attended newes hourly, behold he comes to the armie, he addresseth himselfe to the Earle of Chastillon, intreats him to giue him access vnto the Duke of Bouillon, and presenting vnto him a piece of a crowne which had been broken for his credit, he grieues that vntill that time he had not meanes to produce any effects in fauour of the King of Nauarre, for whose seruice hee would alway be ready to employ both his wit and blood; that hauing now meanes vpon the frontier, for that the Duke of Guise would neuer suffer him, nor his company to abandon him; he had now good opportunity to deliuer the towne & castle of Montargis into his hands. If he thought it fit to aduance the cause, & the Duke of Guise hauing lodged him with his company in the Castle, and left two companies in the towne to fortifie the Inhabitants. If this (said hee) will not serue, I am not resolu'd to returne any more, but to retire my armes, my equipage, and some souldiers of my intelligence, and then come vnto this army and so vnto the King of Nauarre. The D. of Guise hauing not thought it fit that Pau should play his part vpon the frontier, and hauing failed in his enterprize against the Baron of Onay at Vimorri, heooke the way to Estampes in shew to defend the way to Paris. But hee had purposely plotted this stratagem of Montargis, foreseeing that this place lying conuenient for the Earle of Chastillon being neere vnto his house, he should be principally employed therein: And that as he had ruined the father at the Parisen Mattens, the 24 of August 1572, he would also make the sonne companion of the same fortune.

D The Duke of Bouillon, the Generall of the Germanes, the Earle of Chastillon, and the chiefe of the councill holding it not conuenient to neglect this encounter, they commit the execution to Chastillon. Hee returns Pau, and giues him Saint Laurent his Steward to goe into the towne and castle to discouer the truth. But the Traytor had giuen order the souldiers should lie close, if happily they should send any one to visit. Saint Laurent reports, that they saw no cause of suspition, beleeuing that Pau meant sincerely: and Pau for a gage of his fidelitie, promising to remaine in the hands of such as Chastillon should please, vntill the place were wholly at his deuotion, they thought he could not giue any greater assurance. But to constitute himselfe voluntarily an hostage and caution for a disloyal and treacherous designe, was it not wilfully to ruine both his life and honour vpon hope of an vncertaine recompence? Thus great men play with the liues of men, as with tennis balls, not caring how to hazard them, so as they will become instruments and ministers of their passions.

The D. of Guise had instructed him to make all these offers, and to submit himselfe to more if it were required, promising him that he would take so many prisoners and men of quality, as they should be glad to exchange him. Pau returns about two of the clocke after midnight with one confident souldier to bring in them that should be sent to seize vpon the Castle. Chastillon giues him in guard to some of his Capitaines, and commands Capitaine Tessier of Nisines to goe with 150 souldiers to enter the Castle, and to seize vpon the ports, as well of that which wastowards the fields, as of the other which entred into the towne. The souldier guides them, and at their first entry they finde many bottles of good wine, and meats fit to procure thirst. He leaves twenty Harguebuziers vpon the Draw-bridge, assures the Castle, and then he sends his Colonell word that hee may come safely. Capitaine Genill (a man suspicious and very distrustfull in such stratagems) had growne iealous of his conduct by a simple souldier: and being much practised in those policies of warre, the which we must beleue sparingly, hee entreates the Earle not to aduance before he had been within the Castle. I feare (said he) some double practice; at my returne I will tell you if it be safe. Hee goes thither alone, and calls for Capitaine Tessier, adding, adding, that the Earle of Chastillon approached. But at his entry he observes the ground A had bin newly remoured: he heaves the noise of armes in the Church & chambers of the castle, which were lockt vp, and some armed men which he saw going from a hall into a chamber increase his iacobus. But the impatience of a soldier, complaining that Chastillon stayed too long, confirmed his belief. He suddenly returns, & passing the bridge, he aduises Tessier to save himselfe with his men. Tessier had not leisure but with three, all the rest being spoiled by the deuices which they had prepared at the entry of the castle. And when as they heard Gentil cry vnto the Earle of Chastillon that he should returne, they presently shoot at him afare off, hauing left all hope to annoy him nearer. Pau seeing his practice not so successefull as he expected, is wonderfully danted. He thinks he is now at the pits brink which he had prepared for another. They lead him to the D. of Bouillon, who resolves to teare him in pieces with horses. The Baron of Onaw holds opinion, that it were better to leade him to the K. of Nauarre: and fearing lest the French either through compassion or corruption should yeeld vnto the prisoners perswasions, will himselfe haue the guard of him, and doth so clog him with chains, as euery member shrinkes vnder his burthen. Yet within few dayes after he freed himselfe and escaped, verifying, that men vnable to resist the force of wine, are vnfit to guard prisoners or towne.

This losse of horses and baggage, makes the Reistres to mutine againe, growing impatient, neither seeing their pay, nor the K. of Nauarre: for a bait, they force Chateau-landon, and spoile it. The Prince of Conti's arriuall nere vnto Chartres, (where the Duke of Bouillon resigned him the charge and the white cornet) pacified this mutinie. Then the Suisses treated with the King, by the D. of Nevers meane: his Maiestie hauing now conuincd them by their alliance with this Crowne, to serue him, or to retire themselves: some of the Captaines follow the Kings party, others receiving 400000 crownes returne to their country: but some of them at their arriuall lost their heads. By this defection, the army is halfe decreed: the toyles of the warr tyre them: the commodities proue at length insupportable: many of the troopes disband: they foresee an apparant danger, if they giue battell. They take Councell the 24 of Nouember, to turne head, and to draw this languishing army vp to the head of Loire. But the Duke of Guise had well obserued from the beginning, that striking the shepherd, he shall disperse the flocke. The Baron lodged at Anneau nere to Chartres, with seven Cornets of Reistres: but hee trusted too indiscreetly to a promise made by the garison of the said Castle, not to commit any act of hostility, and to furnish him with victuals for his money. The Duke manned it by night with good store of Harguebuziers: and at the first sound of the trumpet, to horse, he enters the towne with all his forces, euen as their Carts stopt vp the streets and gates in the morning. Being thus surprized, and hauing no meane to recover the fields, they are forced to returne into their lodgings, and to remaine at the Conquerors mercy, either slaine or taken. The spoile was great, 300 Wagons, great store of armes, jewels, and chains of gold. Two thousand horse of combat and of cariage. So as in one night, all the Dukes footmen were in a manner hoised, rich in spoils, and rich in prisoners. The Baron, with some few others, leaped ouer the walls and sued themselves, through the fauour of the night, and in a marish. He makes a stand halfe a league from Anneau, and rallies them together that escape. The Suisses that remained came vnto him: all determine to breake. The Prince of Conty, Duke of Bouillon, Chastillon, Clermont, and the rest, become answerable for what is due, so as they will march on. They might easily haue forced through the Duke of Guises army, but they were surprized with feare, a passion which doth easily vanquish the quicknesse of mans iudgement.

The army hath now but one wing to fly withall: it is a body without armes or legs: yet the hope of paine makes them continue their course vp against the river. But the disorder was great: feare accompanies them, many Gentlemen slip away dayly to their houses: and most of them which remained could not easily resolve to fight. They must make long marches to auoid the enemy: they had no guides, no Smiths for their horses, who were spoiled for want of shooes, no bread for the souldiers, no forrage for their horses, their troopes wasted, most of the in were without powder, without bullets, and without meane to recover any: the Lanqueters are reduced to 2000, and most vnarmed, and the Suisses haue changed party. The Reistres thinke of nothing but of their returne into Germany: the French slip away hourly. The Duke of Elperton coasts them with the Kings army,

A army, and wisheth they would accept of a capitulation, to disappoint the Duke of Guise of an absolute victory which he did expect. The D. of Guise pursues them, yet is it not fit for the Kings estate, he should wholly vanquish these maimed troopes: the seruant would then presently attempt against the master. Moreover, this army still holding the field, the Realme should be much impouerished: and ioyned with the King of Nauarre, they might effect great matters.

The King offers them a safe conduct to returne, vpon condition that the French should deliuer vp their colours: the Reistres trusse vp their Cornets, and that all swear, not to beare armes in France without the Kings expresse command. The 8 of December they B accept of this capitulation at Lency in Mafconois, and do disband. The Lord of Chastillon protests neuer to deliuer vp his Ensignes but to the K. of Nauarre. Hee vnderstands the Reistres threaten to cary him away as a pledge: but he frees himselfe from their mutiny like a gallant Gentleman: And being loth to trust this safe conduct, or to fall into the hand of the duke of Guise his capitall enemy, he resolves to passe through Auvergne with ten or twelve men well mounted, and marching by night only to recouer Geuandun, and from thence into Languedoc. Capitaine Gentil dissuades him, and makes him resolve to take the way of Viarez with the remainders of the shipwrack, assuring him to lodge him within few dayes by the Petard in the towne of Pont S. Rambert. Hee had onely remaining forty Cuirasses, thirty Harguebuziers on horsebacke, and 400 foot, with the which C he had come to the Reistres. Some Noblemen and Gentlemen desire to runne the same fortune. Many (being so sicke that he could scarce sit on horsebacke) Lierament, Rebours, Saint Auban, Ouinville, Legualda, Rouffelle, Fereng, Baudans and others. Gentil marcheth in the head of the footmen, and couereth them with some ranks of horse, and Chastillon is in the reere to make head against them that should pursue them. But as they thought to take Pont Saint Rambert, they were in danger to be taken themselves.

Mandelot, Gouernor of Lyonnois, had newly lodged 400 men there by the commandment of the D. of Guise, to cut off the bridges, and to fight with the Reistres which they thought would passe that way. Mandelot, Cheuieries, the Earle of Tournon, Pelloux (who commanded a great garison in Nonnay) and all that had any authority come to take from them all meane to passe but by force. There is nothing, before, behind, nor of either side, but opposite to his retreat, his sword makes his way: he passeth through all that he encountereth like lightning, and forceth his enemies to fight, or to fly, hee giueth occasion to the children of the countrey to call it The battell of turne-tayles. This passage failing them, Gentil takes his way vpon the left hand, and at midnight takes a great village between Lyons and Pont Percier. As they refresh themselves, the neighing of horses which they heare giue them notice that the enemy approaches. Mandelot followed them with six or seven hundred horse, and, without a thicke cloud which did then miraculously couer them, they had been exposed to his mercy. The cloud and the rough way vnefit for horses, kept the enemy from approaching any nearer, besides hee feared some ambush. They passe the bridge at Percier, and who so had charged them in a great plaine beyond the bridge, they themselves confesse, that the place, with watchings, and the toyles of the way, had made them altogether vnable to resist.

The cloud vanishest at the breake of day, and Mandelot scouts seeing them advanced in the Plaine, they gallop after to ingage them in the fight. Chastillon would haue charged them, but Gentil discouers the whole troope, who had come time enough if they had fallen to blowes. They passe the Plaine, and plant their footmen by a riuers side, where through the fauour of some Willows, they might second their horsemen being in fight. His first enemies appeare: Chastillon chargeth them so resolutely, as there remained about thirty vpon the place: The whole troope arries and repulseth him so furiously, as hee is F put to rout, and loseth some of his men at armes, who were caried prisoners to Lyons. Gentil, Ouinville, Legualda, Rouffelle, Fereng, Baudans, and some other horsemen second the footmen, whom the enemy preest, causing them to march on, and to turne head at euery freight and commodious place they came vnto. Night being come, Mandelot, who had followed them thirty houres together, went to refresh himselfe, giuing leisure to this tyred troope to lament and bewaile the mischance of their Commander, whom they supposed to be vtterly lost.

approaching neare vnto the mountaines of high Viarez, the Lord of Chastillon, S. Antoine, Lieutenant of his Company of lighthorse, Capitaine Escallier Lieutenant of the Colonels Company of his Regiment, Capitaine Gache and some others, comming to ioyne with them, to saue these poore men from a generall ruine, and by their presence reuiue the vigour of these footmen to endure with their accustomed courage three assaults from diuers garisons to the shame of them that charged them, before they could reueyler Rountour in high Viarez. Manduel went to Court, to giue an account of his diligence, but he receiued reproach both of the King and the Duke of Guise: for that hee had not charged Chastillon in that great village, or past the bridge at Percier before him, to haue defeated him in the Plaine. The which did alio bring him in disgrace with them of Lions who neuer after loved him. The strangers thought to refresh themelues at Geneua, but the most part were not able to get thither: and many of the Commanders, either with languishing and griefe, or as the common saying was, with the sweet Wines they drunke with the Duke of Espernon, gaue vp the ghost. The D. of Bouillon dyed the 11 of Ianuarie, in the five and twentieth year of his age, leaving Charlotte his sister for his heire, married since to the Vicount of Turenne, now Dof Bouillon, and Marshall of France.

Another troope of Reistres marched towards the French Conit: the Marquis of Pont, eldest sonne to the Duke of Lorraine, and the Duke of Guise, pursuing them (against the publike faith) vnto the mountaines of Saint Claude, enter the citricities of Montbelliard and Hericourt, where by a lamentable ruerge vpon a poore innocent people, by the burning of 200 Villages, by the forcing of many wiues and maids, and by the murder of a great number of all ages, all sexes, and all qualities, they leaue the marks of the inhumanity, and the brutish fury of the League, and carie the spoiles of their triumph into Lorraine.

All the chiefe of the League assemble at Nancy, where they resolute to make the last trial of their ambition. The season inuities them, mens humors are well affected. The Catholike consciences, freed from the fury of strangers, confesse themselues wonderfully bound to the Duke of Guise: the people extoll the victory of Anneau, and the dispersing of this great armie: the Nobilitie of the league looks bigger, the Clergy reioyceth, the Preachers tongues are firebrands of sedition, they speake in derision of the King in their Pulpits, (before time the Pulpits of truth are now become the Chaires of Iuglers:) they make the King a Saul, and the Duke of Guise a Dauid; Saul slew his thousand, but Dauid his ten thousand.

They publish generally in their Sermons, that the King had leauied the Reistres, to oppose them against the Dukes holy enterprises, and to expose Paris as a prey: burby the Dukes valour and constancy, religion had now triumphed ouer heresie. The Pope sends vnto the Duke a Sword grauen with flames. The King of Spain, and the D. of Sauoy, conceiue great hopes. The D. of Parma salutes him, and amongst all the Princes of Europe (saith he) Henry of Lorraine alone deserves to command in warre. They make bone-fires in all places, and sing the wondrous woikes of the Duke of Guise, to the Kings disgrace. The people of Paris especially (possessed with the praises of the House of Guise, and the disorders of the King, the dissolucence, lecherie and hypocricie of the Court, vnder a shew of penance) leane to the party which they hold almost certaine: they disdain the present estate, apprehend what is to come, and thinke to lose nothing by the change.

Henry of Lorraine discourages all this, and thinke to make his profit of so goodly an opportunity. He knowes moreover, that Iambert and Atiron haue giuen their opinion of the Kings disability to haue children. Hee makes himselfe more pleasing to the people, who feare the succession of a Huguenot Prince: hee entertaines them with great familiaritie, but with an humour aspiring vnto tyrannie. Hee sees the maiestie of his Soueraigne disgraced, his enemies retired to Rochel. England ready to be inuaded by a proud army from Spain: he giues eare to the counsell of the Arch-leaguers, increased to the number of sixteene, by reason of the sixteene quarters of Paris. Hee is crafty, aduised, foreseeing, generous and valiant: but variable, corrupt, a dissembler, secret and patient. Hee will by no means vse his owne name in any thing, yet will hee effect that by another which hee attempts or takes in hand. Hee aduertiseth the Cardinall of Bourbon (who goes but as hee is led) that this goodly opportunitye must not be lost. But the secrets of his heart were contrary to his outward shewes.

A This assembly at Nancy tended onely to force the King to make his Will, and to allow the regency vnto them: It was therefore concluded: That the King should be urged to ioyne his forces effectually with the League. To displace such from their Offices as should bee named. To bring in the Inquisition of Spain, and to publish the Council of Trent, but with a moderation of such things as derogate from the priuiledges of the French Church. To consent to the restitution of the goods sold by the Clergie for the Charges of the warre. To giue the townes to be manned and fortified as the time and necessitie required. To forsake the Huguenots bodies and goods, and to entertaine an armie vpon the frontiers of Lorraine, against the Germanes, who threatened reuenge for the insolencies committed in the Conuention of Montbelliard.

But to subiect the Kings authoritie to the designs and practices of the League, what was it, but by this means to aspire to the Crowne? To haue him ruine them hee loved, and that were allied vnto him in blood: what was it, but to make a bush of a Forest, and a desert of a goodly Kingdom? And this word of Inquisition, is it not hatefull vnto all men? It was necessary for the Spaniards, who had no better means to plant and maintaine Christianity. But the tediousnesse and manner of their proceeding is horrible, the malice and calumination of their spies and informers abominable; their prisons vnder ground fearful: their racks and tortures intolerable, the yellow gowne without sleeves painted all ouer with Diuels, the Mytre, and Corde: and for the last act of this pitifull Tragedy, the fire had made it detestable to the Flemings, and execrable to the French. As for the reception of the Council of Trent, the soueraigne Courts of this Realme haue neuer so aduised our Kings, for the prejudice they should doe vnto the Crowne, and the priuiledges of the French Church. To require redemption of the Clergie goods, and to haue the King force them that were benedicted to redeeme them, was it not to haue him make warre for the Church, and the Clergy should giue the alarme, and shadow themselues vnder the temporality, whilest that the Nobility should goe to fight, and the people languish? The League had obtained some townes of assurance, and the Parliaments laboured to put downe the Huguenots. To conclude, the King had not refused the chiefe of the League any demand that he might lawfully grant, and had yielded them many things which hee D might by this authority refuse.

Besides the motions of the Kings apprehensions, the first beginning of his misery is, that almost all his Councillors of State are corrupted, they conceal the truth, they fit themselues to his humors, they are fearfull, weak, and inconstant. Without doubt that Prince is miserable (saide an Emperor) from whom they conceal the truth. They persuade him, the D. of Guise party is strong, that the Townes and Prouinces looke onely after him: if he enters not into it, he must be subiect both to League and Huguenot. Yet hee means to be master ouer both, but he takes not the safest course. He becomes the head of the Guisards party, and talking of nothing but of the voyage of Poitou, thinke to winne the peoples loue, and to stop the murmuring of the League.

E The Prince of Condes death made the enterprise easie. A great debility of the stomacke, a difficulty of breathing, a great collicuense, a continuall vomiting, with an alteration and extreme paine, surprised him the third of May, halfe an houre after supper, and the second day of his sicknesse, a suffocation of all his vital spirits, sent him from the bed vnto the graue. He was a Prince indued with all the qualities fit for a great Capitaine, vnder whose magnanimity the Protestants conceiued great hopes. The body was opened, and the iudgement of Physicians was diuers. The botome of his belly was pale & burnt: his bowels ouerflowed with a reddish water: the stomacke about the orifice pierced through with a round hole, and the vitall parts being viceried, made some suspect poison, others held that it was the remainder of the potion hee swallowed in the yeare 1552, which making an impression in the bowels, had by little and little weakened the stomack, of the paine whereof, as also of his side, by reason of the blow hee receiued at the battell of Contres with a Lance, he had complained many weekes before his death. The Colledge at Montpellier did subscribe to this last opinion.

In the meantime the King doth not greatly affect this enterprife against the Huguenots: he desires to diuert the warre which the League would make immortal. But the Commander vnder whom hee assembles his forces, makes him fall from a feuer to a frigiditie. They had long before made the Duke of Espernon aduancement odious to the people.

The

The Kings
Council corrupted.Death of the Prince of Conde.

The League made him the only Author of all disorder: but the succession of the office of Admirall, and the government of Normandie, wherein the King had installed him since the death of the Duke of Joyeuz, and their disdaine for that hee had crossed the Duke of Aumale in his enterprises vpon Boulogne, and other places in Picardy, shall some discover the violence of an ambitious spirit, who thinks that the very heauens should giue him place.

The Duke of Guise finds, that the warre which hee made against the Princeesse of Sedan, by Roshe his Lieutenant, did but blemish his new trophies. Shee had already chased him from Douzy: she had by the Lord of Neuil slaine fiftene score of the most resolute of his troopes, almost as many hurt and drowned in flying, and 2000 prisoners to Sedan. B. The consideration of an innocent pupill, makes this warre execrable; and makes them odious that attempt to take from another without any iust cause. The Parisiens faint, if he come not to confirme them. They call him: and he leauing Sedan and Iametz, thinks it is now high time that the King either yeeld or breake, and that now they must shew the effect of the conclusion of Nancy.

Hee comes to Soissons. The King is very ialous of his approach: and knowing the Parisiens humour and deuotion to the Duke, he sends him word by the Lord of Belleure (a man of great and found iudgement, who for his great employments, both within and without the Realme, was then one of the chiefe of the Kings Councell, and lately the most worthy Chancelor of France) that hee should doe him a pleasure, not to come to Paris in a time so full of troubles and factions. If hee come against his will, hee will lay vpon him the cause of all the miseries, which his presence shall breed. But to lose all, there is but one hazard: Pompey thinks, that striking the ground with his foot he shall raise vp an hundred Legions. He comes to Paris at noone the ninth of May, followed onely with eight Gentlemen, not to amaze the King. He lights at the Queene-mothers lodging, and goes with her to doe his dutie vnto the King. The people follow him by troopes with great ioy: euery one blesteth his coming, euery one makes new wishes. The Parisiens had long forgotten that ancient and chearefull salutation of, God saue the King. When they see him passe, they change it into God saue the Guise, God saue the pillar of the Church. A doting Gentlewoman sitting vpon a stall, puls downe her maske. D. Good Prince (saith shee) seeing thou art come, wee are all saued. Hee makes his reuerence vnto the King, but not so assured as hee was accustomed: he layes open the causes of his coming, and iustifies his actions as well as hee could. Then seeing the King ready to dine, hee retires to his lodging, and not one Courtier accompanied him as before.

At dinner he growes more resolute. They meet both after dinner at the Queene-mothers lodging. The King full of ialousie and feare: The Duke with a braue and resolute countenance. The people attend the issue of this conference. The next day the Archbishop of Lyons (the chiefe pillar of the League) arises: the Dukes friends and seruants enter: the sixtene Tribunes of the Rebels and Conspirators bring and cary away sundry intelligences. To conclude, all now prepare to execute that whereof they failed the last yeare. A E. notable error of State: for destroying the principall, the necessary perill of himselfe. The King had sufficient forces to suppress these first insolencies. He had the names & surnames of his enemies: most of them were danted with feare, with these long palces and goings from one to another: others did hide themselves: and some dreamed of nothing but of flight. The multitude is apt for tumults. A chearefull and resolute countenance of the King might easily haue dispersed this tempest. But in stead of confirming him, they make him more irresolute: they talke of nothing to him, but of the Dukes practices with the Parisiens, and that by his long delay he will be prevented. He means to anticipate the hour, and drinks it sufficient to terrifie them: for the effecting whereof, he commands the Marshall of Biron, to draw his guards of Suisses and French out of the Suburbs into the Citie, and lodgeth them in diuers quarters, to feare the people, if they stirre. Le Gass with his company, held the little bridge neare to our Ladies Church. Grillon, Saint Michaels bridge: the Marshall d'Amont mans our Ladies bridge with Harguebuziers: the Suisses are diuided into diuers places, before the Towne-house, in the new market-place, and at Saint Innocents Church. But either through want of iudgement, or for want of men, they had forgotten the place Maubert. The people grow amazed: the chiefe of League terrifie them with the apprehension of a spoile: they shut vp their shoppes.

Their

A. Their trafficke, tooles, pens and paper, are conuerted into Halberts, Pertuisans, Harguebuzes and Swords. The schollers come from the Vniuersitie, and ioyning with some multitudes of the people, they seize vpon place Maubert: the neighbours arme, all the City is in combustion: some cry out for Barricado's, there is nothing but stopping of the wayes: they flanke them, and man them, they make them from thirty paces to thirtie, euen to the Centinels of the Loure, they draw the chaines: no man passeth without the word, or a Passcport from the Colonels or quarter Masters. The Earle of Brissac, Bois Dauphin, Chamois, and other heads of the League, charge the Suisses, and kill some: the rest being terrified with this vnexpected fury of the people, without Commanders, without conduct, and without assurance of the Kings intention, choose rather to yeeld their pikes, than to charge them in this violent occasion. Without doubt a more manly courage and constant resolution had forced the Parisiens to fortifie themselves in the bottome of their Cellars. Cities begin a mutine boldly, but they execute it faintly, if they see any resistance, vsing still more words then deeds. The consideration of wife, children, and shop, doe easily quail their first heat. S. Paul, (a simple Gentleman, but a chiefe man in this party) causeth the Kings Guards, to retire with their hats in their hands, and their armes downe. They cry out generally against the Tyrant, against the Huguenot, against the Politicks. It fares with them in a manner as it did in former times with the English and Bourguignons.

C. The Queene-Mother had alwayes made her profit of the variety of Factions: shee is now deceined, the D. of Guise will not employ her in that he hath designed: she takes her Coach, and comes amazed to intreat the Duke to pacifie this tumult. Belleure follows to the same end. But the Duke answered, These are wild bales broke loose, whom I cannot stay. So great a designe was not attempted to faint in the midst thereof. It was no longer time now to dissemble: the maske vncouered, and the fard founded, they must goe on, and seize vpon his person, without whose ruine their victory would be imperfect, for the effecting whereof ten or twelue thousand men were ready to enter by night at the new gate, to beset the Loure, and to shut vp all the passages. Foure Gentlemen, familiar with the Duke, aduertise the King hereof: yet can he hardly beleue it, but that the people will always willingly yeeld to the Kings clemency. Yet his Councell desired to be out of Paris. They lay before his Maiesty the generall reuolt, in the which Philip the faire was forced to saue himselfe among the Templers: the party-coloured hood of red & sky colour, wherewith Charles Duke of Normandy, and afterwards King of France, the first of that name, and surnamed the wife, was hooded, to saue himselfe from the peoples insolvency, during the Captiuitie of King Iohn his father in England: the reuolt of the Malitours: the mutine of the Caboches: the crosses of Saint Andrew: the deposition of Salcedo: the aduertisements of the King of Nauarre, and the conspiracies of the last yeare, which now hath broken the bankes, and ouerflowed all.

His feare increaseth, yet hee settles his countenance. It is reason (saith hee) to provide for these disorders, to assemble the Councell, and to giue all men contentment. And the better to disguise his intent, he sends backe the Queene-Mother vnto the Duke, to perswade him to come vnto the Loure, and to assure him, that hee shall returne with such satisfaction as hee can desire. Shee intreats him in this vrgent necessity, to make knowne vnto the King, that hee hath more will to preferre, then to ruine his Crowne, & to settle the Estate which this mutiny hath wonderfully shaken. To intreat an enemy, is to shew that hee feares him. The D. seems cold: he layes the motives of these tumults vpon the people, to whose assistance hee is drawne, more by the violence of necessity, then by his own desire. It were a great indiscretion (saith he) for mee, to cast my selfe naked into a suspected place, at the mercy of my enemies. The King vnderstanding by his Mother, the Dukes obstinacie in his designe, resolues for the safety of his person. F. He goes from the Loure with a small traine, with a shew to walke in the Tuilleries, and from thence hee goes to lodge at Trapes. I giue thee my curse (saith he, turning at Chalot towards Paris) disloyall and ingratefull Citie: a Citie which I haue alwayes honoured with my continuall aboad: a Citie which I haue more enriched then any of my Predecessors. I will neuer enter within the compasse of thy walls, but by the ruine of a great and memorable breach. Cursed likewise be you all, for whose content I haue purchased the hatred of so many.

O Duke ! thou hast drawne thy sword against thy Soueraigne : but God hath stayed thine arme from striking. It is a folly onely to terrifie him, who may finde meanes of reuenge. Many of his Faction blame him to haue erred in the mayne point, wherein consisted the perfection of his victory, by this attempt hee hath blemished his reputation with all Princes. All Kings are Brethren, one Royall blood summons another, they haue an interest in this cause, they affect troublers of anothers Estate, but they cannot endure them in their owne. Hee therefore thought it good to send the Earle of Brisac vnto Sir Edward Stafford being then Ambassadour for England, to informe him of the subiect of the Barricadoes, who came accompanied with certaine Gentlemen to visit the Ambassadour in his Lodging, to offer him (amidst these popular insulencies) a saueguard, intreating him not to be amazed, nor to retire himselfe, vpon the assurance and protection of the Duke of Guise. The Ambassadour answered, that if hee had beene a priuate person in Paris, hee would haue cast himselfe at the Duke of Guises feet, to thanke him most humbly for his courteous and kinde offer, but being neere vnto the King for the seruice of the Queene his Mistris (who had a League of amity and friendship with the King) he neither could nor would receiue any saueguard but from the King.

The Earle of Brisac told him, that the Duke of Guise was not come to Paris to attempt any thing against the King or his seruice : that hee was onely forced to defend himselfe, that there was a great conspiracy against him and the City of Paris: that the Town-houfe and other places were full of gibbets, whereon the King had resolved to cause many of the city and others to be hanged. Wherefore the D. of Guise intreated him to aduertise the Queene his Mistris of all these things, to the end the whole world might be informed. The Ambassadour answered that hee would easily beleue that hee had spoken this vnto him. That great and bold enterprises remaine many times incommunicable in the bosomes of the undertakers, who (when they please) discover them with what colour they thinke fittest for themselves. But hee would tell him freely, that what had past at Paris would be found strange, & of dangerous consequence by all the Princes of Christendom, who haue interest therein. That no cloake, how goodly soeuer, could make it allowable, being the duty of the subiect to continue constant in his due obedience to his Soueraigne. That if there were gibbets prepared, men would easily beleue it, if the Duke of Guise will shew them: and admit it were so, it were an odious and intolerable thing for a subiect to seeke to hinder by force the iustice which his Soueraigne would doe by armes. That hee promised him willingly that he would aduertise the Queene his Mistris of all that hee had said vnto him. But to be an interpreter of the D. of Guise his conceptions, and of his parties, it did not belong vnto his charge, the Queene his Mistris being wiser then hee, to beleue what he pleased. Then the Earle asked him if he had any armes: to whom the Ambassadour answered, if you question with me as one that hath been sometimes a friend and familiar with Monseigneur de Cossé your Vncle, it may be I would tell you; but being as I am you must pardon me. Your house will be presently searched, said hee, for they thinke you are armed, and it is to be feared ye will be forced. I haue two doores in my lodging replied the Ambassadour, the which I will cause to be shut and defend them as long as I may, to the end the world may know how vnjustly the Law of Armes is violated in my person. After which the Earle of Brisac said, I pray you tell me as a friend, haue you any armes? to whom the Ambassadour answered, seeing you aske me as a friend, I will tell you: if I were a priuate person here I would be armed; but being an Ambassadour, I haue not any but the publique faith. I pray you bid the Earle of Brisac, cause your gates to be shut. I will not doe it said the Ambassadour, an Ambassadors house must be open to all commers, and goers: moreover, I am not in France to remaine still at Paris, but neere vnto the King where soeuer he is. This discourse passed betwixt the Earle and the Ambassadour of England, which I haue thought good to insert at large.

Without doubt the prouidence of God had prepared a strange Catastrophe for the Duke, for the King, and for his Realme: who at this time, by his singular loue to this Crowne, did diuert the successe which they expected of this shamefull and reproachfull mutiny. O Paris! King Charles the 8 had in former times made the twelfth day of May famous, by the absolute conquest of the Realme of Naples: and now thou desicst to haue this twelfth day noted with red letters, and hereafter to be celebrated, for that in the

A same day thou hast presented vpon the Theater of thy rebellions, a King dispossessed of the capitall City of his Realme. Nay rather, what coale can sufficiently note to our posteritie this mournfull and vnfortunate day? What law of forgetfulness, may wipe out the remembrance of thy shame, ingratitude and treachery? what lotion can wash away the spots of thy pollution, filthinesse, and villanies? what fire shall euer consume the memory of the rebellions, tyrannies, and seditions, of this fatal and abominable League? O Barricadoes, you are the spring of those floods, which shall for a time drowne this Estate: and the instrument wherewith that inscrutable wisdom would chastise, both the King and the Realme.

B Fatal and cursed day of the Barricadoes, the birth day of our miseries, and the funeral day of our happinesse, which hath broken the bounds to those streames of blood which haue drowned our fields, which hath made liberty captiue; truth criminall; rapine iust; and tyranny and inuasion lawfull: which hath puld a crowne from a Kings head, and the Lawes out of the heart of the Realme: which hath armed a President to mutine the people of his quarter: which hath made cowards courageous to set vpon the Kings guard: which hath made the most wicked insolent, and caused them of the League to triumph through the streets of Paris, as a perfect image of all villany: which hath made the sixtene Tribunes to publish that wretched rebellion, and to qualifie it with the title of a iust defence against the King; aduertising all the townes of their confederacy, that God had preferred that holy and religious City from a great massacre, and from a fearfull sack; that the Duke of Guise had prevented the counsell of the politics, and especially of the D. of Epiponon, who had fo posselt the Kings heart, as he had caused him to resolute to ruine the chiefe and most Catholike families of Paris, to suppress their liberties, and to deprive them of their religion, thinking there was no better meanes to force obedience in a people, then to keepe them vnder, and to deprive them of their wealth, the which made them insolent, mutinous and rebellious.

The Duke of Guise at the beginning of this bold and insolent attempt, writes presently to his most trusty friends, to repaire speedily vnto him with armes and horses: but no baggage. I haue overthrowne the Sniffes (said he) to Entragues Gouverneur d'Orleans a cut in pieces some part of the Kings guards, and hold the Loures so straitly beset, as I will give a good account of what is within it. This victory is so great, as it will be remembered for euer. But oh Duke! is it presumption that bandies thee against the rules of reason, or weakness which abates thy courage and resolution; in suffering him to scape, who within few moneths shall heape this thy victory vpon thy head, and by thy vter confusion shall make it memorable for euer? Both the one and the other brings a sudden repentance vnto man, and makes him wise too late. Thou seemest, oh Duke! to touch the heauens with thy forehead, and hell with thy foot: but learne, that our Histories are full of the violent deaths of those proud spirits, who seeke their glory and profit with the ruine of their Country, the pretiudice of States, and the subuersion of common peace. That great God which reuengeth the iniuries of Kings and people, layes publike ruines vpon them that doe them. The slaughter at Vassy kindled the fire of the civill warres. So thy father dyed, soone after the new troubles which followed. Euen so, the like storme threatens thy ruine in the midst of thy violent passions.

Entragues had assembled the Nobility of the League at Baugency: but the 14 of the moneth, he writes vnto them: Our great, could not execute his designe, the King having caused himselfe within Chartres: I wish you to retire to your houses, as quietly as you may, making no shew to haue scene any thing. And in the end: I am so amazed, as I know not what to doe. I beleue him. Kings haue long hands, they catch afaire off, and their blowes are dangerous. So hereafter the King shall free himselfe from the Leaguers party, but hee shall be little the better. The Duke is no lesse troubled in minde, seeing the Sunne of the Royall Maiestie eclipsed: hee seemes grieved, rebukes the people, causeth outrages to cease, deliueres the French companies their armes, and puts them out of the Citie; but Saint Anthony gave, quite contrarie to the way which their Master tooke. In such minities, no mind, (be it neuer so resolute) continues still constant in one Estate. The D. of Guise sees now, that the greatest of the Clergy approue not these new insolencies: their callings haue more grace vnder the beauty of a King, then in the confusion of a Democracy. The French Nobility (at the least of ten parts, nine) cannot see themselves to the humours of the Princes of the league; their proper and essential forme is to oppose themselves against the subversion of this Estate. The Gentlemen hold their honours, dignities, charges, fees, and jurisdictions by homage of the King: and therefore, that a royalty cannot be suppressed, but the Nobility must likewise perish: there is like reason (but without proportion) of the obedience, and fee due vnto a King, as of a rent due vnto the Lord of a Mannor, he that hath withdrawne himselfe from the first, will likewise free himselfe from the last. Hee sees that the learned and men of honour abhorre this disgrace, lately done vnto the King. The Court of Parliament resolves to abandon Paris. All France is offended with the Kings departure: and without the Kings person, the Tragedy of Chilperic cannot well be acted, nor the instructions of the Aduocate David perfectly effected. It is therefore better to play the dutifull seruant, and making vnto the King some shew of respect, seruice and obedience, to labour to returne into Grace, and at the first opportunity to effect their purpose.

So the D. of Guise, not able to support himselfe in these high attempts, falls flat down. He protests of his innocency to the King, and of his endeavours to checke the peoples furie: he offers to prostrate himselfe at the Kings feet, to iustifie his honour, the which hee sayes is strangely wounded by his enemies, that are about his Maiestie. But on the other side, the glosse doth ill agree with the text: he chooseth a Prouoft of Merchants, and Sherifffes at his deuotion, receiues the Arcenall, the Bastille, and other places of strength: deposeh many quarter-masters and Captaines, takes an oath from such as hee instals: seizeth vpon the Kings treasure, as he had done at Chaalons, Reimes, Soissons: and through all the townes of his obedience. And if this mischief continues (said hee) I protest to preferre both the Religion and the Catholikes.

The Queene
Mother im-ployed for a peace.

Then by the other Letters written to Bassompierre a Lorraine. The King leauies forces and so doe we. He is at Chartres, and we at Paris. Espernon is chased out of Normandy: the Kings seruants are imprisoned in many great townes: the lesser send to submit themselves to Paris and vs. Whilst the Duke prepares a false for the force which he had made, and the Parisiens perswade their associates, to maintaine themselves ioyntly against the King of Navarre, with whom (they said) the King had made himselfe a partisan, to the preiudice of Religion, and the Catholike Church, his Maiestie exhorts his Lieutenants and Gouernours of his Prouinces, to retaine the Nobilitie, and people, within those limits of duty and respect, which tye them to their Soueraigne; and the chiefe cities, not to frame their affections after the modell of Paris. But he speaks no more like a King: his style is the style of a man that flies, that feares, that intreats. And to repaire this disorder, hee employes the Queene-mother. But how could this turbulent spirit cure the infirmities of the Estate, being irreconcilable in her hatred to the Princes of the blood, and transported in her affection to the children of her daughter, the Duchesse of Lorraine? Shee aduiceth the King, to passe ouer quietly the infolencies of the league: but there is no likelihood, shee should more regard the profit of her sonne, then the aduancement of the Marquis of Pont her grand-child. She brings to this new common-weale (for the Royalty seemed now to be changed into a Democracy) complaints, and teares against the brauiings and force of a courageous Prince, and a furious multitude. And promising effects of greater zeale to Religion, more respect in the distribution of offices, and more moderation in the exaction of Subsidies, shee presumed to give contentment to those who made shew to employ themselves for a generall reformation, and to reduce the most violent to their obedience.

Seven demands of the League.

But this seruice but to breed a second treaty like to that of Nemours. Paris without the King, is a body without forme: the most iudicious finde it, and lament his departure. The late orders of religious men haue great credit with him. They send the Capuchins in procession vnto Chartres, to mitigate the heat of his choler, & then the chiefe of the city went to excuse the motives which had forced the people to defend themselves, and to beseech him to returne to Paris, where he should be receiued with as great ioy, as his subiects were grieved, to vnderstand of his departure: that hee should finde better seruants, then those which had counselled him to ruine, and then to leaue them: and that it would please his Maiestie to grant them seven principal points of their petition: the extirpation of heresie, by the forces of his Maiesty, and the holy vniou: the banishment of the D. of Espernon, and of his brother la Valette: Warre in Guicenne, by the King in person, and by the duke of

A of Mayenne in Daulphine: Abolition of the tumults of Paris: Confirmation of officers chosen for the managing of ciuill causes since the Barriadoes: A restoring of the goodly and ancient ordinances of the Realme: And an abolition of parties, gifts and abults brought in by Espernon, and la Valette.

The Queene-mother presents these Deputies, and the King vrged by the League to grant their request, lets the Cardinall of Bourbon, and the other Princes vnderstand: that the peace and warre, the battels wherein he hath so willing exposed his person, and the last ouerthrow of the Protestant Reistres, haue alwayes bene sufficient testimonies of his zeale to the maintenance of the onely Catholike religion within his Realme: to the extirpation of heresie, and false doctrine: but ielousies and distrust had prevented him from reaping the fruits of the aduantage which he had ouer the said heretikes. That for a present reformation of affaires, and to prevent the feare the Catholikes had to fall vnder the command of Heretikes, he would call an assembly of the three Estates of France: and resolves presently to reuoke many impositions which oppresse the people. As for the private complaints against the D. of Espernon, and his brother: I will (saith he) waite make it knowne in all occasions, that I am a iust Prince, and will preferre the common profit of my Realme, before any other consideration.

The D. of E.
Guicennes indication.

But the two brethren, Espernon, and la Valette, say: to what end should they make an enterprise at Paris, to take the Duke of Espernon, who was then in Normandy? and why made they Barriadoes, euen to the gates of the Louure, armed the people, and seized vpon all the chiefe places of the citie, to chase la Valette from Valence, and other parts of Daulphine where hee remained? and if the confusions of former ages haue kept other Kings from acknowledging our fathers seruices; and hee hath rewarded his meritis in his children; what be those ielous and malicious heads, that enuy our fauours with his Maiestie? what censure? what rigour? what law may keepe a King of France, from aduancing to authority some fauorites, who reuiue in them the vertues of their ancestors? Moreover, the League makes mention, in what places our fauour hath been employed: the treaties of the D. of Espernon in Guicenne: his being acquainted with Cleruants negotiation for the Huguenots of Metz: the enterprises he hath made vpon Cambray: his late fauour to the D. Reistres in their returne: his secret conference with Chastillon, the consultations of that tumult, which hath lately hapned in Paris: the taking of Valence, Tallard, Guildestre, and other places, from the Catholikes of Daulphine, and his practices to stay the yeelding of Aussone. But we say, would to God we had in the like sort taken, Chaalons, Dion, Montreuil, Cambray, and al that are subiect vnto his Maiesty within the heart of France. They terme vs fauorers of Heretiks: And yet we haue in six moneths taken from them by the sword, all their conquests in Prouence (the King, since the death of Henry the bastard, and Grand Prior of France, had giuen this government to the D. of Espernon) which former Gouernours could not doe in twenty yeares. The taking of Sorgues in Daulphine by vs two, during the frozen time of winter: and the ouerthrow of the Huguenots Suisses, by E la Valette: but especially the last diuision of the Suisses from the Reistres, which made the way for the D. of Guise, to defeat them at Auneau, and the discontent, wherein the Duke of Espernon left the K. of Navarre at his departure out of Guicenne: are not these sufficient testimonies, that their accusations are as frivolous and malicious, as the sale of offices wherewith folke charge them? for iustificatiou whereof the Duke of Espernon offers to present his head at his Maiesties feet, if it be proued that he had euer any such thought in his soule. Contrariwise, who hath during the reignes of Henry the second, and Francis the second, managed the treasure without controll but the House of Guise? whereof the latter follow the steps of their Predecessors? Who haue forced the King to exact vpon his subiects but the warre which they haue kindled and drawne his Maiesty into? what should doe euer from so small a beginning grow to so fearfull a greatness? To conclude: no man shall blame vs for being Pensioners to the King of Spaine, to haue hindered our King from the recovery of the Seigneries of the Low Countries, nor to haue stolne away the reuenues of his generall receipts. We will no wayes hinder this goodly reformation: we are not in Court, nor in the Kings presence.

Let vs see the first fruits of this so commendable a government. Haue you left Paris? haue you yeilded it to the King your Lord, and natural Prince? Nothing lesse: you haue reuolted Corbeil, Melun, and Pontoise: you haue (with false perswasions) withdrawne the

the best Cities of the Realme. But we will (in protesting to bee ready to deliuer into his Maiesties hands, with our liues and honour: all the offices, charges, governments and places which it hath pleased him to commit vnto vs) inuite our accusers to doe the like. And if they will pretend inequality of persons: let them vnderstand, that whatsoever either party holds, it appertaines vnto the King, neither can they keepe it, but at his pleasure. Thus the two brethren iustified themselves, whilst the Court of Parliament makes knowne vnto the King by their Deputies, their griefe for this insolvency, which had forced him to abandon Paris. They appeale vnto his clemency and bounty. They present for an humble excuse of his officers, the weaknesse and feare which had forced them to yeeld to so violent a reuolt: beseeching him to returne into his Citie, and to giue rest and content to his Maiesty, order to his affaires, grace to their purple robes, and authority to their offices: and by his presence, to disperse the mutinies which diuisions had bred.

For answer, I doubt not (said the King) but you would willingly haue reformed this disorder, if it had been in your power: neither of your persisting in the same affection and fidelity which you haue testified to my forefathers. I am not the first that hath bintouch with such afflictions; neither will I leaue to be a good father to such as shall be good children. I will alwayes intreat the Parisiens with the quality of a father, as children that haue strayed from their duty, not as seruants to haue conspired against their master. Continue in your offices, and receiue from the Queene my Mother the commandements and intentions of my will.

This answer was soft and cold: but after dinner, hee addes a sharper conclusion, and calling backe the Deputies, I know (saith hee) wherefore garisons are set, either to ruine a towne, or for distrust of the Inhabitants. But what cause had the Parisiens to presume, that I would ruine a towne, whereunto I haue brought so many commodities by my presence, as ten or twelve townes would thinke themselves greatly benefited thereby? and what distrust could I haue of a people whom I loued? of a people in whom I trusted? Haue they lost a loafe, or any thing whatsoever by means of these pretended garisons? I sought the preservation of my good Citie of Paris, and the safety of my subiects, meaning by a strict search, to put out a great number of strangers, whom I knew to be secretly crept in. They haue offended me, yet am I not irreconcilable; neither haue I any humour to ruine them.

But I will haue them confesse their faults, and know that I am their King and master. If not, I will make the markes of their offence remaine for euer. I will reuoke my Court of Parliament: my Chamber of Accounts, Aides, and other Courts of Iustice. I will take from them the Vniuersitie, their Honours, Freedomes, and Priuiledges. I will omit no meanes to be reuenged. Not that I am reuengefull, or accustomed to vse seueritie: but I will haue them know, that I haue as much resolution and courage, as any of my Predecessors. I am no Vsurper, but a lawfull King by succession, and of a race that hath alwayes commanded mildly. Let them not take religion any more for a pretext. There liues not a more Catholike Prince, nor that desires more the extirpation of heresies, then my selfe. I would willingly lose an arme, that the last Heretic were painted in this Chamber. Returne to your charges, and be of good cheere, I will be for you: and let them vnderstand what I haue said vnto you.

Now the most desperate Leaguers found, that the absence of the Court made their fare but simple, made their shops without Chapmen, and their traffick cold: the flame to be without a King, made the most audacious mutines to hang downe their heads: the violence of rebellion quailed: many found the dealing of Paris too audacious. And now Paris studied to returne to the Kings obedience: when as the Duke of Guise fearing the losse of many of his friends and seruants, resolves to make his peace. Hee now speaks of nothing but the Kings seruice, the obedience of his Maiesty, the preservation of the Estate, the reformation of disorders, and the subiects case, and (by the intercession of the Queene-Mother) seeks his fauour which hee had lost. The Queene-Mother terrifies the King. Those of his Councell, (who for the most part are seruants to the Leaguer) keeps him in this humour: and propounds vnto him a generall reuolt of his subiects, with the intelligence, and fauour the League had within Chartres, the which causeth him, for his greater safety to goe to Roan. Finally, they cry out against the Huguenots. My Liege (say they) will you lose the name of most Christian, in winking at these heresies which vnderunion.

A mine the truth? will you alone among threescore and one Kings, your Predecessors, suffer so detestable a medley of truth and falshood?

This Councell carries him away against them in whom hee should most trust, who lamenting the decay of his authoritie, and the weakening of his forces, see that his intentions inclined to his owne ruine. Hee seemes to be in choller with the King of Nauarres party, to haue the League on his side, (but hee telleth no man, that he pretends to vse their forces against themselves) and drawes certaine Articles of the reunion of Iuly, whereby hee frames his Edict, not so much against the King of Nauarres religion, as to exclude him, in fauour of the League, from that, which none but God could take from him.

B But whilst they finish these accords, hee suddenly surpriseth the Isles of Charon and of Marans.

The King by this Edict admits no Religion, but the Catholike: hee promiseth neuer to make a peace nor truce with the Heretikes, nor any Edict in their fauour. He will haue all his subiects to ioyne with him, that by their common forces they might root out the said heretikes. He binds his subiects to sweare, neuer to yeeld obedience after him, to any Prince that shall be an Heretike, or a fauourer of Heresie, degrades from all publike charges, either in peace, or warre, those of the reformed religion: promiseth all fauour to the Catholikes, so as they shew themselves obedient and faithfull, and depart from all vnions, practices, intelligences, associations and Leagues, contrary to the vnion which hee made by this Edict: hee declares them guilty of treason, that shall refuse to signe to this new vnion, or shall afterwards depart from it: and finally, hee abolisheth all that was done and past. But (signing this forced Edict) he wept.

The Leaguers are now wonderfully putt vp with hope: yet this reuerence of the royall Maiesty is so naturally grauen in the hearts of men, as the onely remembrance of the twelfth of May makes their hearts to tremble. They feare the scorpions taylor, and that the King by his great facilitie, should determine against them some mounsefull Catastrophe in the last act of the Tragedie. And thereupon two things amaze them suddenly: newes comes, that the fearefull and huge Spanish armie, wherein were a hundred and thirty great Ships, and twenty thousand fighting men, vnder the command of the Duke of Medina Sidonia, had by fortune of sea, after their departure from the Grongne in Galicia, lost three Gallies of Portugall, many were scattered, and many bruiſed and made v. profitable for the voyage, and were afterwards so encountered by the Admirall, and Drake the Vice-admirall, thwart of Portland, vpon the English coast, as they forced them to turne head, and to retire in disorder towards the towne of Calais, (hoping there to ioyne with the Prince of Parma) with the losse of one gallion, which carried some part of of their treasure, and also the instructions for the order which the Generall should follow, having conquered England.

A bad beginning, for so braue and proud an ostentation, where they promised themselves an absolute victorie. But the progresse and end was yet more fatal. The English Fleet presteth them to neere, as they force them to leaue the Rendezuons in confusion: their General Gallies pestered with other ships, was cast by the current vpon the sands, neere to the Port of Calais, and remained with the artillerie in the gouernours power: The rest were scattered by the English artillerie. The Spanish army lost twelue ships, and aboute fise thousand men, who had no other sepulchres, but the vast Ocean, and the bellicies of sea Monsters: Finally, taking their course to the North, bending towards Scotland, and Ireland, those seas were no lesse fatal to the Spaniards, for seuentene of their great Ships were sunke, and many others cast vpon the sands and rocks, and the rest of this Armie was so miserably shaken, as of a hundred and thirty ships, hardly thirtie arriued in Spaine. Where the Duke of Medina had no other excuse vnto his Master, but the ignorance and treacherie of his Mariners, with the small experience they had of those Northern seas: the want of succours from the Prince of Parma, the tempests shipwracks; finally ill fortune, but not one word of the iudgement of God vpon this gyant-like attempt, to bring all England slaues to the mountaines of Grenada, or to the mynes of Peru.

The second terrour for the Leaguers is, that the King will not returne to Paris, howsoever they importune him. I will prepare my selfe (saith hee) for the warre against the heretikes: and for the Parliament which I intend to call, and to giue all Princes that are vni-

ted, contentment and satisfaction. They doubt the Barricadoes haue left much spleene in A the Kings heart: and to preuent all contrary euents, they thinke it not yett time to satisfie the oath which they had made, to renounce all intelligences and Leagues which they had made both within and without the Realme.

They take new Councils and resolutions at Paris, to maintaine this authority and credit gotten with so many crosses and disgraces vnto the King, and so to presse him, and to subiect his will vnto theirs, as he shall not fee, speake, nor moue, but by the eyes, tongue, and sinewes of the League: to haue the Deputies of the Parliament-House of their faction, with instructions drawne out of the Articles of Peronne, Nancy, Nemours and Giniulle. B

To vige the King against the Huguenots, and to sollicit him to ease the people by the discharge of taxes, thereby to make him odious, if he refuseth the first fruits of their vni- C on: To make them strong at the Parliament, and to that end to send for all the Nobility of their owne faction, and their adherents, to assist with their armes. To hold good correspondence with the Duke of Parma: and to aduertise the King of Spaine, that this accord made with the King, tended only to effect their common designs. To retaine Piffer Colonell of the Suisses, and Balagny Gouvernor of Cambray, with the priuate conuentions passed betwixt them. To preuent lest the Duke of Nevers, whom the King re- solved to send into Picardy to suppress the violences of the League, should winnaway their most trusty friends. To binde the Citie of Paris vnto the Lord of Villars, gouernour C of New-hauen, for the summe of 30000 crownes yearly, to haue him fauourable to their party.

These new Councils bred new teares. The King cannot containe them in subscribing of these new Articles: but his misfortune forceth him to hazard his estate, to preserue his person. Hee knowes well, that these are but imaginations: that his Edict of reuinion will bee observed by none, but by himselfe: or so farre as it toucheth the subuersion of his Crowne. And yet too much bounty, or too great apprehension makes him scrupulous to preuent it. The Protestants offer to try this great quarrell at their owne perils, so as hee will remaine a Neuter, and suffer them to oppose against the mutinies of the League. He reit & this aduice. For there is lesse danger (saith hee) to remaine with those which per- D sist in the unity of our Religion, then with those which are diuided, and become heads of new opinions.

So whether it were of a good meaning or of purpose, hee returnes to Chartres. Hee fees, imbraceth and maketh much of the Duke of Guise, and there all his fauours and bounties are liberally bestowed on the chiefe Pillars of the League. Hee giues the Duke of Guise the generall command ouer all the men of warre within the Realme. This was not the name and title, but in effect the office and charge of Constable. Hee makes the Cardinal of Guise Legate of Auignon, the which he promisseth to obtaine for him of his Holinesse. To the Duke of Mayenne, a goodly army for the warre of Dauphine. To the Duke of Nemours, the gouernment of Lyons, as his father had enjoyed it: and hee E determined to giue the Seale to Peter of Espinac Archbishop of Lion, to winne him vnto him by this great bounty, promising to procure him a Cardinals Hat of Pope Sixtus, by the meanes of the Cardinal of Gondy, whom he had sent to Rome. Without doubt he had receiued more honour by being Chancellor of France, then in being Chancellor of the vniou. (The Chancellor Hurault Earle of Chyuerny, and the Lord of Bellieure, and Villeroi, had then leaue to attend the Kings pleasure at their houses.) Hee declares the Cardinal of Bourbon the first Prince of the blood, deciding (by a doubtfull speech,) that great question of prerogatiue, betwixt the Vncle and the Nephew, wherein there hath been so much written, and so much disputed: perverting the ancient order of succession, and making the Cardinal to scue the passions of the League. F

They present vnto the King (being but six and thirty yeares of age) a successor, who had euen then passed a Climatierall yeare of threescore and three. Was it not the Leagues meaning, vnder the Cardinal of Bourbons image, to raise vp a stranger, and violently to aduance his tyranny, to vsurpe the royalty? To conclude, the King con- tinues, renues and amplifies his fauours to all such as haue any credit with the League: he doth nothing without them; he opens the very secrets of his heart vnto them, and (for their sakes) causeth euery one of their partisans to taste some portion of his bounty, and makes

Council has dismissed the Court.

Troubles against the D.
of Eprouen in Angoulême.

A makes show to beleeeue whatsoeuer they say vnto him. His Councell blinds his eyes, so as hee cannot discern what is the duty of a good King: they disguise the truth from him, and study only to satisfie their ambition and couerousnesse. So as to please them, euen in this, hee himselfe pulis out those eyes, whereby hee did see most cleare, and giues them leaue to retire to their houses, there to shrowd themselves from these confusions of State.

The Duke of Epernon was out of Court: but hee had authoritie from the King, to command in the Prouinces of Aniou, Tourain, Poitou, Angoulmois, & Xantonge. Being at Loches, hee is aduertised that the League pressed with some inhabitants to deliuer B them Angoulême. He posts thither, and the people receiue him with great honour as the Kings Lieutenant. Hee publisheth the Edict of reuinion, his words and deeds testifie nothing but a courage resolved to preserue the Catholike Religion. But behold suddenly a strange Catastrophe. Some Leaguers had perswaded the people, that hee meant to draw the Huguenots troopes into the Castle, and so subdue the towne. The Maior (being the head of the Conspiracy) enters into the Castle on S. Lawrence day, vnder colour to present vnto the Duke certaine Posts that were come from Court: hee mounts vp to his Chamber, at his entry hee dischargeth two Pistols, and seeks to force the house. The Duke was then in a Cabinet, attending the houre of Masse: where hee read the History of Pierre Ganes- C ton, in old time dearly fauoured by Edward the second King of England preferred be- fore all others in Court, enriched with the Kings treasure, and the peoples wealth, but after banished the Realme, and in the end beheaded at the suite of the Estates.

This slanderous Libell being printed at Paris, not so much against the Dukes honour as the Kings, compared the Duke with Guescler, and concluded, that vnder Henry the third, he should end his dayes by the like tragedy. Vpon the first tumult, the Dukes Gen- tlemen flye to armes, and repulse this armed multitude: the Maior being hurt with the shot of a Pistoll through a doore, dyed within feuen houres after. The alarm flies into the towne. The people arme, storme, and make barricadoes. But the Duke kept the Castle: the Citadell was at his deuotion, and might by either of them draw in necessary succours to vngage him.

D The Seigneur of Tagens, the Dukes cousin, advanced with succours: Bordes Captaine of the Citadell being prisoner among the conspirators, loued the liberty of his place, more then his owne life: Merc, Messeliere, Macquerole, and Bouchaux, summoning the besieged, found nothing in them but a constant resolution to dye rather then to yeeld: and the people were willing to capitulate, when as Tagens by his arriuall pacified the sedition: Armes were laid aside, and the prisoners of both parts deliuered. The Duke of Guise hauing made his peace with the King, and disappointed his most faithfull Coun- cellors: yet one thorne troubled his foot, the Huguenots Estate. Hee therefore ceaseth not, vntill hee sees them assailed in Poitou and Dauphine: and whilest the Duke of Ne- uers prepared his armie for Poitou, hee sends the regiment of Saint Paul to the Duke E of Mercuar, to annoy the Protestants, and not to suffer them to reape any commoditie in the country.

The Duke Mercuar goes into base Poitou, besegeth Montagu, repaired by Colum- biers, whom they of Nants had hourly at their gates. But at the first brute that the King of Nauarre was come out of Rochel to succour Montagu, hee retires straight to Nants, and left the regiment of Gersy, to make the retreat, the which was ouertaken, beaten, Gensy defeated and defeated two leagues from the suburbs of Nantes. On the other side, the Duke of Mayenne marched towards Dauphine, but hee planted the limits of his voyage in Lions. Now are two mighty armies in field, the one vnder the Kings authoritie, the other all of Leaguers: But this is not enough. The King by a solemne oath in the Cathedral Church F at Rouan, had sworn the execution of the Edict of vnioune hath sent vnto the Bishops, and commands them to presse the Huguenots in their Diocesse, to make profession of their faith, and to abjure their errors in open Parliaments, royall iurisdiccions and com- munalities.

This Edict must be confirmed as a fundamentall Law of State, and the King prest, to assemble the three Estates of the Realme, as he had promised by the Articles of the Peace. Henry grants a Conuocation, the 1 day of September at Blois: there (in the presence of the notablest persons of euery Prouince, Seneschallic and Bayliwick,) to propound freely the the complaints and griefes of euery man, but not meddling with any practices, or fauouring the priuate passions of any.

But amidst these Commissions from the King, the League wanted no policy to fend secretly (to them that were most affectionate to the aduancement of their desires, and to the most passionate Leaguers of the Realme.) Articles and remembrances which they should put into their instructions, and labour to bee chosen of the Parliament. So as in a manner all the Deputies caried the badge of the League, and their instructions were conformable to those which had been sent vnto them. The King comes first vnto Blois: hee giues order for the place, and for the Deputies lodgings. The D. of Guise follows: but it was a great indiscretion for the Duke to goe to Blois, seeing the King would not come to Paris. The Deputies come one after another: but the King finding not the number sufficient to begin so solemne an act, he defers it vntill October.

In the meane time, the King studies, by the credit which authoritie giues him ouer the three Estates of his Realme, to bring the Duke of Guise into open view, and to receiue punishment for all his offences past. And the Duke assures himselfe, that the most part of the Deputies would countenance his cause, and would serue him as instruments to controll the Kings power. So euery one labours to aduance his designe, and to deceiue one another: but hee which shall be deceived, will verifie, that there is danger in delay. The 16 of October all the Deputies were ready, for the Clergy a hundred thirty and foure Deputies; amongst others foure Archbishops, one and twenty Bishops, and two Generals of orders: for the Nobility a hundred and fourescore Gentlemen: for the third estate, a hundred fourescore and eleven Deputies, all Lawyers, or Merchants.

The 17 day, being the first fitting of the prime wits of all France, rauished euery man with hope to heare rare propositions, and resolutions of great affaires for the reformation of the state. The Kings oration being full of fluently affection, true magnanimity, and pertinent reasons, deliuered with an admirable eloquence and grace without any stay, will testifie for euer, that hee exceeded all the Princes of his age in speaking well, and that hee could grauely, pertinently, and very suddenly make answer to the most important occasions that were offered.

Mantelon, Keeper of the Scale, continued his Proposition, commended the zeale and integrity of his Maisties intentions, promised the Estates, that vnder his happy command, they should reape in this Conuocation, the same effects which had bene tried in diuers reignes: he exhorteth the Clergy to restore the beauty and dignity of the Church: The Nobility, to frame themselves after the mould of pietie, bounty, iustice, and other vertues of the French Nation, so much honoured in all histories: The people to reuerence Iustice, and to obserue good orders, to fly wrangling suits, swearing, blasphemies, play, lust, vniust getting, corrupt trading, and other vices, which be the seeds of troubles, and seditions, and the ruine of flourishing Estates. Hee layes open the Kings great debts, his charge and care to root out heresies, his religion, piety, and deuotion, ending his speech with a commendation, vnder the Kings obedience, of the vnion and concord, necessary for the maintenance of religion.

Renauld of Beaulne Archbishop of Bourges, Patriarke and Primat of Aquitania, thanked the King for his loue to his subjects, and God, to haue insatled on the throne of this Crowne, a King endued from his youth, with the spirit of wisdome, to gouerne his people, who had cast the lightening of the high God, euen vpon the face of the enemies of his diuine Maistie, hauing by diuers and dangerous voyages, through diuers Nations gotten the knowledge of affaires, who by his onely wisdome and vertue, had largely dispersed a great and mighty armie of strangers, and giuen vs hope, that vnder so good and great a King, wee shall see heresie suppressed, peace confirmed, the seruice of God established, Churches and Temples restored, iustice and peace embraced, charitie abound among men, and by vniue of Religion begin here on earth to reigne with Christ, the Idea and patterne of that heauenly kingdome, whereunto wee aspire. The Baron of Senefei testified the Nobilities affection to the Kings seruice, confessing, that to him alone belongs to worke those good effects, for the establishment of the honour of God, the Catholike religion, things profitable for the Estate, and necessary for his people, offering in the name of them of his order, the zeale, faith, and duty, which the Gentlemen of France haue alwayes borne vnto their Kings, their armes, meanes, liues, and persons,

A to maintain the obedience, honor, feare and respect, whereunto the lawes both of God and man tie the subjects to their Soueraigne.

Michel Mayreau Prouost of the Merchants at Paris, President for the third estate, first thanked God, who had cast his eyes of pity vpon this Realme, in the extremity of their afflictions: then the King, to haue yielded to the humble petitions of his subjects, heard their griefes and complaints, shewed a great desire to restore his people to their former estate, Religion to her former dignity, to rule and settle all orders in their ancient forme, being diuided by this iniury of times, protesting that in so doing their most humble and faithfull seruice should not faile vnto the last breath. And so the first sitting ended.

B In the second, the Tuesday following the King at the instance of the Archbishop of Ambrun, the Earle of Briillac, and the Aduocate Bernard, speakers for the three Estates, to content the importunity of the League, did againe sweare the oath of the Vnion, lately made at Rouan, and making his Edict of Iuly last, a fundamentall law of the Realme, to binde him, them, and all their posterity (yet not derogating from the liberties and priuiledges of the Nobility) he caused it to be publicly read by Raue Siegneur of Beaulieu his chiefe Secretary of State.

C And to make the memory of so solemne an oath more autentike to posterity, he commanded the said Secretary to make an act, that all the orders of the Realme had sworn in the body of the State, all with one voyce, the Clergy laying their hands vpon their breasts, and the rest lifting them vp to heauen. An oath performed with great ioy, and generall reuiuing of that happy acclamation of, God save the King, so many yeares forgotten among the French nation: and followed with a singular testimony of the Kings clemency, remitting the Parisiens offence, for the common good of the Catholikes of France, and the ease of his people, whose miseries made him treade vnder foot his iust displeasure. Hold (saith he to the Prouost of Merchants of Paris) this word assured, as from the mouth of your King, and take heed that Paris fall not into a relapse, which will be fatal and not recoverable.

But there was a brute spread ouer all France, that vnder colour of this assembly, they practised an exemplary reuenge against the chiefe of the Estates. Advertisements came D from all parts: this teare went from chamber to chamber: the most apprehenſive desired to be satisfied. The Archbishop of Ambrun makes report vnto the King. I know (said the King) the liberties and prerogative of the Parliament: they ought to trust in my word: It is a sinne to grow in iealousie of your King: and these reports come not but from such as haue no loue to their King, but seek to make him odious to his people. There shall neuer any cause grow from me to disturbe this Assembly. In the end, the familiarity and shewes of loue from the King to the Duke and Cardinall of Guise, and (for their sakes) to the chiefe of the League, made them lay aside all suspiſion of a bloody act, whereof they were advertised from all parts. And without doubt, if the League had not stirred vp the coales of force-paſſed indignities, the fire of his wrath had not perchance deuoured them. This blast past ouer, there are other attempts no lesse dangerous. The League fets them on worke that beares their badge, to hit the marke whereat they ayemed. To put the King in disgrace, and to intall the duke of Guise in his throne, (for the King of Nauarre is now by this new fundamentall law, excluded from the royall succession.) But what meane they to doe? The Collosse they seeke to build, shall be their ruine: the fire they kinde shall burne them: the knife they forge, shall be heached in their owne bowels; and finally, shall leaue of this League a shamefull and reproachfull memory. To hit this pretended marke, they must make the Kings actions odious to all the world, reproach to him his vnreasonable prodigality, his dissembling, the oppression of his people, the erecting of new Offices, thereby to bandy against him the most apparent families of the third Estate, wronged in the suppression of them: or else (neglecting to redresse it) they should declare him an enemy to the people, and a Tyrant ouer his Realme, and so the people should presently resolute to confine him into a Monastery.

E They will lay before him the wonderfull coldnesse of the greatest part of the Catholikes to his loue and obedience, seeing themselves forced to liue amongst them that had burnt their Churches, prophaned their Altars, massacred the Priests, and spoiled their goods. They beseech him to defend the Church, and to prefer the iniuries done to religion, before the violences committed against the State. They propound vnto him, the excessive ex: effuse impositions and subsidies, which had already withdrawne most part of his subjects: and the filthy avarice of Strangers, who by continual inuentions did cruelly impoverish France. They represent vnto him the abuses of the government, in bestowing benefices to all men indifferently, either married, or soldiers: the lust, dissoluteness, and ignorance of Prelates: the sale of Offices and places of iudgment. They exhort him not to deale in spirituall causes, or at the least to proceed holily, as it belongs to holy things. To degrade a great number, as well of Prelates, as of ciuill Magistrates in toueraigne Courts and interiour iurisdiccions, and to punish with death those ministers which by corruption haue crept into the Church, Justice and government, else he cannot preferre the Estate. In the end, they presse him to reforme the excesses and disorders of his Court, the which are odious to so many Noble spirits, fraught with holiness, magnanimity and courage, to so many great and rich minds as be among the Nobility, which being employed, would in few moneths repaire the ruines of this Estate.

Such as finde themselves interested in the cutting off the superfluous number of Officers, and in the buying of their places, dissuade the King from this resolution, but to maintain them in the honours which they enjoy vnder the countenance of his Maiesty. The third estate exhibit their complaints, of the excesses of taxes and subsidies, wherewith they are oppressed, of the customes, foraigne impositions, rents vpon sale, entries, loane, gifts, increase and decrease of the prices of mony, with many other exactions and surcharges, wherof the King receiued not any benefit, but what was dipt in the blood of his poore people. The Nobility complaines of seruices done without recompence, and indifferet distribution of the Kings liberality. The Clergy exclaime that mony which hath bene drawne from them, had nothing auanced the cause of religion.

From complaints of the languishing people, grew the suppression of Officers of the new creation and an intent to ease their subsidies. But oh politicke stratagem! The King yeelding to haue them reduced to the yeare one thousand five hundred scutney six, sees himselfe depriued of all meanes to leauy his armies, and to entertaine the greatnesse of his Maiesties estate. If he refuse this, an occasion is giuen to mutine the Estates, to chafe away such as are neere his person, and to greeue him a gouernour.

The D. of Guise on the one side, dissuades the King to subiect his authority so much, but on the other side, he pricketh them forward to be vehement in their pursuits. In the end, the King passeth this grant of reduction: but hee hopes to make it knowne vnto the Estates, that with so small meanes he cannot maintaine his royall dignity, nor the warre against the heretikes, which they had so solemnly sworne. They deuide of meanes to make vp the stocke, and demand an account of such as had gouerned the treasure, and abused the Kings bounty. But whilst they turned ouer their papers at the Estates, let vs see the progresse of the two armies which wee had left in field. That of Neuers consisted of French, Swisses, and Italians, with many voluntary Gentlemen. Sagonne was Marshall of the light horse, la Chastre Marshall of the field, Chastaigneray, Laucardin, and many others commanded the troopes. Mauleon was the first obiekt of their armes. It is a rashnesse to be obstatine in the defence of a place which is not to bee held: but it is a treachery to ill treat them whom wee haue receiued to composition. So this first victory was bathed with their bloods, who trusting in the force of their courages, neglected the weaknesse of their walls. Montagu was defended some dayes by Colembiers, who at the first saluting the Duke with a furious skirmish, puts him to some losse. But the Cannon hauing both shaken their walls and their constancies, they entred into capitulation, the which was honorably granted the last day of Nouember.

La Ganache, situated vpon the marches of Britany and Poidou, annoyed both the one and the other Prouince. Let vs leaue the army there, to see how the Duke of Mayenne spends his time at Lions. The designs too lightly grounded vpon a peoples mutinie are alwaies ruinous. The Duke of Mayenne knowes it well: and moreover, there is nothing but blowes to be gotten in Dauphine. Hee desires rather to attend the issue of the Estates in a pleasing and delightfull abode: but this stay is a great scourge to Mandelo. He feares to be dispossest of his government. It is giuen to the Duke of Nemours, and therefore hee wonderously suspects the Duke of Mayennes presence. Finally, hee grew so ielous, as surprized with apprehension, with the cholicke, a feuer, the gout, and the fluxe, hee carried (the foure and twentieth of Nouember) this testimony into

A the other world, by the mouth of father Edmond Auger, a Iesuite, in his funerall sermon. That he had neuer signed the league, & that he died firm in his religion, & the Kings seruice.

Whilst the King laboured at the Parliament, to cut off all difficulties which prolonged the war, and the Duke of Mayenne being at Lions, suffered the heat of his passage into Dauphiné to grow cold, Charles Duke of Sauoy foreseeing the disposition of this Estate, he thought, that as a sonne and husband of two daughters, issued from the blood of France, he should be the first which should set his hand to the diuision. The Marquise of Saluces is in the midst of his territories, he thinks, that for such a prize he may well break friendship and alliance with the King his neere kinsman, who of meeke courtiers he newly deliuered vnto him Sauiagnan and Pignerol.

With this designe (seeing the Kings thoughts otherwise engaged then beyond the Alpes) he makes a leauy of men, threatens Geneua, makes a shew to besiege Montferrat, causeth the Marquis of S. Carlin to goe to horse, and on All-Saints night surpriseth the Towne of Carmagnole, and then the Citadell, being vnfortified of victuals, which S. Siluie, successor to la Caste had drawne forth, with hope (said he) to refresh them: so as in lesse then three weeks he possessed all the Marquise, leauing a reproachfull suspicion against the Captains of the Citadell, to haue treacherously exchanged the double Canons of that ancient arcanal of the warres of France, beyond the Alpes, with the double pistolets of Spaine. This conquest made the Duke proud, and already in conceit hee had deuoured both Prouence and Dauphiné. For a colour he writes both to the Pope and King: That the generall respect of the Church had made him leize vpon these places, lest Des Dignities should make it a retreat and refuge for Huguenots: and the priuate interest of his Estates, which he desires to maintaine in the purity of the ancient religion, vnder the obedience of the holy Sea: and by his Ambassadors he disguiseth this wrong with the goodliest colours that may be. He makes a shew not to hold these places, but vnder the Kings authority: but in time hee vlurps all acts of Soueraignty: he displaceth his Maiesties officers, beates downe the Armes of France, sets vp the Croisse of Sauoy; and in a brauery hee causeth peeces of siluer to bee coyned with a Centaure treading a Crowne ouerwhelmed vnder his foot, and carrying this device; Opportunity. The King thus moued with this vsurpation, applies this branch to the body of the conspiracies of the League, he resolves now to pacifie the ciuill wars, to attend after foraigne: and euen then he determines to giue the Protestants a peace, and to vse their assistance against such as make a benefit of the discords of the realme. Such as respected truly the glory of the French, gaue him to vnderstand that he must appease both Huguenot and Liguier, and seeke reuenge of this new indignity: and hunt the Wolfe which breakes into the fold, whilst the Shepheards are at variance. Shall a petty Prince take from a King of France, the pawne which remains to recover Naples and Milan? foure hundred peeces of Cannon, which might beat the proudest Forts of the Spaniards to powder? that ancient see of Dauphiné, comprehended in the gifts which Prince Hubert made to the Crowne of France wherof our Kings haue so often receiued homage & fealtie of the Marquises, and haue often seized thereon for forfeiture and treachery?

All the Kings seruants, all the Courts of Parliament, all the assembly of Estates, iudge that these be the effects of the League, and that this inuasion is not without the intelligence of the Duke of Guise: euen those which fauour his part cannot digest it. But to auoid this common hatred which was ready to fall vpon him, he beseecheth his Maiesty, onely to assure his people, and make them to tast the fruits of contentment; which hee had promised in the oath of the holy vnion, that he would quench the fire which the Huguenots did nourish in this realme, and giue him this Commission against the Stranger, he will be the first that shall passe the Alpes, to make the Sauoyard cast vp his gorge. But could they hope for any remedy from him, who by his continual practices with strangers, had giuen life and motion to the mischief? So the King, considering that neither his Edict of reuision, nor the oath to depart from all associations, produced the effects were promised: and that the League (consenting to the pernicious designs of the stranger) had made the way for the breach of the said vnion, he thinks himselfe no more bound to the oath of this vnion, and euen then deuisech to be reuenged of all the offences past. In the meane time hee diffembles his discontent.

As these newes troubled the assembly at Blois, the King of Nauarre (seeing the practices of the League had excluded him, whereas he should hold the first place) held another in the Towne-houſe at Rochelle, and by their aduice he ſent (in the name of the French exiled for religion) a common petition to the Eſtates, beſeeching the King. To reſtore them the liberty of the firſt Ediſt, which they call of Ianuary; To appoint a Nationall Councell, where controuerſies of religion may be mildly diſputed, and holily reſolued; To grant them reſtitution, and free enioying of their goods; To ſuffer their Petition to be enrolled, and the contents thereof granted by his clemency, to the end that nothing may be done to their preiudice.

Nothing leſſe. This petition was directly againſt the principal intentions of the Eſtates, effected to aduance the League. And therefore not ſatisfied with the oath which the King had made vnto them by the Ediſt of Vnion, they wreſt from the Kings owne mouth a more particular declaration, touching the perpetuall inſufficiency of the King of Nauarre, and other Princes of the blood his couſins, adherents (ſay they) and fauours of Heretikes, to the ſucceſſion of this Crowne.

The conſequence of this Parliament ſhould haue beene for the good quiet of the Common-weale. And doubtleſſe ſome ſmall number (whole wills were not tyed to the paſſions of the Leaguers) wiſhed that remedie which had beene praſticed in former times againſt moſt pernicious hereties: which was a free and lawfull Councell, vniuerſall or nationall; but the greater part ouer-ruled both the King and the Eſtates. The League, to ruine the State, will overthrow the pillars, which be the Princes of the blood, and if the branches of Valois and Bourbon, that is to ſay, if all the race of Saint Lewis be not degraded, they cannot paſſe ouer the Crowne to the family of Lorraine. The King by his Ediſt promiſeth to diſpoſe of the ſucceſſion: but he and the Queene hiſ wife are yet in the vigor of their age, they hope, that God will bleſſe them with heires males. Hee takes no pleaſure they ſhould harpe vpon this ſtring: it is a blemiſh to his authority, and diſrobes him before he is ready to ſleepe: when as a Prince hath named his ſucceſſor, his teſtament is made.

Yet he is content to ſatiſſie the violent appetites of the League. He ſuffers them to diſpute of the ſucceſſion, and (in the aſſembly of all his ſubiects) to exclude the lawfull ſucceſſor: he is content they ſhould propound that which moſt part of the Deputies had already reſolued. The Clergie had the fourth of Nouember condemned the King of Nauarre for an Hereticke, the chiefe of them reſapce, excommunicate, deprived of the gouernment of Guienne, and of all his dignities, vnworthy of all ſucceſſions, Crownes, and Realmes. The Archbiſhop of Ambrun, the Biſhop of Bazas, the Abbot of Ciſteaux, and other Clergy men impart it to the Deputies of the Nobility and third Eſtate: all conſent to the firſt conſequence, and appoint twelue of euery chamber to acquaint the King with their reſolutions.

But the King of Nauarre had often giuen them to vnderſtand, that he was borne during the permiſſion of both religions, inſtructed and bred vp in one from the which hee cannot in conſcience depart without better inſtruction: neither hope nor deſpaire of a Crowne can draw him to ſo violent and raſh a change: hee ſhould thereby incurre the blame of inconfſtancy, infidelity, and hypocriſie: hee is, and alwaies will bee ready to receiue inſtruction from a free and lawfull Councell. Theſe ſubmiſſions are full of iuſtice and conſideration: he defends nothing obſtinately, it is the honour and zeale of his conſcience that binds him. There is no reaſon then (ſaid the King) to condemne him without hearing. Let vs conſider with iudgement and fore-ſight, whether it be expedient to ſummon him againe to ſwear the Ediſt of Vnion, & to declare himſelfe a Catholike.

The Parliament is not of this aduice. The Cardinall of Bourbon his Vnckle (ſay the Deputies) hath once obtained abſolution for him: the Queene mother hath laboured to win him: the King hath ſent Doctours to reclaim him: he is bred vp from his Cradle in this new opinion, condemned by the Councell of Trent, and many others. The Conſistory hath receiued him into grace, he is fallen into the error which he had abjured: he is therefore an Heretike: he is reſapce, and vnworthy of obedience, vnworthy of reſpect, and vnworthy to be prayed for. The holy Sea of Rome hath declared him a Schiſmaticke, excommunicate, incapable of the ſucceſſion of the Crowne: the Eſtates therefore muſt ratifie this ſentence. To conclude, an Heretike cannot raigne in France, it is an incompatible thing with the Coronation and oath which he ought to take, hurtfull to the honor

A of God, and preiudiciall to the good of this Realme. Soft and faire; Nature and the common conſent of Nations will, that the accuſed ſhould be heard. God himſelfe, who hath no need to be ſatiſfied by humane witneſſes, and is not bound to any iuriſdiction, would not condemne our firſt father before he called him into iudgment; examined him, checked and reprimed him, and heard his excuſes. Heare then the King of Nauarre, he may ſay vnto you, that the Pope by ſurpriſe hath noted him of herſie: he knoweth not yet any other truth then that wherein the Queene of Nauarre hath bred him. If hee hath at any time yeelded vnto the force and violence of the time, he had not then his will free, and as ſoone as opportunity gaue him meanes to retire from Court into his Country of Bearn, he framed his beleeſe to the modell of that which had beene preſcribed him: but proteſting alwaies to the Eſtates and Parliaments of France, that he hath no greater deſire in his ſoule, then to ſee the ſeruiſe of God vnitied vnder one religion, by the meanes of a free and lawfull aſſembly of the vniuerſall Church, or a nationall Councell of the French Churches. The Deputies notwithstanding (eſpecially the Clergie) will allow of no reaſon. They are for the moſt part tranſported with paſſion, and apprehend nothing but what may aduance the league. If the King reſuſeth this article, the Duke of Guiſe will diſſolve the Eſtates, and lay all the blame vpon his Maieſtie. Hee hath ſo well provided for his affaires, as he holds himſelfe maſter of the Caſtle of Blois, and of the Kings perſon. There is neither gate, hall, chamber, nor cabinet, but the keyes are at his pleaſure. He hath great forces ready. He checks them that ſpeake not to his liking: their voyces and conſents are forced in the Parliament houſe: he puts in, and puts out, & doth what he pleaſeth. Thoſe whom the King and Parliaments hold inſupportable, finde acceſſe and ſupport with him. To conclude, ſee the firſt Prince of the blood, the firſt of the moſt ancient and moſt famous houſe that doth at this day weare a Crowne, the firſt of that royall branch of Bourbon, which onely remains after ſo many ſifters and couſins of Aniou, Angoulême, Berry, Bourgonne, Angoulême, and Orleans, and which onely ſucceeded that of Valois, deprived of the right which nature hath giuen him, without calling him, or hearing his iuſtifications. The clergie ſaies, hee ought to be no more cited, his herſie, his incapacity to the Crowne is apparant. The Biſhop of Chalons in Champagne deliuerſ this conſequence to the Nobility. The Biſhop of Cominge, to the third Eſtate: and the Archbiſhop of Ambrun to the King, to make a law thereof: and then followed the laſt and lamentable act of the Tragedy of a diſpoſſeſſed King.

But oh men! the Eternall lookes on you, and laughs at your counſels: he now comes vpon the ſtage to act his part, and to bring forth effects far from his thoughts. The King is aduerted from all parts of a great conſpiracy againſt his Maieſty. The Duke of Eſpernon aſſures him by letters. The Duke of Mayenne (zealous it may be of his brothers greatness) aduerteth his Maieſty from Lions, by a Knight of honour: and the Duke of Aumale, from Blois it ſelte by his owne wife, that the Duke of Guiſe had very pernicious deſignes: that the houre of the execution did approach: that they reſolued to ſeiſe on him and to lead him to Paris.

Theſe aduertements kindle a new courage in the King, he means to prevent him, and diſcouers his minde to ſoure, whom he knows as faithfull to his Maieſty, as enemies to the damnable projects of the League. He muſt ſuppreſſe this new ſtar in the Eaſt, whom the people worſhipped already. The preſent neceſſity will not ſuffer him to bring him forth in view: the Popes reſpect retaines him: his oath to protect the Eſtates makes him irrelolute: the troubles which this execution will cauſe in people diſpoſed to the league, makes him doubtfull: yet he muſt die. He hath no quality in France but of a ſimple ſubiect: and yet without the Kings authority, conſent or ſufferance, hee hath built a league, had intelligence with the ſtranger, leauied men of war, attempted vpon townes, and broken the publike peace.

He continues his praſtices, againſt the oath of the Ediſt of Vnion, with the Cardinall Morſine, Legate to the Pope, and Don Inigo of Mendoza, Ambaſſadour of Spaine. Hee confirms his priuate confederations with the Gouernours of reuolued townes. He publiſheth by his declarations, that he hath not taken armes, but for Gods and the Kings ſeruiſe: and yet by the ſurpriſe of ſo many townes, hee hath hindered the aduancement of the Kings army in Guienne againſt the Huguenots. The obiect of his armes is the ſafety and religion of the Catholikes, and to deprive the King of Nauarre of all hope of ſucceſſion

to the Crowne: and in the meane time it appeares, that hee hath fought the loue of the A King of Nauarre: he hath promised to giue him his sonne in hostage, and to meet him with seuentene Princes of his house at the riuer of Loire, to serue him, and make him King of France. Many letters intercepted discover, that after his Maiesties pardon of many capital crimes, he renues his designs against the King and his estate. The surprize of the Marquitate of Salusses is by his intelligence. Hee disgraceth the Kings actions, hee blames him to haue vnwillingly made war against the Huguenots: to haue sold the said Marquitate, that vnder colour of recouering it, he might diuert the war against the Heretikes. In stead of reducing the townes held by the Huguenots, he keeps his Captaines and men of war at Blois, vpon assurance of a profitable change. He hath caused bookes B to bee printed in fauor of the lawfull succession of the house of Lorraine to the Crowne.

At the Barricades this voice was heard; It is no longer time to dally, let vs lead my Lord to Rheims. He hath suffered himselfe to be saluted by the people, with cries and acclamations which belong onely to the Soueraigne Prince. He hath vaunted that he was able to take the King prisoner, or to do worse although he entred but with eight horses into Paris, being assured of the force and wills of the Citizens: he hath seized on the places of strength within Paris, made Governours, Magistrates and Officers at his pleasure: he hath corrupted the Estates, as the Deputies speake not but by his mouth: they produce nothing but what hath bene first examined in his Councell. Many cry out that hee staies C too long before he strikes. Hee speakes no more but in termes of a Soueraigne, with pride, dildaine, and threats: he hath refused to subscribe the Edict which the King would publish in cases of treason: he doth already seale Letters-patents with his great Seale: he forbids the Commons to give victuals or munition to such Companies as the King had sent vnto them. There remains no more but to confirme in his person that ancient greatness sometimes vnrped by the Maiors of the Palace: and to deale with the King as Charles Martel had done with Chilperic. In the end they represent vnto the King the pro- cesse of Salado, a party in his confpiracie, the counsellors of Nancy, and of Paris in Lent last, whereof the chiefe point was: To seize vpon the King: the instructions of the Ad- uocate David: the letters of the Queene Dowager of Denmarke to the D. of Lorraine D her sonne: the attempt of the Barricados, and (to heape vp the measure) the practices, corruptions, and violences done by the Duke of Guise to the Estates. The like and lesse crimes haue in former ages brought more famous heads then the Duke of Guises to the blocke. The leagues and practices of an Earle of Harcourt, of a Constable of S. Paul, of a Duke of Nemours, haue brought them to shamefull ends.

Pope Sixtus, now liuing, hath of late put to death the Earle of Pepoli of the noblest families of Italy, onely for that he had concealed some banished men in his house. The D. of Guise himselfe did of late pursue with all violence the disobedience of the D. of Anjou. His Holinesse hath beleueed, that religion was the onely motiue of the Duke of Guises his ariues. The Barricados, with the vrsurpation of the Bastile, and Bois de Vin- cences haue made him to change his beleefe. Hee himselfe hath said vnto the Bishop of Paris, that the fact was too bold, that the Estate is interestted, and that the offence is irreconcilable. Hee hath written vnto the King, aduising him to assure himselfe of the Estates, at what price soeuer: that in such imminent dangers, hee must seeke out all extra- ordinary remedies: and vpon this consideration he granted the King a Confessor to ab- solve him of all, reseruing the matter to the holy Sea.

Objection.

Yea, but the Estates are vnder the Kings oath and protection. Without doubt an oath was neuer broken without repentance. But how is the Soueraigne bound to his subiect, who by rebellion hath violated his oath to his Prince? Necessity forceth the law: great punishments of Rebels haue bene often done in great assemblies. The Kings of England F and Poland do practise it well, and our Charles hath died his Sisters nuptials with more blood then wine. Moreover, the D. of Guise hath great credit with the people of France. It is true; but his party hath no credit but with the multitude, the which is a very moue- able and an inconsistent foundation. Men of account, Townes, Governours, and the Kings Officers mutine not, but by means of the multitude, and seeing him fallen that gaue mo- tion to their rebellion, they will containe themselves. My Liege, (say they who feare lest this violent counsell which they gaue him in so vrgent necessity should bee discovered)

A the Duke of Guise will surprize you. They haue already published in Paris, that this is your Climatrical year: they shew forth the razor that shall shauo you: they de- mand how long they shall suffer you to lue in a Cloyster. The lightning goes before the thunder: the guilt of treason is extraordinary in the head: so the punishment goes before the instructions and formes of Iustice. One must punish the offender, and then informe of the offence. The mildest Common-weales, most politike, and greatest enemies to rigor, held alwaies, That whereas the estate is in danger, they may begin with the execution. In the end, the King is satisfied, having remained long in suspence, betwixt the rigour of his re- uenge, and the mildnesse of his owne disposition. By the Kings countenance, or some B words let slip by some one of the foure, they find it dangerous to continue long at the Estates. But the more the Duke of Guise enters into discourse, the more the Kings good countenance disswades him. And the Archbishop of Lion attending a Cardinals hat within a few dayes from Rome: retyring your selfe from the Estates (said hee vnto him) you shall beare the blame to haue abandoned France in so important an occasion, and your enemies making their profit of your absence, will soone ouerthrow all that which you haue with so much paine effected for the assurance of Religion.

Man doth often lose his iudgement vpon the point of his fall. Advertisements were come to him from all parts, both within and without the Realme, from Rome, Spaine, Lorraine and Sauoy, that a bloody Catastrophe would dissolve the Assembly. The Alma- C nacks had well obscured it: it was generally bruied in the Estates, that the execution should be on S. Thomas day. The eue before his death, the Duke himselfe sitting downe to dinner, found a seroule vnder his napkin, aduersing him of this secret ambush. But (as ambition blinds those whom shee had raised vp to the Pies nest, and the fury of Gods iudgements confounds such as trust in their authority) he writ vnderneath with his owne hand, They dare not: and threw it vnder the table.

The Duke of Guise following the counsell of the Cardinall Morsin, had the one and twentieth of December incensed the King anew, by some bold & presumptuous speeches. My Leige (said he) seeing I find that the affaires decline from bad to worse, and that those things which seemed curable, are growne desperate: I beseech your Maiesty to receiue D againe the charge you haue committed vnto me, and giue me leaue to retire my selfe. He spake this, to the end that by this discontent hee might take an occasion to dissolve the Estates, and bringing the King into an extreame hapred with his subiects, he might play the last act of his long fore-plotted Tragedy. The King had the 22 day following, prepared seuen of his five and forty (they were Gentlemen whom he had appointed to be neere his person, besides the ordinary Archers of his guard) to execute his will, and by many dis- patches had assured those townes which he held to be most munitious. The 23 he assem- bles his Councell somewhat more early in the morning then was vsual, hauing a deuotion, to goe after dinner, and to spend the holy dayes at our Lady of Clercy. The Cardi- nals of Vendosme, Guise, and Gondy, the Archbishop of Lion, the Marshalls of Aumont, E and Retz, the Lords of d'O, Rambouillet, Maintenon, Marcell and Petremolle Superin- tendants of the Treasor, were assembled: The Duke of Guise comes, and attending the beginning of the Councell, sends for an handkercher: (the grooms of his chamber had forgotten to put one into his pocket.) Pericart, his Secretary not daring to commit this new aduertisement to any mans report, tyes a note to one of the corners thereof, saying: Come forth and save your selfe, else you are but a dead man. But they stay the page that ca- ried it. Larchant Captaine of the Kings guard catcheth another to bee giuen vnto him with all speed by S. Prix the chiefe Grooms of the Kings chamber. The Caffe gates are shut, and the Councell sits about eight of the clocke.

The spirit of man doth often prophesse of the mischiefe that doth pursue him. So whilest F they dispute of a matter propounded by Petremolle, the Duke feels strange alterations, and extraordinary disemperatures, and amidst his distrust, a great fainting of his heart. S. Prix presents vnto him some prunes of Brignolles, and raisins of the Sun. He eates, and thereupon the king calls him into his cabinet by Renee one of the Secretaries of his Estate; as it were to confer with him about some secret of importance. The duke leaves the coun- cill to passe vnto the Cabinet: and as he did lift vp the tapestry with one hand to enter, they charge him with their swords, daggers and pertuisans, yet notwithstanding violence; but hee shewed the murderers the last endeauours of an invincible valor and courage.

The Duke of Guise slaine.

Thus

Thus liued, and thus died Henry of Lorraine, Duke of Guise: a Prince worthy to be in A the first rankes of Princes, goodly, great, tall of proportion, amiable of countenance, great of courage, ready in the execution of his enterprizes, popular, dissembling, but couering the secrets of his mind with his outward behauiour, embracing all times and occasions, politicke in stratagems, making much of his souldiers, and honoring his Captaines. But a Prince who hath blemished the greatest beauty of his praises by extreame ambition, fastidious, a great bragger, vaine in beleueing of Sooth sayers, who assured him of his greatness, and of the change of his family into a Royalty: proud, not able to submit his hopes, euen to those from whom he should hope for his aduancement, giuing men to vnderstand by his inclination, that he was not born to obey, but to command, and with this designe B he framed the minds of the French, by his first actions, to beleue that he had parts fit to make a strange alteration in a Realme, But let vs apply that great diuine Oracle, and tremble at the apprehension of the horror of Gods iudgements: For this cause will I destroy thee in the end: he will put thee out of thy tabernacle, and thy root out of the land of the lining. The just shall see it and feare, and shall laugh at him, saying: Behold the man that hath not taken God for his ayde and succor, but hath trusted to the multitude of his riches, and hath fortified himselfe in vanity.

At the noise hereof, the Cardinall of Guise (being amazed) recouers the doore to goe away. Larchant stays him with the Archbishop of Lion, and lodgeth them in a little chamber about the Kings, lately built for Capuchins and Feuillants. The Cardinall in the heat of this tumult calls forth some words, which hee would neuer haue deliuered being well aduised. They report it vnto the King. The Kings commands La Bassife and Valency, being both of the five & forty, to kill him. The first excuseth himselfe, the other accepts the charge, and accompanied with fixe others, goesto the Cardinals chamber, to make him a companion of his brothers death: but being ready to doe the execution, I know not what cold apprehension quenched this heat, which had moued him to bathe his hands in the blood of so great a Prelate without respect of his Order.

The Cardinall of Bourbon, the Duchesse of Nemours (mother to the Duke of Guise) the Duke of Nemours her sonne by the second marriage, the Prince Ginville now Duke of Guise, and the D. of Elbeuf had at the same instant guards appointed them, to be assured of their persons. Pericard being kept prisoner, discovered all the practices of the League, and by the instructions he had in his keeping, he informed the King at large of all his masters designes. The Earle of Brisac, Bou. Dauphin and some other Gentlemen (faithfull to the Duke of Guise) the President Newly, and Prouost of Merchants at Paris, Compan and Custeblanche, Sherifffes of the said towne, and Le Roy Lieutenant of Amiens, were put in prison: the rest stayed neither for boots nor spurs to dislodge.

Rostene Secretary to the Duke of Mayenne, and son-in-law to Armonuill, Maior of Orleans, had already by speciall posts, aduertised his master of what had past: and so practiseth them of Orleans, as Entragues coming from Blois to bee assured of the towne, found a generall revolt. Doubtlesse the Inhabitants were inclined to the Kings obedience, if before he would haue granted them, at their humble sute, another Gouernor at his Maiesties choice then him, who at the first had engaged them, and afterwards by his wilfulness suffered them to runne into the Labyrinth of Rebellion. It is good to yeeld something to a murinuous multitude, and not to thrust them into despair. The execution done, the King carries newes thereof to the Queene-mother. Madame (saith he) I will hereafter reigne alone, I haue no more companions. She answered him, God grant my sonne is fall out well for you: but haue you giuen order to assure the towne where the name and memorie of the Duke of Guise hath credit and authority. This vnexpected speech did wonderfully moue the Queene-mother, but that of the Cardinall of Bourbon gaue her a deadly wound. Ah Madame! (saith he, the comming to visit him being a prisoner and sicke) you haue brought vs to slaughter. She excusing her selfe that she had neither consented nor giuen counsell in this action, left the Cardinall doubling his complaints, and transported with griefe, he died the first of Ianuary following. At night they draw the Cardinall and the Archbishop from their Chamber, to lodge them in a straighter and more obscure place, and there to passe the night, whilst that the King (with-held by the considerations of the quality of a Prelate, a Peere of France, Archbishop of Reims, Cardinall at Rome, and President of this Order at the Estates) consulted either of his execution, or freedom.

Death of late Queene-mother.

A dome from prison. But Iustice hath no respect of persons: and treason is a worse president in a Cardinall then in a simple Priest. Moreover, the Cardinall might succeed in his brothers credit, and his threats seemed dangerous if hee liued longer. So the King giues Captaine Gast commission to kill him. He craves pardon: but 400 Crownes doe easily find four ministers for the execution. The Archbishop had his life saved, at the humble sute of the Baron of Lux his vnle. The King loued this Gentleman, and pretended to draw from the Prelate all the Quintessence of the league. The punishment of these two, freed the King of Nauarre from being the cause of the misery of these ciuill warres, seeing the King had thereby noted the first author of these troubles. But this Prince B was neuer seene without a singular constancy in his greatest crosses, nor an admirable modesty in his highest prosperities. He vnderstands of the death of two of his mightiest enemies, and would gladly haue seene the Kings wrath and forces turned against the house of Lorraine, whereby he might make his profit in France by the fall thereof, and apply it to his aduantage. But Noble minds neuer looke on their enemies head, but with a heavy and mournfull countenance. He lamented not so much the death but the misery of them of Guise: and yet continues his enterprise which he had vpon Niort, and the 24 of December, vnder the conduct of S. Gelas, Parabel, Harambure, Ranques, Preau, Valieres, and others, he forced & scaled the towne being amazed, and spoiled it, without any slaughter but of five and twenty, or thirty men, no raising of women, not injury to the Clergy. The same day he receiued the Cattle by composition from Malisore, furnished with five great Cannons, and two very long Culuerins; with the which the Lieutenant of the towne, a wicked and a turbulent man, vaned (when they were cast) to salute the King when he approached the walles of Niort. But the great fury of the victors armes, hauing slaine him in the beginning of the fight, was the cause he made not an exemplary compensation for the out-rages and the vnworthy speeches hee had vied against the said King and the Princes of the blood.

Niort taken by the King of Nauarre.

The Duke of Nevers, on the other side, battered Ganache, and the fourth of February (hauing spent 800 cannon-shot) he made two breaches, and gave an assault, with the losse of about 300 men, and growing resolute in this conquest, where his honor was engaged, D he lets Plessigette, Captaine of the place, vnderstand that he had won reputation enough in the defence of so weak a place, that his obstinacy did preiudice the King of Nauarres affaires: that the King by the execution done at Blois, had sufficiently declared war against the league, and that he meant to imploy the said Kings forces against them. Plessie aduertiseth the King his master: he marcheth to succor him, but his violent trauell on foot to get him heat in an extreame cold season, made him stay so dangerously sicke of a fever at S. Perre, as the newes of his death was caried to Court. So Plessie yeelded vp the towne, his armes and baggage saved. But this royall army came to nothing: the Duke went to refresh himselfe at his house, waucring some monthes doubtfull of his party: and the king of Nauarre (whom God would vie in so confused a time, to bring him vpon the Theater, E not as a disinherited child, according to the intent of the Estates, but to teach men that their struing is in vaine against the decrees of his diuine providence) hauing recovered his perfect health, assured himselfe of the places neere vnto Niort, S. Maixant, Malleyaye, Chastelleraut, London, Lisle, Bouchar, Mirebeau, Yionne and others, pretending to doe the King some great and notable seruice.

Genachie yeelded to the duke of Nevers.

The King by this blow had amazed, but not suppressed the league. He had begun well for the warranty of his Estate, but he must not doe things by halues. In stead of going to horse, making his armes to glister, shewing himselfe betwixt Orleans and Paris, calling backe his army out of Poitou, to oppose it against the attempts of the duke of Mayenne, and (being armed, and the towne amazed at this great effect) to diuert the mischief F which oppressed him within fewe months, hee returns to his first remedies, being soft and fearefull, against a mad multitude, hee is content to send words to retaine his subjects already entred into sedition: he releaseth some prisoners whom he held least dangerous, continues the Estates, renues the Edict of Union, and by a generall forgetting of what was past, thinks they will lay downe their armes against him, to imploy them against the King of Nauarre. But a multitude grows mad with misdeeds, and is reuined by severity. The King finds, that in lesse then six weekes, Tours and Baugency are the frontiers of those Provinces that were vnder his obedience. And whereas he thought to begin the new

ceaseth to raigne. So God, who laughed at the vaine attempts of the one, will likewise A heape vpon the other, remedies no lesse violent then those he had practised.

Now many awaked from their amazement, began to stir: the people studied of new munities and new armies. Orleans shut vp their gates: the towne made barricades against the Cittadel: Paris shewed the fury of their mutiny against the Louvre, they beat downe the Kings armes, imprison his seruants, and aswell by their ranfomes and spoile as by a voluntary contribution, they leauy a great sum of money for the war. Marteau, Cas-schlanche, Compan, Roland and others (deliuered vpon promises to reclaime the Parisiens) had contrariwise seduced the people. The sixtene Tribunes (let vs know them by their names, euen as they are set downe in an oration made by the Bourgeses of Paris to the Cardinall Caetan) la Bruyere, Crucé, Buffy le Clerc, the Commissary Louchard, Morlier, Sensault, the Commissary de Bart, Drouart an Aduocate, Aluquin, Emonnot, Iablier, Massier, Passart, Oudeman, Teller, and Morin a Proctor of the Chastelet (euerie one of which had many Agents and followers) like sixtene furies, coming out of hell, sharpened their weapons, and kindled the coales of murder and dissolutenesse, first at Paris, and then in a manner in all the good townes of the Realme, being seasoned with the leuaine of these furious Tribunes. The Preachers (sire-brands of these furies) came not into the pulpit, but to powre forth reproaches, and iniuries against the King, and by an blinde of curse to kindle the peoples minds to rebellion. The people came neuer from their sermons, but hauing fire in their heads, readinesse in their feet to runne, and disposition in their hands, to fall tumultuously vpon such as were not branded with the marke of the league.
He was neither a good nor a zealous Catholike that had not a bed-rowle of out-rages to detest and abhorre that execution of Blois.

The porters at the Palace babled nothing, but a cursing of the Kings life: an Elegy to lament the calamity of these two brethren; an Oration in memory of the commendable exploits of the Duke of Guise in Hungary against the Turke, at Iarnac against the Protestants, at Poitiers, at Montcontour against the Restles of Thoré, at Vimory & at Aumau.
They cried aloud at Paris: that France was now sicke, and could not be cured but by gi-uing her a drinke with the blood of France. And because they haue not the body at their devotion, those things hee possessest must suffer for it: his furniture at the Louvre, his pictures are broken, his armes beate downe, his Images dragged vp and downe, his great seale defaced: they call him impious, vniuelt, villaine, prophane, tyrant, damned. The Col-ledge of Sorbonne concludes by a publicke act of the seuenth of Ianuary, *That the people of France are freed from the oath of obedience and fealty which they ought to Henry of Valois:
and that lawfully, and with a good conscience they may arme against him; rescine his renenues, and imploy it to make warre against him.*

On the other side, Charles of Lorraine Duke of Mayenne, dreaming on his brothers death, provided for the assurance of his owne life, & consulted with the Archbishops Of-ficiall, the Lord of Bothen Senehall of Lionnois, and some others of the chiefe, whether there were any safety for him within their towne. We are (said they) bound vnto the King before all others. Make no triall (we pray you) of your seruants, in that which shall be contrary to the Kings will. Arme not your selfe against him: without doubt hee will seeke your seruice, when you shall submit the passion of reuenge vnto reason, and will aduance your house to the good of all France, the which trembles with apprehension of of the calamities which this warre shall cause. If the people call you, to set them at liberty, you shall abandon them to the spoile: and to defend the Monarchy against the King, you shall make your selfe the head of a confused and monstrous Anarchy. God did neuer forget the protection of Kings against their mutinous subiects. They bee the Images of God, the children of heauen: and whosoever armes against them, armes against heauen.
Moreover, the winde of the peoples fauor, may for a time fill your giles, and carie you designes violently to sea, but they are inconstant, light, and disloyall. And if they haue shaken off the yoke of duttfull obedience and loue to their King, what shall they doe to a Prince, to whom they shall not be bound, but as to the Protector of their mutinies?

They spake truly, for after the triall of all sorts of government, France must in the end returne to a royalty: and the Duke (by a commendable resolution) might haue vnted the miades which his brother had diuided. But when as others represent vnto him the aduan-tage he should haue to succeed in the fauour, credit, and authority of his brother; and by

The Duke of Mayennes
cousin.

A consequence his owne hopes: hee reiects the integrity of the first councill: conspires all the friends of his house to reuenge, parts from Lions on Christmas day: in his passage he assures himselfe of Malcon, Chaalon and Dijon. The Court of Parliament there, refused to consent to this rebellion, and therefore the chiefe were driuen away, and some imprisoned: others (apprehending the losse of their commodities) did easily submit their neckes to the yoke of a new Democracy. At Dijon he receiued letters from the King, promising to surcease the punishment of forepassed faults, with the death of his bretheren, whom (said he) I haue caused to die, to saue my life from the danger whereof you did aduertise me. The Duke (attributing the Kings clemency to some weak and abiect affection, proceeding from feare, either to haue him his enemy, or to lose his friendship) grows obstinate in his resolution, reiects the Kings Officers, giues commission to Rojne, Saint Paul, and others, to command in Champagne and Bric, and to seize vpon the best places: hee comes to Troyes, where the towne (long before corrupted by the infected humors of the league) receiued him with as great honor as they could haue done their King: and in all places where he passed, they were easily drawne into rebellion, all townes framing themselves after the modell of Paris and Orleans.

Three thousand men sent from Paris, to succor the Cheualier d' Aumale (besieged in Orleans by the Marshall of Aumont, with the Nobility of the Court, some troopes of foot and horse, and the Kings guards) had beene defeated neere vnto Estampes, by Fargis
C and Montigni: but the Marshall vnderstanding of the Duke of Mayennes approach, raiseth the siege, and retires to Boigency. In the meane time, the King himselfe in person did view and examine the conclusions of the Estates: but this sudden enterprise of the Dukes, made him to leaue the worke imperfect, and to provide for the safety of his person: and for a conclusion, the fifteenth and sixteenth of Ianuary, he heard the Deputies griefe and complaints vpon the disorders which afflicted France.

The Archbishop of Bourges, President for the Clergy after the Cardinals death, imputed the cause of our miseries to contempt of Religion, which breaking the bonds that ties vnto God, had in like sort diuided the hearts and wils of families and commonalities.
He greatly commended the Kings zeale to Religion: insisted long vpon the abuses of D the Church, which the corruption of the time had bred: the vnworthy promotion of Prelats: the nomination (to Abbies, and other spiritual dignities) of all sorts of persons, soldiers, ignorant men, suborned men, guardians, symoniaks, women, and children; touching the alienation of the Clergy lands, plurality of benefices, vsurpation of the re-uenues of Hospitals, depauration of that goodly ancient order, whereby none might come vnto Commanderies of the order of the Knights of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, vnlesse he were a Gentleman of three descents: disorders of Vniuersities and Monasteries, in former times the nurceries of holy Fathers. Then he turned his discourse to the disorders noted in the Nobility of France, who were in former ages the terrour of all nations, and from whom neighbour nations confesse to haue learned the exercise and profession of E Cheualry: vpon the excesse of men of war: vpon the wasting of the treasure, and other disorders which spring from these first heads: finally, he beseeched the King, to make a good reformation, whereby his people should multiply, Iustice should daily flourish, and peace should be set in the Realme.

Charles of Cossé Earle of Brissac, chiefe Panler and chiefe Fawconer of France, newly restored to fauour, and President for the Nobility, shewes that they be not the hands of Fortune, which enuironed his Maiesties fore-head with this double Diadem. It is God, who hath established him our King, who had before chosen him King of a more remote nation, for the piety, faith, clemency, and magnanimity wherewith he hath bene indued from his tender age. That heresie, schisme, and discord, which are crept into the peoples hearts, haue not taken their beginning vnder his raigne, whom God hath raised vp amidst the furies and afflictions of France, to be reuenged by him, and aduanced aboue all the nations of Christendome, who draw their firmest support from the stability of his Crowne. That the wished victories in France ouer heresie, shall be vnto the King but a continuance of the rout and defeat of that fearefull army of Restles, Lansquenets, Suisses and French Huguenots, which (like so many trumpets) proclaime in all places the honors, praises, and victories of his Maiesty. That now those vowes, fastings, teares, and toyles of the ancient French, are heard, who seemed to demand vengeance against the fire, fury, and rage of those, who after so many religious ages) have violated the sepulchers of their A fathers and ours, and would take from amongst vs that only religion which the holy fathers have planted in old time throughout the world.

Then having represented the zeale and affection of the Nobility to assist the King, to restore Religion, and the State to their former beauty, following the example and the hereditary virtue of their Ancestors, who had chased and vanquished the Gothes, Vandales, Arriens, Albigeois, Lombards, Sarazins, Turkes and Pagans: and continuing the defence of the faith, and the victories of the French Kings, have left no other limits to the reputation of their valor, then those which the Sunne takes in making of his course about the earth. He beseecheth his Maieity, to fauour the ancient priuiledges of the Nobility, B to recompence in them the seruices to their Predecessors: to confirme the military discipline of Kings his fore-runners: not to suffer any by fauour or purchase, to challenge the title of Gentlemen: to maintain the priuiledges of the Knights of S. Iohn of Ierusalem, to cut off the superfluities in Iustice: to moderate the subsidies: order the treasure, establish the Magistrature, plant discipline among souldiers, reforme the Church, and to punish the enemies thereof. Finally, he wished a thousand happinesse to the King, and peace to his people. But this braue and commendable humor shall not hold him long, but he shall returne to his first party, by a new defection.

The Advocate
seignid.

Bernard Advocate of the Parliament of Dijon, began his oration with a solemne thanks for the Kings promise, fully to execute the Edict of the Vnion: he exhorted all the townes C and subiects of the Realme, to vnit themselves not only in religion, but also in good correspondency for the Kings seruice, continuation of his dignity, and defence of the estate. He discovered all the other infirmities of this polittike body, the which (besides the vicer of partialities) have strangely corrupted it: as Blasphemies, Adulteries, Witchcraft, Simony, outrage in souldiers, inuotors of subsidies, and new Edicts, executors of extraordinary Commissions, Brokers, and buyers of Offices, who waste the treasure, and bring the people to beggery. An inuective against so many Edicts registred with this Apostil: By commandment many times reiterated: seeing that in good and iust Edicts, the Soueraign Princes command is not necessary: against the treasure ill employed, and the strange oppressions of France. Then requiring a conclusion of the Estates, he beseeched his Maieity D to open the eyes of his wisdom, for the ease of his poore people: not to change his godly resolutions: and to dismiss the Deputies, considering the mutinies that were in their Prouinces: to see and make proofe (said he) of the effects of their good wills. But these wills were for the most part subiect vnto those that (vnder a goodly shew of waire for religion and the publike good) studied of nothing but rebellion, cruelty, treacherie, trouble, and confusion. Thus the Estates ended, and the King fore-seeing the extreme oppression of his subiects, in so great a leauy of armes, abates the fourth part of their subsidies, and sent to all the Prouinces, to assure them of his good intent. But his subiects were too much affected to mutinies, too capable of disobedience, too ready to spoile the wife and the rich. The mourning of the Duchesses of Guise, Nemours, and Montpensier, being set at liberty by the King, to bind them to bee intercessors to his mutinous people: E the furious cries of Boucher, Guarin, Cneill, Rozé, Pelletier, Guinefre, Hamilton, Christin, Lucain, Maclerc, Comuollet, Feuarden, and other such Preachers (very fire-brands of sedition) the perswasions of the Prouost of Merchants, of the Sheriffes of Paris, and other Magistrates of townes, freely released by the King: had too wickedly seduced them. But the Duke of Mayennes arrival at Paris, confirmed the Inhabitants more in the execution of the fore said decree of Sorbonne.

The Centre of Parliament at Paris unpri-soned.

This decree (quite contrary to those by the which this College hath so often commendably withstood the vndue and violent proceedings of the Court of Rome, against the Estate of this Realme) could not take effect, whilest that Maiesticall and reuerent Parliament, the true guardian of this Crowne, had either force or authority. So one of the fixteene, Buffe le Clerc a poore petty fogger (late much honoured, being admitted to present himselfe bare-headed vpon his knee before this reuerent assembly) followed by some of his acquaintance and companions, and a band of armed rascals, enters the fixteenth of January, armed with a Cuirasse, and a Pistoll in his hand, into the great Chamber, with an intent to cary away the first President De Harby, and the other Presidents and Councel- F lers, who persisting in the fidelity of their charge, might crosse the mad and satall designs of

A of the league. The whole body ashamed to see themselves dismembred by this insolent and presumptuous attempt, followed their head. Buffe then leads them away all, in triumph, two and two, prisoners to the Bastile and Loure. Such as were Royalists were kept there, the rest (which leaned to this popular fury) preferred their houses from the spoile which this Tribune had pretended, and were sent home. Some aduertised of this new Commission, sued their persons, but not the confiscation of their goods and reuenues. That man was happy that found a friend where to hide himselfe, or that could get away disguised in his seruants weeds, and so march many daies on foot to recouer Tours, or some other place of the Kings obedience. All diuine and humane Lawes were subuerted, B respect of equity abolished, and the reuerence of publike authority defaced. The Officers of the Parliament being enlarged, gine the place of the first President to Barnabé Brisson: then they make a declaration in manner of an oath, for the entertainment of the vnion. The Princes of Loraine and many gentlemen sweare vnto it, the fixteene subscribe it, one amongst them prick himselfe in the arme, to signe it with his owne blood: but remaining lame thereby, he was mockt by his companions.

The people made a generall councill of the vnion, consisting of forty choise men of the three Estates, the which was confirmed by the Parliament, to dispose of the publike affaires, and to confer with the Prouinces & townes of the League. For the Church, Brezé Bishop of Meaux, Rozé Bishop of Senlis, Villars Bishop of Agen, Prouost Curat of S. Seuerin, Boucher Curat of S. Benner, Aubry Curat of S. Andrews, Pelletier Curat of S. James, Pigeon Curat of S. Nicolas, Launoy Chanoine of Soissons, & sometime minister at Sedan: for the Nobility the Marquis of Canillac, the Siegneur of Menneville, S. Pol, Rozé, Montberault, Hautefort, Saussay: for the third Estate, Maseparault, Neaill, Gouquely, Misdorger, Mochault, Bafon, Marillac, Acharie, de Bray, Beaucier, Bruyere Lieutenant Ciuill, Anroux, Fontanon, Drouart, Crucé, Bordeaux, Halaguein, Soly, Bellanger, Pencher, Senault, Charpentier, all Lawyers or men of trafficke. The great men enter presently into iellousie of this number, whereas the people commanded: so as (by the Dukes importunity and the aboue-named Princes) they adde vnto them Hennequin Bishop of Rennes, the Abbot of Lenoncourt, the Presidents Lanin, Yeuue, Le Maistre, Dormiffon, Videuille, D' A D mours a Councillor, Villery, both father and son, Sermoise, Dampierre, La Bourdaisiere, Le Fay, and many others, who to cary it away by plurality of voices, called vnto them the President Le Sueur, Bragelonne Treasurer, Rowland a Sheriffe, & others, who assisting one another with their voices, ouerthrew many things which those that were deputed for the people were ready to decree, for the confirmation of their tyranny.

The Duke of Mayenne (to settle his affaires) suffers these base companions to play the petty King. Those of the Clergy, exceeding the authority of the Church, doe in their sermons excommunicate the father that knoweth his sonne to be the Kings seruant, and reueales him not to the Councill of the vnion: the sonne that discouers not his father, the wife and the husband that accuse not one another, the kinsmen and friends that discover not the goods of their kindred and friends being absent, to be employed in the warres. E The Nobility reapes some profit of the ransomes and spoiles of the Royalists and Politikes. The people condemne, imprison, spoile and ransom, of their absolute power, and sell the goods of any that beares not the marke of their enraged faction. This furious combustion of Paris, sets all the Realme on fire: townes and prouinces frame themselves after the mould of the capitall City. Chartres begins the dance: expels Sourdis their Governour, and receiues Reclainville a Gentleman of Beaufe, a partisan of the League. This town imports much for the Estate of Paris, as one of their chiefe graniers for corne. The Duke of Mayenne postes thither, to be assured thereof, and the people receiue him as their Redeemer.

F Being ariued there, Rouan sends for him. He goes: and in all places as he passeth, they meet him, present him their keyes, and sweare to obey him. Those of Mans murder many of the Kings Officers and seruants, spoile others, seize vpon Fargis their Governour, and send him prisoner to Paris. Angiers was assured for the King: but the Duke of Mercœur Governour of Britan, subdiuided in a manner all the Prouince to his party. Thoulouze murders Duranti their first President (a man who in all the fires he had formerly kindled, did neuer shew that hee had any taste of a Huguenot in him) and Dasse the Kings Aduocate. Aix, Arles, and Marçilles plant vp suddenly the Ensignes of the League, and follow the dance with the rest. Lion iumps with them, and growing suspitious of the passage of Colonel Alphonso Corle (afterwards Marshall of France, vnder the title of Ornano) to command the army in Daulphiné which the Duke of Mayenne had abandoned, they declare the occasion why they take armes, (weare to maintaine good correspondency with the Princes, Gentlemen and Inhabitants of Paris, and other townes vnited, and to put in execution all the Duke of Nemours commandements, who was now escaped out of the Caste of Blois. But we shall see this people as easie to mutine against him, as they were now ready to allow him for their Governour. Charles retained almost all Champanaigne in their duty and obedience. Rosne was Governour there. But the whole body of the City, aduertised of this great execution at Blois, let him vnderstand: that seeing the Duke of Guise his master was dead, his authority was extinct. and that acknowledging no other Soueraine but the King, they would preferue their City from all strange enterprises. Langes deserves an honorable testimony, to haue lesse then all other fostered rebels, and to haue constantly opposed themselves against all the attempts of the league. In other Prouinces the townes bandy directly one against another, and the most modest affecting neither party, keepe themselves from the storme. The King beholds this pitifull Tragedy, acted vpon the Theater of his Estate, and thinks yet to reclaim his subjects by mildnesse. He pardoneth, he abolisheth, he forgets all, so as euery one will performe the duty of a subject, and againe promisseth the oblation of his Edicts of vnion, in fauour of the Catholikes, an for the extirpation of heresie. But in the end, patience provoked, turnes into fury. He sees that the Princes, the Prouost of Merchants, & the Sheriffs of Paris which were dismissed, doe lie vnto Nes Rayen, they cast oyle in stead of water vpon the fires that are kindled. Seeing therefore, the more he seekes by mildnesse to reduce these strangers to the right way, the more violent they grow in their furious passions: he now vseth his authority, hee makes sundry proclamations, aswell against the D. of Mayenne, the Duke and Cheualier of Amale, as against the Cities of Paris, Orleans, Chartres, Rouan, Amiens, Abbeuille and other adherents, pronounceth both heads and members, disloyall, rebels, guilty and convicted of the crimes of rebellion, treachery and treason in the highest degree: degrades them and their posterity of all honor, it by the beginning of March they submit not themselves to his obedience. And to ioyne armes to his declarations, he makes a speedy leauy of twelue thousand Suisses, by the Lord of Sansy, who molested the Duke of Sauoy vnder the Kings authority, about Geneva, where hauing taken the townes of Bonne, Gex, Thonon and their Castles, he besieged the fort of Rapaille, where the dukes succors led by Cont Martinengues, were defeated, Martinengues slaine in battell, with about 2000 men, and the place yielded: in the end hee calls the Nobility vnto him, sends forth many Commissions to leaue souldiers, transports the execution of iustice to Tours, which was wont to be in his Parliament at Paris hee commands his chamber of accounts, and all his Officers of the marble table, to repaire presently to Tours, to attend their charges, and deprives from all honors, charges, dignities, E and priuiledges, all townes adhering to these new reuolts.

This did but kindele more the fires of rebellion. The D. of Mayenne armes both horse and foot, practiseth without the Realme, seekes to the King of Spaine, sends out patentes and Commissions vnder a new seale, usurpes all the parts of Royall Maiesty, goes to field with his troopes, makes choise of the most resolute, and goes to Vendosme with a designe to surpris the King in Tours being ill accompanied. All the great councill was at Vendosme, vnder the assurance and word of Maille-Bouchard Gouernor of the towne. But the rich treasures of these Lords were an enticing baitte to a disloyall and wicked soule: He suffers Rosne to enter, and deliueres them all vnto him, to dispose of as prisoners of war: A treachery added to other crimes which shall cost him his head in the market-place of Vendosme, when the towne is taken.

The league increased daily, and the King had need to vse the King of Nauarres forces, and where could he find more trusty French men in so vrgent necessity. To this end he sends to his brother in law, Diana of Poitiers the Duchesse of Angoulême, bastard daughter to King Henry the second, and inuities him to make a truce betwix them, that by their common forces they may more commodiously withstand the furious attempts of Reconciliation of the Kings.

A of the enemies of the Realme, Peter of Mornay, Lord of Buhy Marshall of the campe for the King, and Philip of Mornay, Lord of Pleffis, Marli his brother, superintendant of the King of Nauarres house, treat this truce for the two Kings, and conclude vpon these conditions; that the Towne, Caste, and bridges of Saumur, should be put into the King of Nauarres hands for the safety of his passage and of his forces. That all matters vntill a firme peace were concluded (the which should be treated of before the end of the yeare) should remaine in the state they were in: and for a retreat for sicke and wounded men, one of the three places which should be reduced by their common forces, provided alwaies it were no head of a Seneſhawry nor Bayliwicke. So the King of Nauarre hauing placed Du Plessis gouernour of the Towne, Caste and Seneſhawry of Saumur, and Du Faur at Largeau vpon Loire, he freed all suspitions, and all impressions of distrust which they gaue him to diuert his enterueiw. He passeth Loire the 28 of Aprill with foure hundred masters, and a thousand Harguebuziers on horse backe, to ioyne with the forces of Normandy, Maine, and other places that attended him: and the last of the moneth doth his duty vnto the King within the park of Pleffis les Tours, the one making a great shew of loue, the other of a free and ready resolution (laying aside all icalousie and impressions of distrust, whereby some would haue diuerted this enterueiw) and both of a singular and mutual content.

Three dayes were spent in discourse and conference. The King of Nauarre had repaid the riuier, to cause his foot to aduance: and the Duke of Epsernon (who was newly arised with foure hundred horse, and two thousand foot) marched towards Blois, to keepe the inhabitants in awe: when as the Duke of Mayenne (who stayed at Vendosme) seeing the Kings forces diuided, and trusting in the intelligences he had with some great personages about the King, makes a march of twelue leagues, and the 8 of May appears with his Vantguard about the suburbs of Saint Symphorian of Tours, whither the King was gone to wake, He was scarce thirty paces from the suburbs, when as a man came running to the towne, and knowing his Maiesty, My Liege (saith he) retire your selfe, the league follows me. So the King mans the suburbs, with the Regiments of his guards of Picardy, of Rubempré, of Gerzely conuered from the league to the Kings seruice (grieved with that shamefull fight: hee had made vnder Duke Mayenne, being chased by the King of Nauarre vnto the Suburbs of Nantes) hee causeth them to make barricadoes, fers the Marshall D'Amont at the gate vpon the bridge, and the Suisses of Colonel Galati within the Towne. Hee sends for the King of Nauarre, who was at Chinon, and the Duke of Epsernon at Blois. The Duke of Tremouille and Chastillon Colonel of the King of Nauarres foot-men, arise within few houres. They fight at many barricadoes on foot, then they made the retreat with the Lord of Grillon, who commanded the regiment of the Guarde, hauing a Harguebuze shot through the body. Their troopes arise towards the euening, whom the King caused to be lodged in some Islands neere vnto the enemy all night.

E In the meane time the Duke of Mayenne begins the skirmish, forceth some barricadoes, and kills many souldiers. Gerzely (seeking with too braue a resolution to keepe the enemies from taking vp of his hat, which was fallen from him in defending his barricado with his pike) lost his life. The Duke comes, and about foure of the clocke winnes the suburbs, and threatned the towne. The Inhabitants trembled; and those with whom the Duke had intelligence studied to effect their designs. As the night gaue some rest vnto their armes, the King of Nauarres troopes arise: the Duke of Epsernon did second him. As soone as the day began to breake, the Duke aduertised of these new succours, burnt two great Arches of wood, and the houses at the entry of the bridge, and with a speed equall to his coming, returned the same way, leauing a great suspicion against such as accompanied the King, to haue sought great meanes to deliuer him without striking stroke.

His Maiesty aduised to giue his enemy a free passage to returne. It were folly (saith hee with a pleasant countenance) to haue a double Henry against one Carolus, which is the Duke of Mayennes name. It is a horror to thinke of the infolencies, spoiles, murders, ravishings, sacriledge, blasphemies, irreligions, which these braue Champions (armed for the defence of the Catholike religion) did practice in these suburbs, euen in the Church of S. Symphorian. The Vicar and the Chaplaine beaten and bound all night, did see the coffers broken, the goods caried away, women and maids (that were fled thither as into a sanctuary) rauished: and which is worse, they steale away holy things, as Coopes and Ornaments of the Altar, the Robes and Vestments of Priests, & many Chalice of siluer mettalls, carrying away those of siluer, as belonging to heretikes and royalists (as they termed them) and therefore good prize: and the others that were not siluer they left behind, being (say they) of the vnion. The Cheualier D'Aumale and his people shewed themselves braue artificers in these exploits.

Doublelesse the vnion hath more disunited the Church, and more ruined the Catholike religion in few yeares, then the Protestants had done in many. We haue sene their fouldiers (and amongst them many Priests and Monkes that had cast away their frocks) force Vicars & Curats of Parishes in Lent (with a dagger at their throats) to giue them caluer, sheepe, lambs, pigs, kids, hens, capons, and other flicth, vnder the names of pikes, carpes, barbles, soles, turbot and herings, whilst the College of Sorbonne, and their Preachers, thunder out against their lawfull Prince and Soueraigne. The essentiall forme of a zealous Catholike was then, to rob Churches, to rauish wiues and Virgins, to murder men against the Altars, and to spoile the Clergy, not to be the Kings seruants, which that age held for a crime, but to vomit out against him all the indignities, and all the wickedesse, which religion and impiety could inuent in mad fouldiers.

We know the Lion by his pawes. The towne of Arquenay (three leagues from Laual) had a Church guilt & enriched by the Lords of Rombouiller, and at that time filled with all the goods of the Inhabitants. Commerande, with a regiment of seuen or eight hundred men (hauing ouer-runne and spoiled the Countrey of Aniou, and the Countie of Laual) comes thither with his men to lodge, in the end of Aprill, who burnt the doores of the Church, sackt it quite, hauing no respect of the feminine sex: they slue a poore man at the foot of the crucifixe, complaining that in the same place they had rauished his wife: they did their excrements in the holy water stocke; perfumed all the Church with their stinkinsse, applied to their owne eyes the ornaments of our Lady, sold the coopes, the banner and reliques to the Monkes of Eurons: the Chalice and crosse of siluer to them of Vagute: and to heape vp the measure of their villanies (hauing taken the Pixe of siluer and some foure and twenty of their holy cakes in it) one of them atired himselfe like a Priest, D causing some twenty of the fouldiers to kneele downe, and with his hands imbrued with blood and sacriledge, distributed them vnto them, and trode the rest vnder his feet. The like they did within few daies after at Thorigny.

It sufficeth amongst so many to haue noted this horrible impiety in particular, that posterity may learne, that armes doe not edifie but destroy the Altars: and that piety dwels not much among such as follow the campe. The re-union of the two Kings had greatly troubled the Leaguers of Paris. Now they cease not to draw Articles, instructions and aduertisements, both within, and without the Realme: they forget nothing that may confirme the building of their confusion. They send their Deputies to Rome, the Commander de Dion, the Councillor Coguelay, the Abbot of Orbais, and the Deane E of Rheims: who iustifie their actions to the Pope: demand a Legate, promise the publication of the councill of Trent, beseech his Holinesse, to bee gracious and fauourable to their designs, and to the townes of their affociation, and to contribute to the charge of this common warre, whereof they must beare the chiefe burthen. Indeed they had need of much money, to furnish the expences of so many petty Kings: but some filled their cofers, others payed their debts, and some bought lands & Lordships. Thus the people are the instruments of great men, and the sheffe wheron all kinde of stormes and tempests doe beat.

Liberty exceeded in all places, and rage against the Kings authority seemed desperate. The fire of this reuolt had kindled the heart and all the corners of the Realme: and generally there was nothing but inroades, spoiles, surprizing and facking: when as suddenly many checks amaze the League, and giue hope of a speedy reuiuing of the Kings affaires. The Duke of Montpensier, assisted by the Lords of Hallot, Creueceur, Bacqueuille, and Larchant was in Normandy, with forces for his Maiesties seruice: and for the first fruits, hauing defeated the garrison of Falaise, taken three Captaines, cut most of their companies in peeces, and dispersed the rest, they besieged the towne, and had brought it ready to yeeld, when as the Earle of Brissac (who of late did wonders in speaking well

A at the Estates in the kings fauor) advanced with about three hundred Gentlemen, and five or six thousand foot, whom they called Gaultiers, and made the Duke abandon the siege to encounter them. They lodged in three villages: the Duke forceth two, kills such as make resistance, and chafeth the rest with small difficulty. The Earle flies with al his horse, leaving a thousand or twelue hundred prisoners, and about 1000 slaine vpon the place, amongst the which were found many Gentlemen.

After this attempt of the Duke of Mayenne, in the suburbs of Tours, the King sends the Lord of Lorges to discover the enemy: the Duke of Aumale hath intelligence thereof, and sends some troopes to charge him. The Lord of Chastillon passeth at Boisygeny B with two hundred horse, and as many harguebuziers to second Lorges, and cauleth Fouquerolles to aduance with twenty Gentlemen towards Bonneuall. They meet with Reclainville, who commanded in Chartres. He offers to discover them, they charge him, and kill five or six of his men: he retires in haste, and giues the alarm to the troopes of Picardy, led by Saueuse & Les Broffes, who commanded about three hundred masters, and a good number of Harguebuziers on horse backe, and on foot. The two Commanders Chastillon and Saueuse are in front one against another. No man makes shew to recoyle, and both resolute to fight. Saueuse puts his Harguebuziers before, and placeth his Lancers in hay, approaching softly without disbanding. Chastillon disposeth of his foot, makes two battalions of his horse, and sets Charboniere and Harambure on his left hand, C with their companies of light horse, and then he aduanceth to the charge. Saueuse chargeth resolutely. His Harguebuziers on horse backe very neere. Chastillon too tem receiue them in like sort, and with one breath enter amongst the horse that were come to the charge: they kill many horses with their swords, and lose but three fouldiers. Saueuse chargeth the light horsemen vpon his right hand, and breaking the first rankes, had vnhorled Chastillon, and some eight or ten Gentlemen, but with the losse of five and twenty horse: as these rise and fight on foot, Harambure and Fouquerolles comes in: they charge Saueuse & his men, kill about sixscore Gentlemen, ouerthrow the rest, and force through them. Thus broken, without meanes to make a new head, euery man flies, twenty one placeth his saterie in the heeles of his horse. Chastillon goes to horse-backe, and pursues, chasing, beating, and killing about threecore more in the flight, with all their Harguebuziers. Two Cornets were gotten, and forty Gentlemen taken, most being hurt in the conflict. Saueuse caried Boisygeny, dyed there of his wounds, not able to bee perlawed by any meanes to acknowledge the King, or scarce to aske God forgiuenesse.

Senlis had of late daies, by the meanes of some good Inhabitants, shaken off the yoaके of the League. It was a troublesome thorne in the Parisiens feet, being distant but one small daies iourney to come from their City towards Picardy. To pull it out, the Duke of Aumale goes from Paris, with some troopes of Balagny, Chamois, Tremont, Congis, Menneville, and an army of the Inhabitants chosen out of euery quarter: he besiegeth, batters E it, and makes a breach, but is repulsed from the assault.

Now they aduise the besieged to provide for their safeties: when as the Duke of Longueuille appeared, being followed by the Lords of Humieres, Bonniet, la Noue, Giury, and other Commanders, the Duke of Aumale turns head, and prepares to fight: but La Noue (whom the King had especially commanded to assist the Duke of Longueuille with counsell in matters of warre) did so wisely make choise of the houre and opportunity to charge, as the duke of Aumale, Balagny gouernor of Cambray, and the rest (putting in practice the vie of their long spur-reuols, lately inuented as a mournfull prediction to the League) saued their persons by the swiftnesse of their horses, and left the field dyed with the blood of fiftene hundred slaine vpon the place, in the flight and pursuit, verifying the saying: Hee that flies betimes, may fight againe. Chamois, Menneville, and diuers others could not run fast enough. The artillery, baggage, and many prisoners remayned at the victors discretion, who by the kings commandement went to receiue the army of strangers which were come to the frontiers. The Kings meaning was to subdue Paris. The greatest of the Hidraes heads being cut off, did weaken the whole body, and gaue hope to his Maistie by that meanes to find what hee had lost, the loue and obedience of his subjects. To this end he sends the Duke of Epemont, to take from the Parisiens the commodities about the riuer, and assembles his forces to compassse them in beneath.

Lest for the King.

Thus the war growes hot: the Nobility goes to horse on all sides to reuenge the wrong A done vnto the King: but the more his troopes increased, the more bitter his subiects grew against him.

No prosperitie is so great, but it hath some crosses. As the King attends the forces which the Prince of Dombes (now Duke of Montpensier) brings him from Tours, newes comes that the Earle of Soissons (whom he had sent to command in Britan) had beene defeated at Chasteauguion three Leagues from Rennes, and led prisoner with the Earle of Auaugour, and many other Lords to Nantes: that the Duke of Mayenne had taken Alençon. That the Lord of Aubigni (a younger brother to the house of Gordes, and a partizan of the League) had chased the Colonel Alphonse out of Grenoble, and seized on the towne. B The taking of these Earles caused the King to send the Prince Dombes thither, who more happily reduced many places to his Maiesties obedience.

But was it reasonable to neglect the imprisonment of a Prince of the blood, and of the companions of his fortune, seeing that the hazard of armes doth not depend vpon him that leads them, and that God doth sometimes crosse them, to the end that man should not make a buckler of his strength, but acknowledge his owne weaknesse. To seeke their liberty, the King commands Capitaine Gentil to make an attempt vpon the towne and Castle of Nantes, and to Sardini, to giue him directions, guides, and boates for his descent vpon the riuer of Loire. As they labour in the execution of this commandement, Behold Sardini is taken and led prisoner to Gilbourg in Anion by Hurtand, Saint Offange C and the Abbot of Saint Maur. So his Maiesty reuokes his first commandement, and wills him (being assisted by Pucharic Gouvernor of Angiers) to attempt to force the Castle of Gilbourg by Petard. He views it, and after the discharge of six Petards he becomes Master of the place, of Hurtand, and of his companions: but they had already transported Sardini to Roch-fort. It did much import his Maiesties seruice to haue this prisoner set at liberty, so as at the instant pursuit of his wife, the King caused Pucharic and Gentil to treat an exchange with Hurtand and the Abbot, suffering the designe of Nantes surcease, to aduance other executions which they had in hand.

Varennes taken.

Varennes in Maine, is situated betwixt Laual, Mans and Sable, by the taking whereof he should giue many strokes with one stone. They did amoy these places which were D held by the factions of the Realme, and the Spanish Partisans, and they made the succors easily for Saint Susanne and Pichellieres, which were besieged by Boisdauphin and Laufac. Fiue blowes with a Petard forced it, and Rochepart did afterwards free those two places from the seruitude which did threaten them.

Gilbertine taken.

Nine other Petards did ioyne vnto the former the conquest of Gilbertiere neere vnto Mauleon in Poictou, and this taken by Gentil, laid the way open to surprize others who had fortified themselves in an Island of the riuer of Loire, beneath Rochfort, and hindered his descent to Nantes. Malicorne Lieutenant for the King in Poictou, hauing assisted him with a hundred men armes and 400 Harguebuziks, he passed by night into the Island and clesed Aniou and Poictou of this furnished Vermin. After which he went to view Gan- E nache, and as he returned, hauing for his guard fiftene or sixteene horsemen which hee led commonly at his owne charge, with Pucheries light-horse and some others, Behold the Seigneure of Aillon led 400 souldiers to Poictiers, by whose induction he takes Crusine and Monateuil by petard. Worthy doublet of our History, hauing neuer spared his paines, the perill of his life, nor his expences, in petards, rolling-bridges & other Engines which F he had often made at his own charge, in entertaining of spies for his guard; hauing not any one vein; but he had prodigally opened it, nor motion, which he hath not with great affection bided to exploit with happy successe the Stratagems which industry had suggested. The successe of the Kings affaires made men to iudge, that the League would soone be ruined, the Kings army increasing hourly. Three hundred horse of La Chastre (who presently after the Tragedy of Blois had made shew to iustifie himselfe vnto the King for the strict familiarity he had with the D. of Guise) were defeated by the duke of Montbazon, and the

A Marquis of Nefle his Lieutenant, and fifty of his company slaine: the taking of Iargeau, Pluuiers, Janville, and Estamps, terrified the Parisiens. They call backe the Duke of Mayenne: and he finding the Duke of Longueville far off, goes into Bry, assures some places, and takes Montreuil-faut-yonne, by composition from the Duke of Elpemon: but the Kings approach caried him suddenly to Paris, where (suffering his troopes to lue at discretion in the suburbs) he caused an ill impression to grow in some which could not well digest this confusion in the State.

An army of about twenty thousand men, gathered together by the Duke of Longueville, ioyning with the Suisses and Lanquenets of Sanly, and Pontoise reduced by force B to the Kings obedience: soone after the Kings arrival, all the Kings forces ioynd in one body, being about 40000 men, lodged about Paris: and the taking of S. Cloud, made the Parisiens ready to yeeld: when as a diuellish Monke, an excrement of hell, a Iacobin by profession, James Clement, of the age of two or three and twenty yeares, vowes (said he) to kill the Tyrant, and to deliuer the City besieged by Sennacherib. Thus resolu'd, he imports his damnable proiect to Doctor Bourgeois Prior of his Couent, to Father Commoles and other Iesuits, and to the heads of the League, to the chiefe of the sixteene, and to the forty Councillors at Paris. All encourage him to this happy designe: they promise him Abbeyes and Bishopricks: and if hee chance to be made a Martyr, no lesse then a place in heauen about the Apostles. They caused the Preachers to perswade the people C to patience seuen or eight daies: for before the end of the weeke, they should see a notable accident, which should set all the people at liberty. The preachers of Orleans, Rouan and Amiens, clatter out the like at the same time, and in the same termes.

Paris besieged.

The first of August, the Monke goes out of Paris, and marcheth toward S. Cloud: vpon his departure, they take about two hundred of the chiefe Citizens and others prisoners, whom they knew to haue goods, friends and credit with the Kings party, as a precaution to redeeme that cursed murder, in case hee were taken before or after the deed. In his way he was stayed by the Regiment of Cuslan which was then in guard; telling them that he went vnto his Maiesty, to let him vnderstand something which concerned his seruice. Cuslan caused him to be conducted by two souldiers to the Kings quarter, D which was at S. Cloud, commanding them, that (if haply the King were not there) they should bring him to some one of the Councill. They meet with La Guesle the Proctor generall, and leaue him with him, hearing of his Maiesties absence. He heares him privately in his lodging: the Monke giues him to vnderstand that the first President and other of the Kings seruants had sent him, to aduertise him, that there is a good number of Partisans at Paris, who if it please his Maiesty to giue them a day and houre, will keep him a port open. And to purchase the more credit to his words, he shewes a certaine paper written in Italian Characters, the which hee said was a letter of credit from the first President, accompanied with a passport from the Earle of Briennes, signed Charles of Luxembourg. And feignes that he had obtained it to goe out of Paris vnder colour of going to E Orleans. That he had many priuate instructions which hee might not deliuer but to his Maiesty alone.

The Seigneure of La Guesle, conceiuing him to be a spie, examined him when he saw the first President, and of the forme of their faces that were with him; and by what meanes he entred into the Bastile. Hee answered as if he had knowne them well, and added that hee was assisted by the fauor of Portails son, the Kings Chirurgeon, for the knowledge which he had of his wife. The King being aduertised by La Guesle, commands hee should be brought the next day, but he is examined first by Portail vpon his pretended acquaintance with his wife, to whom he answered pertinently, and gaue good obseruations. The next day being come to the Kings lodging, they were called by du Toulle the first Groomer of F his Chamber. At the first La Guesle caused the Iacobin to stay neere the doore, and taking his papers he presents them to his Maiesty, who hauing read them, commands the Iacobin should approach, whom he asked what hee would say, to whom he answered that it was a secret thing. Some distrust made La Guesle to speake, being betwixt the King and him. Speake aloud (said he twice or thrice) there is not any one here but the King trusts. His Maiesty seeing him make difficulty to speake, commands him againe to approach. The Baron of Bellegarde, master of the Kings horse, and La Guesle (who were alone in the Chamber) retired two or three paces. The King bends his ear, but in stead of hearing what what he expected, this wretch drawes a knife out of his sleue made of purpose, thrusts A his Maicesty into the bottome of the belly, and there leaues the knife in the wound. The King drawes it forth, and with some struuing of the Monke, strikes him about the eye. Many ran in at this noyse, and in the heat of choller killing this monster of men, presented the true discouery of this enterprize, and the authors thereof, worthy to bee noted with a perpetuall blot of disloyalty and treason. The Physicians held the wound curable: and the same day the King did write of this attempt, and of his hope of recovery, to the Gouernors of Prouinces, to foraigne Princes, and to his friends and confederates. But feeling that the Kings of Kings had otherwise determined of his life, he did first comfort himselfe, in foreseeing that the last houre of his crosses should bee the first of his felicities: then lamenting his good and faithfull seruants, who furniuing should find no respect with those whose mindes had bene so abandoned to mischief, as neither the feare of God, nor the dignity of his person could dissuade them from this horrible sacrilege. One thing (said he) doth comfort me, that I read in your faces, with the griefe of your hearts, and the sorrow of your soules, a goodly and commendable resolution, to continue vnited for the preservation of that which remains whole of my Estate, and the reuenge which you owe vnto the memory of him who hath loued you so dearly. I seeke not the last curiously, leauing the punishment of my enemies vnto God. I haue learned in his schoole to forgieue them, as I doe with all my heart. But as I am chiefly bound to procure peace, and rest vnto this Realme; I coniure you all, by that inuiolable faith which you owe vnto your Country, that you continue firme and constant defenders of the common liberty, and that you neuer lay downe armes, vntill you haue purged the Realme of the troublers of the publike quiet. And, forasmuch as diuision alone, vndermines the foundations of this Monarchy, resolute to be vnited in one will. I know, and I dare assure you, that the King of Nauarre, my brother in law, the lawfull successeur to this Crowne, is sufficiently instructed in the lawes, to know how to reigne well, and to command reasonable things: and I hope, you are not ignorant of the iust obedience you owe vnto him. Referre the difference of Religion to the conuocation of the Estates of the Realme, and learne of me, that piety is a duty of man vnto God, ouer which worldly force hath no power. Thus spake Henry, euen as the last pangs of death caried him within few houres after from this vnto another world: but (a notable circumstance) in the same Chamber where the Councell was held on that fatall day of Saint Bartholmew, in the yeare 1572. By his death he extinguished the second Parcell of the third Race of Capets, in the branch of Valois, leaving the Crown to the third Royall branch of Bourbons, whereunto the order of the fundamental law did lawfully call him.

HENRY the FOURTH,
The 63 French King.

Ehold the Theater of mans life: diuers passions appeare in diuers acts; hatred, rebellion, infidelity, treason and fury shall play a long and tragicke rowle in many Scenes. But as our new Successeur hath eaten the bitter roots in his youth, so in his age he shall reape the sweet fruits of vertue, being honored, feared and respected, both of his own subiects and strangers. God gouerns the being of this world by course and temper of diuers seasons, men reape not before they haue sowed, neither doe they sow before they haue laboured. may know, that he deserves not the sweet, that hath not tasted of the sowre: and that the force of his wit can no way aduance the happy success of his estate, without the helpe and grace of that great Guardian, who by miraculous meanes preferres Estates from apparent ruine.

F This Raigne hath two parcells. The beginning is painfull, full of crosses, and confused: vntill that our Henry (solemnly installed) be acknowledged lawfull King by all his subiects: for till then, the most impudent and passionate called him the Bearnois in disdain: others more modest, left him his first title of King of Nauarre, or at the least, of Priace of Bearne. HENRY the FOURTH,
The 63 French King.

Behold the Theater of mans life: diuers passions appeare in diuers acts; hatred, rebellion, infidelity, treason and fury shall play a long and tragicke rowle in many Scenes. But as our new Successeur hath eaten the bitter roots in his youth, so in his age he shall reape the sweet fruits of vertue, being honored, feared and respected, both of his own subiects and strangers. God gouerns the being of this world by course and temper of diuers seasons, men reape not before they haue sowed, neither doe they sow before they haue laboured. Thus he gouerns the society of mankind by certain degrees: that man may know, that he deserves not the sweet, that hath not tasted of the sowre: and that the force of his wit can no way aduance the happy success of his estate, without the helpe and grace of that great Guardian, who by miraculous meanes preferres Estates from apparent ruine.

F This Raigne hath two parcells. The beginning is painfull, full of crosses, and confused: vntill that our Henry (solemnly installed) be acknowledged lawfull King by all his subiects: for till then, the most impudent and passionate called him the Bearnois in disdain: others more modest, left him his first title of King of Nauarre, or at the least, of Prince of Bearne. But the successe will teach vs, that euen now the Lord would succor this Monarchy, and in despite of all the violent oppositions of man, make our King to triumph ouer all domesticall and foraigne insolencies, which had disallowed him for the lawfull successeur, and almost dispossessed him of his Realme.

Doublets

Doubleſſe, we muſt confeſſe without flattery, that France had neede of this Prince, to A root out (like another French Hercules) thoſe hideous monſters which made it horrible and fearful to his own children: to reſtore the French to the greatneſſe of their reputation, and this Crowne to her former beauty. It is of him that the Princes of our age, and of future ages ſhall learne to be Captaines. He himſelfe alone hath made more war, then all they haue ſcene together. Let vs alſo obſerue a great conformity of his raigne, with that of Dauid, in afflictions and bleſſings, and wiſhing that God would make him equall in the zeale of piety and iuſtice, (the chiefe and firmeſt pillars of a Royalty) let vs hope, that with a holy ambition, (being borne a King) he will ſhew himſelfe ſo: and that hee might long raigne happily, to the glory of God, the good of his ſubiects, and the health of his owne ſoule.

The Generalle of the King.

But let vs ſee by what degrees the fundamentall law of this eſtate calls him to this Monarchy. Lewis, ſurnamed Saint, 44 French King, had many ſonnes. Philip his ſucceſſor ſurnamed the Hardy, Peter Earle of Alençon, Robert alſo Earle of Alençon by the death of Peter, and Robert Earle of Clermont in Beauuaſin: the firſt and laſt haue left iſſue; the two others dyed without heyres, and before their father. Philip hath left by order ſucceſ-ſiue in direct line maſculine and lawfull, or collateral from the neareſt to the neareſt kin, all our Kings which haue continued in the third royall race, euen vnto Henry the third King of France and of Poland: by whole death (the name and family of Valois being extinct) the law ſeekes to the line of Robert Earle of Clermont in Beauuaſin, and findes not any one nearer then the houſe of Vendome, whereof our Henry was the ſole and lawfull heire-male, as deſcending in the direct maſculine and lawfull line from the ſaid Robert. For Robert had by Beatrice, the only daughter and heire of Archibauld Earle of Bourbon, Lewis, whole lands were erected to a Duchy in the yeare 1329. Lewis Duke of Bourbon, and Mary the daughter of John the 18 Earle of Hainault, had Peter Duke of Bourbon, and Jamies Earle of Ponthieu, Conſtable of France. Peter had by Iſabel the daughter of Charles Earle of Valois, Lewis and Jamies. Lewis ſurnamed the Good Duke of Bourbon, had by Anne Counteſſe of Auvergne, Lewis Earle of Clermont, who died without children, John and Jamies. John Duke of Bourbon had by Bonne Duchefeſſe of Au-vergne and Counteſſe of Montpenſier, Charles, and Lewis Earle of Montpenſier, father to Gilbert, of whom iſſued Charles the laſt D. of Bourbon. Charles D. of Bourbon had of Agnes the daughter of John D. of Bourgogne, John and Peter. John the ſecond of that name, married Joane of France, daughter to Charles the ſeauenth, and dying without law-full heires of his body, the name and armes of Duke, went to Peter his younger brother.
Peter the ſecond of that name, Duke of Bourbon, had of Anne of France, the daughter of Lewis the eleuenth, one only daughter, Suſanne the general heire of Bourbon, who was wife to the aboue named Charles, the yongelt Son of Lewis, aboue named Earle of Montpenſier, and brother to Charles Duke of Bourbon. But no children growing from this marriage, the branch of the eldeſt ſonne of Lewis created Duke of Bourbon, ended in this Charles Duke of Bourbon, and Conſtable of France, who died at the ſiege of Rome, and the Duchy of Bourbon ſiſe being incorporate to the Crowne, we muſt ſeek the line of Jamies of Ponthieu (they alſo giue him the titles of Earle of Charolois and La Marche) Conſtable of France, the yongelt ſonne of Lewis the firſt Duke of Bourbon.
Jamies had by Joane the daughter of the Earle of S. Paul, John his ſucceſſor Earle of La Marche. John had of Catherine, the only Daughter and heire of John Earle of Vendome, iſſued from the Dukes of Normandy, and Earles of Anjou; Jamies King of Naples, who leaving none but daughters, tranſported his right of inheritance to Lewis his yongelt brother. Lewis had no children by Jane of Ruſſy, his firſt wife, the daughter of Ralf Earle of Montfort, & Anne of Montmorency, but of Jane the daughter of Guy Lord of Guare, and of Anne heire of Laual and Vitry in Britany, or of Mary the daughter of Engender, Lord of Concy, and of Iſabel his wife, the daughter of Edward King of England, according to ſome opinions. By his ſecond marriage he had John his ſucceſſor, & Earle of Ven-dome, the ſecond of that name. John the ſecond had of Jane of Beauue (or of Iſabel of Beauuais, daughter to the Lord of Priſſigni) Francis his ſucceſſor and Earle of Vendome, and Lewis Prince of La Roche-sur-yon, who of Louſe of Bourbon the daughter of Gilbert of Bourbon, and ſiſter to Charles laſt Duke of Bourbon, left Lewis of Bourbon Earle of Montpenſier, who was Father to Francis of Bourbon Duke of Montpenſier, which was

A was father to Henry the laſt Duke of Montpenſier, Prince Soueraigne of Dombes, Dauphin of Auvergne, Lieutenant general for the King in Normandy, and husband to Katherine Henriette of Loyeuz, (a Prince whole vertues France did admire) to Francis were borne by Mary of Luxembourg, Counteſſe of S. Paul, and daughter to Peter of Luxembourg; Charles Earle; but created Duke of Vendome by King Francis the firſt.
Francis Earle of S. Paul, (who by Adrian Duchefeſſe of Elouteuille had Francis, who died young) Lewis Cardinall of Bourbon, Autoyette wife to Claude of Lorraine Duke of Guiſe, Louſe Abbeſſe of Font-Eureaux. Charles the firſt, Duke of Vendome, had by Francis, or according to ſome others, by Louſe the daughter of René Duke of Alençon, B Lewis who died at the age of ſeuene yeares, Anthony who ſucceeded in his right, and was afterwards King of Nauarre, Francis Earle of Anguien, famous for that great battell of Cenſolles, and ſlaine by chance at La Roche-Guion, Charles Cardinall, Archbiſhop of Rouan, John who died at the battell of S. Quintin, and Lewis Prince of Conde, who made another ſtroke of the elder Princes of Bourbon. Anthony had by Joane of Albret Queene of Nauarre (daughter to Henry the ſecond of that name King of Nauarre, and by Marguerit of Orleans, ſiſter to Francis the firſt of that name King of France): Henry the Fourth of that name French King by his Fathers right, and the ſecond of that name King of Nauarre by his Mother.

The amazement was great in the Kings army, and mens hearts extremely daunted
C with ſorrow and griefe, when as our Henry was by the common conſent of the Army, and as the neceſſity of the time and place did ſuffer, publiſhly proclaimed King. Some reſolued to retire as neuters, to ſee how the chance of armes would fall: others aſpired to change their party, and made a ſcruple to follow a king of another religion. A ſcruple which neuer entred into the minds of our firſt Chriſtians, who fought againſt the forraigne enemies, vnder the Enſignes of Clouis, and other Pagan Kings. The Duke of Eprenon retired himſelfe: many troopes followed his example: few continued firme and conſtant to reuenge the outrage wherunto the deſeased Kings laſt words had ſo kindly inuited them, and wherunto euery French-man ought to haue an eſpecial regard.

At Paris there was nothing but ioy and mirth. Bonfires, Songs, Feaſts, Maskes, pa-D ſtimes, and curſing the memory of the King. The wicked Monkes picture was ſuddenly made, he was canonized as a new Martyr, and deliquit of the Church from the oppreſſions of a Tyrant: all that were allied vnto him were enriched with almes and publike contributions: that by this bayte others might attempt the like againſt the King that ſucceeded. The Duke of Mayenne (not daring to take vpon him the title of King) cauſed it by publike proclamation to be giuen to Charles Cardinall of Bourbon, then a priſoner:
and coynd both gold & ſiluer with the picture of King Charles the tenth. And diſguiſing the ſurpuration of his authority, he accepted the title which the general Councell of the Vnion gaue him, of Lieutenant general of the State, and Crowne of France. An abſurd title, ſtrange and ridiculous, for a Lieutenant is he which holds the place for another, who E (by his abſence or other let) cannot performe the function in his perſon. But who can maintaine that a man may be Lieutenant to an Eſtate, to a Crowne, to a thing without a ſoule? It is againſt the rules of Grammar, and againſt the termes of State, who giue the titles of Regent, and of Lieutenant General for the King, and to tolerate that of Lieutenant in the Eſtate and Crowne of France; this was properly to contumace mountaines, and to bring forth a ridiculous mouſe.

On the other ſide, the King (ſeeing the diminution of his forces, teſtifies his intention by a publike declaration to the Princes and Noblemen of the army, hee aſſembles the chiefe of the Nobility: hee lets them vnderſtand the deſeased Kings will touching religion, by a general or national Councell, whereof he proſſets to follow the inſtruction.
F I giue leave (ſaid he) to all ſuch as would leaue me; ſo to doe: yet I am ſorry they are better French-men, for their owne good and ſafety. I haue friends enough without them to maintain my authority. God hath neuer left me, and will not now abandon me; hee hath not begun ſo miraculous a worke; to leaue it imperfect: not for my ſake alone, but for his owne names ſakes and for ſo many ſoules afflicted in his Realm, whom I deſire and promiſe by the faith of a King, to reſtore, ſo ſoone as God ſhall giue me the means. But how precious is this to me, that an your lawfull King; and who leaues you in the liberty of your religion, to ſee you goe about to force me to yours by unlawfull means, and without former inſtruction?

The Kings declaration.

1589

This declaration retained them that were least scrupulous in their duties: and his promise not to alter any thing in Religion, might have shaken many of the League. To cross him, the Duke of Mayenne publisheth an Edict of the seventh of August, in his name and the Councils of the holy Union established at Paris, attending a generall assembly of the Estates of the Realme, to write (said he) all French-men that were good Christians, for the defence and preferuation of the Catholick, Apostolike, and Romish Church, and the maintenance of the Royall estate, in the absence of their lawfull King, Charles the tenth of that name, for whose liberty he invited them all to armes. But he desired no more the liberty of his pretended King, then our Henry did to force Religion, the support whereof serueth them for a goodly cloake.

Violent decrees

Some Parliaments grow incensed of these sudden changes in the State, and seeme to entertaine the people in doubt and feare of the subuersion of their Religion. That of Bourdeaux commands all men vnder their Iurisdiction, by a Decree of the 19 of August, to obserue inuiolably the Edict of Union to the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Church: & declarations were thereupon made. That of Tholoua is more violent. They decree, that yearly the first day of August, they should make processions and publike prayers for the benefits they had receiued that day, in the miraculous & fearful death of Henry the third, whereby Paris was deliuered, and other townes of the Realme: forbidding all persons to acknowledge Henric of Bourbon, the pretended King of Nauarre, for King: declaring him incapable euer to succcede to the Crowne of France, by reason (said the Decree) of the notorious and manifest crimes contained at large in the bull of Excommunication of Pope Sixtus the fifth. Without doubt the authority of the Soueraigne Court is much blemished in pronouncing a Decree, which they must reuoke by a contrary sentence. Thus the league kindled anew the fires which the siege of Paris had somewhat quenched: the Kings troops decreased hourly, sickness diminished their numbers, and the D. of Mayenne increased. The King therefore diuides his Army into three: one vnder the command of the Duke of Longueuille into Picardy, the other into Champagne vnder the Marshall d'Aumont: and he is aduised to passe himselfe into Normandy, with twelue hundred horse, three thousand French foot, and two Regiments of Suisses, as well to receiue succours out of England, as to assure some places and passages fit for his designs, but with direction to ioyne at need. In his passage he causeth the Kings body to be conducted and left at Compeigne, and reduceth to his obedience, Melen, Gisors, and Clermont: he receiues from Captaine Roulet both the place and the hearts of the Inhabitants of Pont del' Arche, four leagues from Rouan, a passage very commodious for the trafficke betwixt Rouan and Paris. He visits Deep: confirms the townes of Caen, forceth Neuchastell to yeeld, hauing by Hallots and Guitry his Lieutenants overcome the succours that were sent thither, and slaine seuen or eight hundred men vpon the place.

The King retires his siege from Paris.

His conquests.

The Duke of Mayenne follows.

All these surprises could not draw the Duke of Mayenne out of the walls of Paris. But when as he sees the King lodged at Dernerat, a league from Rouan, and the townes of Eu vpon Bethune brought to his obedience: at the instant request of the D. of Aumale, and the Earle of Brissac commanding within Rouan, he goes to field, with aboute three thousand horse, and fiftene thousand foot, French, Germans, Italians, Flemings, and Spaniards. He promisseth the Parisiens to pursue, bessege, take, and bring the Bearnois prisoner, and makes them already by supposition to hire shops and windows in S. Antonies street, to see him passe in chains vpon the Bastile. He passeth the riuier of Seine with this mighty army, and recouers Gournay (being lately taken by the D. of Longueuille) Neuchastell, and Eu; and then he aduanceth to stay the course of the Kings prosperity, who triumphed in Normandy.

This proceeding made the King imagine, they should not part without blowes, and full of that generosity, constancy, and ready resolution which he did alwaies carry in accidents which did seeme dangerous, sends for his Lieutenants, the Duke of Longueuille, and the Marshall d'Aumont to approach, for that he forescees a dangerous scin in the Estate which was very sicke. The King parts from Deep, and marcheth towards the Duke: he lodgeth at Arques, three miles from thence, betwixt two hills diuided by the riuier of Bethune: at the foot of the one is the Village, and the Castle which commandeth it. He views the situation, and findes it fit to receiue the enemy. And not to lose the aduantage

A rage which time or industry might giue him, he casts vp a trench of seuen or eight foot deepe on the top of one of the hills, raiseth the defences, furnisheth it with artillery, and foure companies of Suisses: provides for the safety of the Village, casts vp Trenches vpon the weakest places of approach: and a thousand paces off, neere to the riuers side where the enemy should passe, hee lodgeth eight hundred French Harguebuziers in an Hospitall, to cut off the enemies passage. The Duke (whose army was now about thirty thousand men) chooseth rather to leaue the shortest way, then to fight for this passage: and passing the riuier about, he encamps on the other hill right against Arques, and three daies after, the 16 of September, marcheth against the Pollet, a tūberne of Diepe, where the Lord of Chastillon did fortifie, leauing some number of horse, and troops of foot to guard his hill and lodging of Martinglife.

There is no such policie as to strike first, and to charge the enemy while he consults, being irresolute whether he shall fight or retire. The King knowes it well, his owne experience hath often tryed it. He therefore sends to view this army, to discouer their forces, and to obserue their countenance. He leaues the Marshall of Biron to command at Arques, and lodgeth in a mill, which they had entrencht vpon the approach to this suburbs. There they make a furious skirmish. But the Leaguers hauing lost nine or ten Capitaines, and a great number of their most resolute souldiers, they had no will to proceed. They leaue the place, and lodge at the nearest village to the Suburbs of Diepe: an open place, without defence or houses. So many discomforts were scarce tolerable. Chastillon also dislodged them soone, and made them to seek another quarter.

No able exploits at Arques against the League.

On the other side, the Corps de-gard (lodged in the guest house) would not suffer the enemy which kept both the hill and the lodging, to approach neare the Riuier side. Being impatient then to haue any such vigilant neighbours, they resolute to charge this Corps de-gard, and to become masters of either banke, that they might approach more freely to the Trenches at Arques. The Marshall sees them come, and drawing them on by light skirmishes, makes them beleaue they shall haue the better: but suddenly with a furious charge he scatters them, some here, some there: and many seeking to saue themselves from the fight, drowne in the riuier. So this army is charged in three places at one instant: D at the Mill by the King: at Martinglife by Biron, and at the Pollet by Chastillon. They first amaze them whet their courages. They are daunted for this first checke. Battells are variable, and it may be, a second attempt will giue them a more happy successe. Being thus resolute, the Duke leaues that great designe he had vpon Diepe, and propounds to set vpon the guest-house. Three or four volleys of our Cannon (said he) will beat it down. They shot, but preuaile nothing: and seeing their attempts vaine, they leaue force to sie to surprizes.

The first charge in three places.

The 21 of September they passe the water in the night, without drum, without trumpet, and without light; they put themselves in battell, and meane at the breake of day to worke some great effect. But they haue a vigilant enemy, who will see all, know all, and E doe all: the King causeth a long trench to bee drawne from the top of his hill vnto the guest house, and mans it with foure companies of Suisses and Lanquenets, and some French, supported by the Earle of Auvergne, (who in this warre gaue braue and singular proofes of his valor) commanding three companies of light horse, and three other companies of men at armes, seconded also by the companies of the Princes of Condé, and Conty, and on the top of the trench he placeth the Marshall of Biron with the Companies of Chastillon, and of Maligny, (afterwards Vidam of Chartres) and a good number of the Nobility.

All these Companies march by the fauour of the Cannon (which plaied from the Castle to their aduantage) and charge the Duke of Mayennes Cornet, ouerthrowes Sugonne F with some horsemen, dead vpon the place, and disperse the rest. But a new supply forceth them to retire. The Suisses of Colonel Galatz stay their violence. The Lanquenets of the League (degenerating from the ancient constancy of Germans) approach neare the trench, but seeing themselves weake, and engaged with the hazard of their lues, they make offer to yeeld vnto the King. Those within the trench giue them their hands to receiue them. The King seeing them ioyned with his men, runs to charge them, not knowing they had called vpon his name. But seeing his Maiesty, they yeeld themselves, and lay downe their weapons, He receiues them, and assures them of the pay they had gotten in fighting fighting against him. Seeing themselves freed from danger, and the King, Biron, and the other troops of horse, fighting here and there, and that the body of the Dukes horse advanced to charge the Suisses, they turne their armes against them which had newly giuen them life: they charge the Marshall of Birons troop, make them abandon the trench, become Masters thereof; spoile all the Kings Souldiers, take the Ensignes of his Maiesties Suisses and Lanquenets, and deliuer this trench vnto the Leaguers: but they shall not long enjoy it.

A third Siege.

For the King seeing that the treachery of these villaines had made the issue of the combat doubtful, (seconded by the Duke of Montpensier, and his Cornet, and relieved with five hundred foot, led by the Lord of Chastillon) hee comes furiously to charge, imbrues his sword with the blood of many of them, takes many prisoners, drives them out of the Trench, and presently plants two Cannons there, which shot into the Battalion of the enemies Suisses that made the retreat, and strikes such a terrour among them, as in short time all leaue him the place of battell, being covered with the carcasses of his rebellis.

Doublelesse this Spittle-house should be honored with an eternal triumph. It is the place where they thought to haue driven the King into an extremity, either to suffer himselfe to be taken at Diepe, or to seeke his safety beyond the Seas. It is the place where the veins of the League being opened, they powred forth streames of that blood and vigor which maintained their first iollity. It is the place where 300 horse, 1200 French foot, and two thousand Suisses, had as it were prodigiously triumphed ouer thirty thousand men, who with a Giant-like brauery, boasted to bring either dead, or bound hands and feet, the greatest King, the greatest Captaine of the world, who like a lightning finding nothing that might withstand the fury of his victorious armes, dispersed & suppressed with the point of his Sword, the presumptuous and rash attempts of his mutinous Subjects. The Earle of Belin (one of their Marshalls of the field) was taken prisoner: many soldiers, but a great number of men at armes: many Gentlemen, and more Commanders serued as a prey to the birds of the ayre, and the beasts of the field. The King lost the Earle of Rouilly, six or seven Gentlemen, and some souldiers.

Some few daies after, the King doubting (his troops being but small) might be beaten D from their lodging at Arques, he abandoned that quarter, and lodged them neare vnto Diepe, vnder the fauour of the Castle. The Duke of Mayenne finding that lodging abandoned, passed with his whole army vnto the other side of the Towne, within halfe a mile: he plants six Cannons, and about midnight shoots into the Port of the Towne, to keep them from issuing forth. The King vpon this alarme, cast vp a traues before the Port, to blinde their sight, and sends speedily into England to hasten the forces which he expected from the Queene, the which were 4000 men, vnder the command of the Lord Wilborough. But some few daies after (these troops being ready to land) the D. of Mayenne (seeing all his attempts proue vaine) dislodged, and thinks he hath done much for his reputation, if (by some volley of Cannon against Diep, where the King was, and then against Arques) he publisheth throughout all France, that he is Master of those townes without entering. In the end, toyled with the Kings continuall skirmishes, and toucht with apprehension at the first newes, he hearing of the Earle of Soissons approach, (who had cunningly escaped out of prison) of the D. of Longueuills, and the Marshall d'Aumonts with their troops, he went to seeke his safety beyond the riuier of Somme. To assure (said he) those places which by the treaty of Arras he was to deliuer vnto the Spaniards: and then returning to Paris, did nothing memorable, but established his Councell of sixteen, and forty, the which afterwards he reuoked and disannulled all he could, as we shall see in the course of the History. In the meane time (to busie the Parisiens) those three Ensignes which the trecherous Lanquenets had by a trayterous stratagem stolne in the trenches, brought forth twenty other counterfeit, which the Dowager of Montpensier, sister to the Duke of Mayenne, caused to be made at Paris in the Lombards street. This was a patterne of the subtle deuices of that woman, who euery morning suborning some new post, made him to goe forth at one gate, and to enter at another, as bringing still some aduertisements of happy successe, which she sent vnto the Curats to deliuer in their Sermons. and by these publike stratagems, entertained the people in their disorder, and beeced the purfes of the most credulous.

The King
proceeds to Paris.

A The Dukes retreat made the King suspect that he retired for an aduantage, and that marching to defeat the supplies that came vnto him, he would retaine putt vp with greater courage, and new hopes. His Maiestie therefore leaues the Marshall of Biron at Diepe with the army, and resolues to goe meet the Earle and the rest with four hundred horse. Being ioyned, he takes the towne and Castle of Ganache, and recouers the towne of Eu. This bayte might haue drawne the Duke; but he found his aboad in Picardy more safe, and La Fore which he deliuered into the strangers and enemies hands, made him continue the intelligences he had with the D. of Parma, whereof wee shall shortly see strange effects. So the King returning to Diepe, provided for the affaires of Normandie, leaueing the Duke of Montpensier there, (with the forces he had brought) for his Lieutenant generall: he receiued from the Queene of England foure thousand men, money, and munition belonging vnto warre.

VVith this supply his Maiestie parts the 12 of October, and alwaies coasting the enemy, comes to passe the riuier of Siene at Meulan, and marcheth directly to Paris, with a double designe either to fight, or at the least to draw the Duke out of Picardy. The last of October he arrives about Paris, and diuides his troops into three battalions. The first had four thousand English, two regiments of French, and one of the Suisses vnder the command of the Marshall of Biron, for the Suburbs of Saint Victor, and Saint Marcell. The second was of ten Regiments of French, and strangers, committed to the Marshall d'Aumont, for Saint James, and Saint Michael. The third, ten regiments of French, one of Lanquenets, and one of Suisses, commanded by Chastillon, and La Noue, for Saint Germaine, Buffy, and Nelle. He giues to either of these troops a good number of Gentlemen on foot, well armed, to support the footmen in case of resistance: and behind either of them two Cannons, & two Culuerins. The King Commanded the one, the Count Soissons, and the D. of Longueuille the other. Hee causeth the Trenches and Rampars without the towne to be viewed, and the next day by the Sun rising, hee sets vpon them, and forceth them in lesse then an houre: seven or eight hundred souldiers slaine in the streets, thirteene peeces of Cannon caried away, foureene Ensignes taken, and much spoile gotten, did versifie the saying. That all comes to one end to him that can attend. Here Chastillon did not forget to inuite his friends to reuenge the blood so vnworthily spilt at those bloody Parisiens mattins, but by the effusion of his blood, who now suffers for others.

At this new and sudden terror of the Parisiens, the Duke of Mayenne posts to the city with the greatest part of the army. His Maiesty (to see if he would fall forth) presents himselfe the second and third day following, in the suburbs, and without the suburbs, in view of the City, and then afterwards towards Linus vnder Montleher: but all was in vaine. Thus being content to haue taught the Parisiens, that he wanted no means to punish them, but desired rather to reduce them to obedience by mildnesse, the King went and tooke the towne and Castle of Etampes, where Clermont of Lodeue, with about threescore gentlemen or more, had shut vp himselfe vpon the Duke of Mayennes word, to vngage him with all the rest of his army.

Here the Queene Dowager sent a Petition to his Maiesty, beseeching him to doe iustice of that cruell and execrable murder committed on the person of the deceased King her husband. The King sent this Petition to the Court of Parliament, removed to Tours, to the end that his Maiesties Procicour general requiring it, they should frame indictments against such as were held culpable, protesting neither to spare care nor force to take that iust reuenge which reason and his duty required. Doublelesse the horror of this sacrilege had so wonderfully moued some of the officers of the Court, as if they had beene beleueed, the Order of the Jacobins had by decree beene rooted out of France, their Couent at Paris pulled downe, and a Pillar set vp as a perpetual monument, and the hangmen of France should haue beene afterwards attired like Jacobins. The Queene Dowager hath long pursued the rooting out of them. But the memory of Ancestors is Venerable, and their Sepulchers religious. Seuentene Princes and Princesses of the house of Bourbon, buried in the Monastery of the Jacobins at Paris, haue chiefly preserved and kept the Order and their Couents.

The King seeing that he no meanes he could draw forth his enemies, he sends backe the D. of Longueuille, and La Noue, to refresh themselves with their forces in Picardy.

Gniy

Giury, into Brie, and passing farther into Beausie, takes Ianuile by composition, then A from Chasteaudun he leads to inuelt Vendome, his ancient patrimony. Maille Benhard commanded about four hundred men of Garison, and eight hundred Townes-men armed against their Soueraign and lawfull Lord. The Artillery had no sooner made a hole of foure paces wide, but the souldiers, impatient, flie to the assault, take the Castle, and to enter the towne pell mell with the garison, so as his Maiesty seeing himselfe in lesse then halfe an houre in possession both of Town and Castle, he gaue the inhabitants their liues; but the souldiers the spoile.

The treacherous part of Benhard to the great Councell, (as we haue said) with the treason of a vassall and subiect, and the edititious preachings of Iesse the Friar, were the B cause that these two principall motives of rebellion suffered for the people: the one beheaded vpon the Paucement, and the other hanged. Laurdin, Montoire, Montrichard, and Chasteau du Loir, became wise by the example of Vendome, and opened their gates to the Marshall of Biron, who entered into the towne with all his Company very peaceably.

The King seeing himselfe neare vnto Tours, goes thither: the people receiue him the 21 of the moneth with an admirable shew of ioy, he giuing the same day audience to the Ambassadors of Venice, who in the name of the Seignoury, congratulates his Maiesties happy comming to the Crowne; with offer of seruice and loue to the King, and Crown of France. Beaulle, Dunois, and Vendome being subdued, the Kings army marcheth in to Maine: the Earle of Brissac vndertooke to succour Mans, which the King threatned: C to that intent he aduanceth with two regiments, and some horse to la Forté Bernard: but terrified with the noise of the Cannon, he returns, and contenting himselfe with a pillage of forty horse, and some baggage of his Maiesties Reistres which he met by chance, he proclaims his victories at Paris. Bois-Dauphin commanded in Mans, accompanied with a hundred Gentlemen, and twenty Ensignes on foot, who in shew would die with their armies in their hands, rather then suffer the King to enter. But must they cause the people to spend a hundred and fifty thousand crowns to fortifie the towne and suburbs: burne so many houses without the towne, to yeeld it at the third volley of the Cannon? Learne, o ye people! that great men play with you, as with a renise ball: and bee not wedded to any other party, but that of our Soueraigne and lawfull Prince. You run rashly D into a bad action: they fortifie you at your owne charge, and you are the means to vndermine your selues.

The taking hereof caused the Castles of Beaumont and Tenteuoyes to yeeld, with the Townes of Sable, Laual, Chasteaugonthier, Mayenne, Alancou, Falaife, and many others in the Prouinces of Touraine, Anjou, Mayne, Perche, and Normandy. So as in lesse then two moneths, his Maiesty marched with his army (furnished with many Cannons, and a great number of strangers, English, Suisses, & Germans) about eightscore leagues, hauing attieued many memorable sieges, taken fourteen or fifteene good townes, assured many Prouinces: and in all places as he passed, He came, he saw, and ouercame. Thus our Conqueror made the round of a third part of his Realme, not finding any let to stay the course of his prosperities: when as the Court of Parliament at Rouen, no lesse violent and presumptuous then that of Tholouza, pronounceth them guilty of treason both against God and man, and the Estate and Crowne of France, that had opposed themselves against the holy Vnion: and all Royallists and their successors deprived of all prerogatives of Nobility, their offices to be void and not to be recovered: unworthy to possesse any offices, benefices, or dignities, and all their goods forfeited. These armies were too weak to terrifie his Maiesties seruants: this decree did little aduance the league. And the Duke of Mayenne (seeing the King far off, partly through shame, partly through despair, and importuned by the Parisiens) was constrained to pacifie their exclamations by some great exploit. But the taking of Bois de Vincennes and Pontoise ended all F his Conquests.

So many new triumphs did wonderfully amaze the Leaguers: the people grew weary with the burthen of imposts, the spoile of souldiers, and a thousand calamities that did oppresse them: To maintaine them in the gulfes of this confusion, the mutinous and corrupt tongues of the Preachers charmed the blinde with an impression of many intelligences both within and without the Realme, by the hope of a speedy and great succour from Spaine, by the publication of many libels, which they most furiously vied as a fire-brands

A brands to feed this combustion, and by counterfeit deuices, they made the Kings name and his actions very hatefull vnto the multitude.

The King in the meane time, continued the course of his histories in bafe Normandy, where hauing taken Honfleur, a Port town, he came & raised the siege of Meulan, where the Duke of Mayenne had lien fifteene daies, being distant from Honfleur about thirty Leagues, where he offered him battell. The aduantage (being twice as many in number as the King) could not draw him to it. The memory of Arques was yet too fresh, and the supply of fifteene hundred Lances, and five hundred Harguebuziers which the Duke of Parma sent him, vnder the command of Count Egmont, made him forbear. Whilest the Duke goes to ioyne with his strangers, the King takes Nonancourt, and then besie- Siege of Dreux geth Dreux.

In the beginning of March the Duke turnes head towards Manté, to passe the river eight Leagues from Dreux. His Maiesty hath intelligence thereof, and giues him leaue to approach within two leagues. To giue and win a battell is indifferent vnto him. He catcheth his army to march towards Nonancourt, to view the foard of the riuier of Eure, which runs there: he himselfe treads out the place of battell, he imparts it to the Duke Montpensier, the Marshalls of Biron and Aumont, to the Baron of Biron, Marshall of the Field, and to the chiefe Captaines of his army: he makes choice of the Lord of Vique for Serient Maior of the Field: he appointed the rendezuous for his troops at the village of S. Andrew, foure leagues from Nonancourt, vpon the way to Yury, and the place of bat- C tlell in a great plaine neare vnto it. All these old souldiers found the place chosen with so great iudgment and military wilddome as they altered not any thing.

The King hauing deliuered it vnto the Baron to appoint euery man his place, said; It is no desire of glory, nor motion of ambition, nor appetite of reuenge, that makes me resolute to this combat, but the extreame necessity of my iust and naturall defence, the pity of my peoples calamity, and the preservation of my Crowne. Let vs refer the cuncts of this enterprise to the e- ternall Providence. Then afterwards lifting vp his eyes to heauen: Thou knowest, O God (said he) the sinceritie of my thoughts. I beseech thee put mee not in the number of those Prin- ces, whom thou hast forsaken in thy wrath, but of those whom thou hast chosen to reparaire the ruines of a desolate Estate, and to relieue my miserable people oppressed with the violence of war. O Lord, I yeeld myselfe to the disposition of thy holy and infallible will, and desire not to liue, nor to raigne, but so far forth as my life may be to the aduancement and glory of thy name, and my authority the raigment of vertues, and the banishment of vices. These, and such like religious words, moued all the Campe to praiers, and workes of piety, euery one according to his deuotion.

This done, the King disposeth his army according to the plot which he had laid. He diuides it into seuen squadrons, and in euery one 300 horse, flanked on either side with foot-men: the first he giues to the Marshall d'Aumont, with two Regiments of French. The second to the Duke Montpensier with 500 Lanquenets, and a regiment of Suisses. E The third to the Earle of Auvergne and Giury, either of them commanding a troope of light horse, and on their left hand foure Cannons and two Culuerins. The fourth to the Baron of Biron. In the fift were five ranks of horse, and sixscore in a front, Princes, Earls, Barons, Officers of the Crowne, Kinghts of the Order, Noblemen and Gentlemen of the chiefe families of France, besides those which the Prince of Cony, and La Guiscke great Master of the artillery brought that day. His Maiesty was in the head of this troope, shining in armes like the Sun amidst the seuen Planets, hauing on the side of him two battells of Suisses, with the regiments of his guards of Brigneux, of Vignoles and S. Iohn. The sixth to the Marshall of Biron, with two regiments of French: The seuenth were about two hundred and fifty Reistres. These squadrons were all in a front, but somewhat bending at the ends, in forme of a Crescent. There was nothing more terrible then to see two thousand French Gentlemen armed from the head to the foot.

The Duke of Mayenne appeared a far off, and had taken a village betwixt both armies: but his Maiesty forceth them to dislodge, and wearies them with skirmishes, to draw them to fight: and the approaching night leaues our warriors burning with desire to haue the day call them to the Field, to make prooffe of their seruice and duties to their King and Country. At the breake of day the men at armes were in their squadrons, the souldiers in their battalions, and by nine of the clocke euery man did fight in his gesture, in his threats and words. At the same instant the enemy shewes a body of about foure thousand horse, and twelue thousand foot, and almost in the same forme, but most glistering, with more feathers, more men, and lesse courage, almost like a Crescent. The Dukes Cornet was about two hundred and fifty horse, augmented with the like number by the Duke of Nemours, who ioyned with him, and was almost in the midst of his squadrons as that of the Kings, but flanked with two squadrons of Lancers, that came out of the Low-countries, who were about eighteene hundred horse marching altogether. On the side were two regiments of Suisses, covered with French foot, then two lesse squadrons of Lances, seven hundred on the right hand, and five hundred on the left: two Culverins and two Bassards.

The Sunne and the wind might haue greatly annoyed the Kings army. To prevent this inconuenience, his Maiesty aduanceth aboue an hundred and fifty paces, gets both the Sun and the winde, and findes the enemies number greater then he esteemed. But this multitude serues as a spur to euery Capitaine to encourage both himselfe and his men. The King goes to the head of his Squadron, begins his first worke by prayer, exhorts and encourageth them with a countenance full of Maiesty, ioy, and constancy: Mariants a rieurs and giues him intelligence, that the Lords of Humieres, and Mouy are within two thousand paces of the Field. But the King had well obserued the point of his happinesse, and will not giue his enemy that honour to strike the first stroke.

The first charge.

He that begins well, hath halfe ended, saith the Prouerbe. He commandeth La Guisclie to discharge his Cannon: it pierceth through the thickest Squadrons of the enemies, and shoots nine vollies before theirs could begin: five or six hundred light horse, French, Italians, and Wallons, aduance with a full Carriere to charge the Marshall d'Amont on the one side; on the other side their Reistres charge the Kings light horse. The Marshall ioynes with them, and makes them turne their tayles presently: their groue of Reistres is so violently repulled and drinen backe, as they turn suddenly to rally themselves behind the other troops. Another squadron of Lancers, Wallons, and Flemings (seeing his Maiesties troopes separated somewhat from the rest which the Reistres had charged) come hotly vpon them. The Baron of Biron makes it good, and not able to charge them in the front, takes them behind, pierceth a part of them: the rest breakes away like a billow against a rocke: the Baron had two wounds, one in the arme, and the other in the face.

A second charge.

Now comes the Duke of Mayenne with his body of horsemen, in the which were the Dukes of Nemours and Aumale, hauing vpon their wings foure hundred Carabins, (which were Harguebuziers on horse backe, armed with Murrions and Plastrons) who make a furious fallie five and twenty paces off vpon his Maiesties troopes. This done, the King parts like a violent lightning from the head of his squadron, being 600 horse, hee chargeth two thousand of the enemies: he breakes them, scatters them, and is so engaged amongst the thickest of them, as (notwithstanding the great plume in his Caske, and that in his horses head which made him apparant) he remained a good quarter of an houre vnknowne euen to his own people, in this great forest of Lances; amidst a great shower of strokes, giuing a good testimony, that if before he could doe the office of a great King and Capitaine in ordering, so could he now performe the duty of a braue fouldier, and resolute man at armes in fighting.

A bloody charge.

But aboue all, of a most milde and mercifull Conqueror: who in this bloody fight, did found forth that gracious speech: Sau the French, and downe with the stranger. Doubtlesse he is well kept whom God keeps. Some were greatly amazed, others trembled and quaked, hauing lost the sight of the King. This great body whose foundation was so much shaken, began to wauer: those who euen now presented their faces so furiously with the points of their Launces and Swords, doe now shew their heeles, cast away their armes, and trust to their horses. His Maiesty being freed from this presse, hauing with welue or fifteene in his company, taken three Cornets, and slaine the Wallons that did accompany them, and returning to his Squadron a triumphing Conqueror, he filled the Army with exceeding ioy, and the Army the ayre with that louing cry of God sau the King.

The Suisses remained yet whole, but abandoned of all their horse, and laid open. They propound to send the French foot on the right hand, who had not yet fought

A fought to breake them. But the respect of the ancient alliance of that Nation with this Crowne, made the King to grant them life, and receiue them to mercy. Laying downe their armes they passed to his Maiesties side, and those French that were with them, enjoyed the like clemency. But the time his Maiesty lost in pardoning the Suisses, did greatly fauor their retreat that fled, and gaue the Duke of Mayenne leysure to passe the river of Eure, to breake the bridge after him, and to recouer Manté in safety. The Marshall of Biron stood firme without striking, yet did he more terrifie the enemy then any other: for seeing this troope of rescue whole, they supposed that this old fouldier hauing bene practised in to many battels in his life time, would easily breake them, and make the victory absolute. Hereupon the Marshall d'Amont, the Earle of Clermont, the Baron of Biron, and other Commanders, returne from the chase, gather together their troopes, and ioyne with the King. And the King hauing receiued his forces that came out of Normandy, makes a body, leaues the Marshall of Biron with the army to follow him, sends the Earle of Auergne before, takes the Baron of Biron on his right hand, and another troope on his left: and accompanied with the Prince of Cony, Duke Montpensier, Earle S. Paul, Marshall d'Amont, the Lord of Tremouille, and many others, pursued the point of his victory, chasing, beating and killing, vntill that the broken bridge diuerting them a league and a halfe out of the way, to passe at the foard of Ancty and the horses (whose legs the Reistres had cut to stop the way) hindring the pursuit; and the approaching night, ended the victory.

Loss of the Leguiss.

The disorder was great in the retreat of the vanquished, and the slaughter great in the fury of the fight: about five hundred horse were slaine or drowned, and aboue four hundred prisoners. The Count Egmont, the young Earle of Brunswike, Chastaignery, and a great number of other Noblemen slaine, Bais-Dauphin, McSaut, Cieongne (who caried the white cornet to the duke of Mayenne) Fontaine, Martel, Louchamp, Lodnan, Falendre, Henguesan: the Marshals of the field, Treuzay, Cassiere, Desmieux, and many other French, Germanes, Spaniards, Italians, and Flemings were prisoners, whereof the most part being graciously released, did afterwards aboue the Kings bounty by a reuolt, who neuer could practice that vnciuill maxime of State, a dead man neuer makes warre. There were twenty Cornets taken, the white Cornet, the great standard of the Generall of the Spaniards and Flemings, the cornets of the Colonel of the Reistres, three score ensignes of foot of diuers nation, and the 24 of Suisses which yielded. All the footmen which yielded not, or were not drowned, were cut in peeces. All their artillery, all their baggage caried away. Such as fled into the woods found lesse mercy in the peasants, then in the men of warre. The Duke of Mayenne saued himselfe in Manté, and gaue the Townsmen this shourt for their comfort, that the Bearnois was slaine, or little better. The Duke of Nemours, Bassompierre, the Vicount of Taucones, Rosne, and some others tooke the way of Charrres. To conclude, his Maiesty pursues them almost to the gates of Manté, finding the waies (notwithstanding his lets) full of runners away which remained at his discreti- on. And of which Manté persisting in their first resolution to keepe their gates shut, had not yeelded to the Dukes earnest request, both he and all his followers had faine into the victors hands. Thus God poured out his wrath vpon this army: thus a handfull of men defeated many Legions: thus the French spoyled Perou euen in France. On the Kings side were slaine Clermont of Entragues, Capitaine of his Maiesties Guards, Tieb Schomberg Colonel of the Reistres, fighting then vnder the white Cornet, Loneulnay of Normandy, being three score and twelue yeares old (an honourable graue for that braue old man) Crenay Cornet to the Duke of Montpensier, Fesquiers, and at the most twenty Gentlemen more. The Marquis of Nefle being hurt, died within eight daies after. The Earle of Choisy, the Earle of Luden, d'O, Montlouet, d'Auergne, Rosny, and some others were lightly hurt.

Lost on the Kings side

In this battell they obserue three chiefe things. The first, the Kings firme resolution to giue battell, with an assured confidence, that the sincerity of his intent, and the equity of his cause should be fauoured with the assistance of heauen. The second, that at the very instant of the fight it seemed that the earth did bring forth armed men for his seruice: for on the eue and the day of battell, there came aboue fixe hundred horses vnto him vnexpected. The third, that of two thousand French Gentlemen, only 1200 did fight: welue hundred put to rout an army of foure thousand horse, fresh, well mounted, and well armed, med, and twelve thousand foot. Without doubt the eternall God of armes doth neuer forget the right of Princes, against their rebellious subjects: and abraue resolution, with a wife command giues a happy end to battells.

The next day by the Sunne rising the Vidame of Chartres went to field by the Kings commandement, to get some intelligence of the enemy. In the sight of Mantes he caused Dauid of Villeneuve a Gentleman of Quercy neere vnto Cahors, to aduance, whom he knew to be full of courage & zeale to his Maiesties ser vice, hauing seene him many times in good places, and lately very active to pursue the victory without care of booty, like vnto many others. Gold doth many times cause him to be hated that loues it, and spoiles doe little aduantage the spoilers; But goodly aduances, leaue a fauour of immortal praise in generous minds. Villeneuve resolves not to returne without some certaine newes. All the Country was amazed, No man appeared. Hee approacheth neere vnto the towne, to talke with the first hee should meete. Some labouring in the Vines, seeing him armed and wearing a white scarfe, they run and giue the alarm at Mantes. The Inhabitants run in heapes to the port with all sorts of armes. He heares a great tumult in the towne, and thereupon takes an occasion to found their wills. He prickes on his horse to the turnepike, and cries out that he came from the King to know their intentions: That hee hath his armes open to receiue them with clemency that fauour the Iustice of his cause, and his sword ready to force them that thinke to pul from him the Inheritance which Nature and Law had giuen him.

God blessed his designe, and disposed the hearts of this people to follow the better way. Aboue two hundred of the chiefe Inhabitants, come to him to the port. Hee shewes them the Iustice of his Maiesties armes, exhorteth them to renounce all foraigne leagues, and not grow obliuate, through the perswasions or promises of such as pretend to raulsh the Crowne, against all right and reason, and to consider that this warre was merely for state, and that religion was onely a maske: witnesse the Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelats, which lay masse dayly in the army, with all liberty. That they should deliuer their resolutions freely, the which being reported to the King they should fee the effects, which a people merits of a most mercifull and conquering Prince.

Being thus perswaded, and seeing the King armed with right & force, all ioynly lift vp their hands, and protest to liue and die in the fidelity, which good and loyall subjects owe vnto their lawfull Lord; and that by their true obedience, they would wipe out rebellion whereunto they had suffered themselves to be carried, in the common deluge which had drowned the other people of the Realme. The Duke of Maine being aduertised by a strange Captaine of the garison, of the oath which he had seene giuen by the Inhabitants, from the which he could not diuert them neicher by threats nor violence, in stead of assuring himselfe of the towne, as hee might well haue done, hauing many souldiers with him, both horse and foot, considering that to settle his safetie vpon the vncertainty of a popular friendship is to build vpon a quick sand: hee retires by the opposite Port without any trumpet, leauing the souldiers in so bad teames with the Inhabitants, as feare putting wings to their feet, they followed the fortune of their Commander. Thus by the industry of this Gentleman (worthy doubtlesse to be registred in our History) the towne of Mantes importing much for the bridge which it hath vpon the riuer of Seine, came without charge or losse of men vnder the Kings obedience, who the next day made his entry there with all signes of ioy. Vernon another bridge vpon the same riuer did in like manner plant the banner of France. And the heavens seemed to poure more blessings vpon our Henry, and to make his way easie to an absolute Royalty: for the Earle of Rendant, chiefe of the league in Auvergne was the same day of the battell of Yury, shamefully chased from the siege of Issoire, slaine in battell, his troopes cut in peeces and his Artillery taken, by the Lords of Curton, Rosignat and Chafferon.

As they had abused the Mantois with a vaine assurance of his death, whom they durst not looke vpon nor encounter, so with the like practices they must delude the Parisiens. The Duke of Mayenne, his sister of Montpensier, and the other heads of the league, decieued of their hopes, published by printed bookes, and at the first assault at Dreux, the Bearnois had lost about 500 men, that their wounds had made a greater number visit for their armes: that the Marshall of Biron was wounded vnto death. That in another encounter

A counter neere vnto Poissy the Vnion had gotten a great victory. That in the battell of Yury, the combat had bene long, and the losse almost equall. That if the Bearnois bee not dead, he is little better. But such as (glad to haue saued themselves) came to Paris, marred all, in verifying the contrary, making the people to hang downe their heads, and to wish for peace by a still and mournfull muttering. The firebrands of hell in their pulpits made the losse far lesse then it was, giuing them an assured hope of speedy and new succors from Spaine, for the restoring of their Estate and destruction of the Maheustres, so they then called such as did fight vnder the Kings Ensignes.

And the Duke of Mayenne after hee had made a certaine practice vpon the Towne of Sensis (for the which twelve as well Captaines as souldiers, and many others being engaged in the same conspiracy, past through the hang-mans hands, the third day of Iuly went into Flanders, to the Duke of Parma: that is to say, he went to ruine his honor and reputation, for being a master at home amongst his owne Country-men, hee went to make himself a seruant and slaue to an ambitious proud man, who hath often in scorn made him attend at his Cabines doore, and lacquay after him, before he could receiue an answer of any matter of small importance: to the great griefe and disdaine of the French Gentlemen, that did accompany him, who scorned to imbase themselves to those proud humors. Doubtlesse it was necessary the Duke should try the infoleny of strangers, the better to know the courtesie of the French, and submit his armes and person to the King his Soueraigne and lawfull Lord: the means whereby hereafter hee shall abolish the memory of things past.

Adversity makes the willfull more obstinate. The Court of Parliamt at Rouen, for execution of the former decree, puts to death the seuenth of April, some prisoners the Kings seruants: and three daies after they declare all those persons guilty of high Treason both to God and man, that followed the King of Nauarre (so spake the decree) and would not yeeld to King Charles the tenth of that name, ioyne with the Vnion, and cary armes vnder the Duke of Mayenne. Whilest these threaten by their decree, and the duke goes to beg reliefe, the King being at Manté laboured to reduce the Parisiens to reason by mildnesse. But these trumpets of sedition, imputing this delay to want of courage, persuaded the people, that shortly their sworne enemie should haue worke enough, and that at length he should be ruined, that a little patience would giue them a great victory: that they must not yeeld to any Article whatsoever: making impudent allusions to the name of his family, who is now seated in the throne of this Monarchy.

These insolent exclamations brought the King about Paris. Paris is accustomed to liue from hand to mouth: the benefit of the Halles, the place Maubert, and other market places, is the cause that most households doe not know what prouision means. And the chiefe of the League had so settled this former beliefe in the Citizens mindes, as of a hundred, foure score and nineteen had neglected to provide for things necessary to endure the toyle of a siege. So as the taking of Manté Poissy, Pontchartrain, Corbeil, Melun, Montreau vpon Seine, and Lagny vpon Marne, brought Paris in few months to extreame necessity. Compiegne, Creil, and Beaumont stop the riuer of Oise.

But the ordinarie cries of the Preachers: the practices of the chiefe, and the Ladies of the league, and the erroneous decision of the faculty of Sorbonne, giuen the seuenth of May in the third General Congregation, held to that end in the great Hall of the sayd Colledge, prohibiting all Catholikes according to the Law of God, said they, to receiue for King an Heretike or fauor of Heretikes, relapse & excommunicate, although he doe afterwards obaine by an outward iudgement absolution of his crimes and censures, if there remaine any doubt of dissembling, treachery, or subuersion of the Catholike Religion. Condemning all them for Heretikes, forsakers of Religion, and pernicious to the Church, that should suffer any such to come to the Crowne. All these made the multitude more obstinate against the extreamest miseries which the rigour of a long and painful siege may cause. Besides this decision, they had yet stronger restraints to bridle mens tongues & actions that fauoured the Floure de Luce in their hearts. The sixteene Tribunes set spies to obserue the speeches and countenances of such as they suspected: that is to say, of such as wish for peace, and haue not lost the remembrance of the true Princes of France. And if any one chance to say, it were good to treat of a peace. Hee is a politike: he is a Royalist, that is to say, an Heretike, and enemy to the Church.

Church. They spoile, imprison, yea put to death, such as doe not applaud this horrible A tyranny.

The Duke of Nemours, in the Duke his brothers absence, commanded at Paris, and for his chiefe Councillors, he had the Popes Legat, the Ambassador of Spaine, the Archbishop of Lion, the Bishops of Paris, Rennes, Placentia, Sens, and others. Panigraole, bishop of Ait, Bellarmine and Tyrens Iesuits, who with diuers processions, fasting, vovles and supplications, bewitched the people in their greatest famine: many zealous doctors, curats, priests and monkes tooke armes, and the Friars with their Breuaries in open multers were admired by some, and laught at by others. The Cheualers D' Aumale, with some others, laboured by fallies to annoy the Kings troopes, who content to repulle them, hoped B their bellies would shortly make their tongues to sing a new note. The Duke of Mayenne on the other side courted the Parmesan: and the King of Spaine proceeded so slowly in his succors, as the best iudgments did perceiue, he rather sought to entertaine, then to quench their thirst.

The Parisiens in the meane time had leisure to sharpen, but not to satysfie their appetite. The corne and other prouision of the publike, was wasted the first moneth. Such as had any prouision in their houses, kept it very secret: and others that trusted too confidently to the words of the chiefe Commanders and Preachers, perished of hunger, or at the least indured much, straining against the cruelty of famine. All passages by water were cut off, the taking of Saint Denis deprived them of the plaine of France, and but C for the passports (which a little fauour or money obtained easily of the Capitaines and Guards) the Citizens had in few weekes beene brought to the Kings discretion, who yielded good for euill, suffred them to carry victuals for the Duke of Nemours, the Ladies and others who practised his ruine, except Nitri Gobert, who by his ordinary fallies had often conference with the King to produce in the end great effects for his Maiesties seruice, and by his returne to the Royall party euaporate the bad fauour of foure thousand Crownes which had caried him to the mutines faction in the greatest necessity of the Kings affaires.

The misery of the Parisiens.

Their misery grew extreame in the third moneth of the sicke. There was a hundred thousand people dead of hunger, griefe and poverty, in the streets and hospitals, without D reliefe, and without pity. The suburbs ruined, beaten downe and waste. The City needie and solitary. The rents of the Towne-houie (being the chiefe livings of many families) were extinguished: their lands about the City wasted and desolate, the Vniuersity forsaken, or serving to lodge peasants, and the Schooles for stables for their cattell: the Palace not frequented, but by some idle persons, the grass growing whereas before they could hardly go for preffe. The shops either without workemen, or without traffike. No corne, no wine, no wood, no hay upon the river. Nothing passed but was subiect to the garisons of S. Denis, the fort of Gournay, Cheureuze & Corbeil: the Halls were empty, no Merchants in market-places, no means to make money, nor to get meat. To conclude, see this Queene of Cities, this little world, this Paris without Peere, waste, desolate, and at the last E gaile, and (to augment the disorder) many reliques were eaten, the Jewels and the crownes of ancient Kings molten, and for a peece of bread, many Wiues and Virgins doe willingly abandon their bodies, and their honours to the fondlers.

But all these miseries and horrors cannot moue these hard-hearted Pharaoses. The sixteenth, the forty, and the chief of the faction, bewitch the people, as it were with a sleeping potion which benums the members, to cut them off by peece-meale when they be asleep, that hauing sucked the blood, the vital heat, and the hearts out of their bodies (as they haue done the fluer out off their purses) they might confirme their insolent tyranny, without controll: They force the Parliament (being subiect to the houses of Spaine and Lorraine) to publish a decree the sixteenth of Iune, F Forbidding upon paine of death all men to speake of any composition with Henry of Bourbon, but so oppose themselves by all means, yea with the effusion of their blood. And the Preachers did fill feed them with hope of a speedy deliuey.

A forced decree of the Parliament at Paris.

But the belly hath no eares: the people are not fed with paper, or with the Duke of Mayennes promises, nor with his trumpets. They haue already eaten dogs, cats, horses, asses, moyles, herbs, roots, and any thing that might quench the rage of famine, such extreame dispaire. They come tumultuously to the Conncell assembled in the Palace, to requite

A quire a peece. They prouide for this mutinie by a silly reliefe of eight or ten daies. At the end whereof a great number appeare armed in the same place, and demand a peece, or bread. Gohs, a Capitaine in the towne, steps forth to feede these famished people with words, but no bread, and for his reward he was wounded in the shoulder with a Sword, whereof he died within few daies after. The Cheualer D' Aumale flies thither, and followed by a troope of men at his deuotion, shuts the Palace gates, imprisons them that were armed, and hangs two, out of the whole multitude, to suppress the like fits of this despairing people. These popular mutinies had confounded the chiefe Leaguers, if they had not preuented it. To this end they assemble with the chiefe of the Citie, and notwithstanding the decision of the Sorbonne, and the Decree of the Court, they resolute B to send the Archbishop of Lions, and the Bishop of Paris to the Kings Maiestie, to seeke some meanes of pacification.

Deputies sent to the King.

Before they part, they will haue leaue from the Legate, lest they incur some Ecclesiasticall censure. The Legate consults with Panigraole, Bellarmine, and Tyrens, whether the Parisiens did fall into excommunication, being forced by famine to yield vnto an hereticke Prince. If the Deputies going to such a Prince, to conuert him, or to better the E. state of the Catholike Church, were comprehended in the excommunication of the Bull of Pope Sixtus the fifth: the Doctors answer no. Thus the Deputies come to the King, to S. Anthanies in the field. The King heares their speech, tending to a generall peace C for the Realme, or a particular for Paris, if the Duke of Mayenne will not seeke a generall. But what can they hope to obtaine of a King of France and of Nauarre, treating with him but with the simple quality of King of Nauarre?

Your Conncell (said his Maiestie) contradicts it selfe, demanding peace of him whom they will acknowledge but for King of Nauarre. I will and desire peace, to ease my people, but not according to your proposition. I loue the Citie of Paris as my eldest daughter, and will doe her more good then she requires, so as she be thankfull vnto me, and not to the D. of Mayenne, nor to the King of Spain. The brute of the Spanish succours for Paris, do not amaze me. I know the practices of Spaine, and with the helpe of heaven will conuert them into smoke. Paris and the Realme of France are not fit for King Philip D. lips mouth. I will giue the Parisiens eight daies to consider of their yielding, and of the Articles of peace for the whole Realme. Vpon their refusal, I know well how to vse a Conquerors right against the chiefe motiues and fauourers of rebellion: the constancy of them of Sancer, the despaire and victorie of the Gantois, whereby you magnified them of Paris, is impertinent: for those of Sancer were prest to these extremities by the violences of such as would take from them their goods and liberties, their religion and liues. Contrariwise I will giue the Parisiens life, which Mendos the Ambassadour of Spaine takes from them by famine. As for religion, informe your selues of these Princes and Noblemen Catholikes, if I doe force their consciences in the exercise of their religion or otherwise. The comparison with them of Gant is not good. The Parisiens haue sufficiently E shewed their courage, in suffering their Suburbs to be taken. I haue five thousand Gentlemen with me, who will not be intreated after the Gantois manner. I haue likewise God, and the equity of my cause. Make a faithfull report of my words to them that haue sent you.

The Kings
answer to the Deputies.

With this answer, and other speeches testifying the Kings good meaning, and the small feare he had of the League, these Deputies goe to the Duke of Mayenne: and he sends them backe to the King, and giues great hope to incline to a peace. But, Be not amazed at this treaty (said he to the Parisiens, by a Secretary of his going after the Deputies) I will rather die then make a peace. And being aduertised, that Paris would shortly be forced through want to yield vnto the King, The taking thereof (answered he) shall be preiudiciall F vnto him: this conquest shall disperse his army, and then we shall proue easily. But his Maiestie would neither see nor suffer the ruine of his capitall city: and his meaning was not to seize vpon Paris in such sort as his enemies supposed. It grieved him to see so many ill aduised people. And if the Dukes of Mayenne and Parma, comming to succour them, would hazard a battell, he hoped by their ouerthrow to bring the Parisiens vnto reason.

Thus the Duke thought to abuse the King with deuices, and vnder a color of treaty win time, in fauour of the besieged. But the King being aduertised, that the D. of Mayenne was parted from Bruxelles, and tooke the way to Paris, followed by Balagni, Capitaine S.

S. Paul, and other troops, his Maieſty advanceth with a troope of horſe, and marcheth A ſeventene leagues to encounter him: and miſſing them but one houre, he forceth them to ſie into Laon. The Duke fortifies himſelfe there with his forces, and approaching vnto Meaux, he gives a generall hope of a battell. The King goes againe towards him: but he finds the Duke fortified betwixt two rivers, attending the duke of Parmaes comming: who being come, renews this fiſt hope, and with this deſigne he goes to lodge at Clay and Preſures, fixe leagues from Paris. The King raiſeth the ſiege, comes to meet him, appoints the Rendezvous for his army: the next day, the thirtieth of Auguſt, on the plaine of Bondy in the way to his enemies, hee chaſeth their quarter-maſters from Chelles, who began to make out their lodging, and forceth a troope of eight hundred horſe to retire B into the body of their army. The fiſt of September, the Kings army is in battell about the village of Chelles, about fix thousand horſe, in the which were fixe Princes, two Marſhalls of France, many Noblemen, more Commanders, more great Captaines then are in all the reſt of the world, foure thousand French Gentlemen (whom the bare ſhew of a combat doth draw more cheerfully to the place of battell, then to a gallant wedding) and eightheene thousand foot, French & ſtrangers. The Duke of Parma ſtanding vpon a hill to view them, Be theſe (ſaid he to the Duke of Mayenne) the tenthousand men, which you afford me would be ſo eaſily overcome? there appears above five and twenty thousand in the beſt order that I have ſene. This Duke made more account to ſaue one of his men, then to kill ten of his enemies. So reſolving not to hazard any thing, they change their ſwords C and lances, into ſhouels and pick-axes, and intrenching themſelves in the Fenne, ayoyed the danger, and preferred his army: neither could ſkirmiſhes nor alarums make him abandon his trenches.

On the eight day of the month, the miſt was great, and the winde being contrary, carried away the noiſe of the enemies cannon. The Dukes laying hold of this occaſion, make a bridge of boats, beſiege Lagny vpon Marne, a weake towne, lying behind their backs, and halfe a mile from their campe: they batter it, and take it by force, but not without an honorable and vertuous reſiſtance of three hundred men, that kept it, but holding it not guardable they razed it. To draw them out of their fort, his Maieſty makes ſhew of a great enterpriſe againſt Paris: he makes his deſigne knowne, that hee will attempt it by ſeaſon: and the tenth day at night goes from the campe with a good troope. But they keepe themſelves within their Fences, yet could they not long ſubſiſt in this ſtraight, where they endured all wants: and hunger in the end would drive the Wolfe out of the wood. The King offered them battell in vaine: he attended the tryall of the Dukes forces in vaine. Hee therefore mans thoe places he held about Paris, ſends backe ſome of his troops into Touraine, Normandy, Champagne and Bourgongne, and retaines a ſufficient army to annoy his enemies.

This proceeding draws the Dukes to field, to free Paris. Parma calls himſelfe a Redde-mer: and to make his profit of this advantage, he beſiegeth and taketh Corbeil by force, and kills all that he finds in armes. Rigaudi (a brave and valiant Captaine) commanded there, and having no time to reſiſt to great a power, he found there an honourable Sepulcher. For dying at the breach, he performed the duty of a faithfull and vigilant ſervant to the King. But the Parmeſan loſt the Marquis of Renty, with a great number of men, blemiſhed his reputation, and weakened his army: for whileſt that he waſts time, the King makes new deſignes, which ſhall bring the league into greater difficulties.

Even then the Agents of Philip would have filled his good City of Paris (for ſo the Spaniards called it) with numbers of Spaniards and Vallons. But on the one ſide the plague was great, and victuals very ſcant: and on the other ſide, the forces of Maurice Earle of Naſſu prevailed in the Low-Countries: the Queene of England ſending great ſuccours thither. And the ſixteene Tribunes of Paris ſeeing themſelves at ſome more F liberty, thanked the Duke of Parma, giuing him to vnderſtand, that his aboad at Bruxels, would be more pleaſing and more ſafe for him. His army decayed viſibly: hee ſees himſelfe in the middeſt of an incontinent multitude, and to diſmember his forces to leave any with the Parisiens, were to loſe them, to draw the King vpon him, and to bee in danger of an overthrow. So in the end of November hee gathers together his troopes, and makes his retreat, being purſued, tired, and beaten with dayly loſſe, even to the frontiers of Artois, by the King, the Dukes of Nevers and Longueville, by the Baron of Bi-ron,

A ron, Guiry, Parabel, and others. To teach ſtrangers, that France cannot be taken, nor ruined, but by it ſelfe.

He had no ſooner turned his backe, but Corbeil, and other ſmall places held by them, returned to the Kings obedience: the garriſons placed there by them, repayed the French blood lately ſhed at the taking thereof: and Paris fell againe into new confuſions and like neceſſity. The Duke of Mayenne was greatly troubled to aſſiſt the Parmeſan in his retreat. During the which the Marſhall of Biron tooke Clermont in Beauvoſſin for his Maieſty, five or fixe other townes, and twenty forts or caſtles poſſeſſed by the Enemy. The Duke of Parma being out of the Realme, the King made his entry into S. Quentin, being receiued B by an honorable entertainment, and exceeding joy of the inhabitants: and the tenth of December, he was aduertised, that Humières, Beſſiere his brother-in-law, and Parabel, had forced Corby, ſcaled the wals, fought with the garriſon, ſlaine all men of defence, and conquered the towne for his Maieſty.

for the king.

We have conducted a mighty enemy out of the Realme: let vs now obſerve ſome particular exploits, for which wee would not interrupt the continuance of our Hiſtory. The Leaguers forces conſiſted of men, who fought their priuate profit in the confuſion of the Eſtate, and by conſequence, wiſhed for nothing but increaſe of diſorders: to all their deſignes tended onely to ſpoile and delolation, to the prejudice of the Kings ſubiects, but to no advancement of their party. In Dauphine thoſe of Vienne fought in the month of C March to ſhew ſome effects in ſauour of the croſſes of Lorraine. Thoſe which had the Flower de Luce printed in their hearts, aſſure the towne for the King. The Colonel Alphonſo and Des Diguieres goe to ſuccour them: and from thence goe and take Pont d' Beauvoſſin, and S. Laurence du Pont, poſſeſſed by the League.

In the meane time, the Marquis of S. Sorlin, brother to the Duke of Nemours, hath an enterpriſe vpon Vienne. Theſe two Commanders flye thither with ſpeed, and repulſe the Enemy. Alphonſo deſires to ſee how he carries himſelfe in his retreat: he falls into an ambuſh laid by the Baron of Senecy, is taken priſoner, and payes afterwards forty thousand crownes for his ranſome. Des Diguieres tooke the townes and caſtles of Briançon and Daxilles, and entred vpon the territories of the Duke of Sauoy. Then in November he beſieged and forced Grenoble a Parliament towne, to ſet vp the armes of France, & to change their affections which inclined to the factions of ſtrangers. So we may ſay that Dauphine was the fiſt Prouince of the Realme wholly ſubdued to the King from the League: which was chiefly performed by the valour and diligence of the Lord of Des Diguieres. In Normandy the Duke of Montpenſier tooke Honfleur, and forced the Leaguers to leave the field. Thus the League decreaſed in diuers Countries: and to giue them a mate, the King did ſollicit a leauy of Reſtires in Germany, by the Vicont of Turenne. On the other ſide, Gregory Sfondrate lately inſtalled in the Pontifical Chaire, and a partiſan of Spaine, reui- G te the hope of the League, promiſing a ſuccour of ſiſtene hundred horſe, and eight thousand foot, vnder the command of Francis Sfondrate his Nephew. During theſe E preparations, the Cheualier D'Amale attempts vpon Saint Denis, ſcales the wall by night, enters the towne without loſſe, and held himſelfe for maſter thereof, when as the Lord of Vicq, a valiant, wife, and reſolute Gentleman, comes into the ſtreet, chargeth the Knight, layes him dead vpon the place, kills moſt of his followers, and puts the reſt to flight. This Knight was one of the chiefe of the League, violent, hardy and valiant, but of a ſtrange diſpoſition, inſupportable and diſſolute.

Gregory the 14,
a partizan of Spaine.

The King tired the Parisiens with continuall alarums, and new enterpriſes, but rather to terrifie then to ruine them, and to giue them occaſion to open their eyes, and to conſider of their eſtate. They grow ſo amazed, as they wall vp S. Horories gate, vpon an aduertiment that the Kings troops would make ſome great attempt the 20 of Ianuary. The Parisiens feare ſerues the Agents of Spaine for a pretext to draw in ſome regiments of Spaniards and Neapolitanes, attending ſome great ſuccours from the D. of Parma. The hope of theſe new ſuccours from Spaine and Italy, ſerued the chiefe of that faction as a bridle to reſtrain the Parisiens. But the more to encourage and content the whole body, Gregory the 14, aſſiſted by many Cardinals, doth againe excommunicate the King and his adherents: he ſends a Monitory to the Cardinall of Placentia his Legate at Paris, by Marcellin Landriano his Nuncio: and for the effect of his purpoſes and promiſes, he begins to arme, to nouriſh (in ſtead of quenching as a common father) the combuſtions of this Realme.

On the other side (the Chastillon having priuate intelligence with the D. of Mercœur) A the Spaniards land in Britany, and fortifie Blauet a port of the Sea: & thereby in a manner dismember the whole Prouince, vnto the Crowne vnder Charles the eighth. The King sent La Noue to make head against them: & retiring to Senlis, he tooke the way to Brié, accompanied by the D. of Neuers (who hereafter shall be of the Kings party, vpon the assurance the Cardinall of Bourbon gaue him, that he might without scruple of conscience cary armes for his King, although of a contrary religion) he makes a shew to besiege Prouins, Sens, or Troyes; and then with a sudden change hee giues out, that his meaning was to go to Tours, to redresse some disorders: but he commands the Marshall of Biron (who returned from the conquest of Caudebec, Fescamp, and diuers other places for his Maiesty) to make a shew to passe through Beaufe, to ioine with him, and that suddenly he should turne and inuest Chartres, before any greater forces should enter.

Chartres besieged and taken.

Chartres was environed the tenth of February, besieged, battered, and assaulted, but valiantly defended almost two moneths and a halfe. La Bourdaisiere commanded there, who hauing endured some assaults, it was propounded in the Kings Councell to raise the siege: but the Earle of Cheuerny (lately restored to the office of Chancellor by his Maiesty) did vehemently impugn it: hauing an especiall interest in the reduction of this towne, by reason of some lands he possessed thereabout, he aduise the King to giue a generall assault: insists vpon the dishonour and prejudice it would bring to the Kings affaires, and the commodities he should receiue by the taking thereof, being one of the C keys of Paris, which might greatly settle his estate, and annoy his rebels. The Lord of Chastillon (comming from raising of the siege of Aubigni, which La Chastre, chiefe of the league in Berry, had besieged) prometheth the King, that if he will make him his Lieutenant on this side the riuer, he will deliuer it into his power within eight daies. His Maiesty giues him this command. He makes a bridge of wood, the point whereof reached vnto the breach, that they might come couered to handy strokes with the enemy. This new engine amazeth them, and draws them to composition: the which they obtained on good Friday, vpon condition to yeild within eight dayes, if they were not relieved. The Duke of Mayenne would not lose the certaine, to run after the vncertaine. He held Chasteau-Thierry to faithfully begirt, as the Vicount Pinard was forced to capitulate D with him before the King could come to his succour. So the King lost Chasteau-Thierry, and in exchange tooke Chartres, a goodly and a strong place. There came forth about 600 men with their armes, horse, and baggage, and the 19 of Aprill the King made a triumphant entry in armes, appointed a garison, restored Soudis to his gouernment, reduced Aulneau and Dourdan to his obedience, and then went to refresh himselfe at Senlis.

Chasteau-Thierry taken by the League.

Let vs now see some other sinister accidents, which in time shal help to ruine the league. A thousand horse, and eightene hundred Harguebuziers, Prouengals, Sauoyards and Spaniards, seeke to subdue that Province for the Duke of Sauoy. La Vallée inuities Les Dignieres to doe the King herein a notable seruice: he goes, and both ioyndly charge these troops of strangers and bastard French, they kill foure hundred masters, and 1500 Harguebuziers, take many prisoners, and carry away fiftene Ensignes, win many horses and much baggage, and lose but one Gentleman, and some twenty souldiers. This done, Les Dignieres returns into Dauphine. Being gone, the league recouers new forces in Prouence by the fauour and credit of the Countesse of Saulx: but she had neither force nor vigour able to countenance the factions of Spaine and Sauoy. The Duke of Sauoy, lately returned from Spaine, grows zealous of some intelligences preiudiciall to his Estate, and sets guards, both ouer her and the Lord of Crequy her sonne. She is cunning, counterteifes her selfe sicke, conceales her discontent, and in the end, finds meanes to escape with her sonne disguised to Marfeilles.

In Poitou.

In Poitou the Gouernor of Loches, hauing taken the Castle of la Guierche, the Vicount of the said place presseth his friends, intreats the D. of Mercœur, assembles all he can to recouer his house. The Baron of Roche-pose ioyned with some other Commanders of the country for his Maiesties seruice, comes and chargeth the Vicount, kills above three hundred gentlemen, his best footmen, and about seuen hundred naturall Spaniards that were come out of Britany, to succour the Vicount. The Vicount after he had maintained a little fight, flies to a riuer by, where thinking to passe in the ferry-boate, the presse grew presently so great, as boate and passengers sunke. La Guierche with

A with many other Gentlemen slaine or drowned, did almost equall the number of the Nobility which died at Couras.

Then the Princes, and Noblemen, Catholiks, following the King, did sollicite his Maiesty to turne to the Catholike religion, and had by the Duke of Luxembourg fought to appease the bitterness of the Court of Rome, against the estate of this realme. The dukes returne with small hope: the petitions made vnto the King, to provide for his dutifull subjects of both religions: to prevent the new attempts of Gregory the fourteenth and his adherents, to the prejudice of this Crowne, were the cause of two Edicts made at Maite in the beginning of Iuly: the one confirmed the Edicts of pacification made by the deceased King, vpon the troubles of the Realme, and disannulled all that passed in Iuly, 1585 and 1588, in fauor of the League. The other shewed the Kings intent to maintaine the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish religion in France, with the ancient rights and priuileges of the French Church. The Court of Parliament at Paris, resident at Tours and Chaalons in Champagne, hauing verified these Edicts, did presently disannull all the Bulls of Cardinall Casertani Legation, and other Bulls come from Rome the first of March, proceedings, excommunications and fulminations, made by Marcellin Landriano, terming himselfe the Popes Nuntio, as abusive, scandalous, seditious, full of impossittures, made against the holy decrees, Canonick constitutions, approved Councels, and against the rights and liberties of the French Church. They decree, that if any had bene excommunicate by vertue of the said proceedings, they should be absolved: the said Bulls and all proceedings by vertue thereof burnt in the market-place by the hang-man, Landriano the pretended Nuntio (come priuily into the Realme without the Kings leave or liking) should be apprehended and put into the Kings prison, and so to proceed extraordinarily against him. And in case he could not be taken, he should be summoned at three short daies, according to the accustomed manner, and 10000 franks giuen in reward to him that should deliuer him to the Magistrate. Prohibitions being made to all men to receiue, retaine, conceale or lodge the said pretended Nuntio, vpon paine of death. And to all Clergie men, nor to receiue, publish or cause to be published any sentences, or proceedings comming from him, vpon paine to be punished as Traytors. The declared the Cardinals (being at Rome), the Archbishops, Bishops and other Clergie men, which had signed, and ratified the said Bull of Excommunication, and approved the most barbarous, abominable & detestable Parricide trayterously committed on the person of the deceased King, most Christian and most Catholike, deprived of such spirittuall liuings as they held within the Realme, causing the Kings Proctor generall to seize thereon, and to put them into his Maiesties hands: forbidding all persons either to cary or send gold to Rome, and to provide for the disposition of Benefices, vntill the King should otherwise decree.

That of Tours added this clause to their Decree: they declared Gregory, calling himselfe Pope the fourteenth of that name, an enemy to peace, to the vniou of the Catholike, Apostolike and Romane Church, to the King and to his Estate, adhering to the E conspiracy of Spaine, and a fauourer of rebels, culpable of the most cruel, most inhumane, and most detestable Parricide, committed on the person of Henry the third of famous memory, most Christian and most Catholike. The Parliament of the League, did afterwards condemne and cause those decrees to be burnt at Paris, which were made against the Bulls and Ministers of the Romish see. So one pulled downe what an other built vp. During this contrariety of Parliaments, there fals out a crosse to diuide the intentions of the Spaniard, and Lorraine without the Realme, and of the Dukes of Mayenne and Nemours at Paris. Euery one by diuers practices affected this Crowne, and euery one tryed all his wits to set it vpon his owne head. But these men had diuided it amongst them, giuing the rest to vnderstand, that they fed themselves with vaine hopes. To call more wood F and oile into the flames of their diuision, and to ruine one by another, matters were so handled, as the fifteenth of August, the yong Duke of Guise escaped out of prison from La Chastre, to conduct him. This escape caused many bonfires, and greatly reuiued their hearts, who held this Prince fit to make a King of the Vnion. But the cleere-sighted thought with reason, that his arrival at Paris would rather ruine then aduance their party, and the deuices and practices of other pretendants, must needs soone kinde an extreme and common ialousie amongst them.

The Popes Bull annulled.

The D. of Guise escapes.

HENRY the fourth,

HENRY the fourth,

While these confult with their moft truly friends and feruants, what effects might A grow by this new accident, the King in the fame moneth befieged Noyon in Picardy, de-fented the succours fent by the League, foure times, killed their moft reſolute men at armes, took many priſoners, put the reſt to flight, and at the duke of Mayennes noſe (who to auoyde this checke, which the League was like to receiue, attempted neere to Noyon, fought to force his Maieſties Suiſſes lodged at Houda, and approached neere to Noyon, but would not fight) heaping ſhame vpon his enemies, he forced the beſieged to yeeld to his obedience: and moreover, went and dared him to fight before Han. Whileſt on the other ſide the Prince of Couary reduced Sellies in Berni to the Kings obedience, at the winning whereof hee won more honor, being ſtrongly ſituated in a marſh, then Mal- B be did in the keeping of it: for he ſuffered it to be recovered within two months by him that had loſt it.

Let vs returne in Dauphiné, to behold the moſt memorable, and moſt fatali defeat for the enemies of this Crowne, the moſt vertuous expedition of armes, which for theſe many yeeres hath moſt broken their deſignes vpon Provence & Dauphine, and moſt weak-ned the League in thoſe Provinces which the Sanoſien affected: Don Amedeo, baſtard brother to the Duke of Sanoia, Don Oliuier cheife of the Spaniards, (when the duke had lately obtained of King Philip his father in law,) the Marquis of Treuic and others, conceded to ſeue hundred and ſixtye men, by the plains of Pontcharra, neere to the Caſtle of Bayard, in the valley of Graſiaudin, Doubtleſſe the place ſhould not ruine the me- C mory of that incomparable Knight, who by the valour of his armes, had in former times wonderfully eyed the Realm: to commend his merits: the Lord Les Dignieres meets them, chargeth and defeats them, leauing two thouſand five hundred ſlain vpon the place, caries away many priſoners, and moſt of the Commanders, takes eighteene Enſignes with Red Croſſes, and makes booty of all their baggage, which amounts to aboue two hundred thouſand Crownes, in chaines, jewels, plate, money, both gold and ſiluer, horſe and armes. Two thouſand Romanes and Milanolds, which had ſaued themſelues with Comte Galas of Bel-loyeuſe their Commander in the Caſtle of Aualon, were the next day at the victors diſcretion: fixe or ſeven hundred were cut in peeces, the reſt were ſent to a place of ſafety, with white wands in their hands: and then ſent home into Italy, with D an oath neuer to rayſe armes againſt France.

The King ſeeing, that neither by the taking of Noyon, nor by any other baite, he could draw his enemies to fight, doth preſſe them yet more neerly. To this end he commands, that Paris ſhould be reſtrained on all ſides, both by water and land, and enioy no commodities, but by the mercy of the neighbour garriſons (the which hee entertained, vpon the tributes and cuſtomes impoſed vpon victuals, which they ſuffered to paſſe to Paris: and by this meanes emptied the inhabitants purſes, ſtrippt them, and drew out of the City ne-ceſſary commodities for his troopes,) then with one part of his army, hee marcheth into Normandy, to priſon the Louiers, and then reſolueth to beſiege Rouan, the inhabitants whereof ſeeming no leſſe obſtinate then the Pariſiens, whereupon hee made a voyage to E Dieppe, to provide for all things neceſſary for this ſiege, from thence he ſent an Amba-ſadour to intreat the Queene of England to aſſiſt him at this ſiege with foure thouſand men for three moneths, and to haue the Earle of Eſſex, to command them, the taking of which Towne imported very much hee ſaid for the Trade of the Engliſh Merchants.
The Queene did willingly graat theſe ſuccours, and the Earle came at the appointed time with foure thouſand foot, and a hundred and ſixty horſe as gallant troopes as could bee ſene: the King in the meane time was in Picardy attending his Germane army which came vnto him vnder the command of the Prince of Anhalt. The Engliſh lay idle and halfe of the time was ſpent that was limited for their ſtay: at the laſt the King ſent the Marſhall of Biron to ioyne with them with part of his army, who beſieging Gournay with their ioynt forces they took it by compoſition, and then vpon the Kings arriuall they went to ineſt Rouan, where at their firſt ſitting downe the garriſon made a gallant ſally vpon the Engliſh quarter, but they reſuſt them and beat them into their towne as valiantly, but the Engliſh loſt in this ſkirmiſh Maſter Walſer Denoreux the Earle of Eſſex brother, a gallant yong Gentleman and of great hope. This ſiege grew long and the inhabitants cried out for ſuccours being reduced to a very deſperate eſtate. So the King of Spaine ſends to the Duke of Parma, commands him to leaue the government of the Low.

A Low-Countries to Cont Mansfield, to go and free Rouan, and to imbrace ſuch occasions as ſhould be offered. Whereupon hee parts from Bruxelles with 4000 foot, and 3000 horſe: and fortified with the ſuccors of Italy, and 3000 Suiſſes, hee marcheth by ſmall iourneies, for he wiſely conceiued that his maſter ſent him into France for the ſame conſiderations, that he would haue giuen him the conduct of his army by ſea into England, and vnder this ſhew of armes hee practiſed another deſigne: to cauſe the eſtates of the League to giue the Crowne of France to the Infanta of Spaine, whom the father promiſed to marry with one of the heads of the party, whom the eſtates ſhould name.

This tended greatly to the preiudice of the D. of Mayenne, for he was married: and the eldeſt ſon of Lorraine, with the Dukes of Guiſe and Nemours were to marry. He is therefore now reſolutely determined to croſſe the 16 Tribunes of Paris, who with their Champions caried away the peoples voyces, and aboue all others, did feed the Spaniards hopes in this Realme, to whom (inticed by the gold of Pern, and his prodigall promiſes) they had already ſold the Capitall City. The 16 growne hatefull through their tyrannous authority, ſeare to be ſoone ſuppreſſed: they reſolute to preuent it, and rather to vnkhorſe the Duke, the better to aduance their affaires according to King *Philip*s intentions. One thing ſeemed to aduance their deſigne: they held priſoner one named Brigard a Proctor of the Towne-houſe, accuſed to haue had intelligence with the King, and for letters written to his Maieſty. Brigard eſcapes out of priſon: they ſuſpect the Preſident Brifſon, and the

C Councellors Larcher and Tardiſe, to haue fauored his eſcape. In this fury the 15 of No-uember, they ſeize vpon theſe three venerable perſons, hale them to the Chafeſter, cauſe them to be ſtrangled in the cloſe priſon, and the next day, hang vp their bodies at the Greue, with infamous writings on their breſts. This execrable fact might haue extended farther, and made the like ſpectable of any one that ſhould in any thing haue controlled the actions of theſe homicides. The Duke of Mayenne (who treated with Parma) poſts to appeaſe this tumult. Hee ſends for Eſpriuel, Francis of Ardilly a Gentleman of Beaufe who commanded in the Loure in the abſence of Rinande his kinfman, aſking him if there were an executioner provided. This had bene ſufficient to amaze the moſt conſtant, if he were not aſſured not to haue failed againſt the commandement

D which the Duke had giuen him at his departure, not to obey any but the Lord of Belin.
He offers his hand to Ardilly, and commands him to cauſe thoſe which hee ſhould ſend vnto him to be preſently hanged. Crucé, Louchart, Hameline, Auvoux, Emonnet, Ruſſile Clerie, and many others of the fixteene which could not bee found in the heat, eſcaped the gibbet. Crucé had bene firſt hanged if the Biſhop of Triſt had not purchaſt his pardon from the Duke of Mayenne. Louchart had eſcaped this miſchiefe if hee would haue accepted the honor which the Duke offered him to make him Commiſſary of the victuals in the army. I will not (ſaid he proudly) goe out of Paris.

You haue men about you, to whom you ſerue as a buckler; if your preſence were not,
we would make them change their language. Hameline ſeeing Louchart ſtrangled, made a E long prayer in French. Emonnet a violent man, ſtrugled much with the Hangman that bound him, thinking they would only terrifie him: but being led towards his companions hee deſired to be confeſſed, proteſting before all the aſſiſtants, being about forty, that he was not culpable of the Preſident *Brifſon*s death: yet that God had worthily puniſhed him for that hee had in a night wickedly ſlaine a Secretary belonging to the Chenailier d Aumale, whom hee had ſene receiue two hundred Crownes in gold which hee had.
Auvoux excuſed himſelfe that hee was not of *Louchart*s practice although hee had ſollicit-ed him, that hee tooke his death in good part, for many other great offences which hee had committed, but he named them not. Thus theſe foure rascals were hanged in the lower Hall of the Loure, the which they call Saint Louys Hall, and by him, who for that hee had

F made no reſuſall to put them ſecretly to death and without any ordinary forme of proceeding, whom the beauty of their Scarlet robes made reuerent and to be reſpected, ſhall be hanged within few yeares after with other confederates of that curſed attempt, when as after theſe furies the capitall City of this Realme ſhall acknowledge her lawfull Lord, and the Court of Parliament recouer her former dignity, to reuiue theſe miſerable wretches oppreſt at this day by the damnable commands of theſe Tribunes. The Duke of Mayenne by this execution thortned their number, weakened their authority, and maintained his owne as well as hee could, and to pacifie the people, guilty of this mutinie, he he published the tenth of December an abolition of things past in this disorder. The King A in the meane time made his necessary provisions for the siege of Rouan; and appointed his store houses at Caen, Pont Larche, Pontreau de Mer, and other places. On the other side, the hope of speedy succors from the Stranger, the presence of Henry of Lorraine, eldest son to the Duke of Mayenne, and the arrival of the Seigneur of Villars, with six horse, and 1300 Musketers, made the Citizens to persist in their rebellion: and the Parliament, forbid all men by a decree, in any sort to favour the part of Henry of Bourbon: upon paine of death: ordaining that the oath of the union made the 20 of January, in the year 1589. should be monthly renewed in the generall Assembly made to that effect: in the Abbey of Saint Owen, with commandement by the said Court to the Inhabitants; to obey the Lord of Villars, Lieutenant to the said Henry, in all he should command for the preservation of the towne. Moreover, Baughemare then first President, procured that all the Inhabitants should sweare before La Londe Mayor of Rouan, to retaine all such as by word or deed should favour the King of Navarre, to be exemplarily punished. Villars having got footing within Rouan, he presently displaced his superior: settles his authority, expells all such as he suspected, fortified S. Katherine mount, and did all acts of hostility against the King, annoying his army what he could, which he did, the obsequy of the besieged, was to encounter with the extreme rigor of the winter, sickness, & want of victuals

But they surpassed all these difficulties cheerfully, and the besieged were ready to yield, when as newes comes that the Dukes of Mayenne, and Parma had taken Neuchastell, C (abandoned by the Kings garisons) and were lodged at Franque-ville, halfe a daies iourney from Rouan. The Duke of Guise, la Chastre and Viry his Nephew led the forward.
The Dukes of Mayenne, of Parma and Sfondrate Nephew to Gregory the fourthenth, the battell. The Duke of Aumale, the Earle of Chaligny, brother to the Queene Dowager, Boisdauphin, Balzany, and Saint Paul the rearward: Boisjempierre and la Motte, Loraines, led the Swisses and the artillery. Wherest that the King made a necessary voyage to Diepe, to frustrate some intelligences of his enemies, the Marshall of Biron draws forth seven peeces of artillery to Bais, a village about Darnetall, plants them in three places, and puts himselfe in battell, to receive the Duke of Parma, who should come to lodge in the valley on that side, and by this countenance, made them thinke that he had a desire to fight.

The King arriues, continues in battell almost thirty houres, and prouokes his enemy by continual skirmishes. But he was encountered by a cunning temporizer, who paffing with his troopes wide of Darnettall, made the king to deuise a new stratagem to draw him on more, and to ingage him; as it happened foone after. The King dismisseth his Nobility, but with charge to be ready at the first command; & by continual skirmishes kept Rouan from any reliefe, from the 20 of March to the 21 of April. In the end, the Dukes of Mayenne, Guise, and Parma, seize vpon Caudebec, from whence the garison was dislodged, and the same day they come to Rouan, but stay not many houres, neither had they means to victual it. His Maiesty seeing that Rouan was not supplied with victuals, paffeth at Pont-Laueche, catches his army to aduance toward Fontaine-le-Bourg, and sends for all i. garisons of Louiers, Manté, Meulan, Vernon, and other places neere; so as fortified with about 3000 horse, and 6000 foot in lesse then six daies, he turns head towards the village of Lucor, where the Duke of Mayenne & Guise were lodged, charged their forward, and defeats it quite, chatcht the Dukes about two leagues from *Parma*s quarter, leaving their baggage & place in the possession of La Guishe. The first of May he takes from them another lodging, leaves about 600 Leaguers dead vpon the place, and loseth but fise souldiers, and eightene or twenty hurt. All these checks should draw the Dukes to fight; but Parma seeks only to free himselfe from the king, and the rest had no desire to make triall of their valors. They held themselves very close intrenched and fortified within their campe, issuing forth no more then they had lately done neer vnto Lagny. The King preffeth them and takes from them all passages both for victuals and retreat. They likewise intrench a great wood, and to stop the Kings approach, lodge there 2000 Spaniards and Wallons. In fight of their whole army his Maiesty forceth this entrenchment, and had it not bene for a small number who by great speed recovered the army, had defeated the whole troop. For ten dayes space the King tyred them with continual skirmishes, during the which he views the situation of their Camp, and the 10 of May he made choise of such forces as he

A. held necessary, and by five of clocke in the morning, chargeth a quarter which the Leaguers held to be most safe; and without resistance kills about two thousand five hundred men upon the place, carries away about two thousand horse, and wins all the baggage. To conclude, this war brought forth nothing so memorable as that which was done at Gaudebec; at Iuctor, and at Aumale. For a proofoe of the perpetual assistance and fauour of Heaven to our King, amidst this thundering of Artillery, and so many shew-ers of shot, his Majesty was hurt with a hargubeuze in the reynes; but yet so miraculou-ly, as the force of the bullet was spent in the empanelle of the ayre, and lay betwixt his armour and his backe, giuing the King this lesse by a diuine aduertisement, My Lord, His hand your life more sparingly, it is necessary for your subjects. The Duke of Parma (ticiped not all these encounters without a musket-shot in the arme: the wound did accom-pany him to his graue.

1 In the end, blowes, hunger and extreme thirst, forced these Dukes to take their way to Paris in confusion, from whence Prima (carrying no tokens of victory) passed through Brice, recouered Arthois, and so went to refresh himselfe at Bruxelles; then in the end of the yeare he died in Arras, as he returned from the Spaw. His reputation began to decay. He had preuailed little in France, and Conte Maurice did daily take something from him in the Low-countries. He had bene aduertised by a great souldier, and a man of iudgement, that hauing taken the towne of Antwerp (against the opinion of all the world) in the yeare 1585, he should shake hands with war. Doubtlesse this Prince should haue ended his labors by this great seruice done to King Philip his Master, as the most glorious triumph which Spaine had long time seene.

Thus the Duke of Parmas troops by land were weakened, and those he had imbarked were fought withall, some taken, and the rest sunk by the Hollanders. So Spondani came to confine his troops in France. Thus France elapsed at this time the proud threats of her ancient enemies. Rouan pressed with as great necessity as before, brought come out of Fillars store-houses, at his own price, whereby he got an infinite treasure. The King weighing well the toils his nobility had endured, dismisst some, and retyened the most resolute, and to hinder the Parmelan from attempting any thing, he sent the Marshall of Biron to follow him at the heeles. Who loath to remaine idle, besiegeth, battereth, and takes Epernay. But Epernay must be the fall place to end his labors, and by his death brake off some other designs which his Majesty had, who to stop the entry of another army of Strangers (which King Philip, at the entreaty of the chiefe of the League, nothing sorry for the Duke of Parmas disgrace, whose pride they could not beare) determind to send, vnder the conduct of the young duke of Parma, assisted by the Duke of Feria, vntill the coming of the Archduke Ernest, brother to the Emperor Rodolphus, gave order for the most vrgent affaires of his Realme: he diuided his forces into the most convenient places, to let vpon the league, where they had greatest strength, and laboured to effect some intelligences he had within Paris. But the period of his happinesse was not

E yet come. During these practices the Duke of Mayenne surpris'd Ponteau de Mer: and to get more bags of double Pistolets, he treats again with the Agents of Spaine, touching the assembly of their estates, to make the Crowne elective, against the fundamentall law of the realme. But he had his designe apart, and the greatest part of the parliament was tir'd with this hidious confusion, vnder the which their secret toabes could not appeare so beautifull, as vnder a stately Royalty: and the chiefe of the third Estate inclining vnto peace, abhorred these tedious furies of the league. The D. of Nemours for his part laid the foundation of a petty Monarchy at Lions, but he built it vpon the sand. He was now installed in the towne which Mangron had found him treacherously; considering the shew he had made of faithfull seruice to the King, and the towne and Castles of Vienn e in Dauphiné, the which he had recieued to the preiudice of the truce, which was then betwixt them of Lions and Dauphiné. Being assured of these good places, hee goes to field, but with more breare then fruit: for he did not fortifie his party, but by the taking of Saint Marcellin, and Echelles, places of weake resistance: and doublet Bellicre won more honour in the defence, then the Duke did in the conquest of the last. The Colonel Alphonso, and Les Dignieres, vpon assurance of the truce were far off, the one in Provence, the other in Languedoc, where both oppoled themselves against the forces of the league. This breach recalled them soone into Dauphiné, where with their ioynt forces they recover that which the Duke had taken, not daring to oppose himselfe. In the end Les Digniers having thrust the Duke of Nemours out of Dauphiné, (who by fauour of the forces of Sauoy, thought to settle himself there) enters into Piedmont, in the moneth of September, fortifies Briqueras, batters and takes the towne and Castle of Caouons, chargeth the Dukes men at Vigon, forcéth and defeats them. The Duke of Sauoy posts to Turin, and seeks to take the fort begun at Briqueras by Scalado. Hee is repulst with dishonour and losse. They charge him in his retreat, but some feare of an ambush made them retire. And Les Digniers (having left the Lord of Piët to command in Piedmont) returns to Grenoble, whither the affaires of the Prouince did call him.

Represented temporarily
by the Spaniards.

On the other side, seeing the armes of Spaine had preuailed so little on the Land, they must try if some enterprize by Sea would repaire their former losses. The Gouernour of Fontaraby had long practised vpon Bayonne with a Physician named Blancpignon, who had intelligence with a Spaniard that had liued long in the towne, and vnder borrowed termes of art, did by letter negotiate the surpris of Bayonne, and the rooting out of all the Kings officers and seruants. Their treason was so well advanced, as a fleet of Ships with an army at land was ready for the execution, when as by Gods permission La Hillière Gouernor of Bayonne surpris'd the Lacquay comming from Fontaraby with letters of credit to the Traytors, who being taken and beheaded afterwards, discouered soone the whole practice: but the Spaniard chose rather to dye then to write those letters hee was required, to giue direction to the attempters, and to lay a plot for his companions.

Disaster of Ambulic.Duke of Joyeuse.

In October the D. of Bouillon followed with four hundred horse, two hundred harguebuffers, before the towne of Beaumont defeated Ambulic great Marshall of Lorraine, Lieutenant General to the Duke, accompanied with eight hundred horse, and two thousand: he slew the Commander, and above seven hundred others,ooke their artillery, their ensignes, and their Cornets, sent home four hundred Lanquenets with white wands, and lost not one man of marke. A small fifth called Remora slaises a great ship: so a poultry hens rouffruins the league in Languedoc and Quercy. The Duke of Joyeuz (brother to him who died at Coutras (having spoyled the Country about Montauban with six hundred masters, and foure thousand foot, French and Lanquenets, in the end became Master of Monbequin, Mombartier, Monbeton, andooke Barte by composition: but in reuenge of so souldiers he had lost before it, (contrary to his faith) he puts most of them that yielded to the sword. A treachery which caused his brothers death, and for the which the vengeance of God shall soone confound this man. The fort of Saint Maurice came in like sort into his power, & then he besieged Villemur. The Lord of the place called Reniers, commanded about two hundred and fifty souldiers, whom the Lord of Theminis Seneshall of Quercy (a wise and valiant Gentleman) relieved suddenly with six and forty men, as well Cuirasses, as Harguebuffers, led by the Seigneur of Pedoue: and then (being ioyned with the Duke of Espernon) he caused Joyeuz to raise the siege, recouered Mauzac, and some other small places thereabouts.

surrendered and descended.

But whilst his troops sleepe at their ease, after the order and maner of the French, with too great confidence and contempt of the enemy, the Duke of Joyeuz, sets vpon them with all speed in the night, kills foure hundred, hurts a great number of them, and but for the wisdom and aduice of Theminis had slaine all the rest, and gotten two Cannons of Montauban. This done the D. of Espernon retires into Prouence. His brother La Valente died in February, & the Estate of Prouence required the Dukes presence, being Gouernour. Joyeuz laies hold at this occasion, and the tenth of September returns and camps before Villemur. Reniers commits the place to the Baron of Mauzac, to Chambert, and La Chaise, wife and valiant Commanders in war: and goes himselfe to gather together some succours at Montauban. The Seigneur of Desme is happily there with some forces, and without any stay puts himselfe into Villemur. Joyeuz made his battery of eight Cannons and two Culierins, when as Theminis accompanied with sixscore Masters, and 200 Harguebuffers, marcheth courageously to succour them, causeth his horsemen to light, and sends their horses safely backe to Montauban, and so with great dexterity, thrusts himselfe into Villemur. And in good time, for the next day, the 20 of September, Joyeuz gaue a furious assault, but it was valiantly defended with great losse to the enemy. At the same instant Theminis gives an alarm with foure Trumpets which he had brought with him, chargeth Joyeuz fiercely, and defeats a Regiment newly come from

1592

A from Tholouze, with a supply of powder, bullets, pikes and iron forks.

Hereupon the Marshall of Montmorency Gouernour of Languedoc supplies the besieged with some troops led by Leques and Chambault, who aduertised of new forces, comes to Joyeuz, attends some daies for Misillac Gouernor of Auerngne, to ioine with him. Joyeuz means to prevent them, and before they ioine with the Auerngne, to set vpon them. He chargeth them at Bellegard, and finds the beginning successful and pleasing, but the end foule and mournfull: for hee left the Field, and returned with great losse.

Notwithstanding he meanes to amaze the besieged, and by the counsell of Oronce and B. Mombertault, polittike Capitaines, he makes many fires in his Campe, as a signe of victory and ioy: but Theminis, Leques and Chambault did but laugh at this policy. Misillac arrives at Montauban with a hundred Masters, and a good number of Harguebuffers. Joyeuz having his troops then disperfed, some before Villemur, others in field against the Kings seruants, all the Commanders resolute to fight with him. Misillac leads the forward, Chambault the battell, Leques the rereward: & the 19 of October they resolutely set vpon the Dukes first trench, by the regiments of Clunel and Montaillon, guarded by two hundred souldiers, and presently succoured by foure hundred others, they force them and chate them to their second trench, after an houre and a halles fight, vnder their Commander. The rest of the Kings army comes violently vpon them. Theminis sluesh out of C. Villemur and chargeth them behind. He leaues die place and retires farther off to Candommes, where his Campe and arillery remained. His men seeing themselves purfued, takes this retreat for a flight: they grow amazed, all disbanded, all fly in disorder, feare makes them to lose their iudgement, and the most part casting themselves into the river of Tar, (the bridge of boats which Joyeuz had made being vncapable of so great a presse) desired rather to try the fortune of the water, then of the victors sword. They cut the bridge, which was in a manner the death of all them which had trusted in this violent Element. Joyeuz disappointed of the vse of the bridge, leaps among the rest into the river of Tar, being full of them that fled, and the Tar swallowing vp his body, as the rest, leaues his soule to lose the place of his destiny. The Victors passe the board, and charge them D that did swim in the water, pursue them that flye, cut all in peeces they encounter, and of so great a number bring but forty three prisoners.

The Duke of Joyeuz was killed.

The death of about three thousand men ruined the league in Languedoc and Quercy. Three Cannons, two Culierins, two and twenty ensignes, and all the baggage, were the spoiles of this memorable day. And to make it the more memorable, the Victors lost but ten men, wherof foure being not well knowne, did by mistaking run like fortune with the vanquished. Thus Villemur hauing endured about two thousand Cannon shot, was fully deliuered, with the losse of seventene souldiers only. The Dukes body was drawne out of the water and buried in Villemur, and the Kings army, consisting of five hundred Masters, and two thousand and five hundred shot, besides those which remained in the place besieged, retired (having purchased great honour) to their garisons. Thus the leagues affaires began to languish: the impatience and lightnesse of people (who promise vnto themselves much, and suffer little) did quench their great heat which was lately seene in good towne, and the whole party runs headlong to their ruine. They did no more take for payment the assurance which was giuen them to prouide shortly for this common disorder, and by an assembly of the Estates, proceed to the election of a King, who should raise the pillars of their Estate, and restore the good order and harmony that should be betwixt them. The zeale of the new Pope, Clement the eight, moued them very little. The forces and pistolets of Spaine grow careful vnto them. The adions of the Duke of Mayenne are detested; they abhor the tyrannies which other petty Kings F would practice in their Prouinces, and did well foresee, that the ambition of great men would soone thrust the people into the gulfe of vnter ruine, finally euery one begins to lift vp his head, and to desire peace. They speake of it in the open Parliament of the league. The chiefe of the City ioine with them that are desirous of quiet, and in the end procure an assembly of the City of Paris, in the middelt of Nouember. They speake very plainly to end these troubles, and to send to treat with the King to that end and purpose: besides (by the death of the Cardinal of Bourbon lately deceased) the preferring & aduancing of the vnckle before the nephew, which they pretended, was no more of force.

The D. of Mayenne seeing himselfe ready to be disapointed, goes to the town-houſe, A increaſes the aſſembly to refer the deciſion of that point to the Eſtates, and to forbear to deale therein. Otherwiſe ſaid he I ſhall haue reaſon to thinke that the authors ther-of are ill affected to our partie, & will deale with them as with the enemies of our religion. Notwithſtanding all his threats, it was decreed, that attending a conuocation of the Eſtates, they ſhould ſend vnto the King to obtaine a free trafficke betwixt them and the Townes of this Realme. The Duke not able to impugne this concluſion, ſeemes to allow thereof. This was to reconner ſome life after a long nummeſſe and fainting, and to returne to the way of obedience: But the Legate of Rome (a penſioner of Spaine, and the chiefe of the League) hoping to draw the affaires to another courſe, calling from all parts the B Deputies of townes confederate, to aſſiſt at the Eſtates at Paris, they fought all meanes to mortifie theſe motives of charity to their country, which reſiued in the moſt modeſt. And the better to aduance their deſignes, they publiſh a certaine writing in forme of a Bull, commanding, and giuing authority to the Cardinall of Placentia to aſſiſt and to con-firme the future election of a new King. This doth ſufficiently diſcouer what which hitherto they haue concealed and kept ſecret, couering (with the pretext of religion) their wicked and daubable conſpiracy, which opened the gates to the ouerthrow and ruine of all order and humane ſociety, inſtituted by God, eſpecially of this moſt famous and flouriſhing Monarchy, whereof the fundamentall law conſiſts chiefly in the order of the law-full ſucceſſion of our Kings.

A ſentence a-gainſt the Bulls

The Court of Parliament (being remoued from Paris to Chazalons, by a decree of the 18 of Nouember, (confirming the requelt of the Kings Proctor generally,) allowed of his appeale from the grant of the ſaid Bull, and authority contained therein, the publication and execution thereof, & whatſoeuer was therein contained, they decreed that Philip of the title of Omphrius, Cardinal of Placentia, ſhould be cited to plead againſt the ſaid appeal.
They exhorted all men not to ſuffer themſelues to be infected with the poiſon & witchcraft of ſuch rebels and ſeditious perſons: but to continue in their duties like good and naturall French men, and to retain ſtill the obedience and loue they owe vnto their King and country, not adhering to the practices of ſuch as (vnder the colour of Religion) would invade and trouble the Eſtate, and bring in the barbarous Spaniards, and other D viſſipers.

The Popes Bulls
diſannulled.

They did expreſſy inhibit and forbid the keeping of the ſaid Bull, to publiſh it, to ayde or fauour the ſaid rebels, or to transport themſelues into any towns or places that might be aſſigned for the ſaid pretended election: vpon paine for the Nobles to be degraded of their Nobility, and they and their poſterity to be declared infamous and baſe; and for the Clergie to loſe the poſſeſſion of their benefices, and to be puniſhed as all other offenders, guilty of treſon, troublers of the publique peace, traitors to their Country, without hope to obtaine pardon, remiſſion, or abolition. And all townes not to receiue the ſaid rebels and ſeditious to make the ſaid aſſembly, to lodge, entertaine, or harbor them. E Moreouer, they decreed, that the place where that reſolution had bene taken, together with the townes of the ſaid aſſembly ſhould be quite razed, without hope to be reedified, for a perpetual memory of their treachery and treſon: Commanding all perſons to ſet vpon ſuch as ſhould transport themſelues to the ſaid townes, to aſſiſt at this aſſembly:
And to the Proctor generally to informe againſt the authors and procurers of ſuch monopolies and conſpiracies made againſt the Eſtate.

This decree was but laughed at by the heads of the League, and did nothing daunt their priuate hopes. Every one makes his faction apart. Every one deſired to ſiſt in his maſters Chayre: and not one would be a ſervant or companion. The D. of Guiſe, Mayenne, Nemours, and Sauoy, the Marquis of Pont, fought by ſundry practices to get the voyces of the pretended Eſtates. The inſtructions found in the colers of the Baron of Teneſſey, F after his defeat by Vaugrenan, who commanded for the King in S. Iohn de Lanne in Bourgogne, did ſufficiently diſcouer the high proceſſes which certaine bad Councellors made this young Prince to conceiue. But above all, the D. of Mayenne, ſuppoſing that after the death of the Duke of Parma (whom he feared as very oppoſite to this authority) this occurrence would giue him meanes to recouer his credit, began to play the King within Paris, hoping the Eſtates would prefer him before the younger: or at the leaſt, the title of Lieutenant generall to the King of Spaine, could not eſcape him in the conqueſt of

A the Realme. For the ſiſt fruits of his absolute power, hee forceth the Presidents and Councellors remaining at Paris, to receiue Reſes, one of his moſt truſty friends, with the title of Marſhall of the Crowne, and Gouernour of the Ile of France, dignities fit for a Nobleman of a better houſe and quality. And to bridle the Pariſiens who demanded peace; he cauſed on Christmas Eue, going vp to the Palace (the City being in armes) the foreſaid decree againſt the Popes Bull to be openly burnt, then by a publike declaration he inuited all the Catholikes of the Realme to vrite themſelues, and to forſake the obedience which they ſhewed to a Prince, whoſe profeſſion and perſeuerance made him incapable, and appointed the conuocation of the Eſtates on the 17 of Ianuary following B at Paris. There ioyntly to ſeeke (without paſſion ſaid he, or reſpect of any mans intereſt) the remedies which they ſhould thinke in their conſciences to be moſt profitable for the preſeruacion of religion and the Eſtate.

But what Eſtates? Like vnto thoſe of Troyes, where they diſinherited Charles the ſeauenth, the true and lawfull heire of the Crowne, as Excommunicate. Eſtates, choſen almoſt of all the ſcum of the people, of the moſt mutinous and ſeditious: corrupted by mony, and all pretending ſome priuate profit in change and innovation. A Parliament compounded of men, which either enjoyed the benefice, the office, or the houſe of their neighbour, or that had ſtolne his goods, or detained his reuenues; or (to conclude) that feared by a peace to be toucht for ſome committed crimes, bankrouts, infamous C and wicked. Eſtates, where there appears not one Prince of the blood, no Chancellor, no Marſhall of France, no Presidents of Soueraigne Courts, none of the Kings Proctors generall in his Parliament: few men of reputation, knowne to haue loued the peoples good, and their owne honours. No men of make and account, without whom they could not aſſemble, nor hold any iuſt and lawfull Eſtates. Finally, a Parliament where they ſee none but paſſionate ſtrangers, gaping after France, greedy of the blood and wealth thereof; ambitious and reuenging women: corrupt Priests, licentious and full of vaine hopes. No Noblemen of worth, but three or foure, who already had reſolued to abandon that faction. All the reſt were beggarly, louing war and trouble, during the which they eat the poore mans bread, not able to maintain their trains in time of peace, D An Italian Legat, and vaſſall to a ſtrange Prince, (who in this quality neither can nor ought to haue any place) ſent to hinder the liberty of voyces, and to authorize ſuch as had promiſed him to doe wonders for the affaires of Rome and Spaine. A Cardinall of Pelue, a Frenchman by nation, but pleading the cauſe of the King of Spaine, and the rights of Lorraine. The Duke of Feria, and Mendoſa Ambaſſador of Spaine, had their Agents and Aduocats, by whom they gaue them to vnderſtand, that the King of Spaines intention was onely, to haue a King choſen that might pacifie the troubles of the realm; deliuer them from their enemies; defend them againſt all aſſailants; and reſtore the Crowne to her firſt beauty. And repreſenting the voluntary bounty of the Catholike King, and the great effects of the ſuccours giuen by him vnto France; wherein he had E employed about ſix millions of gold: he would infer, that none but hee was capable of this election: or eſſe in regard of him, the Infanta Donna Iſabella, to whom the ſaid Am-baſſadour durſt maintaine, that by the lawes of nature, of God, and the Realme, it did belong. Doubleleſſe from the inſolent proceedings and proud deſignes of ſtrangers, the ſoueraigne author and guardian of Eſtates cauſed the preſeruacion of this Monarchy to grow. They commended this Ambaſſage, and receiued it with honour. But the pretentions of this Infanta were reiected at the firſt, as a propoſition contrary to the fundamen-tall lawes of the realme. His Agents, ſeeing themſelues fruſtrate of this firſt demand, they frame a ſecond, vpon the election of the Archduke Erneſt, firſt brother to the Emperour, to whom the King of Spaine promiſed to giue his daughter to wife, when as the F aſſembly had declared her Queene of France. But what ſhould become of ſo many competitors growne vp in France? So this propoſition finding no man willing to entertaine it, remained fruitleſſe.

Now ſome thinking to giue the laſt mate to the Kings good fortune, vtge a third expedient: That if they giue this Crowne to the noble Infanta, and to him of the Princes of France, comprehending the houſe of Lorraine, whom the King of Spaine ſhould choſe, they would cauſe this election to be ſeconded with an army of eight thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, and within ſew months to be fortified with the like numbers,

which soone should reduce France wholly and peaceably to these new Kings : that they A would giue a hundred thousand Crownes monethly, so long as the war should last, to entertaine ten thousand foot, and three thousand horse within the Realme. Was not this to feed mens minds with fancies, dreames, and imaginations ? But no man giues his voice to this last proposition. Doubtlesse there was no proportion to recompence the succours sent by Philip to the revolted townes, with the Crowne of France.

Contrariwise, many hauing their minds meereley French, knew well that this proposition was to make matters irreconcilable, and to bring an immortal war into France, and therefore with a feruent zeale and great affection, they opposed themselves against the reception thereof : hoping the eternall providence, who had so often raised France from B most grievous falls of war, and from greater infirmities, would now preuent these latter dangers, otherwise then by the subseruion of the lawes which were made to support it. The declaration which his Maiesty opposed to that of the Duke of Mayenne, did much preuaile to fortifie those good minds in their commendable resolution, and prepared their hearts generally to conceiue a great hope of a speedy peace. For the King discovering the practices of his rebellious subjects, namely of their heads, and the Dukes treachery, presuming to assemble the Estates of the realme, which may not be called but by royall authority ; and for matter of religion, he protesteth, that besides the Conuocation of a Councell, if there be found any better or more speedy meanes to come to the instruction which they pretend to giue him, to diuert him from the exercise of his religion, C to that of the Catholike and Romish, he will willingly embrace it with all his heart, giuing leaue to the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and other Noblemen that did assist him, to send their Deputies to the Pope to deale in this instruction, and to be pleased therewith ; and blaming the Leaguers who had hindred the effects, he layed a good foundation of the obedience which his subjects prepared for him. Declaring moreover, this pretended assembly at Paris, to be attempted against the lawes, against the good and quiet of the Realme : and that should be treared or concluded therein, abusive and of no force. Terming the Duke and his adherents in that case, guilty of high treason ; shewing that he could maintain his authority against all vlturpers. But offering pardon to all townes, Commonalties, and persons seduced by the chiefe of the league, and exhorting them to remember themselves, hee made his subjects begin to tast that great and admirable clemency, whereby he hath won the hearts, and brought the affections of the French to a perfect and most voluntary obedience.

To this declaration of his Maiesty, the Princes and Noblemen, Catholikes, that were about him, added another, which they sent to these pretended Estates, and required that some should be deputed on either part, to resolve of the fittest expedients to pacifie these troubles, for the preferuation of the Catholike religion and the Estate. The Duke of Mayenne and his party accept of this conference, to as it may be done by Catholikes onely, and it began the twenty ninth of Aprill at Surenecare Paris. Whilst the good Cardinal of Bourbon liued, he was an instrument for the League : now hee E is dead, Religion is their onely pretext. And the more the King giues them hope of his conuersion to the Romish Church, the more violent they are to draw the people from this beleefe.

The Legate seemes to crosse it, and by a publike exhortation full of injuries against his Maiesty, hee labours to perswade the French, that the King long since dismembred from the body of the Church, was most iustly pronounced incapable of the Crowne. Then opposing himselfe against the decrees of the Parliaments of Tours and Chaulons, made against the monities of Landriano, he extolls his Masters praises, condemnes the Parliament which had condemned his Bulls, magnifies the Estates of the League, who reiected an obstinate heretic and relaps, with a resolution neuer to yeeld vnto him ; for (said he) such is the Popes will and pleasure. But why a relaps and obstinate, considering the due submission which our Henry makes to yeeld to better instruction ? The Pope himselfe will hearken soone vnto him, and all the Consistory will blesse his resolution.

Both the Duke and Legate preuaile little in their deuices. Those which held the first place in this assembly, and had no other care but to preserve this Monarchy, found this expedient : that to frustrate the former propositions, they should say to the Duke of Feria and

A and other ministers of Spaine, that it would be now out of Season, and dangerous to make this election : and that the assembly referred the conclusion thereof, vntill they might see an army ready, by meanes whereof their resolutions might bee supported and put in execution. Courage ! This calme promisseth that wee shall soone anchor in a safe harbour. And that which aduanceth the ship of our estate with a more prosperous gale, That great and magnificent Senate of France remaining at Paris, resumes their credit, and the beauty of their scarlet Robes : they exhort the D. of Mayenne to employ his authority of Lieutenant, that vnder colour of Religion, the Crowne fall not into strangers hands, against the lawes of the realme, and to provide speedily for the peoples quiet, and B by a decree of the 28 of Iuly, they declare all treaties made, or to be made to that end, voide, and of no validity, as being made to the hurt and preiudice of the Salique Law, and other fundamentall lawes of State.

A decree of the Parliament at Paris.

This decree did wonderfully incense the Duke of Mayenne and the agents of Spaine, especially against the President Le Maistre who deliuered the speech : who encountering all their chollers, left them to byte vpon the bridle. But see now the fatal blow which ruins that third party, by the which Catholikes were ready to thrust the realme into new combustions, and cuts off all difficulties as well in them which made a scruple to fight vnder the ensignes of a King of any other religion then their owne, as in others which had for long time shadowed their mutinies and rebellions with this goodly pretext. The King, C after the taking of Dreux, satisfied in his conscience, by the instruction of the Archbishop of Bourges, of Rene Benoist Curate of S. Eustache in Paris, and of some other Doctors, desires to be admitted into the bosome of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Church, and the twenty five of Iuly made a publike and solemne profession at S. Denis to the said Archbishop, assisted by Charles Cardinal of Bourbon, Archbishop of Rouan, and Nephew to the deceased, nine Bishops, with many other Prelats and religious men : he protested to liue and die in the Catholike religion, swearing to defend it against all men : he made profession of his faith, and performed all ceremonies requisite in so solemne an act : and then he received absolution and blessing with an admirable ioy and acclamation of the people.

The Kings conversion.

D Presently after this solemne act, his Maiesty sent the D. of Neuers, the Marquis of Pisani, and Henry of Gondy Bishop of Paris to the Pope, to yeeld obedience by them to the holy See, and to testifie, that he desired no lesse to imitate the example of Kings his Predecessors, and to deserue the title and ranke of the first Son of the Church by his actions, then they had bene carefull to get it and preserve it, and to beseech him to allow of his conuersion, and to countenance it with his owne blessing. This is that great action of State which the chiefe of the league most feared : for what could they now object against the King, to contradict his right, & to rearm him incapable of his inheritance ? See now by what subtlety they seek to crosse his Maiesties affaires, and to support strangers. They complaine first of his sudden change, and say they may not trust him : that his Holinesse must begin and end this worke. That the King should make all submissions to the Sea of Rome, and attend if the Consistory would declare him capable to gouerne the Realme of France. That hauing command from the Conclauce they would aduice to do what should be reason. Vntill the which were effected they would not treat any more with the Kings Deputies, and till that this change of religion which the King had made, were approved by the Pope, whereof afterwards they would take aduice, for assurance of the preferation of the onely Catholike Religion in this Realme.

The D. of Mayenne hauing (to his great preiudice) so often tryed the proud insolencies of the Spaniards, and since knowne that their practices tended only to feed a perpetual fire of diuision among the French, by meanes of the election of a new King, whom F they promised to marie to the Infanta, had often protested, that when he should see the Kings return into the bosom of the church, from which his religion had excluded him, he would presently yeeld him obedience as his most humble seruant. The Kings conuersion doth now free him of this imaginary scruple. The King himselfe offering him offices and honorable aduancements, seeks to draw him out of those snares from the which hee would willingly bee freed. But hee is so farre engaged as hee can hardly retire himselfe : and some hope that the decisions of Rome, the resolution of the Estates, the conclusions of the Colledge of Sorbonne, and the practices of

Spaine,

1593

Spaine, would yet worke some good effects in his fauour, doth with-hold him from accepting of his Maiesties offers.

The Duke of Mayenne seeks to coule his Nephew.

But on the other side, he cannot digest the aduancement of the D. of Guise, whose marriage with the Infanta the partisans of Spaine did solicit, as being heire to his fathers pretensions. And to ouerthrow it, he seemes in generall termes to approue so great an honour done vnto his Nephew: but requiring for his owne particular so high and difficult things, he giues them easily to vnderstand, that he will not subiect his will to the appetites of Pope Clement, nor of Philip King of Spaine, neither yet to the decision of the Estates, whilst that he crosseeth the propounded election of the D. of Guise. The conference at Surene giues the subiect meanes to take the liberty of the fields, and the sweetness of peace, concluding the last of Iuly a generall suspension of armes on either side for three months, a meane which shall soone reduce whole Prouinces withdrawn from their ancient obedience. In the meane time, the more the Agents of Spaine see their practises disappointed, the more vehement they are that the Court of Rome should giue no audience to the Kings submission.

They oppose themselves by the meanes of the Ambassadors of Spain at Rome, against the negotiation of the Kings Ambassadors with the Pope. They speake of his Maiesties conuersion, as of a counterfeited thing, to decieve the Church, and after his confirmation to ruine the Catholike religion. To conclude, to doe their best to quench these coals of charity, which were kindled in the peoples hearts, and cause the Pope to reiect this faithfull and willing obedience, where by the King will shew himselfe a successor of the piety of Clouis, Charlemaigne, and Saint Lewis, as well as heire of their Scepter.

Execution of their Barriers.

But see one of the most violent attempts of the league, which had almost dissolved this harmony, which was prepared by a generall reconciliation of the French among themselves, and of them to their lawfull and Soueraigne Lord. The 26 of August Peter Barriere borne at Orleans was taken prisoner at Melun, where his Maiesty was then, by the discovery of a Iacobin a Florentine, to whom he had confessed himself in Lions; (the Priest revealing this crime, incurs no Ecclesiasticall censure) he confessed, that seduced and persuaded by a Capuchin of Lions, and afterwards confessed by Aubry Curate of S. Andreu des Arts at Paris, by his Vicar, and by father Parade a Iesuite, he was come thither expressly to murder the King. And in truth, the wretch was found seized of a sharpe knife with two edges: and for this cause he was pinched with hot pincers, his right hand burnt off, holding the said knife: his armes, legs, and thighes broken, and his body burnt to ashes, and cast into the river.

The like treason practised by the Duke of Mercuer, whereof the chiefe were the Marquis of Aillerac, of the house of Rieux, the Seigneurs of Crapant and Bois-marin, had entrapped Henry of Bourbon D. of Montpensier (who made war in Britany for the King) and the Parliament of Rhemes; if the discovery in time had not brought these three heads to a publike scaffold, and many others to the gallows.

Recouerat Lions against the D. of Nemours.

Whilst the Agents of Spaine labor for this election, and their partisans doting, will doe as the Frogs, who weary of their quiet King, made choise of the Storke, which in the end deuoured them all: the D. of Nemours made his faction apart, and seeing that by the nomination of these goodly Estates hee should bee excluded from his pretensions: knowing moreover that his brother on the mothers side, did crosse all his designs, and bare him no good affection, he resolved to canton himselfe in his gouernment, and by many and sundry forts both on the water and land, to plant his fortunes there. Already the Citadels and Forts he held at Toifay, Vienne, Montbrison, Chastillon in Dombes, Belleuille, Tify, Chartieu, and else-where, threatened all Lionois with seruitude, if the Lord of S. Iulian would haue sold him Quirieu for ready money: whom in the end (thrusted on by the persuasions and presence of their Archbishop, sent by the Duke of Mayenne, with this Commission among others) they force into his house, and the eighteenth day of September put him with a guard, into a straight prison in the Castle of Pierre-ancise, from whence in the end disguised, (playing the part of a groom of the Chamber which carried forth the excrements of his Master) he passed through the guards, turning away his face more for feare of being knowne, then for the ill smell: and escaping from them the three and twentieth of March following, being dispossessed of all his meanes, and expelled from his places, he went and died in Ancy, a house of his owne, in the Countie of

A of Geneva in Sauoy, nor without suspition of being poysoned at a Feast that was made him.

This generall surceasing of armes prolonged vnto the end of the yeare, and religiously obserued on either side brought a great quiet to France, and gaue the King leisure to assemble some of the chiefe of the Realme at Manté, to consult vpon sundry affaires, and particularly to heare the complaints of such as stood in doubt of the Kings change in religion, and were grieued at diuers controuersions of his Maiesties Edicts, whereby they suffered many wrongs in all Prouinces: for the partisans of Spaine, for their last refuge, continually exclaimed of the incompatibility of two Religions in France, and many continued to this opinion: That the King ought not to be a limited, but he should promise expressly to banish all such as made profession of any other Religion then that which hee did embrace, or at the least to abolish all publike exercise. But the King employed all his care to vnite his people in accord: and this new change did nothing alter the affection which he did beare indifferently to all, as a common father of his subiects.

Assembly at Manté.

Thus armes were laid aside, whilst the Lord of Des Diguieres hauing beaten the Sauioyard in diuers encounters in Prouence, in Dauphiné, vpon the frontiers, and in Sauoy vpon his owne land, conquered many places in Piedmont, & lately succoured Cauiours, which the Duke had besieged two months, gaue great hope to force this neighbour enemy sooner to yeeld what he had lately vsurped of this Crown, if he had beene supplied with men, munition and money, and if some priuate feeds of new combustions had not drawn him away, to quench those fires which threatened to consume Prouence.

By what meanes and degrees, the Townes subiect vnto the League, returned to the obedience of this Crowne: and the Spaniard chased out of this Realme.

But courage oh my Country-men! After a long and sharpe winter, wee begin to see a pleaine Spring. As the Sunne rising on his horizon encreased in heate and brightness, so the people are ready to embrace the French liberty: their naturall affection to their lawfull Prince reuiues: now we shall see them which made the wound, giue the remedy: the French striue now to submit themselves vnto their King, and the king to receiue his subiects with an admirable clemency and fatherly affection. The Lord of Vitry giues the first checke vnto the Spaniard. The sundry conferences hee had had with his Maiesty before Paris and elsewhere, doe now worke a great effect: for deliuering the towne of Meaux to the King as a New-years gift, he gaue a plausible beginning to this yeare, and made the way for the Lord of La Chastre, his Vncle, at Shroftide to bring vnto his Maiesty two goodly Duchesses at once, of Orleans, and of Berry. And to summon Monsieur De Villars to follow these commendables example, he writes vnto him, I haue giuen a New-years gift vnto the King, Monsieur de la Chastre hath sealed him at Shroftide: shew you your selfe vnto him on horse backe at mid lent: which letter shall soone take effect. Some townes practised by the heads of the league, demand a continuance of the truce, but it was only to prolong the miseries of France. The King therefore doth publish a declaration, shewing the wicked and damnable practises of the Leaguers, who vnder the continuance of a truce, would confirme their tyranny. Hee prescribes to all in generall one moneth of respite to acknowledge their lawfull King, and to performe all necessary submissions, to be restored to their charges, benefices, goods, and liberties. He condemnes the Rebels, and reuokes his pardon, the time being expired. The brute of this declaration, and the Kings preparatiues to punish the obstinate, terrified the heads, and the most part of the townes and commonalties, yet he was content to hold the staffe, but not to strike: and the providence of God conducted the worke of this restitution, by other then violent meanes. The Duke of Mayenne sought all meanes to auoide this blow, but he found no force able to prevent it. So this vnion cemented together, with so many thists, oaks and coniurations, is dismembred on all sides: the most obstinate apprehend their totall ruine, if they persist in their rebellion.

Preparations of Orleans and the Kings.

The

THere was one thing very necessary to seale the generall approbation of the Kings lawfull authority. He was not yet anointed, nor crowned, and the want hereof (as if the Coronation were the essentiall forme of a Royalty) served yet as a maske to many to with-hold their obedience. It is good in some things to please the peoples humour, and doubtlesse the end will shew, that this solemne action did serve as a bright Lanterne to guide them to the Port of obedience, which had refused to yield.

And for that the rebellion of Rheims had shut the gates against him, Chartres was the Rendezvous of this solemne Ceremony, and the Abbey of Marmouster furnished the Oyle, which they keepe religiously in the holy Voyall, with the like life and vertue, as in former times. Raoul was anointed at Soissons, Lewis the fourth at Lions, Hugues at Compeigne, and Lewis the young likewise at Chartres. Thus was our Henry anointed in Chartres by Nicholas Thon Bishop of the same place, the 27 of February, in the presence of the Prince Contry, the Earle of Soissons, and the D. of Montpensier, Princes of the blood; of the Dukes of Longueville, Luxembourg, Retz, of Vantadour, and of the Earle of S. Paul. Of the Bishops of Angers, Orleans, Nantes, Maillezais, and Beauvais. The Marshall of Matignon supplied the Office of Constable; the D. of Longueville, of Lord Chamberlain; and the Earle of S. Paul his brother, of Lord Chamberlain. The next day his Majesty received the Order of the Holy ghost by the hands of the Bishop of Chartres. Let vs now see the fruits of this solemnity. The townes and commonalties of the League begin to tremble, and the most part determine to send their Deputies to his Majesty being resolved to receive his commandments.

The fruits of his Coronation.

Attempts of the Marquis of Saint Sorlin against Lions, and of the Spaniards.

Misfortune is good for something. The Marquis of S. Sorlin, brother to the Duke of Nemours (being yet a prisoner) afflicted the Inhabitants of Lions with all acts of hostility. The King of Spaine on the other side confirmed his intelligences more strictly with them of his faction: and gave them assurance by the D. of Terra-nova, Gouverneur of Milan, of a leavy of twelve hundred Swisses, the which with other forces he would thrust into the towne, under pretext to succour it against the violencies of the Marquis, but having drawne them in amongst the Inhabitants, he should through the favour of the partisans of Spaine, make himself Master of the towne. Lions was now ready to fall under the rule and tyranny of a stranger: but God this vp means beyond mans reason. Some good men alwaies well affected to France in their hearts, with the consent of foure Sheriffs, resolved to seeke the meanes to draw the towne to his Majesties obedience.

They acquaint Colonell Alphonso with their enterprize, who gives them assurance of his favour and succour in so good an occasion, the seventh of January hee comes to the suburbs of Guilloiere with goodly troops. And the same day betwixt three and foure of the clock in the morning, Laquer one of the Sheriffs, assisted by the Seigneurs of Liergues and de Sene (followed by a good number of armed men) force a guard placed at the foot of the bridge vpon Saone, and constrain them to leave the place. The towne is in armes, they make barricades in their streets. Such as were of this enterprize, repair to the quarters that were assigned them: euery man desireth the liberty of France. They seize vpon the Arcenall, and vpon the most factious Officers and Captains of the towne. All the people wear white scarfes & fethers. That happy cry of, God save the King, sounds in the ayre. They make Bon-fires in all places, they burne the armes and livery of Spaine, Sauoy and Nemours, and the picture of the league in forme of a witch, and set vp the Kings in all places. Hee vpon Alphonso entred the towne, accompanied with d'Andelot, Chenierres, Saint Forient, Sothen, la Liegue, Banne de Mures, with many other Gentlemen of the Country: and for the finishing of so good a worke, he deposed the suspected Captains of the towne, received the oath of fealty to the King of such as he did substitute in their places: and afterwards the councill of the towne did resolve and sweare neuer to admit any Italians, or Sauoyens to publike charges: Nations which had most nourished the fire of vncwill rebellion within their city. The like broile in a manner recovered the obedience of the towne and Parliament of Aix in Prouence to his Majesty. The D. of Epemnon built a Citadell there to keepe them in awe, with whose humors

A they could not well agree. Moreouer, he was not in good termes with the King, and seemed to pretend some inuouation to the prejudice of the Kings affaires. The Nobility of the Country grew also in hatred against him, and from their secret discontentes grew to open armes to expell him the country, whereupon they made a protestation for their taking armes against him.

Hereupon they had called vnto them Les Dignieres, and the King commands him to goe with speed, and to oppose his forces against the Dukes in Prouence. He wanted men, money, and necessary prouisions, to entertaine that which he had exploited in Piedmont: he therefore furnisheth the places he held, as the time would suffer him, and goes to cross B Epemnon, razed the fort he built against the towne of Aix, and reduced the Inhabitants to their ancient obedience.

The miraculous reduction of Paris to his Majesties obedience.

A Middest for many happy Catastrophe for the restoring of this Monarchie, some notable Inhabitants of Paris, which lound the Flower-de-luce in their foules, made the way to free it from the rule of Strangers: but many difficulties crossed the meanes they gaue vnto the King, who employed all his designs to recover the ancient throne of his Predecessors by the mildest meanes he could. Paris was neuer without some Prince of the house of Lorraine: and about foure thousand French, Spaniards, Italians, Lansquenets, and Wallons, kept the City in subiection. Seeing then that of many enterprises, not one could succeed happily, neither might they attempt it by open force, without a horrible effusion of blood, and bringing the City in danger of extreame desolation, a surpris was therefore necessary.

Miscellaneous
State of Paris.

It was now almost ready to be effected, by the meanes especially of the Lord of Belin Gouverneur of Paris, of Martin Langlois, Seigneur of Beurepaire, one of the Sheriffs of Paris for that yeare, and some others, of whom they had assurance for the execution of their proiect, as well of the City, as of the Souldiers practised long before. But the Duke of Mayenne being aduertised that the said Belin had intelligence with the King, puts him from his gouernment, and doth substitute in his place the Earle of Brissac: and to fortifie the garison with strangers, he causeth fourteen hundred natural Spaniards to approach. By this displacing of the Lord of Belin all their first designs are made frustrate: but the Earles humor was found apt to vntie them. Hee sought the means to bring to light the effects which he had resolved, to purge the ill opinion of times past. As Langlois attended some favourable opportunity to discouer himselfe to the said Earle, his Majesty sends him word that he is agreed with him, that he should not feare to open himselfe vnto him touching the meanes he had plotted with Belin. He confers with the Earle, lets him vnderstand such as be of the intelligence, and they resolve together, That to bring the King in without effusion of blood, (as he desired) the Eue before the execution they should eary some stuffe to the new gate, that vnder colour to wall it vp, they should draw away the gabions that stop the gate: that in the night they should cut away the earth which stoppeth that of Saint Denis, and so feize on the one and the other. That the Sheriffe Nerat with his children should take S. Honoris gate, whereof hee had the keyes, and draw in a good number of men of war to fauour the enterprize; and that by Saint Denis gate should enter another troope of armed men, as well to feize on the Gate, as on the Rampar of either side, to make a barre betwixt the Spaniards and the Wallons, and keepe them from ioyning. They keepe two guards neere Saint Denis Gate, one at Saint Eustace Croisse, and the other at the Temple. At the same instant the garisons of Melun and Corbeil should enter by Boate at the Bulwarke by the Celestins, and should be received by Iohn Grosfier, and by the Seigneur of Cheuallery, the first being Capitaine of the said bulwarke, and the other Lieutenant generall of the artillery remaining in the Arcenall. And to auoide a popular tumult, a brute should be spread abroad of a peace betwixt the King and the Duke of Mayenne, whom (vnder colour of the peoples ialousies of the Spaniards, which he had caused to approach vnto Beauuois) they had found meanes to send out of Paris, with promise to cause them to retire. That ouer-night they should giue tickets to the chief whom they knew desirous of a peace, (as for the multitude of factions, and the partisans of Spaine, they durst not speake openly vnto them to bring in the King, and some that were desirous of peace, could not rest assured of his clemency and bounty by the which they should be aduertised of the accord, and intreated to arme with their friends, for the bringing in of the Deputies of either part, which should come in the morning to make the publication, and resist the Spaniards that would oppose themselves. So it was decreed, and so executed.

This order being resolved on, it was imparted to those with whom the enterprise had bene long before concluded, by the means of the Lord of Viques then Gouvernor of S. Denis, to whom the greatest honour is due, both for that all the associates did rely vpon him, and daily were aduertised and encouraged by him, and also for that he did cary himselfe so wisely in S. Denis, as he was more gouernour of Paris, then of S. Denis. The 19 of March, the Secretaries of the Lords of Brissac and S. Luke, carie it to Senlis to the King, with a plot of the City, setting downe the places of the strangers guards, and of the Parisiens. They are searched going out of the towne, but they remember not to looke into their gloves, where their instructions were written by the hand of the said Langlois the Sheriffe. The King giues them aduice for the execution, the night before the two and twentieth day of the month, about foure of the clocke he finds all things ready, and the new gate, and S. Denis gate at his deuotion. He enters with his trooppes by the Lords of Humieres, Belin, Viques, and Fauas, at the same Gate by the which the deceased King parted mournfully out of Paris. At the same instant the Lord of Vitry comes C with a troope of men at armes to S. Denis gate, beats backe the strangers, who made resistance vpon the rampar, enters the towne, lets guards at the gate, and on the rampars, then passing through S. Denis street, he encounters his Maiesty, whose troopes were come to S. Michaels bridge, and before the Palace.

Thus according to the oath which his Maiesty had taken of the Captaines of euery company, Not to doe or suffer any inoleny or outrage to any Citizen, but to such as should obliuiously make resistance, all his troopes enter without disorder, without murder, without spoile, and by their perfect obedience testifie how great his authority is that commands ouer them. The King being seized of the Loure, the Palace, both Chastelets, and other chiefe places of the City, and assured of the D. of Feria and his strangers, he D went armed with his Caske on his head, with an incredible concourse and ioy of the people, to our Ladies Church, and there gaue solemne thanks to the Soueraigne Protector of this monarchy: who hauing as it were led him by the hand, by such extraordinary and miraculous meanes, into the capitall city of the Realme, gaue him hope that he should soone chase the stranger out of his inheritance, and peaceably enjoy the throne of his predecessors. In the meane time the Earle of Brissac, John Lhuillier Master of the accounts, and Prouost of the Merchants, with the Sheriffe Langlois, accompanied with the Heralds, went through the City, proclaiming the Kings generall pardon: causing them to take white scarfes, and gaue tickets printed at S. Denis, containing an abolition of all offences past. So as in lesse then two houres all the City was quiet, euery man went to his ordinary exercise, the Shops were opened, as if there had bene no alteration, and the townes-men grew familiar with the men of war. There was nothing but signes of wonderfull ioy and loue: the bitternesse of the proud and insolent command of the Spaniard, made the Parisiens to tast the sweetnesse of the fatherly rule of their Kings, and those detest him as an enemy, who lately feared and respected him as a Master.

A happy and famous day, wherein the people (lately so contrary and full of cruelty) reduced to that misery as they durst not fight in their misery, exceeding glad to see a means to enjoy their ancient liberty, know not with what acclamations to receiue their peacefull and gracious King, who by his wonderfull clemency washing away the blemishes wherewith Paris had bene unworthily polluted, made the inhabitants, of slaues, Citizens, restores them their wiues, children, goods, honours, Magistrats, and liberties, and giues peace to them who lately held it a crime to demand bread onely, and capitall to demand bread and peace together. His Maiesty suffered the Duke of Feria, Don Diego with other Commanders and men of war, to depart with their baggage, their marches out, and their armes downe. The Basille made some shew of resistance: but as all was prepared to force it, and that their viuals (which were purposely kept backe) began to faile them, de Bourg hauing the command thereof, yielded it three daies after: and

A and his Maiesty to recompence such as had serued him in this enterprife, gaue them great gifts, with many Offices, and aduancements.

He confirmed all the companies of the City, and disanulld the delarations which had bene published in the month of March 1589: hee restored the Lord d'o to his gouernment, from the which the generall reuolt had expelled him: he appointed him to goe to the towne-house, to take an oath of the Officers in the presence of Master Francis Miron, one of the Kings priuie Councell, Master of Requests, and President of the great Councell, Ouer-seer of the discipline of the Kings armies, and appointed to assist him. And the Earle of Chiuerny Chancellor of France, assisted with the Siegneurs of Ris, Pontcarre, B Miron, and other Councillors of the Priuie Councell, & Masters of Requests of the kings house, to the number of twelue, went to the palace, and caused the letters of re-establisment of the Court of Parliament to bee read, and at the instance of Loisell, appointed in the abeance of the Kings Officers, they tooke the oath of all the Presidents, Councillors, and Officers of the said Court, before the returne of the Parliament, remoued to Tours in the yeare 1589. And so in like sort to other companies, the Chamber of Accounts, Court of Aydes, and chamber of the money, to whom Councillors were sent to doe the like as to the Parliament, and to continue their places and dignities, with the other Officers resident at Tours, whom this happy reduction brought within few weekes after to their ancient seat of Iustice. Paris being freed from the command of strangers, and reduced C under the obedience of their naturall & lawfull King, it was needfull to reparaire that which the liberty of war had changed, touching the lawes and grounds of the Estate, and the rights and honors of the Crowne. To this end, the court of Parliament lately established, reuokes, and disanuls by a decree of the 30 of March, all other decrees, orders or oaths giuen or made since the 29 of December, 1588, to the preiudice of the Kings authority, and the lawes of the realme, decreeing that as things forced by violence, they should remaine suppressed for euer. And especially they disanulld all that had bene done against the honor of the deceased King, as well during his life, as after his decease: forbidding all persons to speake of his memory, but with honor and respect: commanding to informe of the detestable parricide committed on his person, and to proceed extraordinarily against D such as should be found culpable.

They reuoked the authority giuen to the Duke of Mayenne vnder the title of Lieutenant generall of the Estate and Crown of France, forbidding all men to acknowledge him with that quality, to yeeld him any obedience, fauor, comfort or aide, vpon paine of high Treason. They likewise enioyned the Duke of Mayenne, vpon the like paines, and other Princes of the house of Lorraine, to acknowledge King Henry the fourth of that name, King of France and Nauarre, for their King, and to yeeld him the obedience of faithfull seruants and subiects. And to all other Princes, Prelats, Noblemen, Gentlemen, Townes, Commonalties, and priuate men, to forsake that pretended faction of the League, whereof the Duke of Mayenne had made himselfe the head, and to yeeld vnto the Kings obedience, service and lealty, vpon paine to the said Princes, Prelates, Noblemen, and Gentlemen, to be degraded of their Nobility and Gentry, and they and their posterity declared base, with confiscation of bodies and goods: and the razing of their Townes, Castles, and places, that should infringe the Kings Ordinances & commandements. They reuoked and disanulld all that had bene done or decreed by the pretended Deputies of the Assembly held at Paris, vnder the names of the generall Estates of the Realme, as void, done by priuate persons, chosen or suborned for the most part by the factious of this Realme, and partisans to the Spaniard, hauing no lawfull power: forbidding the said pretended Deputies to take vpon them this quality, and to assemble any more in the said City, or elsewhere, vpon paine to be punished as troublers of the publicke quiet, and guilty of high F Treason. They inioyned such of the pretended Deputies as were yet resident at Paris, to retire home to their houses, to liue there vnder the Kings obedience, and to take the oath of fealty before the Iudges of those places. Moreover, they decreed, that all processions and solemnities instituted during the troubles, should cease, and in stead thereof, the two and twentieth day of March should bee for euer celebrated, and the same day a generall procession should be made after the accustomed manner, where the said Court should assist in their scarlet robes, as a remembrance, to giue God thanks for the happy reduction of this said City to the Kings obedience.

The voluntary surrender of the Vniuersity.

As the Vniuersity by their trecherous decision had before countenanced and supported the Parisiens insolencies and mutinies, so now by their humble and due submission, of their owne proper motion, they seeke to repair the crime they had committed. James d'Amboise Doctor in Physicke, chiefe Rector, chosen since the reduction of Paris, the Deane and the Doctors of Sorbonne, the Deanes and Doctors of other faculties, all the members and officers of the Vniuersity, come to the King to yeeld him a testimonie of their loue, and finding him in the Chappell of Bourbon, prostrate before his Maiestie, they acknowledge him their true and onely naturall Prince, sweare to bee obedient and faithfull seruants to him for euer, and beseech him (as to his other people which submit themselves like good and loyall subjects) to extend his fauor vnto them. The Kings owne disposition did moue him, but the place did inuite him to this pardon. He protests before God, to be as ready to remit the offences of others, as he desired Gods diuine Maiesty to be mercifull vnto his. So he received them, and sent them home gratiofully, granting them this Edict following.

The Kings Edict or Declaration, vpon the reduction of Paris vnder his obedience.

HENRY by the Grace of God, King of France, and of Nauarre, to whom these presents shall come, greeting: As it hath alwaies beene our desire and intent, (since it pleased God to call Vs to this Crowne) to settle a good and assured peace in this our Realme, to the end that the disorders, violences and miseries of warre ceasing, God might be serued according to his holy Commandements, and the authority of the lawes and of our iustice restored; vnder the protection whereof, the three Estates of our Realme may happily enioy with peace that which doth iustly belong vnto them. To attaine vnto the which, we haue (as euery man knoweth) employed all our meanes, with the hazard of our life, preferring death before the blame and infamy which would iustly fall vpon vs, if wee should suffer the vniust usurpation and dissipation which some pretend to make of this Crowne. And not to omit any thing which is in the power of a good Prince, for the settling of peace and vniou among our subjects, so necessary and so much desired of al good Frenchmen, we haue with much patience supported & giuen vnto the publike, the offences and rash attempts of many, who without this respect, haue deserued seuer and exemplary punishments. Wee haue for this consideration after diuers victories, pardoned them which haue attempted against our life. And for the great compassion which wee haue had of the Capitall City of our Realme, to auoyde the sacke, and spare the blood of many good Citizens which did not participate in the wicked designs of such as did nourish rebellion, we haue chosen rather to bee frustrate of the obedience which was due vnto vs, then to see innocent men which dwell there, with the women and little infants, and so many goodly buildings, exposed to the violent rage and fury of fire and sword. Having moreover, for this consideration granted in Iuly last a generall truce for three monthes, during the which the Deputies of that party which doth not obey vs, did assure vs that they would send speedily vnto the Pope, to haue his aduice vpon the resolution which they were to take, in the conclusion of a good and durable peace and reconciliation with vs, who am their King and naturall Prince. Wherein they also promised to employ themselves with all loyalty and affection, to settle a peace in this Realme, the which made vs more easie to yeeld vnto the said truce, although we knew well how much we were prejudiced thereby, & what great aduantage we might haue had by armes: hauing (during the parcell of peace) taken Dreux in view of the chiefe of their party, being assisted by their Protectors of Spaine. At which time wee wanted no meanes to presse the City of Paris in such sort, as necessity should in the end haue aduised them to shake off the yoke of such as had so long tyrannized, and insolently abused their miserable patience. But we yeelded of our authority, to the end the Pope might bee satisfied, and truly informed of all our actions, to whom our intent was to haue recourse to discover our wounds, and to implore his aide, fauer, counsell and assistance: and to that end wee made choice of our deare and welbeloued Cousin the Duke of Neuers, a Prince full of all vertues, wisdom, piety, and of great merit: who preferring the seruice of God, and the good of this Estate, before the discommodities of his health, and the tediousnesse of the way, had courageously vnder-

A vnder taken a voyage to his Holinesse. And as for the Deputies of the said party, whom they promised confidently to send with all expedition; We doe not find that during the truce, they made any accompt to dispatch them. And notwithstanding that since the conclusion of the said truce, we haue not discovered in all their actions, but designs preiudiciall to the publike good of the Realme, with whose spoiles they pretended to cloath and to enrich themselves with the blood and meanes of good and loyall Frenchmen: there being fallen into our hands a certaine oath made by the chiefe of the said party, in a manner at the same time when as they signed the truce, and promised to treat faithfully touching a good peace, and to reconcile themselves vnto vs, and to that end to send to Rome to haue the Popes aduice: The said oath containing, that they would neuer treat any peace with vs; wherein they suffered themselves to be so transported by the passions of the King of Spaines Ministers, as they made no reservation of the Popes authority, vnto whom they said they would send: wherewith being iustly incensed, notwithstanding at their great instance, and to iustifie our actions vnto the Pope, we granted them a prolongation of the truce for two monthes. But conceiuing how little they desire to see an end of the miseries of this Realme, with the authority they haue vniustly vlturped ouer part of it: iudging also by their cunning delayes, that they seeke nothing but to prolong the miseries of France, and to assure their vniust vlturpation: Wee haue therefore with the aduice of our Councell, refused a prolongation of the truce for 3 monthes more, which they required of vs, with such importunity, as wee haue iust cause to beleuee, that this pursuite was not to purchase a peace, but rather that during the said time, the King of Spaines forces, being come vnto the frontier of our Country of Picardy, they should haue better meanes to reuiue the warre, to the ruine of our good and loyall subjects: the which God by his grace would not suffer, causing vs to see plainly (by the letters which were intercepted) their wicked designs to continue the miseries of this our Realme. His diuine bounty hauing taken the defence of our iust cause into his protection, moued an infinite number of our good subjects to acknowledge their naturall duty, in the reduction of the Townes of Meaux, Lion, Orlean, Bourges, Pontoise, and others to our obedience. But the memory shall neuer bee lost of the happy reduction of our good City of Paris, the chiefe of our Realme, which happened the 22 of March, with such mildnesse, and order, as not any one Citizen can iustly complaine of wrong. The peoples ioy and acclamations, which haue seene their King so much desired, was not lesse, then if they had had the same security which is giuen them by these presents, of our grace, fauer, protection, and forgetting of things past, with assurance that the merits of such as shewed themselves faithful to our seruice shall neuer be forgotten. The which considering, and the speciall bounty wherewith it hath pleased God to fauour vs in this occasion, wee hold our selues bound more then any man liuing, to make our actions pleasing to his diuine prouidence. For this cause, acknowledging that there is nothing makes vs more like vnto God, then clemency, forgetting freely all offences past: we declare by these presents, that we receiue E into grace, the Citizens of our good City of Paris, and of our speciall fauor and royall authority, doe abolish all things hapned in the said City, during, and by reason of the present troubles, the which we will shall remaine extinct, and held as if they had neuer hapned.

And to this end, with the aduice of the Princes and Noblemen of his Councell, he ordained, That within the City and Suburbs of Paris, or within ten leagues round about, the Romish religion should be only exercised. That no Clergie men should be molested in the exercise of his function; That they should freely enioy the reuenues of their Benefices, and be restored vnto that which belonged vnto their Churches. Moreover, hee restored the City of Paris to al her ancient rights, liberties and immunities, to enioy them as they formerly had done. All matters were remitted which concerned the inhabitants, and had beene committed during the troubles, if within eight daies after publication of this Edict, they came and tooke the oath of Allegiance. All iudgements and sentences giuen against the Earle of Brissac were reuoked. The Inhabitants which should performe their due submissions and take the oath, were restored to the possession of their goods, offices, dignities, and reuenues: and all grants made to the preiudice thereof reuoked. There were many other Articles tending to the good of the Parisiens, and the settling of a quiet estate within the City.

Diners return in diuers places.

Paris gave example to all the rest of the Realme. And the first fruits of this happy re-union began to ripen in the hearts of other Townes and Commonalties. So the moneths of April and May were spent to receiue the submissions of diuers Prouinces, and chiefe pillars of the league: so as every bird hauing his feather, the Crow in the fable remained in the end naked: The Lord of Villars submits himselfe to his Soueraigne Lord, and yeelding him the townes of Rouan, New hauen, Harfieu, Montiuillier, Pontoile de Mer, and Verneuil: he obtains in exchange the Office of Admirall of France, and hereafter closes a most obdurate warre against the Spaniard. But a sad accident shall soone frustrate the designs he made with his Maiesty. Abbeville hath beene alwaies called the Citadell of Picardy, lying at the mouth of the sea. Maugis the Mayor, and some Inhabitants, had resolved to giue a great checke vnto the League: but the feare of the Duke of Aumales faction restrained them, and the seditious impressions of Preachers, (who throughout the Realme, haue beene the greatest motives of these last mutinies) made this their good will fruitlesse. The King being aduertised thereof, did hazard Franc, one of the Secretaries of his chamber, who was borne at Abbeville, to found and discouer the end of their intentions.

He parts in April, and vnder colour to visit his friends, he behaues himselfe so discretely in his negotiation, that in lesse then eight daies they resolved in open assembly to send their Deputies to yeeld themselves at his Maiesties feet, who in token of good service, ennobled Franc and his posterity, and augmented the priuiledges of the Towne. In the same moneth, the Inhabitants of T.oyes expelled the Prince of Iauille, and recalled the Lord of Inteuille, their ancient gouernour for the King. The Townes and Prouinces contend, who shall haue the honor to return first to their due obedience, from the which these popular furies had withdrawn them. Sens, Poitiers, Agen, Villeneuue, Marmande, and other Townes of Gasconie, and in a manner all that had followed the dance of Orleane and Paris, do now frame themselves to discerue. And all this is done in few weeks. The most factious of the party, did still feed the fire of rebellion in some townes of Picardy: Amiens and Beauvois wauered: the Spaniard possessed Laon and La Fere, places of importance in that Prouince: and the Count Charles of Mansfield had euen now besieged and taken Capelle, a small towne, but strong in the Duchie of Tiersche. The King being aduertised thereof, went home to their trenches, to draw them forth to fight: but making no shew to come forth, to get that by force, which he could not obtaine by reason, he besiegeth Laon, deserts the succors at sundry times that come to the besieged, kills aboute fiftene hundred of their men in sundry encounters, and taking the towne by composition in the end of August, he ends (by this act) the furies of civil warres without hope of returning, and then returns triumphing to Paris. Chasteau-Thierry, before the siege, and after the siege of Laon, Amiens, Beauvois, and all the townes in Picardy (except Soissons and La Fere, which the Duke of Mayenne and the Spaniard held) did shake off the strangers yoke, and took the oath of fealty to the King. Cambray did likewise acknowledge him, and gaue his Maiesty such advantage, as his enemies remained without meanes to maintain the war, and without hope to obtaine their peace. The duke of Mayenne in the meane time entertained all his friends and intelligences at Bruxelles: but the supplies of men and money which he drew from thence, were not able to stay the course of the kings prosperities. He therefore retired himselfe into Bourgongne, to assure such places as were yet at his deuotion.

Contrariwise, his nearest kinsmen retiring themselves, left him almost alone to treat with the Spaniard. The Duke of Nemours made his accord at the Castele of Pierre-anse, but being escaped the 26 of Iuly, as we haue said, death deprived him of the vse of his liberty, as we shall see hereafter. The Duke of Guise did still testifie, that he desired nothing more then the Kings seruice, and drawing in the moneth of Nouember to his Maiesties seruice his brethren with himselfe, many Noblemen, the City of Reims, to his many other places, it did greatly shake this monstrous building, which was now ready to fall to ruine.

The Sect of Iesuits had as chiefe pillars of the League, mightily supported it vnto this day, and by all meanes laboured to aduance the Spaniard in France: they had spread throughout the whole Realme, the furious effects of the fire which they had kindled, and

A continued in priuate confessions (as lately in their Sermons) to disgrace the memory of the deceased King, and the Maiesty of the King now reigning: and to encrease it, the principall of their Colledge, and some others, had largely approved, countenanced, and perswaded that execrable attempt of Peter Barriere. The Vniuersity of Paris grounding the renewing of their ancient Processe against the Iesuits, vpon these considerations and motives, demand the rooting out of them. Some great men, & of the chiefe men of Iustice, sue for them: the Cardinall of Bourbon supports them: The Duke of Neuers makes their cause his owne. The respect of their learning, care, and diligence to instruct and teach youth, did moue them: and a very vtigent cause must draw the Court of Parliament (whose authority notwithstanding they did contemne and reiect) to pronounce and declare this great decree, the which an accursed and detestable attempt, by one of their owne disciples, did in the end extort. They proceeded that the cause might be pleaded secretly, for that (said their Aduocat) to defend my Clients, I shall bee forced to speake some things offenfue to many which haue lately turned to the Kings seruice. But these pleadings are to be read in Arnault against them, and Perforis for them, both graue and learned Aduocates.

By the reduction of so many Prouinces, Townes, Commonalties, and priuate Noblemen, the League shall be now confined into some corners of Bourgongne, Picardy, and Britany, where the Spaniards (to haue alwaies footing within the Realme) entertained the hopes of the Duke of Mayenne and Mercœur. The first began to fall from them: but the other (grounded vpon some vaine pretensions of the Duchie, where he gouerned by reason of his wife) hoped to preuaile, if not of all, yet at the least of a good part. The Queene Dowager his sister, laboured to make his peace: but he delayed the time, knowing that in his greatest extremitie he should finde grace with the King. The Spaniard being brought into Blauet by his means (a fort which the situation of the Country had made almost impregnable, as if they had built a fort nere vnto Croisic, to shut vp the entry of the port at Brest, they had also made another right against it on the other banke) hoped, that being chased out of the other Prouinces, he should yet hold this as a pawne for the money he had disbursed. His Maiesty sent the Marshall d'Aumont, and General Norrice, a braue Commander of the English, to encounter him, who fortified with a Fleete, vnder the command of Captaine Forbisher, they became Masters of Quimpercorentin and Morlay, and then they forced the new fort at Croisic, and slue (but with the losse of men, and of the said Forbisher) foure hundred souldiers, to whom the guard was committed: which seruice was chiefly performed by the English, to their immortal praise.

France grew quiet, yet must they employ the souldiers, and cary the warre into the Spaniards Country. It seemed this would free the Realme, but feldome doth it bring forth the effects that are expected. Yet for a triall, the King agrees with the Estates of Holland and their confederates, to invade the Duchy of Luxembourg with their common forces. E The Duke of Bouillon, now Marshall of France, and the Count Nassau, seeke to enter in October, but they find the passages stoppt, and the Count Charles Mansfield before them, who by the defeat of the Hollanders troopes, made this attempt fruitlesse. On the other side, the King seeke to keepe the frontiers of Picardy safe from the Spanish forces, and threatened Arthois and Hainault, that if they fauoured the forces of Spaine, which molested Cambray and the Countries thereabout, he would make violent warre against them. The Estates of those Prouinces make no answer to these threats, framing their excuse that they could draw no direct answer from the Archduke Ernest, Lieutenant generall for the King of Spaine in the Low-Countries, who soone after perswaded the subiects of the said Countries to arme, and to invade France. The better to know Picardy, and to iudge of what should be necessary against the attempts of this new enemy, the King makes a voyage to the frontier, and then returns to Paris, to celebrate the solemnity of the Knights of the Order of the holy Ghost, and to receiue the Ambassadors of Venice, Vincent Gradenigo, and Iohn Delphino being sent to congratulate the happy successe of his affaires, and Peter Duodo to succeed Iohn Mocenigo. At his arrival he receiues three good aduertisements: That the Marshall d'Aumont had taken from the Spaniard one of the places he had fortified in Britanie; That the Spaniards thinking to enter into Montreuil, hauing giuen fifty thousand Crownes to the Gouernor, had beene repulsed with the losse of five or six hundred

hundred men: And that the Marshall of Bouillon had ioyned with the army of Count A Maurice in despite of Count Charles.

But oh monstrous prodigy! the onely remembrance should make our haire to stare, and our hearts to tremble. The 27 of December, the King being booted in one of the Chambers of the Louvre, hauing about him his cousins the Prince of Conty, the Count Saiffons, and the Earle of Saint Paul, and a great number of the chiefe Noblemen of his Court, bending downe to receiue the Lords of Ragny and Montigny, who kist his knee, a yong man called Iohn Chastel, of the age of eightene or nineteene yeares, the son of a wollen Draper in Paris, a Nouice of the Iesuits, encouraged by their instructions, and thrust on by a diuellish furie, creeps into the Chamber with the presse, and surprizing B his Maiestie as he was stooping to take vp these Gentlemen, in stead of thrusting him into the belly with a knife, as he had determined, he strucke him on the vpper lip, and brake a tooth. This wretch was taken, and confessed it without torture. The King vnderstanding that hee was a discipule of that schoole. Must the Iesuites then (said he) be iudged by my mouth?

Thus God (meaning by this cursed and detestable attempt) to countenance the pursuite of the Vniuersity of Paris against that sect, Iohn Chastel hauing declared the circumstances of his wicked intent, was found guilty of treason, against God and man in the highest degree, and by false and damnable instructions, holding that it was lawfull to murder Kings, C and that the King now reigning was not in the Church, vntill hee were allowed by the Pope, was by a decree of the Court condemned to doe penance before the great doore of our Ladies Church, naked in his shirt vpon his knees, holding a burning torch of two pound weight, to haue his armes and legs pinched at the Greue with burning pincers, and his right hand holding the knife wherewith he fought to commit this parricide to be cut off, his body to be torne in peeces by foure horses, burnt to ashes, and cast into the wind, and all his goods forfeit to the King. The said Court decreed by the same sentence, That the Priests, schollers, and all others terming themselves of that Society, (as corrupters of youth, troublers of the publike quiet, and enemies to the Kings state) should depart within three dayes after the publication of this decree, out of Paris, and other places where they had Colledges: and within fifteene, out of the Realme, vpon paine after D the said time to be punished as guilty of high treason, all their moueable and immoveable goods to be forfeited, to bee employed in godly vses, forbidding all the Kings subiects to send any schollers to the Colledge of the said society without the Realme, there to be instructed or taught, vnder like paines as before.

The Decree was executed the 29 of the said moneth. Peter Chastel the father, and Iohn Gueret school-master to this murderer, were banished, the first for a certaine time out of Paris, and fined at two thousand Crownes, the last for euer out of the Realme, vpon paine of death. The fathers house standing before the palace, razed, and a pillar erected contained (for a perpetuall monument) the causes of that ruine. Amongst the writings of one named Iohn Guignard of Chartres, were found certaine outrageous and scandalous libels against his Maiestie, made since the generall pardon granted by him at the reduction of Paris, for the which he was executed the 7 of Ianuary following. Experience hath often taught, that armes produce greater effects abroad in the enemies Countries then at home, and that the goodliest triumph is sought farthest off. Our vnciuill confusions were forged chiefly in Spaine, and the Iesuits had bene the chiefeest workmen. One Francis Iacob, a scholler of the Iesuites of Bourges, had lately vnto to kill the King, but that he held him for dead, and that another had done the deed. And this horrible attempt of late vpon the sacred face of his Maiestie, (wherein he was miraculously preferred) doth witness, that they were the chiefe firebrands. So the King grounding the necessity of his armes vpon these considerations, after hee had rooted this Sect out of the Schooles, which they held within the Iurisdiction of the Parliament of Paris, hee published a Declaration for the making of Warre against the King of Spaine. Without doubt the reasons were very apparent and manifest, and the beginning more fauourable then the end.

The Marshall of Bouillon begins this new warre: hee enters the Duchy of Luxembourg with an army of a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot, and at the first puts to rout eleven cornets of horse of Count Charles neere to Witron, kils two hundred and fifty

leave the King.

A fifty vpon the place, makes the rest to leaue armes, horse and baggage, and to saue themselves in the next forest. Philip likewise for his part proclaimes warre against our Henry. The Duke of Lorraine on the other side, hauing taken a truce with his Maiestie, the Baron of Aunsouille, with the Siegneurs of Tremblecourt, and Saint George (who before made warre vnder him) now take the white scarf, they enter the County of Bourgogne with a thousand horse, and fise thousand foot, and at the first they seize vpon Vezou, Ionville, and other places.

Behold the fire which threatens two Prouinces: but the Spaniard suffers them not to be consumed, as men presumed, that being busie to quench it, he would leaue Picardy in B quiet. He commands the archduke Ernest, that with the hazard of the Low-countries he should transport all his forces into Picardy, and moreover causeth the Constable of Castille gouernor of Milan, to passe the Alpes with a great army of Spaniards and Neapolitans, who recovered the places, and forced the Lorraines to disperse themselves.

The Artesiens and Hannuyers, fore-seeing the desolation which the continuance of this warre would cause, solicited the Archduke to seeke some meanes to quench it: but death cuts off the course of his enterprife. The Earle of Fuentes (that is to say, Fontaines) aduanced them courageously, causing the gouernour of Arthois to enter into Picardy with a thousand horse, and fixe thousand foot. Behold rough seas and great storms, which violently beat vpon our great Pilot: but in despite of their attempts, hee shall C guide his ship to a safe port, and bring his enterprises to an end.

Vienne, Nuiz, Autun, Beaune, and Dijon, did happily assist him: let vs see the successe. The Duke of Nemours escaped from prison, assembled a good troope of souldiers, horse and foot, and drawing to him 3000 Suisses which wintered in Saouy for the defence of the Country: with these forces he pretended to subdue the Prouinces of Lionois, Forest, and Beauuicoulois, and to reuenge the disgrace hee had receiued in Lions. For a beginning, hee had reduced to his deuotion, Thisi a strong Castle in Lionois, Vienne in Dauphine, Feur, Montbrison, S. Germane, and S. Bonnet, townes in Forest: and by this, restraining them both above and beneath the R. iuer, hee made an account either to bring Lions to some extremity of victuals, or to cause some tumult among the people, who should giue him entry into the City.

D Being ready to effect his designs, the Constable parted from Languedoc, to ioine with the King, he resolues in this encounter to doe him a notable seruice. He comes into Lionois, followed with a thousand horse, and foure thousand spoile Harguebuziers, happily for the preservation of the Country: for he presently stayed the course of the Duke of Nemours prosperity, who posting to oppose himself against the constable, (hauing made a voyage to the Constable of Castille, with hope to haue authority ouer these foraine forces, and to dispose of them for the execution of his designs) fortifies S. Colombe, a small village at the foot of the bridge of Vienne towards Lionois, lodgeth some troopes there, and the rest he puts in garison into the towne.

This great multitude of men shut vp in Vienne, makes their victuals grow scant: E they likewise want other necessities and munition for warre. The Constable cuts off all meanes from them. The Suisses mutine for want of pay, and being called home by their Colonels, goe to ioine with the forces of Saouy, which the Marquis of Tressfort commanded, being Lieutenant generall for the Duke of Saouy, on this side the Alpes. To curbe Lions more straightly, the Marquis came to winter his men at Montliel, a small towne of Saouy, three Leagues from Lions. The Constable preuents him, and surprizing the Towne, disappoints the Marquis, lodgeth his men dry, and leaues the Sauioussien subiect to the injuries of the aire, and keepest him from attempting any thing against Lions.

F The Constable aduertised of some discontent betwixt the Captaines of the strangers that were in Vienne, and the Siegneur of Disminie a Gentleman of Dauphine, who commanded in the Castle of Pipper, the chiefe sort of the said towne, he practiseth Disminie, lets him vnderstand of his dutie to the Kings seruice, his naturall Prince, his duty to his Country, and the profit hee shall bring by the reduction of this Towne, to so many people threatened with foraine oppression. Disminie giues ear and without any great difficulty, hauing passed his word to the Constable, suffers the Siegneur of Montoiion to enter the Castle with a troope of Harguebuziers. The Constable parts the foure and twentieth of Aprill, with eight hundred Harguebuziers, three hundred horse, and many Gentlemen, as well of the Country, as his owne followers: and marcheth towards A Vienne. The Marshall of Ornano doth likewise meet him, with 500 Harguebutiers, and two hundred masters. All shew themselves about Vienne at noone-day. Then Disimieu gives the Siegneur of Cheylart, and Dom Vincentio Colonel of the Italian foot (that were there in garrison) to vnderstand, that being well informed of the finifter practice and charge they had to seize vpon his person, he had resolved to yeeld the towne and castle vnto the King: yet would he not put it in execution, before he had obtained a safe conduct for the and their troopes. Montolison shewes himselfe with his troope, and makes Cheylart and Vincentio to accept the condition that was offered them. They goe forth, and take the way to Sauoy, guarded by a company of light-horse. Disimieu brings them vnto S. Blandine, B where the Constable attended him, and there takes the oath of obedience and fealty to the King. Towards night the Constable entred Vienne, and received the towne and castles of Pippet and La Bastie in his Maiesties name. So Vienne, the only Sanctuary of the duke of Nemours, the Rendezuous of strangers, and the Port of Dauphiné to neighbor Prouinces, caused the quiet of all the Country and neighbors about. Since the which, the duke alwaies droopt, being contemned, hated, and frustrate of his attempts: and finally, he ended all his griefes by a mournfull and lamentable Catastrophe.

As all things succeeded happily for the King, the Marshall of Biron hauing taken Beaune in view of this great army of the Constable of Castille, Autun and Nuy in Bourgogne, he puts himselfe into Dijon, being called by the Inhabitants, he chased away the C Vicount of Taunannes troopes (who held the Inhabitants shut vp in a corner of the town) fortified their barricades against the Castle, and did beleaguer it, attending his army, which made haste to returne out of the Franche Conté. His Maiesty foreseeing, that the Constable of Castille being free, after the recovery of Vezou, should be employed by the Duke of Mayenne, to succour the Castle of Dijon, wherein consisted the chiefe hope of his rising, makes haste to Troyes, gives tolemme thanks for so happy a victorie, and takes his way to Dijon, arriues there the fourth day of Iune, carying with him the execution of a designe, more miraculous then all the rest. Without doubt our posterity may put this History with the fabulous tales of the foure sonnes of Aymond, of Rouland, Oliver, and others, if we set not downe the truth, with the chiefe Circumstances: for D is it not a dreame, and enchantment, and a fabulous tale, that fourescore Cheualiers, but true French Gentlemen, generous, and well led, haue amazed and put to flight, two thousand horse? But what durst not this braue Nobility doe, hauing in the head of them so incomparable and valiant a Capitaine, and a King so well beloued and respected of all?

The Castilian had already passed his troopes and Artillery vpon bridges of boates at Grey: when as the King hauing fortified the Inhabitants with a thousand men, commanded by the Earle of Thionny, he viewed the Castle of Dijon, the fort of Talon a Cannon shot from the towne: and all the approaches, whereby the enemy might attempt to succor the Castle, made choice of a place of battell fit to stay him, and where to make fort for the restraining of the said Castle: he resolves to free him of halfe his paines, and to meet him in the mid-way, with a double intent, the one to fight with him at the passage; the other, to giue the assaillants time to finish their trenches against the Castle. For the execution hereof, he assigns the Rendezuous at Lux vpon Tile, & Fontain Française to a thousand horse, and 500 Carabins, whom hee would vie in this rare stratagem: and the same day parts with the onely company of the Baron of Lux, and some thirty horse, and comes to Lux, & from thence to Fontaine Française, putting a troope of foot into two Castles which are in the village of Saint Seine vpon the river of Vigerine, to stop the enemies passage. It was the direfkest and best way to come to the succour of Dijon.

A league from Fontaine Française, the Marquis of Mirebeau gives his Maiesty intelligence, that he hath encountered with two troopes of three or foure hundred horse, which made him retire in haste: that hee did thinke to haue seen some wing of the army behind, but hee had no leisure to discover them plainly: He spake thus, for all the Castilian army was aduanced to seize vpon the passage of Saint Seine. Some weak spirit or lesse generous then our Henry, would presently haue resolved to make an honourable retreat: but this did kindle his courage, and increase his desire to their countenance.

A tenance. He sends the Marshall of Biron with the company of the Baron of Lux, to discover if it were the army, or some other troope that went to the war, and himselfe followed the Marshall a good pace. A hundred paces beyond Fontaine Française, the Marshall discovers about threescore horse vpon a hill, mid-way to S. Seine, situate at the foot thereof on the one side, so as the villages cannot see one another. The Marshall resolves to chase them, to see what the enemy did behind. He sees the enemies army comming to the said village, and neere vnto a wood fast by, about 300 horse, which had bear backe the Baron of Aulonville, whom his Maiesty had likewise sent before with a hundred horse, to see if the enemy marched or layed.

B These (supported by their whole army, which followed them at the heeles) put forth one troope on the right hand, and another on the left, who make a shew to charge the Marshall, that they might obserue what forces followed him. To frustrate their expectation, he causeth the Marquis of Mirebeau to stretch forth at large on the one hand, and the Baron of Lux on the other, and then assured that the enemies army followed, hee began to make his retreat towards the King. The enemy presseth him, taking this retreat for a kind of flight: But he retired only, to charge more furiously. The Baron of Lux less a troope, which aduanceth before their army, and enters so hotly amongst them, as his horse being slain, he remains engaged in great danger, if the Marshall had not taile on them with so rough a charge as they were constrained and forced to turne their backs. issie forth from the woods, many troopes of horse, which in all, with them that marched before, made about twelue hundred. The Marshall (discouering them) retires more speedily, as well to aduertise his Maiestie that all their army followed, as also to tell him that he had meanes with his horse to fight with theirs before their foot could arriue. Before he could deliuer this vnto the King, the troopes of the Baron of Thianges, Thenifsey, Villiers, Houdan, and a company of Carabins ioyned with him, whom he had chased, and forced him to turne head, but with twenty horse onely, for the great number of enemies at the first view had amazed most of them which followed the Marshall. Hee charged, and ouerthrowes the first he encounters. But two wounds, one on the head, with a sword, the other with a Lance which razed the skinne of his belly, made the victory for D a while doubtfull. Without doubt his braue resolution and wise command encouraged many that were amazed, and confirmed that, which in shew tended to ruine. The onely feare which they had, least he had more men in the village or thereabouts, then hee had made shew of, kept the enemy backe, and made them to attend the rest of the army which aduanced: in the meane time they put them into five equadrans. His Maiesty sees himselfe engaged to fight, and hath small meanes to make it good, for the troopes followed easily, and the houre of the Rendezuous was not yet come. The King notwithstanding aduanceth a troope of horse which newly arriued. But discouering this great cloud of enemies ready to charge them, they retire to his Maiesty.

One torch may kindle many lights. If our Henry had wanted resolution: if his valour E had not been able to hear these cold and frozen hearts: if numbers had exceeded his courage, he had been wonderfully perplexed. It was a shame to retire, a rashnesse to aduance, and dangerous to make a stand. There was perill to fight, or not to fight. He chooseth rather to exceed the limits of valour, then to be noted of any cowardise. He aduanceth to them that fled, and causeth some to turne and to ioyne with his troope. The Lord of Taunannes arriues with his companie, encreasing his number, which are about two hundred horse, but not yet well ioyned. Hereupon the Duke of Mayenne appeares vpon a hill, and sends forth threescore equadrans against his Maiesty, which flanked him on the right hand, the one of three hundred horse, the other of two hundred, and the third of a hundred and fifty; and two others against the Marshall of Biron.

F The King aduanceth, with about fourescore horse, and chargeth the first squadron so violently, as he giues them no leisure to thinke to fight, ouerthrowes the second, and dispereth the third, with about five and twenty horse, which remained with him (this rest pursued the victory) strikes terror into all, and leaues the vanquished no other safetie, but to die by the hand of so incomparable a Conqueror. The Marshall of Biron seconds this admirable victory with a great resolution, who followed with about fifty horse, defeated the two equadrans that came against him, one after another, within threescore paces of the Duke of Mayenne, who stood firme on the hill with his troope

many Gentlemen, as well of the Country, as his owne followers: and marcheth towards A Vienne. The Marshall of Ornano doth likewise meet him, with 500 Harguebutiers, and two hundred masters. All shew themselves about Vienne at noone-day. Then Dismieu gives the Siegneur of Cheylart, and Dom Vincentio Colonel of the Italian foot (that were there in garison) to vnderstand, that being well informed of the finisser practice and charge they had to seize vpon his person, he had resolved to yeeld the towne and castle vnto the King: yet would he not put it in execution, before he had obtained a safe conduct for the and their troopes. Montefon shewes himselfe with his troope, and makes Cheylart and Vincentio to accept the condition that was offered them. They goe forth, and take the way to Sauoy, guarded by a company of light-horse. Dismieu sees them vnto S. Blandine, where the Constable attended him, and there takes the oath of obedience and fealty to the King. Towards night the Constable entred Vienne, and received the towne and castles of Pippet and La Bastie in his Maiesties name. So Vienne, the only Sanctuary of the duke of Nemours, the Rendezuous of strangers, and the Port of Dauphiné to neighbor Prouinces, caused the quiet of all the Country and neighbors about. Since the which, the duke alwaies droopt, being contemned, hated, and frustrate of his attempts: and finally, he ended all his griefes by a mournfull and lamentable Catastrophe.

As all things succeeded happily for the King, the Marshall of Biron hauing taken Beaune in view of this great army of the Constable of Castille, Autun and Nuy in Bourgogne, he puts himselfe into Dijon, being called by the Inhabitants, he chased away the Vicount of Tannanes troopes (who held the Inhabitants shut vp in a corner of the town) fortified their barricadoes against the Castle, and did beleaguer it, attending his army, which made haste to returne out of the Franche Conté. His Maiesty foreseeing, that the Constable of Castille being free, after the recovery of Vezou, should be employed by the Duke of Mayenne, to succour the Castle of Dijon, wherein consisted the chiefe hope of his rising, makes haste to Troyes, gives tolemne thanks for so happy a victorie, and takes his way to Dijon, arriues there the fourth day of Iune, carying with him the execution of a designe, more miraculous then all the rest. Without doubt our posterity may put this History with the fabulous tales of the foure sonnes of Aymond, of Rosland, Oliver, and others, if we set not downe the truth, with the chiefe Circumstances: for it is not a dreame, and enchantment, and a fabulous tale, that fourescore Chewaliers, but true French Gentlemen, generous: and well led, haue amazed and put to flight, two thousand horse? But what durst not this braue Nobility doe, hauing in the head of them so incomparable and valiant a Capitaine, and a King so well beloued and respected of all?

The Castilian had already passed his troopes and Artillery vpon bridges of boates at Grey: when as the King hauing fortified the Inhabitants with a thousand men, commanded by the Earle of Thorigny, he viewed the Castle of Dijon, the fort of Talon a Cannon shot from the towne: and all the approaches, whereby the enemy might attempt to succor the Castle: made choice of a place of battell fit to stay him, and where to make forts for the restraining of the said Castle: hee resolves to free him of halfe his paines, and to meet him in the mid-way, with a double intent, the one to fight with him at the passage: the other, to giue the assailants time to finish their trenches against the Castle. For the execution hereof, he assigns the Rendezuous at Lux vpon Tile, & Fontaine Françoise: to a thousand horse, and 500 Carabins, whom hee would vie in this rare stratagem: and the same day parts with the onely company of the Baron of Lux, and some thirty horse, and comes to Lux, & from thence to Fontaine Françoise, putting a troope of foot into two Castles which are in the village of Saint Seine vpon the riuer of Vigierne, to stop the enemies passage. It was the directest and best way to come to the succour of Dijon.

A league from Fontaine Françoise, the Marquis of Mirebeau gives his Maiesty intelligence, that he hath encountered with two troopes of three or foure hundred horse, which made him retire in haste: that hee did thinke to haue seene some wings of the army behinde, but hee had no leisure to discover them plainly. He spake truth, for all the Castilians army was aduanced to seize vpon the passage of Saint Seine. Some weak spirit or lesse generous then our Henry, would presently haue resolved to make an honourable retreat: but this did kindle his courage, and increase his desire to see their countenance.

Wonderfull effects of the kings armes.

A tenance. He sends the Marshall of Biron with the company of the Baron of Lux, to discover if it were the army, or some other troope that went to the war, and himselfe followed the Marshall a good pace. A hundred paces beyond Fontaine Françoise, the Marshall discovers about three score horse vpon a hill, mid-way to S. Seine, situate at the foot thereof on the one side, so as the villages cannot see one another. The Marshall resolves to chase them, to see what the enemy did behind. He sees the enemies army coming to the said village, and neere vnto a wood fast by, about 300 horse, which had beat back the Baron of Autonville, whom his Maiesty had likewise sent before with a hundred horse, to see if the enemy marched or stayed.

B These (supported by their whole army, which followed them at the heeles) put forth one troope on the right hand, and another on the left, who make a shew to charge the Marshall, that they might obserue what forces followed him. To frustrate their expectation, he causeth the Marquis of Mirebeau to stretch forth at large on the one hand, and the Baron of Lux on the other, and then assured that the enemies army followed, hee began to make his retreat towards the King. The enemy presteth him, taking this retreat for a kind of flight: But he retired only, to charge more furiously. The Baron of Lux sees a troope, which aduanceth before their army, and enters so hotly amongst them, as his horse being slain, he remains engaged in great danger, if the Marshall had notaine on them with two rough a charge as they were constrained and forced to turne their backs. Hereupon C issue forth from the woods, many troopes of horse, which in all, with them that marched before, made about twelue hundred. The Marshall (discouering them) retires more speedily, as well to aduertise his Maiestie that all their army followed, as also to tell him that he had meanes with his horse to fight with theirs before their foot could arriue. Before he could deliuer this vnto the King, the troopes of the Baron of Thiangies, Thénifsey, Pilliers, Houdan, and a company of Carabins ioyned with him, whom he had chased, and force him to turne head, but with twenty horse onely, for the great number of enemies at the first view had amazed most of them which followed the Marshall. But two wounds, one on the head, with a sword, the other with a Lance which razed the skinn of his belly, made the victory for D a while doubtfull. Without doubt his braue resolution and wise command encouraged many that were amazed, and confirmed that, which in few tended to ruine. The onely feare which they had, least he had more men in the village or thereabouts, then hee had made shew of kept the enemy backe, and made them to attend the rest of the army which aduanced: in the meane time they put them into five equadrons. His Maiesty sees himselfe engaged to fight, and hath small meanes to make it good, for the troopes followed easily, and the houre of the Rendezuous was not yet come. The King notwithstanding aduanceth a troope of horse which newly arriued. But discouering this great cloud of enemies ready to charge them, they retire to his Maiesty.

of three hundred horse, whither the run-awaies fled, thinking there to be in safetie.

The King and the Marshall charge them ioyntly, force them, put them in rout, and pursue them vnto the corner of the wood. Here the King findes their battalions of foot, and great store of Muskets and other shot placed amongst it, with four hundred fresh horse, sent to relieue the Duke, a hundred paces from their battalions. So his Maiesty makes a stand, and the enemies freed from him, begin their retreat. The Kings horse follow them to the toppes of the hill, and there put themselves in battell. The King hauing taken breath in the place from whence he parted to go to the charge, diuides his men into two troopes, one for himselfe, the other for the Marshall. Here, about a hundred French Gentlemen take the place from fiftene hundred horse, and by this means the King was master both of the enemies bodies, and of the place of battell. His Maiesty gathers together such as were disperfed, to make the better shew. Hereupon arises the Earle of Clermont, Vitry, the Kings lights horse, those of Caſar Monsieur, the Duke d'Elbeuf, the Earle of Chiuerny, the Cheualier d'Oise, the Lords of Risse and Aix, which made about fixe hundred horse of his bands of Ordinance, all gricued that they had not followed the fortune and valor of our King, to bee partakers of the honour which he had won.

With this supply he turnes to ouertake them that fled, and pursues them two leagues, neere vnto Grey: but not able to follow this shamefull flight, he was content his glory should surmount their shame, and that his valour had vanquished their force: and vsing this famous victory with piety, hee let all the world know in his person, that it is not the sword, nor the arme that strikes, nor the number of men, that preferres Kings in the midst of armes: but that high Providence, which fighting with the one hand for the iust cause of lawfull Princes, against the attempts, and violences of vfurpers and Tyrants: and holding victories in the other, decides the quarrels of Soueraignties, by the equity hee finds in Princes armes vnjustly oppressed, and makes it manifest that the admirable euents of batells consist not onely in number or force, but in the free disposition of his fauors, vnto a people whose miseries he will shorten, which the continuance of warre hath bred in a diuided Estate.

The enemy returned to lodge at S. Seine, and dislodging the next day with feare, they repassed the water vpon their bridges, leauing both the one and the other side of the hill at the Kings deuotion, who without doubt had giuen them a great checke vpon this retreat, if his footmen had bene with him, and the horses lately arriued could haue endured the toyle in the vehement heat of the Sun. The Duke of Mayenne and the Castilian lost in this charge sixscore men slaine vpon the field, threescore prisoners, and two hundred hurt. His Maiesty, onely foure slaine, and one prisoner. But for a notable circumstance, and a signe of the especiall care of God ouer his person, hee performed these exploits without any other armes then his cuirasse alone, and was well assisted (to their great commendation) by the Dukes of Guise and Elbeuf, the Lord of Tremouille, and the Marquises of Treyne and Pizany, by the Lords of Inteuille, Roquelaure, Chasteauvieux, Liencourt, Montigni, Mirepoix and others. And in despite of all the furious attempts of the league, the Castle of Dijon, and in a manner all Bourgongne was soone after reduced to the Kings obedience: and now the third time, he freed his Realme from strangers. The King in the end inuades the Country, forceth one of their lodgings in the view of the Constable of Castile neere vnto Grey, becomes master of the field, takes Alpremont and many other places: he had forced their chiefe forts, if the Swisses had not intreated him to retire his army, and to suffer that Province to inioy her ancient libertie.

The Princes absence did imbolden them that were light headed to discover the rash imaginations of their brains. The Colledge of Sorbonne was not yet so well purged of factious humors, but there remained some leuaine of sedition and scandall. For Florentine Jacob an Augustine Monke maintained in his disputation in the Colledge of Sorbonne, vnder Thomas Blancy Doctor in Diuinity and principall of the Colledge of Caluis, That without doubt all Spirituall and Temporall things depend vpon the successe of Saint Peters Chaire, whereas Clement the 8 sits at this day, the great and most soueraigne Bishop, Lieutenant to God on earth, for hee hath Spirituall and Temporall power ouer all. A vnto the head. And that the Church hauing the power of two swords, grants vnto Kings and Magistrates the vse of the temporall, for the defence of the good, and rooting out of the wicked. But the Court of Parliament, the true seat of Royall Iustice, ready and careful to maintaine the estate against such as would shake it, in that which concerns the affaires of the Crown, declares by a decree of the nineteenth day of Iuly these two Articles to bee false, schismaticall, contrary to the word of God, holy decrees, canonical constitutions, and lawes of the Realme; tending to rebellion and the trouble of the publicke quiet: wherefore the Monke being conducted from the prison of the Conſergerie vnto the Sorbons hall; the Deane, Sindic, Doctors, Lycenciats and Batchelors, being assembled by the found of the bell, he declared (being bare-headed and vpon his knees, Blancy also assisting bare-headed, but standing) That rashly and indiscreetly he had propounded the said positions to be disputed off, and maintained by him in his Ordinary Aff, for the which he was sory, and demanded pardon of God, the King, and Iustice. The questions were torne in peeces, and defences made to all Batchelors to present the like against the Kings power and the obedience which all his subiects owe vnto him, the establishment of the royall estate, and the rights of the French Church; and to the Deane, Sindic and Doctors of the faculty, to receive them; nor to suffer them to be printed nor disputed off, vpon paine to be declared guilty of high treason, and vnworthy to enioy the priuiledges granted to the faculty of Diuinity, by the Kings predecessors to the King now reigning, and confirmed by him. And to eternize the memory, the Court ordained, that this decree should be written in the Registers of the said Faculty, and read euery yeare at the first Assembly of the Sorbonne by the Beadle of the said Faculty: enioying the Sindic to certifie the Court of the reading thereof within three dayes after it should be done, vpon paine of disobedience. This present decree was executed by Iohn Forger one of the Kings priuy Council, and President in his Court of Parliament, Stephen Flury, Ierome Angenoult, Ierome Anreux, and Prosper Bauin Councillors in the said Court, and deputed Iudges to that end, in the presence of his Maiesties Doctor generall, who by a graue and Maiestical admonition did shew zeale and affection to conuince the error & rashnesse of any one that would attempt to make a breach in the royall and soueraigne authority, to weaken the temporall sword, which God only did put into their hands for the preservation of the good and punishment of the wicked.

Whilest the King continues his victories, the Marshall of Bouillon executes a dangerous enterprize, but of importance, vpon the Towne and Castle of Han. Han opened the way for the Spaniard from the frontier vpon Beauvais and Amiens: but this surprize cunningly performed, did wonderfully annoy them, and not one Spaniard of those which had it in guard escaped either death or prison. Sixscore naturall Spaniards, and fixe or seuen hundred Captaines and souldiers of diuers nations were slaine, and three or foure hundred prisoners. But all this summe of men could not recompence the death of that braue and generous Nobleman Humieres, one of the chiefe actors in the enterprize, as much lamented first by the King, then by the Nobility, and generally of all France, as his vertues and merits had made him commendable and necessary for his Maiesties seruice. La Croix master of the campe, Maſſiers Lieutenant to Surville, and Boycourt Captaine of Humieres guard, were companions of his valour, and graue. The Towne was taken for the King, with the death of some twenty other Gentlemen, and about a hundred souldiers. But the Spaniard soone after reuenged this surprize vpon Castile, but more sharply vpon the towne of Dourlans, for hauing put to rout the succours which the Marshall of Bouillon sent, slaine the Admirall of Villars and many Gentlemen, they tooke the towne by assault (not for want of men or munition, but by their bad order, and the intelligence which the Commanders in the towne had with the enemy) and entered it with such fury, as they had no respect of sex or age: hauing no reason for their horrible cruelty, but the fresh remembrance of their companions. Itis (cried they) to reuenge those of Han.

The Duke of Neuers, the Marshall of Bouillon, and the Earle of Saint Paul, Commanders of the Kings troops, hauing diuided the charge amongst them, to encounter the Spaniards forces, the Marshall and the Earle went to provide for the places about Bollongne, and the Duke for those vpon the riuer of Somme. Passing by Amiens, he finds the people and chiefeſt so amazed, that to assure them, he was forced to lay aside the quality of his person, person, and to promise to put himselfe into Corbie, foure leagues from Amiens, to defend it the enemy approached. He enters it the third of August, views it both within and without, takes a survey of the quantity of munition, and of the number of mouths, and provides as time & necessity would permit him, for things necessary for the preservation of the place. The Spaniard had another designe: for the first day of the month he parts from about Dourlans, and taking the way betwixt Peronne and Corbie, seemes to threaten S. Quentin or Cambray. So the Duke leaves Corbie, but doubtfull whether the Spaniard went: yet aduertised by the Viconc d'Auchy gouernour of Saint Quentin, that the Enemy approached towards him, he goes to defend S. Quentin. He is no sooner aduertised, but newes comes, that the Earle of Fuentes is lodged about Cambray, to besiege it with seventene thousand men, and threecore and two peeces of artillery. The Lord of Balagny, Marshall of France, by his articles of capitulation with the King, confirms this aduise by his letters of the eleuenth, twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth of the month, and requies to be suddenly released, for the pitifull Estate of Dourlans terrified the people: the towne was ill provided of men, this huge number of Cannons, and this fearfull multitude of soldiers, strooke a generall terror among the Citizens.

But to reuine their spirits, who were ready to yield obedience to a new Lord, the duke of Neuers sends them his only sonne, the Duke of Rethelous, assisted with the valour and wisdom of the Lords of Vicques, Buhy, Trumelet, Vaudecours, Sugny, Fleury, Chantay, and others, with about three hundred and fifty horse. The Peasants by their bells giue the alarm from village to village, & a paley bridge of wood at Anne, two leagues from Cambray, having their troope, gaue the Earle of Fuentes means to put his horse in battell almost directly in the way where the Duke should passe. He anoides it, and going aside encounters a guard of six and twenty Lances, making a stand on this side of a hollow way: he chargeth them, cuts them in peeces in the sight of their horse, which could not succour them by reason of the said way, and passing on, hee falls into a troope of two hundred & fifty horse, marcheth directly to them, scatters them, goes on his way, & comes to the towne ditch. The Inhabitants know him and receiue him, with much honor and ioy to see so braue succors.

But it was too weake against such a number of assailants: the King was farre off, the Estate of Bourgundy kept him occupied: the affaires of the Prouince of Lionois required his presence. The Inhabitants of Cambray began to decline in affection: they were male-content with the tediousness of the siege, and the ruine of their houses by the Cannon, and of the constraint to take certaine money made of Copper, and not suffer them to employ it, carrying on the one side the Kings armes, as Protector; and on the other chole of the Lord of Balagny, created Prince of Cambray by the Articles of his rendition. On the other side, the enemy made strange attempts, and gaue horrible threats against the besieged. They shut their eares against all persuasions, and make a disloyall resolution to yield, and hoping for better vltage and more liberty, they open the gates to the enemy. The Duke of Rethelous, Balagny, Vicques, and others sicke into the Citadell. The Duke would retire his sonne, and makes the besieged despaire of any speedy succours. So the ninth of October Balagny signed the capitulation, offered by the enemy: but with so much griefe and sorrow, as the same night hee signed it, his wife being a woman of a great spirit died, not able to endure that so precious a Iewell as Cambray (whereof she was newly created Princesse) should fall into the Spaniards cruell hands.

Thus this ancient member of this Crowne was lost: Thus the onely triumph of a son and brother of the Kings of France was blemished. Doubtlesse had it not beene for the impatience and disloyalty within, the fault of some great men that might haue prevented this mischiefe, all their attempts had been in vaine: for the Earle of Fuentes was ready to build forties about the towne, rather to vanquish them by a long siege then by assault. And the King halted his entry into Lions, so come to their speedy succor. The Duke of Neuers died soone after, grieved on the one side for so great a breach made to this Estate, and satisfied on the other, that his sonne had shewed himselfe so valiant in the conduct of the succors he put into the towne.

The King seeing the Constable of Castile shut vp into Dole and Grey, being loath to hazard a battell, he went and made his entry into Lions the fourth of September, assured the

A the Prouince, provided for the troubles of Prouence, nourished not so much by the league, as by the discontentments and partialities of some which had no intelligence with them: he receiued Bais Dauphin in his obedience, with the townes of Chasseaugonier in Aniou, and Sable in Maine, and for recompence of his seruice, honored him with the place of a Marshall of France. Then he granted a general truce throughout the whole realm, to the Duke of Mayenne, which after so many storms and so many tempests, shall in the end bring vs to a safe port, so necessary to quiet the diuisions of this Realme.

The King being prest to make a general truce, and cessation of armes throughout his whole kingdom, vpon the assurance which the D. of Mayenne had giuen him to cause it to be obeyed by all them which doe yet make war, as well vnder his authority, as in the name of the Vnion: his Maiesty desirous to ease his subjects of the oppression of war, granted them certain Articles:

That there should be a truce and cessation of armes for three monthes. That all men indifferently might enioy the fruits of their reuennues, and returne into the possession of their houses and Castles. That no fortification should be made during the truce. That Labourers and husbandmen might with all liberty follow their accustomed workes, and not be molested vpon paine of death. That all men might passe freely throughout the Realme without passport. That all taxes and impositions set vpon Merchandize, should be leauied during the three monthes. That during the said truce nothing should be attempted vpon the places of either party, nor any act of hostility done, which it any should attempt, reparation should be made, and the delinquents punished as troublers of the publike peace. That no man might take any place, during the truce, to fortifie. Quarrells and challenges were forbidden for any difference which had hapned during the troubles. These Articles with diuers others were concluded vpon at Lions the three and twentieth of September 1595, and signed by the King, and Duke de Mayenne.

God raised vp a great meane from beyond the mountaines, to make the way easie for a general peace and re-union of people distracted from his Maiesties obedience. The Pope moued in the end to see the eldest Sonne of the Church, and the chiefe Christian Prince prostrate at his feet, shewes himselfe a true father of Iustice, to vanquish the difficulties and oppositions, whereby the Ambassador of Spaine had cross his Maiesties constant and iust pursuit, since the time of his conuersion. The 18 of September he opens the streames of his blessing vpon our Kings head: and all the Colledge of Cardinals, all the people, all the Citie of Rome cry out with that happy acclamation, God saue Henry of Bourbon, King of France and of Navarre, most great, most victorious. God saue the most Christian and the most Catholike. God saue the chiefe Sou of the Church.

The Pope blest both the Kings.

Few daies after the newes of this solemne action, the King went from Lions in post by night, to goe to the succour of Cambray, but the effects were not answerable to his care. The Cambresiens had already conceiued some hope of greater liberty: they hoped to get much by the change, and yielded their necks to a new command. There is neither meanes, counsell, nor reason that can stay a multitude, when as a disordered appetite of Freedome doth transport them. His Maiesty finds other worke to employ his forces: hee sought to roote this foraigne power speedily out of Picardy, which held his hands bound and insulted over him. La Fere is the chiefe and most important fort of the Prouince; he besieged it, and finds therein an obstinate and inuincible resolution. Perseuerance is necessary in all actions of war, but especially in the Siege of townes, and there is no place which the munition and the situation makes impregnable, but time & famine will force, subdue, and bring vnder. Whilst the King leaves the besieged nothing free but the ayre, and drives them to all extremities: the D. of Mayen on the other side (seeing his retreats in a manner all lost, and that he is in disgrace with the Spaniards) fues for his Maiesties fauour, and vpon his simple word he promitteth to come vnto him wherefoeuer he pleased. The Marquis of S. Sorlin, now Duke of Nemours by the death of his elder brother, yields with the like facility.

La Fere beleagued.

The Duke of Mayenne and Nemours received into grace.

Neuer Prince did more easily remit the wrongs were done him. The King grew more cold then was requisite in a siege of such importance, to attend the trearies of the one and the other. He commended the first, for the affection he had shewed to preserve the realme entire, hauing not done, nor suffered it to be dismembred, but of some places, in the great declining of his estate, and declares that hee had alwayes heard that the second had no part in the troubles and diuisions of the realme, by any designe preiudiciall to the Estate. This re-vnion of the Duke of Mayenne, performed at Monceaux in Brice, caused the yielding of Soissons, Pierrefont, Chaalon vpon Soane, Seurre in Bourgogne, and some other places, to the Kings obedience, whereupon the King made an Edict, as followeth.

Henry by the grace of God, &c. As it is the duty of a good King to loue his subjects, as his Children, to intreat them as his owne, and to thinke that their felicity is his: God and men are witnesses, that since it pleased God to call vs to this Crowne, wee haue had no greater desire then to free our selfe of this charge. For, hauing found this realme full of factions, war, and diuisions, more dangerous then haue been heretofore, we haue neither spared our blood to defend our authority, nor our clemency to forget wrongs which haue bene done vs: to the end we might soone free our Realme from oppressions and ciuill wars, the very spring and mother of all miseries. Wherein we confesse that we haue bene no lesse assisted by the grace & blessing of God in the one, then in the other. For, if he hath often giuen vs victories ouer our enemies, he hath also giuen vs a will and meanes to vanquish them by mildnesse, that haue made them selues worthy; so as we may say, that we haue no lesse advanced the re-vnion of our subjects by clemency then by armes. And therein we haue bene chiefly moued by the great loue we beare vnto our subjects, and the compassion we haue of their calamity and miseries, more then with our owne particular interest or aduantage. We haue also had a great regard vnto the causes which haue incited many of them to arme, being grounded vpon the care which euery man should haue of his foules health, the which we haue held so much the more worthy of commiseration and excuse, for that we doe acknowledge as a true Christian, that there is not any thing hath more power ouer vs, then this bond. Wherefore hauing often tried by our selfe, that force doth rather fortifie then change the resolution of man, in matter of Religion, and that it is a grace which is infused into vs, not by our owne iudgments, nor by any other, but by the only bouny of the euer-living God, and by the working of the holy Spirit.

As soone as we had any breathing from our great toyles, by the aduantages which God hath giuen vs ouer our aduersaries, wee drew vnto vs Prelates and Doctors of good life, and learned in the holy Scriptures, to instruct vs in the truth of the Catholike religion, whereof God by his grace hauing made vs capable, with a firme resolution to perseuer therein vnto the death: we haue since had no greater desire then to participate in the vnion and society of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Church, and our reconciliation with our holy Father the Pope, and the holy Sea, as all men may see by our actions, and the continuall pursuiues which we haue made: the which haue bene so crost by the ordinary practices of our enemies, and their power at Rome, as if our constancy and reason had not moued and fortified the vertue and singular bouny of our Holy Father (who like a common father did only regard the good of Christian religion) we had neuer attained to the happinesse of his holy blessing, nor of our reconciliation so much desired, for the quiet of our conscience, and the better satisfaction of our subjects, moued onely with the zeale of religion. Wherein we haue great cause to praisse God, and to magnifie his holinesse and equity, who by his wisdom and bouny hath confounded the infolency and falshood of our enemies: We haue no lesse cause to admire Gods diuine providence, in that it hath pleased him to make the way of our saluation, the fittest meanes to win the hearts of our subjects, and to draw them to obey vs, as hath bene seene soone after our vnion to the Church; and euer since continued.

But this worke had not bene perfect, nor the peace absolute, if our deare and welbeloued Cousin the Duke of Mayenne, chiefe of his party, had not followed the same course, as he was resolved to doe, when as he saw our holy Father allow of our re-vnion: The which hath made vs to like better of his actions then before, to take in good part the zeale which he had to religion, and to commend his desire to perseuer the realme, the which he would not suffer to be dismembred, when as the prosperity of his affaires seemed to giue him some meanes: As also since, being weake, hee chose rather to cast himselfe into our armes, and yeeld vs the obedience, which God, Nature, and the Lawes commanded him, then to seeke other remedies which might continue the wars, to the great preiudice of our subjects: The which makes vs desire to acknowledge his good will, and to loue and

A and intreat him hereafter as our good kinsman and faithfull subiect. And to the end, that both he and all Catholikes which shall imitate him in this duty, may be the better confirmed, and others incited to the like resolution: And also, to the end that no man may hereafter seem to doubt of the sincerity of our re-vnion to the Catholike Church, and vnder that pretext stir vp new seeds of dissention to seduce our subjects, and draw them to their ruine: Wee declare and protest that our resolution is to live and die in the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish religion, whereof wee haue made profession: our intention is also to procure the aduancement thereof with all our meanes, and with the like care and affection, as the most Christian Kings our predecessors haue done, by the aduice of our good and loyall Catholike subjects, as well of those which haue alwaies assisted vs, as of others which haue since yeelded vs obedience, maintaining notwithstanding the publicke tranquillity of the realme.

After this Edict and protestation, his Maiesty granted many things touching the good of the Duke De Mayenne, and those of his party which should submit themselves. The townes of Chaalons, Seurre, and Soissons, were left vnto the Duke for six years, as places of surety, and no religion to be there exercised during that time but the Romish, nor any one to be aduanced to any office or publicke charge, but such as made profession thereof. All Letters, Declarations, Iudgments and Decrees, made against the D. of Mayen, or any other whoseouer, that would enioy the benefit of the said Edict were reuoked, and the memory thereof suppressed and extinct. All men of what quality and condition soeuer, that did acknowledge the King, and make their due submission, were restored to their goods, offices and dignities, notwithstanding all Edicts, seissures, sales, confiscations, or declarations formerly made, the which were reuoked, and they put into possession thereof by vertue of this present Edict, vpon condition that they should sweare fidelity and obedience to the King, and presently depart from all leagues and associations. That neither the Duke, or any one which had followed his party, should be called in question for any thing which had bene done during the present troubles, if within the time limited by the Edict, they came and acknowledged their duties: vntlesse it were for the murder of the deceased King: which exception should not tend to the Princes and Princesses which had fallen from the obedience of the deceased King, & should now acknowledge their duty. That all men which desired to enioy the benefit of the Edict, might returne and possesse their houses, goods, and dignities, notwithstanding all letters and decrees to the contrary. That the Duke of Mayen, and all that had followed him, should be discharged of all soms of money, leauied or taken by them for what cause soeuer, and they likewise acquitted which had furnished the same. They were likewise discharged from all acts of hostility, and from any thing attempted contrary to their duties, during the war: with many other Articles for the ease and discharge of the Duke of Mayenne, and those which had followed his party. All that would enioy the benefit of this present Edict, were bound to make declaration within six weekes after the publication thereof, to the Courts of Parliament, or to the Iudges where they dwelt, and to take the oath of allegiance.

The execution of a decree made by the Court of Parliament, against the Duke of Anjou was surceased with an intent to suppress the same, if the Duke of Anjou should acknowledge his Maiesty as he ought within the said terme. Moreouer, the Duke of Mayenne was discharged of three hundred and fifty thousand crownes, for the which he and some of his friends and seruants had engaged themselves, which was employed for the war, and not conuerted to his owne priuate vse. The King did also promise to discharge him of all soms of money, for the which he stood bound to the Suisses, Reistres, Lanquenets, or any other strangers, and to make it his owne debt. There was other secret articles granted which were not expressed in the Original.

This reduction of the Duke of Mayenne serued the Marshall d'Amont as a spur to crosse the exploits of the Duke of Merceur in Britany. He had lately seized vpon Chai-ze, a place situated betwixt Normandy, Maine, and Britany, and from thence commanded the neighbour Prouinces; stretching out his wings thirty leagues round about, without contradiction. They of Caen did first complaine of it: the Marshall d'Amont aduertised of this prize by the Earle of Montgomery, sends for Captaine Genill (whose merits haue giuen vs subiect to make an honourable mention of him else where.) Genill gets leave of the King, and goes to view Chaze in a daie night, but he could finde no meanes to force it, being seated high, enuironed with steep rocks, a river and two pooles, hauing no approch nor entrance, but by two narrow Cawseys, whose issues must be discovered by light. He returns thither at a full Moone, and finds no other expedient, but to open the wall by the force of his Engines, by the meanes of a little hole which he found close to the ground. Yet this place is fortified with a double ditch, flanked by the dungeon, and hath but a very narrow cawsey to passe vnto, and to descend into the ditch by Moone light, in view of a Sentinel set right ouer it. Circumstances able to discourage the vnder taker, if some inward motion of a diuine assistance had not fauored his designe. He undertakes it, moued with the excess and violences of this insolent Garison, consisting for the most part of Spaniards, and roguish strangers. The Earle of Montgomery, and the Seigneur of Roches his brother, led many of the Nobility thither with sufficient forces. At their first approach the Sentinel gives the alarme: the Garison is presently in armes and man the walls. The first Petard discharged within the hole: all run thither to defend the entry: foure others follow as speedily as their shot. Gentil applied a great mortar, when as beheld the wall opens, and giues them meanes to enter. He calls for a Saullige to scatter them that came thronging to the breach. Des Roches brings it vnto him, but he is stricken dead with a Musket shot. Gentil cast the Saullige among their feet, it burnes some, lames others, lets fire of their furniture and powder, discharged their peeces, and makes a terrible spoile. Gentil casts himselfe desperately into the breach: the Earle of Montgomery seconds him, preferring the publike profit of this victory, before his priuate griete for the death of his brother. All the troops frue to go in, and pursue their enemies vnto the entry of the Dungeon. The Engines being speedily prepared to force them, ended them to capitulare, every one to depart with a white wand leaving the place to the discretion of the Earle Montgomery, and to Gentil a desire to make other enterprises in Britany, the which he had effected, if the Duke of Mercœur had continued in rebellion against the King.

The hazard and burthens of rebellion, ruined the Duke of Aumale onely: he would be more willfull then all the rest. He therefore grew so incensed against him, as the Court of Parliament at Paris made his proceesse, declared him guilty of treason in the highest degree, his picture to be drawne in peeces with foure horses, all his goods forfeited to the King, adiuudged his goodly house at Anet to be razed to the ground; and for more detestation of this treachery, the trees about it cut off by the waist. But he sought his safety with Albert Cardinall of Austria at Bruxelles, lately come to succed the Archduke Ernest his brother.

Albert assures the besieged in La Fere, to free them: but hee suffered the succours that should relieve them, to be defeated. And the Earle of Fuentes hauing manned the towne of this new conquest, went to winter in Haynault, and gaue the King meanes to dismisle most part of his horse to be ready in the Spring against the Cardinals designs. In the meane time he assembled the Estates of Picardy, Bolognois, Vermandois, and Thierache in Amiens, provided for the estate of the Prouince, and punished those Capitaines with death, whose couetousnesse had partly bin the cause of the former losses.

Whilst that our Henry, assisted now by the Duke of Mayenne in person, brings them of La Fere to be ready to submit vnto his Maiesty, behold the beginning of this new year, sows the seedes which shall bring forth most profitable fruits for the perfect restoring of this Estate. The townes and whole Prouinces desire a generall deliury, and nothing staies the effects, but that some gouernors will haue the honour to see the Cannon at their gates, before they treat of their accord: others set their places to sale. A filthy traffike, fit for the confusion of this age, but vnworthy of all good order, vnworthy the duty of good lubiecs, and vnworthy of the liberty and honour of the French Nobility. The King reducing them by force which will not voluntarily returne to their duties, he willingly giues ease to the mildest and shortest course. He should spend more money to get more honor, but he frames himself after the example & model of Charles the seventh, whose two raignes had many conformities. He desires rather to buy a place for money, then to besiege it with much more charge, and great losse of men. The people suffer great losse, and oft times the issue is doubtfull.

The first fruits of this new yeare are most happy in generall, and most honourable for the

The D. of Languedoc.

A the chiefe authors thereof. The Duke of Ioycuze holds the first ranke. It is hee which shall take againe his possession of a Capuchin, whereunto he was vowed after the death of his wife: and by the deceale of the last Duke of Ioycuze his brother (drowned neare to Villemur) had left it to succede in the name, gouernment and estate of the deceased. Without attending of any force, he yeelds freely to his Maiesties seruice, and the King opening his armes and heart, makes him partaker of his special fauours, honouring him with the title of Marshall of France, and one of his Lieutenants generall in Languedoc, in the townes, places, and countries he brings to his obedience: giuing him this testimony, that the onely zeale and profession of his religion had made him take armes, without any other pretension whatsoever. By his example the Officers of the Court of Parliament remaining at Tholouza for the exercise of Iustice, the Capitouls, and all the rest of the Citizens, together with all other people of the Prouince of Languedoc, which held the contrary party, vnder the authority of the said Duke, make known vnto the King the desire they haue to yeeld obedience and duty vnto his Maiesty, and their resolution to perseuer therein.

The D. of Guise did second this happy beginning of the yeare, and dorth sweeten the sharpnesse of those losses which the Spaniards had caused vs lately to suffer. He was still vigilant to embrace all occasions that might settle his affaires in his gouernment of Prouence, wherewith the King had newly honoured him, hauing already with the helpe of the Lord of Les Diguiers, reduced Cisterton and Riez to the obedience of this crown, and Martegues, with the tower of Boue, seated at the mouth of the Sea, the towne and citadell of Grasse, with the helpe of the Earle of Carces, and the Lord of Croze: he finds a fit opportunity, to make knowne vnto his Maiesty, that hee had quite forsaken the alliance and correspondency which he had with the Spaniard.

Lewis of Aix, and Charles of Casau commanded in Marfeilles with great authority: Marfeilles violent men, and of the Spanish faction, They bargained with Philip to sell him this towne of importance, the port of all the Prouince, and the key of one of the chiefe entries of this realme, where the Emperor Charles had often knockt, yet could neuer get it open, and for the execution of their design, had already caused some Spanish gallies to approach vnder the command of Prince Charles Doria of Genoua. All such as were fled out of Marfeilles, propounded some enterprises vpon the towne to the D. of Guise, but all were weak and of small possibility, yet had he purchased some reproch to faile in his seruice to the King if he had not attempted some one. Peter of Liberta commanded at port Reale, a man of courage, and full of affection to the Kings seruice. He acquaints the D. of Guise with his resolution, either to kill or to shut out these two Tribunes, who euery morning at the opening of the gates went with their guards to walke without the towne; that laying an ambush neare vnto the Gate, it would be easie for seize on, to be masters of the Port, and to consequently of the Towne. The Duke thinks well of this enterprise: he takes the name of the gate and of the person, for a presage of good fortune. The gate is called Royall, and the liberty which the Predecessors of the vnder taker had in sold time purchased to the Towne of Calui in Corseca, from whence they came, had deferred this goodly surname of Liberta. But the Dukes neare aboad at Aix, held these two petty tyrants in perpetuall distrust. To free them of this iealousie, he retires from Marfeilles, to employ his forces in some place which might breed no distrust in them. Hee doth therefore besiege and take the townes of Hieres, S. Tropez, and Draguignan: blocks vp the citadells, undertakes the siege of La Garde, a small Towne, but with a strong Castle, which the Duke of Elpernon held, being a cornuall to the Duke of Guise, in the gouernment of Prouence: batters the place, makes a breach, and giues two assaults, and euen when as they held him far engaged at this siege, he riseth, retires his Cannon, comes to Toulon the fifteenth of February, giues the Rendezuous to all his troops, at ten of the clocke at night, at Saint Iulian, two leagues from Marfeilles: he approacheth, and sends his Sentinels of horse before to aduertise him of the sign which Liberta should giue him, which was to shut the wicket after the Tribunes, or one of them as occasion serued. It was a faire day, when as these Counsils being aduertised that they had discovered sixtine Souldiers, two hundred paces from the gate, Lewis of Aix goes forth, and to discouer them he causeth twenty muskets of his guard to aduance: Barthelem of Liberta taps to the wicket and shuts Lewis out, and Casau within. Munier Leader of the Dukes Sentinels, seeing seeing the signe giuen, sends eight horsemen to charge these musquetiers, and aduanceth A with the rest towards the gate by another way: the footmen present themselves to the charge, as was resolved, but in stead of good reception, the Cannon and small shot plaies on them from the towne. Casau meaning to go forth with his guards to follow his companion, Peter of Liberta thrusts him suddenly through the body: his musketiers charge Liberta, his brothers assist him, the Captaines Heruizen, Laurence, Imperiali, and some few others, to whom he had imparted the enterprize, disperse these guards, and set vpon the gate, crying Liberty by the King: and by the authority of this name assured many which were vncertain what party to follow. Then with Liberta they set themselves to guard the Port. Lewis of Aix seeing himselfe shut out, and these vnknown men coming to charge B him, found meanes to get ouer the walls, and to enter the towne by a boate which hee found happily, and being accompanied by Fabio of Casau, the Sonne of Charles that was slaine, and five hundred of his friends and partisans, hee comes to force the gate on the town side: but being repulsed, he goes to the Corps-de-garde, that was before the town-house. Here, by some rumour that he heares, he takes an impression of the peoples ill affection towards him. To free himselfe, he makes shew to goe to the other guards, and so goes to Sea with Fabio to get Saint Victors port, and to assure himselfe of the rest. Some of his friends march after him, some disperse themselves in the towne, and some begin to cry: God saue the King, and Liberty. Retained sore, and the Duke of Guise amazed at this long protraction in the town, thinking the intelligence had bene double, thought C to retire his men engaged in fight, against the musketiers of Lewis of Aix, when as Imperial and Laurence come to assure him that Casau was slaine. Then began his troops to march into the towne, and for his better assurance, the President Bernard in the open street assembles what honest men he could, and ioynes with the Dukes men, promising them that were armed before the Town-house, life, liberty, and freedom: then going to another guard neere to the hauen, and to S. Iohns Church, where at the first broile about a thousand men were together in armes, by meanes of the like promise hee easily drew all this multitude, to sound forth that happy cry: God saue the King, and Liberty.

These two troops being assured, they visit three or foure other guards, whose attempts were to be feared, some they changed doubting such as commanded, leaving such as D knew desired to be freed from the command of strangers. So as in lesse then an houre and an halfe, they were all dispersed that lately fauoured this new tyranny. Thus the Flower-de-luce, which an vnwholsome winde from Spaine had till now blasted at Marfeilles, recovered its ancient beauty, and the white scarfes, which feare had kept in their coffers, or made them to reiect, were now put on.

Charles Doria growes amazed: he dreames of nothing but of his retreat: but so surprised as he forgot part of his company. The hauen seemed too little to carie forth their least Cock-boate, feare and amazement had so daunted them. The Captaine of Saint Iohns Tower, and that of the Moores head might haue staid them, or at the least, hindered their escape: but they were shrunken with the like terror, expecting the last act of E this Tragedy.

The Seigneur of Baufet, Captaine of the Castle d'If, fought to annoy the stranger with his Cannon, but being far off he did them small hurt. Lewis of Aix had thrust himselfe into S. Victors Abbey, and Fabio of Casau into our Lady of La Garde, but so amazed, as they could not think of their own safeties. Twelue hundred Spaniards being along the hauen, retired to enter into their Gallies: but this generall terror had so daunted them, as they saue themselves, without any remembrance of their men. The D. of Guise chargeth them by the Baron of Sel, Lieutenant of his company of men at armes, and La Pierre Captain of his guards, who slew a great number vpon the place, and got about a thousand muskets, hargubuzes, and pikes, and the onely Ensigne which they had, which feare made them forget to their great shame and confusion. The Duke entering into Marfeilles without any troupe, made knowne vnto the people the freeness of his affection, and the assurance he had of them: he confirmed all things for the Kings seruice, disappointed the designs of the factious which remained in the towne, and by his presence did so amaze all the garisons therof, with the Towers and Forts, as they submitted themselves to his discretion, and obeyed the King.

Doubtlesse this young Duke wonne much honor in this action, namely, that the fowldiers

A diers entred without effusion of blood, and without spoile, restrained by the respect of his presence, they were contented to haue the houses of Aix & Casau for their booty. On the other side, those of La Fere (hauing nothing free but the ayre, which cannot bee kept from prisoners) suffered (with the hope of succours) the extremest discommodie which might afflict a place strictly besieged. The Cardinal of Austria (newly come from Spaine into Flanders) promised to deliuer the Men supposed this Prince hauing made no profession of a military life, would find smal credit among martial men, who rather follow actions then words, and the example then discipline. But he will teach vs, that the surfeit strokes come from the head: and if the old Duke of Guise could by a gallant stratagem B reconquer a Towne from the English, most important for the Estate of this Crowne, hee in like sort by the like exploit will make himselfe the terror of all Picardy. He departs from Brussels, and giues it out that he will succour La Fere. For his first fruits, hee finds meanes to giue them some reliefe of men and munition in March. Then in April hee causeth his army (being very strong) to turne head towards Calais, besiegeth, batters, and takes both Towne & Castle by assault, against all the resistance of the besieged, and puts many French Gentlemen to the sword, being sent to supply the Castle. The Seneschall of Montimart, commanding the French, and Aluarez of Orsio the Spaniards in La Fere, hauing for the space of five moneths endured all the toyls of war, and seen the Riuier which in the Towne rise two or three foot by the labor of men, had the 22 of the said month, C by a good composition somewhat recompensed this so notable a losse, if the Cardinall had planted here the limits of his victories. But continuing the propertie of his armes, whilst the Kings are weary, and demand rest, after to great a toyle: he goes in the beginning of May, and camps before Arrdes, a very strong Towne, and notwithstanding their great defence, became Master thereof, the 23 of the moneth, and resolves to people these townes of his new conquests, with strange Colonies, and prepares to add vnto them that of Hulst in Flanders. In the meane time the two armies spend the rest of the Sommer in light roads one into anothers country.

In the beginning of September the Marshall of Biron enters Arthois, takes the Castle of Imbercourt, encounters with five cornets of horse, of the Marquis of Varambon, D followed by five or six hundred horse of combat, chargeth them, he kills all that seek to withstand the violence of his armes, puts the rest in rout, takes the Marquis prisoner, and afterward had forty thousand crownes for his rancome: filled the whole country with feare: then inuading the Countie of Saint Paul, hee tooke and spoiled the Towne, and some other places.

The Cardinall busied at the siege of Hulst, hearing that the Marquis was taken, he sent the Duke of Arfcot to command in his place. As he enters into Arras, the French assaile him on the other side, spoile the country about it, and (laden with booty) the Marshall retires safely into the frontiers of Picardy. Being discharged hee returns to Bapaume, spoiles Hebuterne, Benuiller, Courcelles and other places, defeats such as would make E resistance, and caries away more spoile then at the first. And seeing the Duke of Arfcot encamped neare to Arras, vnder the fauor of the Cannon, intrinched carefully and loath to hazard any thing, knowing that he was to deale with one of the happiest and most valiant warriors of Europe, they fire all, and reuenge (as opportunity would suffer them) the Spaniards outrage in places lately taken: they make a road towards Bethune and Theroenne, bring away many prisoners, furnish their places with cattell at the enemies cost, and without any resistance goe and campe in the plaine of Azincourt. The Duke supplied with eight hundred foot, ioyned to the Regiment of Colonell Bourlart, parts from Arras the first of October, and goes and encamps at Saint Paul. The Marshall leaues Fardly there, returns into Arthois, runs vnto Douay, spoiles all: then returning into Picardy, he gaue the Duke of Arfcot meanes to recouer the Castle of Himbercourt: who content with this conquest, dismisseth his army, and disposed of his companies into garisons. Then by the means of the Duke of Bouillon, the alliance was confirmed and sworn betwixt the King, the Queene of England, and the vnited Prouinces of the Low Countries. For matters past, there is no remedy, and the Politicians hold: that there is no law more vnprofitable, then that which tendeth to reform what is past. The King therefore to settle his affaires, and to provide for the future, resolute not to suffer these new Colonies of Dourlans, Capelle, Chastelet, Cambray, Calais and Arrdes, and with the Calais and Arrdes taken by the Spaniards.

War in Arthois.

An assembly at Rouen in forme of a Parliament.

Gggg

new year to renew a deadly war against the Spaniard, which might not be attempted A without a mighty army, nor the army leaue without treasure, the which he could not recover without the help of his subjects: he assembled, in manner of a Parliament, the greatest and most discreet of the three orders of his Realme, at Rouen the fourth of Nouember, where the Inhabitants of their owne voluntary free will, spent foure hundred thousand Crownes to make his Maiesty an honourable reception, where hee received the Garter (a marke of the Order of England) by the hands of the Earle of Shrewsbury.

His Maiesty desired to deferre these two glorious titles of Deliuere and Restorer of his Estate. At his comming to the Crowne he had found France, not onely in a manner ruined, but almost all lost for the French: but by the grace of the Almighty, by the prayers, by the good counsell of his loyall Subjects, (who make no profession of armes) by the sword of his Princes, and of his braue and generous Nobility, by his paines and labour, he had preferred it from losse. Let vs since now from ruine (said our King, speaking to the Assembly) participate, my deere subjects, with me in this second glory, as you haue done in the first. I haue not called you as my Predecessors did, to make you approue my will. I haue caused you to assemble to haue your counsells, to beleue them and to follow them: finally, to put my selfe into your hands. A desire which seldom commands Kings that haue white hairs, and are Conquerors. But the loue I beare vnto my Subjects, and the exceeding desire I haue to add these two goodly titles to that of King, makes me to finde all easie and honourable. C The sharpest of winter had laid armes aside, and the excess of raine caused many inundations, whereof amongst others followed that of the Millers bridge at Paris, which sinking on Saint Thomas night, was the losse of three hundred persons, flaine in the ruins of the building, and drowned in the riuer. Whilste they examine the resolutions taken in this honourable assembly, and that the King prepares for a mighty army to chase the Spaniards out of Picardy, behold the capitall City of this Prouince, strong of fear, and well fortified, where his Maiesty pretended to make his Arcenal and store-house for the war, against the Stranger in Arthois, and other Prouinces of the Low Countries, was surprised in the day time, the people being at a Sermon, without force, and without defence, by the practice of some factious, and the careless baseness of the inhabitants, who standing vpon their ancient priuileges, had refused to receiue the Swisses into garison. Hernand Teillo Gouverneur of Doullans for the Spaniard, advertised that the Citizens of Amiens (a proud people, and little practised in armes) would not receiue the garison that the King offered them for the preservation of their Towne, hastens the effect of those intelligences he had there, and on munday the 10 of March he attires forty or fifty soldiers like peasants, laden with many burthens, and armed vnderneath with daggers, and short peeces, and marcheth with about seven hundred horse, and 5000 foot: he laies his ambushes neare vnto the Towne, and the next day sends his disguised Soldiers to the gate of Montreuil, following a cart, which being vnder the Portcullis, one of the pretended peasants cuts the horse trace, and by the great disorder of the horse, hinders the liberty of the gate. The others presently discover their armes, seize vpon the Corps-de-guard, and giue a signe to the ambush. The ambush comes horse and foot, and enter into the towne, and goe directly to the market-place: the troops enter, take the fort, and seize vpon the Arcenal and munition which the King had lately sent, & in the end compound with the townsmen for the redeeming of their goods. But at length they had both cloth and siluer, and those of Amiens shall not tast much of the Spaniards command, but the sharpness thereof will make them desire the mildness of the French. The great bell of Beffroy did ring at the first tumult, as it was their manner, but few were moied thereat. Some heard the Sermon, others slept at their ease, and some were contented to shut their shops and to retire themselves into their houses. The Earle of S. Paul was then in the Towne, but seeing the small care and endeavor of the Inhabitants to resist this forraigne inuasion, he gets himselfe out of Amiens with all speed, and retires to Corby: This affront had in shew made the realme without all hope of recovery, and without means to assaile, for the effects of all the Kings designs seemed disappointed in their beginning. They thought Amiens could not be recovered but by surpris, and that the hope to take it would be lost with the enterprize: and now the Spaniard began to thinke that Amiens should be the bounds of the country of Arthois, as in former time vnder Philip D. of Bourgongne.

A Bourgongne. But when as the affaires require a present remedy, our Henry wants neither courage nor counsell. They were hopes built in the ayre. His Maiesty doth speedily be- siege it, giues order that no greater forces may come to raise vp these mountaines of pride, which built the honour of their nation vpon the shame of such a losse: he batters it with fise and forty Cannons, makes the Marshall of Biron Lieutenant in his army, besiegeth it on the strongest part, restraines their sallies, keeps them within their trenches, and approacheth in such sort, as by the midst of July, they might hurt one another with stones: then lodging vpon the ditch, and cutting off the beseged daily in their sallies, or other stratagems, he made Hernand to haue the Cardinall to his succour.

B Some place of importance taken from the Spaniard, might in shew serue as a reprimall. Capitaine Gentil of Geauaudan, tried all his wits and inuention for this designe, for the effecting whereof he went by night to view the Towne and Castle of Perpignan in the County of Roussillon, and found no difficulty but to leaue men without alarm in the country. Languedoc might furnish sufficient being the frontier, but the Spaniard entertained many secret spies. Gentil therefore thinks it best to take them in more remote places, 200 horse were to be leaued in Poitou, who vnder a colour to ioyne with the Duke of Guile, take their way by Guienne to Beziers, and should giue no ialousie in regard of their small number. And 2000 foot, leaued in Viuzare and Geauaudan by the Seigneurs of Fosseuse and Chambauld should crosse base Rouergue, vnder colour of assisting them. C selues by the Kings commandment into Bayonné: (whither by the common brute the Spaniard was bringing an army) and by the rocky and hidden waies should defend on the side of Beziers, soone after the taking of Perpignan: faigning to take the way to Thoulouze to recouer Bourdeaux, and from thence Bayonne. This resolution being taken, Gentil imparts it to the Seigneur of Pleffis Mornay at Saumur, and to the Constable at Paris, they allow of it, and hee, assuring himselfe to take the Castle at the first without Petard, during the long nights, he might from the Castle (being furnished with about thirty peeces of Ordnance) thundering into the enemies trenches, bring his troops into the Towne: and the brute of this vnexpected newes would haue armed 20000 men in Languedoc in 8 daies to inuade all the county of Roussillon. The King himselfe held it D feasible, and caused dispatches to be made to Gentil, as well for himselfe as for Fosseuse, and Chambauld. But at the instant pursuit of the Bishop and Inhabitants of Mende, his Maiesty hauing commanded that the Citadell should be dismantled, and Fosseuse Gouvernor of the place, pretending recompence for some charges, before hee would suffer the Cannon to be transported. The King commanded the Duke of Vantadour to besiege him within Mende, in the month of August, and to force him to that which hee would not willingly yeeld vnto.

They of Perpignan thinke this siege attempted to surpris them, and stand vpon their guards: notwithstanding his Maiesty giueth order for another leauey in Languedoc by the Lords of Spondillan, Conas, Montbafen, Legues, and other chiefe men of that Cly- E mat; but whose actions being neare the frontier, could not be hidden from the enemy. Thus Gentil seeing his designe anticipated from the longest nights to the shortest in the year, and that those of Languedoc were employed therein, he thought it could hardly be successful. The Marshall d'Ornano had the conduct of this enterprize. Ten or twelue thousand men follow him confusedly as to a certaine victory. But the most part are thrust on with the glistering of the doubloons of Spaine, and with a desire of spoile. And can we wonder if heaven doth not blesse those enterprizes, where the consideration of priuate gaies doth march before that of the publike good? Hee was not come out of Dauphiné where he was Gouverneur, before all the neighbour Prouinces were posselt of it: and aduertisements were come out of Spaine to them that were threatened. Vpon their F approaches to the towne, the Marshalls guide wandered in the night. The Petards were brought neare vnto the town gate, but the rolling bridges to ioyne vnto the draw-bridge could not be made ready before day. The towne was barricadoed euen vnto the gates, and the Cannon planted. All the whole county did shine with the fires that were made: this enterprize being vnder taken with too much brute, and some of the chiefe commanders, swallowing vp all the best spoiles of an imaginary conquest, learned that it is a rashness to diuide the Beares skin before the beast be taken: moreover, reason would not but the author of a goodly enterprize should haue the principall conduct, to the end

war in Britany

that he should either reape the honour of his exploit, or the blame of his error. Gentil A is knowne to be capable for such effects, and if many during our incivill wars had performed thelike stratagemes both in quality and quantity to him. France had not so long groaned vnder the burthen of her miseries. All France did in the meane time run to the siege of Amiens: all Europe attended the issue, and did iudge that the end thereof would be the beginning of our slavery, or of our liberty. But whilst the plague afflicts the besieged, that many and sundrie exploits of war diminish their numbers, and many remain vnprofitable, by reason of their wounds: let vs wander a little into some other Provinces both within and without the Realme, whereas their war hath any thing common with ours. The want and dearth of victualls afflicted Britany in the moneth of May, and forced the Marshall of Brissac in Iuly, to diuide and separate some troops which he had gathered together, to preferre some Parishes about Rennes, which the enemies threatened to spoile. The Lord of Saint Laurence, Lieutenant for the D. of Mercœur in his army, desirous to visit the said Duke, lately come to Chasteaubriant, and to giue him newes of some braue stratagem, takes six companies of men at armes with his owne, the regiment of Tremereuc, brother to S. Laurence, fortie Harguebuziers out of euery company of the garisons of Dinan, and some other troops both of horse and foot, making 600 or 700 men, and comes to lodge at Maure, seuen leagues from Rennes. The Lords of Tremblay, la Troche, Teny, la Courbe, Beaumont, and Pomeray, being lodged at Messac vpon Villaine, three leagues from Maure with some forces, march by the Marshalls commandment to fight with S. Laurence: they finde hee was dislodged, follow and ouertake him within three hundred paces, charge the troops led by Tremereuc, appointed to make retreat, kill about 60, and force the rest to fly to their maine strength. They presse them in such sort, as they must either suffer themselves to be slain without resistance, or else fight: they turne head, take a place of aduantage in a field well ditched about, and there make some resistance. But seeing Tremereuc, brother to S. Laurence already taken prisoner, La Pomeray Captaine of Dinan, and Vieux Ville, slaine vpon the place, with about 150 souldiers, and some members of Companies, all giue way, all fly, all are put to rout, and the most part falling into the peasants hands, finde lesse mercy with them, then they had done rigor with the victors. This was the twentieth of Iuly. On the other side, as the Spaniard had set one foot into Picardy, so did hee long labour to cast the other into Campagne, and had many designs vpon the Townes lying vpon the riuier of Menue, Messires, Sedan, Mouzon, Villefranche, Rocroy, and Maubert. Fontaine: but the care and loyalty of the Gouenours, hauing alwaies made frustrate the hope of his enterprises, hee now conuerts his open force into secret intelligences and dishonest practises.

Villefranche is a very small towne, or rather a corps-de-gard made of foure square bastions, built by King Francis the first, to serue as a bar against the incursions of the Bourguignons (so they call all the King of Spaines subiects lying vpon this frontier, and euen those of the Duchy of Luxembourg) and falling into strangers hands, it opened them the gate to enter into Champagne, and gaue them an assured retreat to fauour their inroads. To this intent Gaucher, late one of those souldiers which they call of Fortune, being come within ten yeares to some credit by armes, practiseth with some souldiers of the garison, to sell and deliuer him the place. These souldiers giue care to this traffike, entertaine Gaucher, but with as crosse a hope as his name was vntoward and eiminous, for they impart the matter to Tremet Gouernour of Villefranche, commanding one company of men at armes, and three of foot. Tremet by this trafficke, pretends a great effect for the Kings seruice, commands the souldiers to deale more plainly with this Captain, imparts it to the Earle of Grandprie, to Rumelnil, and to Estuieaux Gouernour of Mouzon, Maubert, and Sedan, and draws from them assistance of men, and means to frame a double intelligence. These Merchants treat with Gaucher, agree vpon the time & houre to deliuer their ware, they receiue some money in hand, and take his word for the rest.

The fourth of August at night was appointed for the execution, and for a signe a Cannon should be discharged. But Rumelnil had the night before brought in a supply of men, needfull for the preferuation of the place, and with the rest hee lay in ambush halfe a league from the Towne, as Gaucher should passe. Gaucher approacheth, hee causeth all his troops to light, a quarter of a league from Villefranche, puts a part of them very secretly into the ditch, and followes with the rest to second the first attempt: but at all aduacatures

A aduentures he causeth his horse to be led after him. The first enter by fauour of the souldiers: the signe is giuen, and being giuen, those which thought to surpris, find themselves surpris'd: all are put to the sword, consumed by wild-fire, or drowned in the ditch. Rumelnil comes out of his ambush at the same time, chargeth Gaucher behinde, kills three hundred men vpon the place, and suffers few of his enemies to escape, through fauour of the night: finally, of five or six hundred men which he brought, scarce fifty escaped death or imprisonment, and had it not bene for the horse which Gaucher held ready to fauour his flight, he had not escaped the victors hands.

Let vs passe into Saouy, and see the progresse of the Kings forces, the taking of places, and victories obtained. This warre shall helpe much for the recovery of Amiens, for they diuert the forces of Saouy from molesting of the King in sundry places at once: for the managing whereof, the Lord Les Diguieres parted from Court in the end of March, with the title of the Kings Lieutenant Generall, gathers together about 600 horse, and 5000 foot, in the moneths of April, May, and Iune: enters into Maurienne, a Country depending on the Duchy of Saouy, the high way to Piedmont and Italy, surpasseth with much labour and toile the difficulties of the wayes, rocks, and steepe hills: in the end he recouers the top of the mountaine, finds there a Corps-de-gard of 500 men well fortified, and with his tyred army chargeth them with such fury, as the enemy not able to withstand their force, is constrained to quit the place. Presently the army comes to Saint Iohn of Maurienne, the chiefe towne of the Country, and seizeth on all the valley.

C These conquests as suddenly executed, as wisely attempted, thrust on the Conqueror to goe and fight with certaine Spaniards which were sent into Flanders to oppose against the prosperous successe of Cant Maurice: but the bridges being broken, and the waters very great, stayed his passage. Hereupon newes come, that Dona Sanchio Earle of Salines, General of the Duke of Saouyes light horse, is about Bragorant with a part of the Dukes army. Les Diguieres marcheth thither, chargeth the Earle, makes him to quit the Castle of Saint Michel, and some other villages where he had fortified himselfe, chafeth him by Mont-Senys into Piedmont, and so hotly, as the most part, to make themselves more light cast away their armes. Being thus peaceably possessed of all Maurienne, he fortifies S. Iohn D and the Castle of Saint Michel, and seizeth on all the forts that might serue for the safety of the Country.

To stay the Conquerors course, the Duke of Saouy passed the mountaines, by the valley of Aust with three thousand Italians, and a good number of horse, and came by Chambery into Tarentaise, where his army remained vnder the command of the Earle of Martinengues, consisting of eight hundred horse, and six thousand foot: he came and encamped beyond the riuier of Isere (yet vnder the fauour of the Cannon of Montmelian) at the Castle of Saint Helena. Les Diguieres continues his conquests, hee approacheth within musket-shot of the Duke, besiegeth and takes the tower of Aiguebelle, the castles of Rochette, of Villars-Saller a house of the Earles of Montmaieur, de L'huile and Chamoux, and besiegeth the fort of Chamouisset, being defended by Philippin, bastard brother to the Duke of Saouy, places very commodious and profitable for victuals and forage, and which stopt the passage from Saouy into Maurienne.

Here newes come to Les Diguieres, that the Duke raiseth a fort on the other side of Isere, to assure the passage for his army, and meanes to lodge at Chamouisset, a place of great aduantage, which might greatly annoy the Kings army and the passage betwixt Dauphine and it. This fort was of a triangular forme, made defensive, and raised the height of a pike in one night, it was guarded by 600 choice souldiers out of the whole army of Saouy, & fortified with many gentlemen of the dukes Court. Les Diguieres views it, and propounds it in Councell, & according to their aduice that were about him, saures F it with some volley of Cannon, opens it at one point, sends 2000 harguebuziers, commanded by the Lord of Crequy his sonne in law, who seconded by a troop of horse, enter furiously into the fort, and in despite of their obstinate resistance, and the force of foure peeces which played incessantly from the other side of the riuier along the flanks of the said fort, they carried it in fight of the Duke, and kill by the sword and water about foure hundred men, and many of the Dukes Gentlemen, who was in person in his army beyond the riuier of Isere: and forced the fort. The Baron of Chauniruc borne in the Countie was slaine there, the Colonell was taken prisoner, and the Castle of Chamouisset 1597 yielded the next day by composition. The towre of Charbonniere, a place strong of A situation, which couers Aiguebelle, and might be made fit to annoy Montmelian, seeing their Capitaine and many others slaine with the Cannon, came likewise into the victors power.

The Castle of Aignille remaind yet, a strong place both by nature and art, vpon the side of a mountaine, inaccessible of one side, hauing on the other a double ditch, with a thick rampar betwixt both, yet was it taken after two hundred Cannon shot. This place assured all Maurienne, and that which lies beyond Isere to his Maiesties obedience from Mont Senys vnto Montmelian. The supplies the Duke expected, caused the Lances of Sauoy to remaine in quiet. Being now fortified with two thousand five hundred Suisses, and B as many Spaniards and Neapolitans, he comes with all this army to lodge about Montmelian, and resolues to set vpon the Kings army. To free him of some part of this trouble, Des Diguieres turnes towards him with his forces, and comes to incamp at Mollettes, halfe a league from Montmelian, the river of Isere being betwixt them. The Duke passeth the river vpon a bridge of boates made nere vnto that of Montmelian, and lodgeth at the Castle of Saint Helena, right against Molette, places some what high, and within Cannon shot one of another, separated by a great meadow and a fenne; at the first they salute one another by skirmishes, and if the Sauoisians had done what they might, they had greatly annoyed our men, who were not lodged nor scarce armed. The night approaching ended the combat, with the losse of a hundred good men, and gaue meanes to the Kings C troops to take breath, and prepare to be reuenged with vsurie. The next day the Duke shews 15000 foot, and 1500 horse, in battaile, in this great meadow, but with such advantage, as no man might charge them. Des Diguieres intrencheth himselfe at the foot of the meadow: euery master of the Camp, euery Capitaine takes his quarter, and by the care of the Lord of Crequi commanding the foot, the Kings campe was in short time out of present danger, which seemed to threaten their ruine. In the meane time they faile not on either side to trie their swords, and pistolls, two to two, three to three, troop to troop, and nothing but a simple ditch, yet deepe and full of water, keeps the two armies from a bloodie fight.

Thus for some dayes these warriors inflamed their resolutions, when as the Duke of D Sauoy propounded to his Councell a great designe, for the execution whereof the fourteenth of August by eight of the clocke in the morning, he secretly drawes three thousand men into a great wood, nere to the trenches of the Kings army, lodgeth his Suisses with a battaillon of foot on another side, sets his horse in a vallie, and encouraging them by his presence, causeth about two of the clocke a Cannon to be discharged, for a signe of a cruell and bloodie battaile, but fuller of passion then of iudgement. The losse fell vpon himselfe: the Kings troops, both horse and foot, were with a firme resolution prepared to withstand their force. They come to skirmish: the noyse of the Cannon drownes all other sounds, the fire of the shot inflames the ayre and seemed for five houres together to dazell the light of the Sunne: the meadow is couered with dead carcasses, the enemies E blood dies the brookes, and inflames our men to fight. The Seigneur of Crequi receiues a musket shot in the right arme: but the Lion is chafed and stormes at the sight of his owne blood. So retyring himselfe apart vnder a tree to be drest, he returns speedily to his companions, and burning with a generous heat of reuenge, shewes that he is a right heire, both in blood and verue to that braue Lord of Pontdormy, who hath so often heretofore died his sword and arme in the blood of the stranger being enemy to this Crowne. About twelve hundred men slaine or hurt made the day famous, and made the Sauoisien lose all desire to trie any more the firme resolution of our men, grounded vpon the right of a most iust offensive warre.

If all this great armie, neither by the thunder of their Cannons, nor the furie of their F shot, neither by the force of their men at armes, could any thing shake the constancie of our men, doth Colonnell Ambrose thinke to preuaile more with five hundred naturall Spaniards assailing a Corps-de-gard, placed on the side of a fenne: but he doth increase their flame, in stead of reuenging their publike losse. The Seigneurs of Baume and Poët receiue him with such resolution, as they kill a hundred and fiftie vpon the place, and take many prisoners: the rest they force to cast away their armes, to be the more light to flie. The Duke spent the night to burie his men, and to carrie away the wounded: then he dislodged

A dislodged the sixteenth, and went to lodge at a village called Barraux beyond Isere, at the entry of the valley of Griffuauand towards Grenoble, and there begins a fort, buyling himselfe in the building thereof vnto the end of November. This change of lodging inuaird our men to do the like. Des Diguieres comes to lodge at Castle Bayard, and his army at Pont-Charra, halfe a league from the enemy, the river being betwixt them: hee keeps his men in continuall skirmish, to the enemies losse, and by this placing of his campe, makes the enemy doubt that he would attempt the passage to Eschilles. To crosse him the Duke sends many troops to enter by the valley of Pragelas into the countrie of Briancon, and to shut vp the passage in case he were besieged. The check he receiued countenanced the first. The water, the sword, and the steepe mountains, denoued a greater B number of his men, then the skirmishes of S. Helene and Molettes.

Behold a third, which shewes that God doth fauour the iust cause of armes, and makes their effects happie against the iniustice of vsurpers. The eight of September, the Lord Des Diguieres (who lets not slip any occasion) is aduertised that Sanchez Earle of Salines, (to draw him to succour his owne Province, and to leaue Sauoy) goes to spoyle about Grenoble with five hundred masters diuided into two bands of horse.

To adde this victory to the former, he sends two houres before day, the Seigneurs of Baume, Authun, and Saint Iure with two hundred horse, and a hundred Carbins to lie in ambush in an Island in the midst of the river of Isere. At the breake of day, the Earle C passeth in fight of them: they suffer him to aduance about halfe a league, then they issue forth of their ambush, and wade through the other part of the river to their sadle skirts, they ouertake the Earle at La Frette, charge him furiously, kill Dom Iohn de Sequano frist

Ar La Frette. Captain of the horse, Dom Roario, Dom Probie, with many other Commanders and men at armes, to the number of two hundred; and by the taking of Dom Euangeliste, who led the second troupe of the Earle of Gatinari, of Dom Iohn Tac, brother in law to the Earle, and three score others, they end the combat, and returne with honour, having lost but sixe men in this bold encounter. Some daies after, the Lord Des Diguieres passeth the river with most part of his horse, at Chaparrouillon, and there charging a troupe of the enemies, which made a good shew by the fauour of some trenches, gaue the Seigneurs of D Crequi and Buiffe the second honor of this victorie.

The last of October, the Kings armie ill lodged at Pontcharra, retyred about Grenoble: from thence Des Diguieres sent foure regiments towards Barcelonne, and surmounting the toile of the way, being of most hard access for the Cannon, tooke Allost: then in the end of November, Saint Genis, to disappoint the intelligences which the Duke of Sauoy might haue with some ill affected in Dauphine. But a few daies before the Earle of Roche had failed by the meanes of Albigny a yonger brother of Gordes, to deliuer the towne of Romans to the Sauoisien: for Saint Ferriol, that commanded in his absence, had some incking: who by the aduertisement he gaue to the Officers of the Parliament, whom the plague had transported to Romans, he faued the towne from the rule of a Stranger.

E The Duke wonderfully grieved to haue failed of Romans, retires to Chambery, and the Lord of Crequi with some regiments to Maurienne, very happily to make his coming famous: for hauing first by the assistance of the Lord of Paquieres, kept Dom Amedee the Dukes bastard brother, from passing with his troops on the side of the mountains, hee made the way open for a braue and generous stratagem. The Earle of Carraul would likewise passe with a regiment of twelve ensignes, and two Cornets of horse. Crequi parts before day from S. Iohn of Maurienne, marcheth directly towards him, encounters him at Saint Andre, chargeth, defeats, takes him prisoner with all the Commanders, and for a monument sends their colours and Cornets to the King, which hang yet as a trophie in our Ladies church at Paris, to his Maiesties great content. Let vs now see the countenance F of them that were besieged at Amiens. If there were valour without to win the wall, there was resolution within to burie themselves in the ruines thereof, rather then to abandon it.

The batterie continued with a strange furie. The extraordinary deep trenches, the sap and myne, the attuall of the Dukes of Mayenne, Bouillon, and the troops which increased dayly, gaue hope to the Citizens of Amiens, soone to see themselves vnder the milde command of their lawfull Prince, and to returne to their ancient fortunes. The fallies, plagies, hurts, and other infirmities, had diminished the besieged to the number of two thousand: the diuersitie of nations threatned some new change, the soldiers diers would no more trust the cunning and vaine promises which Hernando gave them by A counterfeit Letters from the Cardinall: the old and bad drugges killed in stead of curing: finally the Letter of Hernando to the Cardinall being intercepted, gives a very sufficient testimonie of the vrgent necessitie which leads him to his ruine. It is now time (said he) that we cease to write, for I labour with the soldiers and Burgeses at the rauein, where within few dayes I attend a continuall battery of the enemy on three parts. Mans reason sayes vs: our hope is in God, and in your Highnesse speedy comming to giue battell, or to receive it. We attende the second causes should worke.

There is no lesse honour to keepe well, then to make a goodly conquest. To practise this ancient saying, the Cardinall hauing assembled foure thousand horse, and fifteen thousand foot, with eghteen Cannons, and fixe or six hundred wagons chained together, to serue as a barricado, and to inclose his campe, he marched to vngage or to succour the besieged, publishing in all places, that he would giue battell. But before hee approached, he sends to discouer the way which he was to take, and where he might lodge nearest to the towne. This charge he giue to Contreras, Commissary general, who led the troope to Don Gaston Spinola and Taffedo Marshalls of the campe, to Don Ambros Landriano Lieutenant general of the Light-horse, Don Iohn Bracamont, to Colonell Bourlote, Nicholas Basso and other chiefe Commanders of his army. These to giue the lesse alarm, take about 400 choise horse, and make a shew as if they would come but to Dourlans: but they giue order that the troops of horse at Dourlans, Hefdin and Bapaume should bee ready when they passed.

Thus increased by the said garisons, and making a troope of nine hundred or a thousand horse, the nine and twentieth of August they come beneath Saint Quirieu, a village vpon the banke of a small riuer, two leagues from the Kings quarter: and begin to view the said lodging. A troope of light-horse and Carabins comming from an ambush which they layed, discouer them, the Seigneur of Heucourt doth aduertise the King at six of the clocke in the morning.

Behold one of the effects of his Maiesties speedy resolution, of his great iudgement in warre, and his exceeding diligence in his executions. Behold moreover a patterne of that happinesse which attended him at this siege, and the earnest penny of an absolute victorie which God prepared for him against his enemies. Two alarms had kept the King waking the rest of the night, and he now began only to take a little rest. Hee riseth, goes to horse, hauing about him the Master of his horse and some Noblemen: he passeth by the Carabins quarter, commands them to horsehacke with some light-horse, commands the Constable to stay in the quarter to giue order to all euent, and goes directly where the enemy had bene discouered, more with an intent to prouide for the places which they might haue viewed, then to fight: thinking they would not haue bene so slacke in the retreat, being neere vnto an army led by so vigilant a Commander. The Marshal of Biron comes posting after him, the Lord of Montigny brings a troope of light-horse. Some Noblemen and Gentlemen of his Court post thither in haste, to haue their part thereof.

His Maiesty makes a battailion 200 horse, and 150 Carabins. Hee pursues them with all speed to Encre, seuen Leagues from his quarter, hee puts his Carabins before, who seeing themselves seconded by his Maiesty, charge resolutely, and so amaze them, as seeing the King so neere them, and knowing him very well, they breake, and take their flight diuers wayes, leauing them that were appointed for the retreat, or such as were not well mounted. There were about forty slaine at the first charge, and about two hundred of the best being prisoners, gaue the Carabins meanes to furnish themselves with horse, armes, and apparell.

To make this victory absolute, his Maiesty sends the Marshall of Biron with the Lord of Montigny before, and halfe his troope with them: the other hee keeps with himselfe, pursues them within a League of Bapaume, tithes their troope by the way, and doth not abandon them vntill they came within view of their retreat: he takes two Cornets from them, and kills or takes fixe hundred horsemen. The generall ioy thereof in the army brought the newes vnto the besieged, who by a heauy and mournfull silence shewed they had no pleasure therein.

But see, the third of September the death of Hernand Tiello slaine with a Musket, at the defence of the rauein which his Maiesty caused to bee assailed, assisting them with a pub-

A a publike sorrow, giues the Citizens as assurance of a speedy deliuey, and the assailants to conceiue a certaine hope of victory. There is no so great prosperitie, but is crossed with some aduersitie, and trouble. Two dayes after, the Lord of Saint Lue, Gouernour of Brouage and great Master of the Artillery of France, slaine in the trenches, obtained that graue and worthy testimony of his valour from his Maiesties mouth, to haue lost that day a most valiant and faithfull seruant, leauing his people much grieved, and the whole campe lamenting this generall losse to France, as of one of the brauest Captaines of his age.

In the meane time the Cardinall approached, vnting that he would fight within foure B dayes. Yet had hee no inclination to put it in practice. The King to draw him to battell, preuents the policy which the enemy would vse to succour the place: he takes his place of battell on the top of Long-pré, a quarter of a league behinde the inclosure of his campe, intrenched as well to saue themselves from the cannon shot of the towne, and from theirs that came to succor them. And to keepe the enemy from sending in any succors on the other side of the riuer, he leaues the Lords of Montigny, La Neue, de Vicques and Cluseaux, there with three thousand foot, and foure hundred horse.

The fifteenth of the said moneth, the towne being reduced to that estate, as without succors it must needs yeeld of it selfe, the Cardinall in the morning casts two artificiall bridges vpon the riuer of Somme, where through the fauour of his forces and cannon he C passeth two thousand, fixe hundred men, amongst which were eight hundred choise captaines, to thrust themselves into the towne, and about two of the clocke he shewes himselfe in the view of Long-pré, with an order which in shew did promise a generous attempt. But the diligence of his Maiesties courage without feare, and the wise order hee presently gaue at his arrival, changed their braue countenance into a cowardly and base feare. The King leaues three thousand men to guard the trenches against the sallies of the towne: he presently marcheth with all his troopes to the place of battell, and plants his Cannon to his best advantage.

The Artillery of the besieged and of them that came to succor them, thunders, but they D passe ouer his Maiesties esquadrons. Our men during this siege haue bene well acquainted with the shot of the Cannon, but they stand firme like rockes. They tyre the enemy with continuall skirmishes, the Cannon mightily annoyes them, the admirable government of the Leader, and the firme resolution of the assailants doth so terrifie them, as at the first attempt they thinke of a retreat, and presently they retire to the quarter where the Kings light horse did lodge by the riuers side. The foure aboue named Colonels hauing discouered the Cardinals Stratagem, charged them that came to succor the towne, kill, take, & force the whol body to repasse the riuer in disorder, and to abandon their bridges. The King seeing the enemy lodged alongst the riuer, passeth three cannons ouer the water, shootes at them, and doth annoy their lodging, and remaining all night on the place of battell, abates the ioy which the besieged had shewne by the number of fires which E they had made. So the Cardinall seeing all his attempts fruitlesse, in stead of turning head to the towne, or against the French troopes, he begins very early in the morning to retire and to take an other lodging on the mountaine of Vignancourt.

The King follows him with foure thousand horse, and twelve thousand foot, lodgeth vpon the next hill and a great valley betwixt them, continues foure or fixe houres in battell before their army, prouokes them by his Cannon and continuall skirmishes, views all their forces, number, forme and countenance, and seeing them disposed to retire, determines to charge them in their lodging. But it is good sometimes to make a bridge of gold to a flying enemy. Moreover, it was a great glory for his Maiesty to haue shamefully chased him away, without raising the siege from so great a towne, and to haue pursued F him with the Cannon three Leagues.

They take a contrary way, and couer the right wing of their army, which lay next to the French, with their waggons chained together, they cause their horse to aduance into the head of the army in forme of a halfe moone, and their foot into battalions, diuided into forward, battell and reuerward: they place their Cannon in the head of these esquadrons, in this sort they place their troopes, and their baggage in safety, making a shew sometimes as if they would charge. But seeing, that to come to the gates of the City besieged, they must force through the Kings army, which being in battell did fight with their countenances and gesture, they haue no will to attempt this passage, and by their speedy retreat, giue all France an assured hope to be soone freed from this strange nation, which sought to ruine it. The besieged are now forced to yeeld to the victors law. This shamefull retreat hath ouerthrowne their first resolution. Their practices, inuentions, engines, their incredible labour to cast vp earth, their many Cannons, their deepe trenches, their continuall watching, nor the strength of the place, could not keepe the assaillants from lodging vpon their rampier and ravelin, and so neare, as they came to handy blows. So two daies after, the Marquis of Montenegro, who commanded in the towne after the death of Hernand, doth promise to yeeld the place, if within six daies he be not succoured with two thousand horse that should enter into the towne.

Amiens yeeld
ed and the Spaniards depart.

So was it said, and so done. The time inquired the Cardinall, and gaue him leasure, being with all his forces within feuen leagues of the towne, but he had neither will nor power to relieue them. And therefore according to the capitulation made the nineteenth, that the souldiers should depart with their armes, their matches light, their colours flying, and drums sounding, with their horse and baggage, and whatsoever they could cary away of theirs: the 25 of the moneth, his Maiefty hauing put his army in battell, sent the Constable, the Marshall of Biron, the Duke of Montbascon, and the Lord of Vicques to the Port of Beauuais where the garison should come forth, who comming to the gate, the bridge is let downe, and the Marquis comes forth on horse-backe alone, but followed by a hundred and thirty horse, and as many Harguebuziers on foot for the guard of his person. They receiue him, and conduct him to his Maiefty, who attended him halfe a league from the towne: the King was accompanied with his white Cornet, wherein were about seuentene hundred horse, and fue hundred Suisses, hauing about him the Prince of Conty, the Dukes of Montpensier, Neuers, and Nemours, the Prince of Ioinuille, the Marshalls of France, and other Noblemen in great numbers, mounted vpon goodly Couriers with rich caparisons: he doth embrace him most graciously, and then dismisseth him. He goes to horse, and by the Kings commandement, the Constable conducts him two leagues vnto the confines of the King of Spaines territories.

All the Spanish Capitaines and others both horse and foot, passing by his Maiefty, light from their horses and kisse his boote, with great humility and reuerence, and follow their Leaders, being receiued by the King with courteous words. After the Marquis and his guard, followed about 1000 women of bale quality, amongst the which some foure hundred of the towne marched willingly, a hundred and threecore waggons, laden with all kinde of baggage, and vpon them about 300 men sicke of the plague, and wounded, foureene hundred shot, and six hundred corslets well appointed, and in the end ten companies of horse, six of men at armes Lancers, and foure of Carabius, which made in all about fue hundred horse.

The King hauing not by policy, but by the most memorable attempt, and the greatest glory of armes that might be, pulled this strong Towne out of the strangers paws, without the recovery whereof he was in danger to be lost, and plunged in the gulfe of miseries: he entred the same day into Amiens towards night, triumphant and victorious, as into his owne towne recovered from the enemy, accompanied with a thousand gentlemen on horse-backe, and receiued with a wonderfull ioy and applause of all the people: he lighted at our Ladyes Church, and caused solemne thanks to be giuen to God: hee placed twenty companies of foot, and three of horse in Garison, and gaue the Government thereof to the Lord of Vicques. Doublesse, O Lord, wee haue reason herein to admire the wonders of thy mercy! The supprise of this place seemed late a Charybdis, to swallow vp the greatest part of France. But it is not now alone, that the iudgments of God doe make vs know, that if he puls vs downe with one hand, hee raiseth vs vp with the other; and if we be vpon the brink of our destruction, he retires vs by the hand to saue vs. So his prouidence subuerted the designs of the Spaniard, who by this trophie promised to extend his conquests, & recouer those places and prouinces which he had lost. So from the trouble bred by the enemies of this estate, grew the aduancement of our quiet, from their pernicious practices, the assurance of the country, & seding of inconstant minds from their vniust attempts & violence: one of the greatest actions that hath been of long time for the good of France, and preservation of this Monarchy. The losse of Amiens was shamefull, but the recovery glorious: the taking strange, but the reduction admirable, at his enemies

A enemies nose, and in view of his armie. Finally, a reduction, which giues as much consolation as the inuasion brought desolation.

The Cardinals retreat puts the King in hope, that God would doe him iustice, for the wrongs that he and his had done vnto his Realme: with this designe hee marcheth with his troopes, and 18 peeces of Cannon to Dourlans, into the which the Cardinall in passing had put some of the best men of his army, with a great conuoy of victuals and munition of warre. He presents himselfe, and seekes by all means to draw them out of the precinct of their walles. But being loth to aduenture any thing, his Maiesty passeth into Arthois, fills the Country with feare and terrour, goes vnto the gates of Arras, into the which the Cardinall had shut himselfe, dischargeth fue, and twenty or thirty volleies of Cannon, makes a stand there: and by all the deuices which a generous and warlike mind may inuent, he seekes to draw him to fallly forth, and to see some braue exploit of his men at armes.

Roades into Arthois.

In the end, his Maiesty not able by any stratagem to heat these cold humors which did freeze their hearts through feare, the rest of his victorious army, after so great toyle, endured in so long and painfull a siege, the raine and the sharpnesse of winter which approached called him backe to prouide for a people, who by the negligence of their owne health, had lately, as it were, enclosed within their walls the destiny of France, and to passe into Britany, to finish that great worke, for the restoring of this Monarchy, that afterwards he might with all his forces, set vpon the common enemy of his Estate, if the negotiation of peace betwixt these two mighty warriors, practised by the Pope, a common father, did not take effect.

retreat.

But before we proceed, let vs see the last acts of the Tragedy that was played in Sauoy. The discomforts of the lodging of Pont-Charra, caused the Kings army to winter about Grenoble, and the extraordinary Snow stops the passages from Daulphiné into Sauoy. The Duke of Sauoy embraceth the time and occasion, to recouer the Country of Mauryenne. He parts in February with twelve Cannons, and by the induction of Albigny, camps before Aiguebelle. At the first brute hereof, Des Diguieres sent the Lord of Crequy, vnder the authority of Lieutenant general for the King in Sauoy: hee causeth him to passe the rough and steepe mountaines on foot, where through the rigor of the season, appeared no traces of man on the side of Puissigny, to march more safely, accompanied onely with feuen or eight Gentlemen. He arriues happily at S. Iohn of Mauryenne, findes that the Seigneur of Pasquieres, commanding in the said place, had fortified the approaches of the bridges of Amefrex and Hermillon with good barricadoes, and finished them with speed. The sixt of March the Duke puts his Cannon in battery, and the next day Arce Captaine of the said place, yeelds it vpon composition not to ioyne with Crequy but to returne towards Grenoble. They supposed this place would haue held at the least fixe weekes: and the Sauoisien, to decieve the Seigneur of Crequy, being lodged but three leagues from him, continues shooting his Cannon into the aire, to persuade him that the place was not yet yeilded. Crequy abused by this stratagem of Albigny, marcheth with a good troope of foot, to take some lodging from the enemy, thinking that Aiguebelle did yet hold good. But God will haue man to know that he is man, and that his condition makes him subiect to the chances of this world. Hee findes the Duke before him, being dillogged, the eight of the moneth, and thinking it some troope gone forth to the warre, he aduanceth neere, and with a furious charge seekes to open a way through the enemy. The whole army comes vpon him, and as hee thinks to recouer his Barricadoes by the sides of the hills, as they gaue him hope, hee findes the snow had stopp the passages, and finally compassed in on all sides, hee is forced to take a Law from the stronger, and by his imprisonment to redeeme the liberty of Pasquieres, his Captains and souldiers. The duke proceedes, and taking all Mauryenne, by composition, makes great designs vpon the towne of Grenoble, by the means of a fort which he had built to cower his Country on the side of Montmelian and Chambery.

Crequy taken Prisonier.

The fort was vpon the frontier of Daulphiné, about a quarter of a League within the Kings Country towards Grenoble, vpon the side of a hill above the village of Barreaux, kept by Bellegarde a Gentleman of Sauoy, with feuen companies of foot, and furnished with all munition necessary, but made rather by ostentation (hauing as a great wonder sent the plot therefore almost to all the Potentates of Christendome) then by any necessity,

Printed Saint Bartholomew

Grenoble did wonderfully apprehend this eye-fore, and Des Dignieres having dispersed the Kings army for to winter, framed many designes and enterprises at Grenoble vpon this fort (the which, for that it was made defensible the eue before S. Bartholomewes day, the Duke called it by that name), and had attempted it by siege, if he had not beene pressed with the want of the chiefe finewes of war. In the end, vrged by his duty, and moued by the misery of his Maiesties subiects, and pressed with the iust entreaties of the chiefe Officers, both of Iustice and of policy within the country of Daulphine, he learns of many fault-finders that came forth, the estate of the place, with the forces that kept it, and sends off B ten to view it in the night.

He is informed that it may be taken by Scalado in two places, at a corner on the right hand going from Grenoble, and on that side which looks towards Isere, the earth being not yett above two fadome and a halfe high. Hee causeth the troops nearest to Grenoble to approach, makes them to passe ouer the bridge into the towne, and saines that all the rest shall make the same passage, to goe into Maurienne, where the army of Sauoy was. But the fourteenth of March, on Palme Sunday Eue, he secretly puts some petards into a boate, and thirty ladders, necessary for the execution, and at the same instant hee causeth his troops to repasse in the night in boats prepared to that end, to take from them of the fort all knowledge that they were on their side, whereby they might haue occasion C to call for supplies from Montmelian or Chambery. Things thus disposed he parts from Grenoble the five and twentieth of the said moneth in the morning, ioynes at a Village called Lombin, with such as he had appointed for this execution, making about three hundred horse, and a thousand or twelue hundred foot, diuided into foure troops, commanded by the Seigneurs of Morges, of Hercules, Lieutenant of Des Dignieres company of men at armes, of Auria, and of Maurieu, ensigne to S. Iulian: he calls these Commanders apart, acquaints them with this designe, to set vpon the fort the night following, and arises there about eleuen of the clocke at night. The Captaines appointed to plant the Petards and the ladders, performe their charge with an incredible resolution, notwithstanding the alarme which those of the fort had taken, by reason of the fires indiscreetly kindled by their boyes. The Petards worke their effect happily, one at the false gate which looks towards Grenoble, and the other at the principall Port towards Montmelian: the alarm growes hot on all sides, so as they within the Fort knew not which side to guard. They mount to the scalado: some ladders are ouerthrown, and with their shot they seeke to repulse the assailants, who get vp and come to handy blowes: the weakest must yeeld to the stronger. The enemies fought to make a new head: but after some little resistance they slew a hundred of them, and the rest leaped ouer the rampier where the alarm was least violent. Bellegard and some others remained prisoners: of seven ensignes five were sent vnto the King, the two others were lost in the heat of the assault. They found there six peeces of battery, and three for the field, with great store of powder, lead, match, & come, which had bene so many scourges against the vniust usurpations of the Sauoifien, if the reduction of the Duke of Mercœur, and that which remained to conquer in Britany had not laide their armes aside, and aduanced the Treaties which were made for the tranquillity of their estates.

The Kings authority had for nine years been banished out of such places as the Duke of Mercœur held in Britany: This Province was a prey for such as enriched themselves with the miserable spoiles thereof: the people hauing nothing left them but their voice, wished to see themselves freed from the tyranny of many vicious men, and without mercy; and to talke with many others, the effects of the Kings clemency and bounty: and his Maiesty grieved infinitely to see them afflicted, and not able to relieue them, for the vrgent necessity of his affaires. But after a storm comes a sun-shine. The Duke of Mercœur had often giuen hope of his submission & obedience; but the places of his command, and the quality of his person, in his opinion deserued a voyage thither. Our Henry is not sloathfull in that which concerns the good of his realme, and the great loue he bare to the ease and health of his subiects, who with a generall voyce giue him that fauourable title of Father of his people, and made them willingly to exceede the bounds of modesty.

At the onely brute of his coming, the Lords of Heurtault, and La Houffaye, S. O. fange

A fange, commanding at Rochefort vpon Loire, knowing that the D. of Mercœur was ready to free himselfe from the Spaniard, and to bee reconciled to his Maiesty, they cast themselves at the Kings feet, beseeching him to receive and accept of them as his most humble seruants and subiects, & that it would please him in that quality to continue them in the command of the said place: to appoint what garison hee pleased for the good of his seruice: to grant them a pardon for their taking of armes, and all other things which had followed vnder the authority of the Dukes of Mayenne and Mercœur, whom they had acknowledged for the heads of the Vnion: and with that capitulation they bring to the Kings obedience, the places of S. Symphorian and Rochefort.

B Plessis of Cosne at the same instant yeelded the town and Castle of Craon to his Maiesties seruice. But the surprixe of Dinan by them of S. Malo, one of the strongest places of Britany, in the which the said Duke put his greatest hope, forced him to fly to his Maiesties mercy. There is no cause so bad but may be shadowed with some apparant reasons. The Duke of Mercœur giues his Maiesty vnderstand, as well for himselfe, as for those that shall submit themselves vnder his Maiesties obedience, that the zeale of the Catholike religion, the respect of the good of the Realme, whereof he had alwaies desired the preferuation, and feared the dismembring, the danger into the which Britany was brought, when as the King encountered the Spanish violences vpon the frontier of Picardy, the intelligences of the greatest of the Prouince with the enemy, the means they had to make diuers enterprizes, and to draw in forces to the great preiudice of the Crown and State, had caused him to continue so long in armes after his Maiesties reconciliation with the Pope: and therefore hee beseecheth him most humbly to take knowledge of his good will, and to countenance and vse him as his most faithfull seruant and subiect.

His Maiesty had alwaies wished, that God would giue him the grace, to end the troubles of his Realme, rather by a voluntary obedience of all his subiects, then by force and necessity of armes: that the last come might taste the same fruits, which his bounty shewed to those that had formerly returned to their obedience. So the said Duke of Mercœur, the Clergie, Officers, Gentlemen, and other persons of all qualities and conditions, making their due submission, and taking the oath of fealty, the King made the Edict which followeth.

An Edict made by the King vpon the Articles granted to the Duke of Mercœur vpon his reduction to his Maiesties obedience.

HENRY by the Grace of God, &c. We haue alwaies desired that God would giue vs the grace to end the troubles of this Realme, rather by a voluntary obedience of all our subiects, then by the force and necessity of armes, to the end the last come might E enjoy the same fruits of our bounty, which the first which returned to their duties, haue received: The which hath so happily succeeded by the reduction of our deare and welbeloued cousin the Duke of Mercœur, (who hath shewed himselfe so willing to yeeld vs the obedience which he owes, with all those that were in armes with him,) as wee haue cause to rest content and satisfied: to approue the zeale which hee hath shewed to Religion, and to excuse our Cousin for that he hath continued so long in armes after our reconciliation with the Pope, and the coming of our deare and welbeloued Cousin the Cardinal of Florence, his Legate into this Realme; hauing giuen vs to vnderstand, that he was kept from making of this Declaration, for considerations which concerne the good of this Realme: whereof he hath alwaies desired the preferuation, and feared the dismembring, especially to preserve our Prouince of Britany from the danger whereinto F it was reduced, when as we were buied vpon the frontiers of Picardy, to repulse our enemies, by reason of the intelligences which the greatest had in the said Country, and the means to attempt and draw in forces, to the preiudice of our seruice, and of the Estate. By means whereof, wee desire to acknowledge his good will, and to loue and intreat him hereafter as our good kinsman and faithfull subiect, inclining vnto the humble request which he hath made vnto vs, as well for himselfe, as for those which shall returne with him vnto our obedience.

To this Edict the King annexed many Articles, by the which hee forbade the exercise of the reformed Religion in the Towne and Suburbs of Nantes, or within three leagues thereof. He did acknowledge the Duke of Mercœur with all that had assisted him and should submit themselves with him vnto his Maiesties obedience, for his good subiects and faithfull seruants, taking the oath of alleageance, and making the submission required, after which they should be restored to all their goods, offices, benefices, charges and dignities, notwithstanding any Grant to the contrary, all which hee did presently reuoke. That no Clergi-men of Britany, which had payed their Tenths to the Receiueurs of eyther party, should be called in question for what was past, and should likewise be eased for the Arrearages which they did owe. That all officers of Iustice, or of the Treasure, which had bene made by the duke during the troubles, should bee maintained in their places in taking letters of prouision from his Maiesty. That neither the Duke, nor any other which had followed and assisted him, should bee called in question for any thing which had been committed during those troubles, if they came with him to submit themselves vnder the Kings authority, the memory whereof was suppressed and extinct. The Duke and all which had assisted him, were discharged of all impositions and leuies of money. There were many other Articles for the freeing of the Duke of Mercœur, and those of his partie, and for the settling of the quiet estate of Britany, the which the curious Reader may finde more at large in the Original.

So our King about all the Princes of the earth, got this commendation, to haue exceeded in wisdom, valour and clemency. The whole Prouince, not by a politicke necessitie (which disposeth people to the obedience of their Soueraigne Princes) but as it were appointed by God to command ouer them, acknowledged our Henry for their Soueraigne King, protested to liue and die in the obedience which loyall and faithfull subiects owe vnto their supreme Lord. And by this milde re-union of the members with their head, of the parts with the whole, forgetting the bitterness of the fore-past warre, he dispersed the confusions and disorders, which threatened to bury him vnder the common ruines of these vnciuill troubles.

So in the end, after so many labours, which Hercules could hardly haue surmounted, so many toyles, vnder which Atlas would haue shrunk, the minds of the French vnited, their affections mutually conioyned by a strict bond of loue, vnder the obedience of their King, and all the forces of the chiefe Kingdomes of Christendome, were ready to fall vpon the common enemy of his Estate. But you haue fought enough: the blood of your subiects, oh Princes, hath bene too outrageously spilt in your Champion fields: the furies of your armes haue wonderfully amazed your subiects. Shew your felues hereafter to be pastors and fathers of nations, which reuerence the beauty of your Diademes. Let the seas, riuers and mountaines, which be as a barre betwixt the territories of your Dominions, limit hereafter the greatness of your ambition. Heauen, the Iudge of controuersies, doth pronounce that sweet and sacred name of Peace. A name which cannot displease any, but such as take delight in blood, spoile, and fire: and (hating nothing of a man but the name) breathing out nothing but impiety, licentiousnesse, and iniustice. So after a long treaty betwixt the Deputies of both Kings, in the end a peace was concluded at Veruins, as you may read in the following Discourse.

A CONTINUATION OF THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF FRANCE,

from the beginning of the Treatie of Veruins, in the yeare 1578, vnto these times. Collected out of PETER MATHEVV, and other Authors that haue written of this subiect.

HE ciuill warres of France being ended, all the Kings rebellious subiects, & the reuolted Prouinces reduced to his obedience, God disposed the hearts of the Kings of France and Spaine, to a generall peace, for the good of their subiects, who had bene long oppressed with the spoiles and miseries of bloody warre. God stirred vp Pope Clement the eight, who powred balme into the wounds of France, not like vnto his Predecessors (who reioycied at her afflictions, and sought to make them incurable, applying no other remedies but fire and sword.) Hee (like another Hercules) fought to calme the stormes which troubled both Land and Sea: he shewed himselfe a common father of Christians, a Mediator of Peace and Vnion, at such a time as necessity and the estate of their affaires made them to desire rest. To this end he lets Henry the fourth King of France and of Nauarre, vnderstand by Alexander of Medicis, Cardinall of Florence, then his Legate in France, and doth aduertise Philip the second King of Spaine, by his Nuncio: that it was now time to lay aside all passions of hatred and reuenge, to resume peacefull spirits, and to ioyne together against the common enemy of Christendome, who only made his profit of their ruines. That their subiects had bene sufficiently drunke with the blood, gall and vinegar of discord, and that it was requisite to refresh them now with the sweet wine of peace.

These two Princes were too high minded, to demand a peace one of another. There must bee a third person, to vnite these two extreames. But there must be some one to make this entrance, and to bee as it were an Interpreter of their intentions. To this end, the Pope makes choyce of F. Bonauenture Calatagione, Generall of the Order of the Franciscans or Grey Friars, to acquaint these two Kings with this holy and charitable perswasions vnto peace. Religious men had bene actors in this warre, they are now held necessary for the peace. Spirits separated from the troubles and confusions of the world, are most fit for such negotiations, being lesse transported with violent passions.

The King of Spaine did not attend to haue the Pope exhort him vnto peace. He had begun his reigne by war against the French, he would now end it by a peace with them. He was now leuenty yeeres old, being desirous to discharge himselfe of the heauy burthen of so many kingdomes, and to leaue them quiet to his sonne. To this end, he must marry his daughter Donna Isabella, who remaining in Spaine, without a husband, might contend for the succession of the Crowne, with Don Philip her brother. He could not giue her lesse for her dowry, then the Kingdom of Portugal, or the Low-Countries, with the Countie of Burgundy. By the one, he did weaken and diuide his Estates, and by the other, he gaue his daughter meanes to contend for her portion in Spaine. For it was impossible to reigne long in Prouinces diuided by irreconcilable warre, hauing two mighty neighbours for enemies. And therefore to assure Spaine, he must marry the Infanta: and to confirme that which hee gaue vnto her in marriage, it was necessary to conclude a peace with the French King, and to banish those vaine imaginations of the conquest of an Estate, the which will alwaies grow great, by the encrease of Concord: and fortified with armes and iuincible spirits, supports it selfe against any violence that shall seeke to supplant it. Being thus resolu'd of a peace, he desires to vnderstand the opinion of his Councell.

Reasons that moued the King of Spaine to a peace.

This resolution to have a peace was iust, and all things shewed a necessity inseparable with iustice. The King of Spaine (to whom this was well knowne) had no need of any other counsell, for that his Councillors for the most part did hold, that his Estates could not continue in peace, vnlesse that France were at warre, and that they must alwaies maintaine a diuision in that Estate, whose forces are so mighty and warlike. Yet would he haue it resolved on in Councell, in the presence of the Prince his sonne, and the Infanta. The Prince transported with the courage of his great and high resolutions, had no other thoughts but to continue his fathers conquests.

The Prince of Spaine calls the counsell of peace.

This peace being propounded in counsell, euery one spake not what hee thought the best, but rather to please the Prince (who valued resolution more then wisdom, and the dangers of warlike enterprises, more then the assurance of a happy peace) there is no place whereas dissembling should haue lesse credit then in a Princes Councell. But Christopher de Mors, holding it the chiefe and essentiall vertue of a Councillor, to speake the truth, and that it belonged to none but vile and base spirits to lie: hee fortified his opinion with the best reasons he could, to induce the yong Prince to like of the proposition of Peace: the which he knew the King held to be iust and necessary, and that in this necessity, wise men found the surest law of their conduct, and the felicity of an Estate. You may read his discourse at large in the Originall. For which liberty of speech, contrary to the Princes humor (who shewed by his countenance, that such as loued peace were not his friends) de Mors was disgraced with bitter words, and commanded not to come in his presence: but he was restored againe into fauour by the Kings command, hauing made his excuse vnto the Prince, for that hee had spoken the truth too boldly, for the good of the peace.

Mors disgraced by the Prince of Spaine.

The King of Spaine (to preuent all priuate passions, which do alwaies corrupt counsels in publicke affaires, being vnwilling to haue it treated of in Spain) commanded the Infanta Isabella, to aduise Alberus the Archduke (then Gouvernour in the Low-Countries, to whom the was promised) to make some ouerture of an accord, and to found the mindes of the French. Shee (who was Daughter to the generous Princeesse, whom Spaine called the Queene of Peace) inuited the Archduke to imploy his counsell and meanes for the building of this Temple, proceeding with a good intention, and sincerity of zeale. The Archduke (who found no better rampart to defend the Low-Countries, then a peace) makes shew to haue no other thought in his heart, nor any word more ordinary in his mouth, then peace: greewing to see the misery of the warres, and that two of the greatest Princes of Christendome (whereof the one might serue as a sword, and the other as a Target against the power of the Ottomans) should bee so ready to ruine one another.

The Archduke applies all his munde to a Peace.

This conceit, that the Archduke, desired a Peace, did purchase him the loue of those people, ouer whom he should command in regard of his mariage: it confirmed him in the good liking of the King of Spaine, seeing that he did apply himself wholly vnto his humor, and did wondrously content the Infanta, who desired to bee married with a beneficiall peace. All Europe aspired to this general good. Those which were farthest off, held it iust: the neighbours profitable, and such as were interested, necessary: and this interest did not only concerne the French and the Spanish, but all neighbour States, whom it did much import to see a peace concluded.

The Archduke sends armes vnto the king.

The Archduke discouers the Kings disposition, by Monsieur de Sancerre, Agent at Brussels for Queene Elizabeth Dowager of France. Who coming to Montceaux presented the King with rich armes, which the Archduke had caused to bee made for him at Brussels, and withall hee gaue him charge to say vnto the King, that hee lamented to see the continuance of a warre so preiudiciall to two of the greatest Christian Princes, and so profitable to the common enemy of Christendome. That if it pleased him to hearken vnto a peace, his will should bee soone followed by the effect: offering all his vowes and seruice to the king of Spaine his vnkle, to make him resolute to a perfect & assured peace, wherewith Sancerre acquainted his Maiesty, after the deliuey of his armes, saying "That the Archduke was a Prince full of holy resolution for the general good of Christendom, who lamenting the affaires of Christian Princes, which went to ruine by their discord, had commanded him to vnderstand his Maiesties pleasure, if hee would enter into any treaty of peace, the onely and last support of Christendome."

The first entrance of a peace.

The

A The King received the Present graciously, and hauing awhile considered of the proposition (made vnto him by Sancerre) he answered, That he had neuer yet tasted the sweetnesse of peace, desiring greatly to know what it was, not so much for his owne ease, as for the good of his subiects: and although he had alwaies loued war, yet had he neuer refused peace: that he was not insensible of the miseries of this diuision, and had often lamented so much blood vnprofitably spilt, & the weakening of the chiefe pillars of Christendome. That he had not entered into this war but for a iust and necessary defence, all Europe hauing seene the King of Spaine to raise the greatest forces of the world, yet and his owne subiects against him, and that there was no war more iust, then to recouer that, which was vnjustly vltured. Yet notwithstanding, all these considerations should not hinder his inclination to a peace. But he could not easily beleue, that the Archduke had any such desire, hauing so many Spaniards about him, who would neuer counsell him to make any warre but in France.

1598

This holy resolution was imparted vnto the Archduke, and by him to the King of Spaine, who doubted that a Prince borne and bred vp in armes, hardened in the exercise of warre, and prosperous in his proceedings, would giue care to a peace: and although the good of his Realme, might draw him to this resolution, yet such as had counselled him to proclaim war against him, when as his affaires were most desperate: euen when as foure or fise Dukes his subiects were in armes against him, would not aduise him now to make a peace, when as all France was reduced vnder his obedience. He therefore commands the Archduke to proceed warily and easily and wisely, and not to doe any thing that might be dishonorable in seeking of a peace.

The King of Spaine doubts of a peace.

The Archduke knowing that the Kings inclination to a peace, proceeding from his owne proper motion, and from the best aduice of his seruants (who held a long want to be as ruinous for France, as a long peace is hurtfull to a warlike nation) continued his first motion, sending backe Sancerre vnto the King who was then at Rouan, to speake more openly and plain y vnto him, and to vnderstand his Maiesties pleasure, in what towne vpon the frontiers the Deputies of either side might assemble. This negotiation was not managed by letters, but by instructions, and by one man onely: the which was kept so secret, as on the Kings part, no man was acquainted therewith, but Villeroy (the Oracle of the secrets of this Estate) neither would the Archduke trust to any one but himself and the Duke of Sora, master of his horse, to the end that Spaine should not know any thing but what pleased him, when need should require. If matters had beene managed more openly, they might haue proued lesse successfull. These Princes wanted not spirits of diuision about them which blamed this peace. There were some in Spaine which maintained, that the lawes of Religion and conscience, would not allow them to lay downe armes, vnill that France were reduced vnder one Religion: and that it were dishonorable for so warlike a nation as Spaine, to demand a peace of them which had proclaimed warre against them. In France some cried out that they should make no peace with Spaine, without satisfaction for Milan, Naples, Flanders and Nauarre. Those which did second this good worke with their grane and wise counsell, were men full of affection to the publike good, and capable of the remedies of this diuision. The President Richarot was the first to whom the Archduke imparted this secret, and the King would haue Belieure his chiefe Councillor of State acquainted therewith, vnto whom Sancerre imparted the order and state of the business. This done, he returned to the Archduke to Bruxelles, carrying with him a resolution of the Kings pleasure: whereupon the Archduke commanded him to conduct the Generall of the Friars into France, being then come out of Spaine.

All in peace penckens into a walkenation.

Diuers opinions of the peace.

The Generall acquainted the King with the commandment he had received from the Pope, to passe into Spaine to dispose the Catholike King to a good and holy peace, whereby the forces and wills of all Christians might be vnted against the common enemy, who made his profit of this miserable diuision: that the King of Spaine for seeing it well, and lamenting this general desolation, had said vnto him, that hee desired a peace: which by his will should be firme and durable, for the recovery of that which discord had caused the Christian Princes to lose, desiring not onely to treat a reconciliation of friendship betwix the two Crownes, but also to preuent all occasions of future warre: And to this end, he had giuen all his power to the Archduke his Nephew, who was a Prince desirous of peace.

The

The King answered: That he was desirous of a peace, neither would he prescribe him any other conditions, then the honour and iudice of his pretensions, the which hee held so assured, as no man might call them in question. The Generall of the Franciscans assured him, that the King of Spaine would give him all the contentment hee could expect from a iust Prince. Reason which alwaies finds place in generous minds, and Necessity whose stings (when shee is moued) are very violent, made these two Princes lay downe armes, to releue their subiects, tired with miseries and publike oppressions. These first hopes of a peace, did but begin to appeare when as the King was aduertised of the surprize of Amiens. This was a frost which nipt all the hope of this first seed, a winde which blew away all the flowers of this yong plant. The Generall of the Friars returnes into France to assure the King, that if it pleased him, the raking of Amiens should not hinder the peace. The King answered, that hee himselfe wronged in this proposition, that he neither could nor would hearken vnto it: and that hee neuer did any thing by constraint: neither were matters now fit for an accord. I will not (saith he) that they demand a peace of me in a brauery, I will neuer yeeld vnto it by force. Wee will talke more, when I haue recovered Amiens, Calais, and Ardres: and so hee sent backe the Generall of the Friars, to the amazement of the enemy, who did admire the Kings noble resolution, (which like vnto the ancient Romances) was more admirable in Aduersity then Prosperity.

A iust peace is dualc.

Amiens being recovered, and the Pope foreseeing by the continuance of the Kings victories, that it would produce no other effects but a weakening of the whole body, hee conuises the two Kings anew, by the apprehension of the publike miseries, and the pitifull estate of Christian affaires, to agree and to resume their chiefe inclinations to peace. He commands his Legate to dispose them to some conference, whereby hee might discomie who was to be blamed, and who failed in his affection, for the generall good of a peace. The Legate goes to S. Quentin: the Generall of the Friars comes thither vnto him and beseecheth him, to be a means vnto the King, to send some man of credit, with whom they might conferre of a treaty. The king sent the President Sillery, with an expresse commandement, not to consent to any treaty of a peace, but vpon assurance to haue those townes yielded vp, which were held by the King of Spaine. The Popes Legate, the President Sillery, and the Generall of the Friars met at Saint Quentin: the greatest difficulty at this first entrance, was for the restitution of places. The Generall of the Friars said, that the King Spaine would not purchase a peace at so deare a rate. Sillery answered, that the King of Spaine did giue nothing of his owne, but did only yeeld vp that which he could not keepe, the King hauing made proofe by the recovery of Amiens, what hee might expect of the other places. And if they desired a good and a durable peace, they must make it iust: for else it could not continue. That there was nothing more iust, then restitution, nor more honourable then to leaue that willingly which they could not hold by force: That the King had expressly forbidden him to consent to any Treaty, nor to the choise of any place for an assembly, before hee had Assurance of this restitution: that hee held it a wrong done vnto the dignity of so great a Prince, to the honor of his commandements, to the equity of his cause, and to his good fortune, once to hearken vnto the difficulties they made to yeeld him vp that which was his owne: That whoeuer should treat with this preiudice, deferred to be punished as the authors of Treaties, that were dishonorable to their Masters.

The Generall of the friars (who could not get any other resolution at his hands) returned twice into Flanders, to let them vnderstand, that among all the reasons of the Treaty, that of restitution was inuincible: that it was in vain to demand a peace of the French, if they did not restore all. That this restitution was the soule of the Treaty, without the which it was a fantaslike body, without any naturall proportion and substance: That in the end, desiring too much, they should haue nothing: and thinking to hold all, they would lose all. The Archduke doth aduertise the King of Spaine, that there was no meanes to enter into the Temple of peace, but by opening of the gates of Calais, Ardres, Doullans, and other places (taken in warre) vnto the French King. God inspired the heart of the King of Spaine, against the opinion of his Councell of State, to yeeld vp all his pretensions for the good of a peace; rather then to leaue the world in this perpetuall discord and confusion.

Hee

A He did consult with his Councell of conscience, vpon the necessity of this restitution. They answered him, that he could not liue with a quiet soule, nor die in the integrity of his religion, if he did not restore those places. The King of Spaine followed this aduice, aduertising the Archduke, that he would not, for that which hee had gotten from another, lose the meanes to leaue a peace to his owne Estates. Vpon this resolution, the Generall of the Friars returnes into France, and passeth his word vnto the Legate and Sillery, for the restitution: so as after an infinite toyle of two months, these three made all things ready for a Treaty.

The King of spaine resolves

places.

Sillery returnes to the King, leading with him the Generall of the Friars, as well to let him vnderstand from the Kings owne mouth, what hee had said vnto him by his commandement, as also to haue the Generall tell the King what he had promised, and propounded on the Archdukes behalfe. The Legate remained at Saint Quentin, as gardian of the words and intentions of two Princes. Being assured of eithers faith, they agree vpon a place for the Assembly of the Deputies, and to conclude the treaty. The Towne of Veruins (being vnder the Kings obedience, and neare vnto the Frontiers of Artois) was found the most commodious, and was presently furnished with all things necessary to receiue the Ambassadors. The King deputed Pompeo of Belicure Knight, Lord of Grignon, the chiefe and most ancient of his Priuy Councell, and Nicholas Brulart Knight, Lord of Sillery, Councellour of State to his Maiesty, and President in his Court of Parliament. For the King of Spaine and the Archduke, there came John Richardot Knight, President of the Kings Priuy Councell, and of his Councell of State: Iohn Baptista Taxa Knight, Commander of los Santos, of the military order of Saint James, and Councellour of State, and of the Councell of war: and Lewis Ferrichen Knight, Audiencer and chiefe Secretary and Tresurer of the Charters of the Councell of State, men of great experience and approved fidelity. The Cardinall Medici, Legate of the holy Sea, assisted by the Bishop of Mantoua, was as it were an Vmper of all difficulties in this good and holy reconciliation. The Kings Deputies arised first, and those of the King of Spaine presently after, where hauing saluted one another with their hearts full of ioy and incredible content, they promised to treat roundly, sincerely, and mildly, communicating their commissions one vnto another, and reforming those errors which they found, that they might begin to treat more safely and freely. After much question, and many protestations made by the Deputies of the King of Spaine for the precedence, in the end they yeelded vnto the French Kings, to take what place they pleased, after the Legate, and the Popes Nuncio. At their first sitting, the Legate exhorts them to shew their fidelity and integrity in this action which their Masters desired, whereof he assured himselfe by their experiences, as of those which had happily managed the greatest affaires of Europe; more then any other men: wishing them to consider, that hauing the honour to counsell two of the greatest Princes of the world (who submitted their wills vnto their counsels, as the most diuine thing among men, when it is purged from ambitious passions, violent thoughts, and preiudicial opinions) they should omit nothing that might regard the contentment of their good intentions, and not to doubt, but that God, who hath an especiall care of Kings and Kingdomes, would insufe the light of his Spirit into their most secret thoughts, and threaten them with the severity of his Iustice, if they did not apply all their endeavors to his glory, and the good of the Christian Common-weale.

Then they entered into treaty with a mildnesse fit for men of that quality, and the merit of the subiect. It was managed with such secrecy, as nothing was knowne before that all was concluded. The chiefe point of difficulty was, for the restitution of places. Many reasons were propounded on either side, but the Kings Deputies had great aduantages: the force of reason: the prosperity of affaires in the recovery of Amiens: and above all, the fauour of the time and occasion. The King of Spaine would not dye but in peace: he desired his Sonne might raigne in peace, and that his dearly beloued daughter might be married in peace. The Archduke languished with a desire to be married: & fearing lest the promise which he had (not taking effect) during the life of the King of Spain the conditions would be made worse, he pressed Richardot and Taxis, not to proceed in this negotiation after the Spanish manner, but to remember, that they must not prolong their consultations, nor protract an action, the praise whereof depended vpon the conclusion. So after they had balanced all matters in the Treaty, to reduce them to a iust proportion proportion of reason, all controuersies betwixt two Kings were reconciled and ended.

During this Treaty the most Christian King was at Nantes, he pacified Brittany, discharged the new garrisons, and some Imposts, and placed for Gouverneur there, Caspar Monsieur his base sonne, now Duke of Vendosme, who was betrothed to the only daughter of the Duke of Mercœur. Hee then granted the Edict of pacification to them of the reformed religion within his Realme, as we shall shew hereafter. A peace being concluded at Veruins betwixt the two Kings, there was nothing yet agreed vpon for the Duke of Sauoy. It seemed the King of Spaine had forgotten him, and that he did not acknowledge him for his Sonne-in-law. The French King held him neither for kinsman nor friend, so long as he should deraine the Marquisate of Salusses. The Marquis of Lullins (who was then Agent for the Duke) assured the Deputies, that the Duke had no other intention, but to giue the King more contentment hereafter, then forepassed occasions would giue him meanes. Vpon this assurance he entered into the treaty, the which by his occasion was in a manner broken off, three dayes before the conclusion. For, the King was resolved, not to thinke of any accord with the Duke, but by present effects: without deferring the satisfaction of that which was due vnto him. It was not likely (that drawing by the execution of the treaty, out of the hands of so great and mighty a King, six places in Picardy, and a Port of great importance in Britany, which was harder to take then the Marquisate of Salusses) the King would conclude a peace with the Duke of Sauoy, with lesse honourable conditions then he had done with the King of Spaine, and bring his indubitable right in question. But the Pope (fearing that this Marquisate of Salusses would proue an Achilles, to fire all Italy) prevailed so with the King, as he preferred the public good before his own particular interest, being content (for the finishing this building of peace) that the Dukes interest, and his right should bee put to compromise.

It was agreed, that the Pope should be the only Iudge of this discord, touching the restitution of the Marquisate of Salusses, and that within a yeare. So a Peace was concluded, and signed by the Deputies: but it was not published till a Month after: only a generall suspension of Armes was proclaimed. The King being at Rennes in Britany, came Post to Tours, and so to Amiens, for the better execution of the peace, which was comprehended in thirty eight Articles.

It was concluded, That the treaty of Peace, made at the Castle of Cambresis, in the yeare 1590, should remaine in his full force, but what should be expressly derogated by this present Treaty. That there should bee a firme and stable Peace betwixt the said two Kings, their heires, successors, realmes, countries, and subiects. That there should be free trafficke and commerce betwixt them, and all Letters of make or reprisal suspended, and none to be granted afterwards, but vpon deniall of Justice. That the Townes, Subiects and Inhabitants of either Country, should enioy the priuiledges and liberties which had beene granted them by precedent Treaties. That the subiects and seruants of either side, notwithstanding they had followed a contrary party, should returne into their offices and benefices which they did enioy before the end of the yeare 1588: provided that they should first obtaine leave and Letters-patents vnder their Maiesties great Seale for the same.

It was also concluded, That there should be a reallistitution, one vnto another, of all which had beene taken and held by them, or any other in their names, in one anothers Country. That the Catholike King might cary away all the Artillery, powder, bullets, victuals, and other munition of war, which should be found in those places he was to restore, with all their moueable goods; yet they might not exact any thing of the inhabitants, nor cary away anything belonging vnto them. That the most Christian King should furnish the Souldiers which were in Blauet with shipping, for their speedy return into Spaine, and the transport of their Ordnance, baggage, victuals, and other munition of war, giuing caution for restitution of the Ships, and return of the Mariners within a prefixed time. That the French King hauing ratified the treaty, there should bee foure Offages deliuered vnto him, such as he should choose out of the Catholike Kings Subiects, vntill restitution were really performed, and then to be presently set at liberty: and if restitution were made of the six places in Picardy, then two of the Offages should be deliuered, and the other two remaine vntill Blauet were restored. That there should be Arbitrators deputed on either side, to decide certaine controuersies contained in the

Treaty

A Treaty of Cambray, but not executed. That all prisoners of war on either side should be set at liberty, paying their charges, without ranfome, vntill they were already agreed vpon. All others subiect to the said Kings, and detained in their Gallies, should be released without delay, and without demand of ranfome or charges. All rights, actions, and pretensions were referred vnto the French King, vntill hee or his predecessors had expressly renounced them, to make his pursuit by law, and not by armes: the like reservation was made for the Catholike King, and the Infanta his eldest daughter. It was decreed, that the Duke of Sauoy should be comprehended in this Treaty of peace, vpon certaine conditions to be presently performed, and some other controuersies betweene the Christian King, and the said Duke, were referred vnto Pope Clement the eight, to be decided within one yeare after the date of these presents.

Thus I haue briefly set downe the chiefe points of the Treaty, the which you may read more at large in the Originall: after which they come to comprehend their allies, as followeth in the thirty fourth Article.

34 In this peace, alliance and friendship, shall be comprehended by the common consent of the said Kings, if they will be comprehended: First, on the behalfe of the said most Christian King, the Pope, the Apostolike Sea, the Emperor, the Princes Electors both Ecclesiasticall and secular, the townes, commonalties, and estates of the sacred Empire, and namely the Count Palatine Elector, Marquis of Brandebourg, Duke of Wirtemberg, Landgrau of Hessen, Marquis of Hanfpatch, the Earles of East-Frizland, and the Sea townes, according to their ancient alliances. The King and Realme of Scotland, according to the ancient Treaties, alliances and confederations, which are betwixt the Realmes of France and Scotland; the Kings of Poland, Denmarke, and Sweden, the Duke and Seignoury of Venice, the thirteene Cantons of Suisse, the Seigneuries of the three Cantons of Grisons, the Bishop and Seigneuries of the Country of Valais, the Abbot and towne of Saint Gal, Touchembourg, Milans in the country of Neuf-Chastell, and other allies and confederats of the said Cantons: The Duke of Lorraine, the great Duke of Tuscane, the Duke of Mantua, and the Common-weale of Luques, the Bishops and Chapter of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, the Abbot of Gozze, the Lords of Sedan, and the Earle of Mirande; provided alwaies, that the consent which the said Catholike King giues to the comprehension of the Earles of East-Frizland, shall not prejudice the right which his Catholike Maiestie pretendeth vnto their Countreies: As also there shall be a reservation against the defences, rights and exemptions of the said Earldomes, with a declaration that the said Catholike King may neither directly by himselfe, or any other, molest any of them which haue beene formerly comprehended by the said most Christian King. And if the said Catholike King pretends any thing against them, he shall pursue them by Law, before competent Iudges, and not by force in any manner whatsoever.

35 And on the behalfe of the said Catholike King shall bee comprehended in this Treaty, if they please: first of all, the Pope, the holy Apostolike Sea, the Emperour of Romans, the Archduke, his brethren and Cousins, their Realmes and Countries, the Electors, Princes, Townes and Estates of the whole Empire obeying him, the Duke of Bauaria, the Duke of Cleues, the Bishop and Country of Liege, the Sea townes, and the Earldomes of East-Frizland. And the said Princes doe renounce all Practices, promising hereafter not to make any, neither within Christendome nor without, that may be prejudiciall to the said Emperour, nor to the members and Estates of the said holy Empire; but shall with all their power, procure the good and quiet thereof, so as the said Emperour and Estates cary themselves very respectfully and lovingly vnto the said most Christian and Catholike Kings, and doe nothing to their prejudice. There shall bee also comprehended the Seigneuries of the Cantons of high Germans, the Grisons, and their allies, the Kings of Poland, Sweden, Scotland, & Denmarke, the Duke & Seignoury Venice, the Duke of Lorraine, the great Duke of Tuscane, the Common-weales of Genoua and Luques, the Duke of Parma and Placentia, the Cardinall of Fernelle, his brother, the Duke of Mantoua, the Duke of Vrbino, the chiefe of the houses of Colonne and Vrsins, The Duke of Salmonet, the Lord of Monaco, the Marquis of Finall, the Marquis of Massa, the Lord of Plombin, the Earle of Sala, and the Earle Collonna, to enioy the benefice of this Peace, with expresse declaration that the said most Christian King and if he pretend any thing against them, he may pursue it by law before competent Iudges, and not by force in any sort whatsoever.

King shall neither directly nor indirectly by himselfe or any other, molest any of them, A

36 And there shall be also comprehended in this present Treaty, all others that shall be named by the common consent of the said Kings, so as within six moneths after the publication of the said treaty, they give their Letters declaratory, respectively as it is in such case required.

37 And for the better assurance of this Treaty of peace, and of all the Articles therein contained, it shall be verified, published and enrowled in the Cour of Parliament of Paris, and in all other Parliaments of the Realme of France, and in the Chamber of accounts at Paris: as also it shall be verified published, and enrowled in the great Council, and other Councils and chambers of accounts of the countries of the said Catholike King, and all according to the form contained in the Treaty made in the year 1559, whereof the expeditions shall be given of either part within three months after the publication of this present Treaty.

38 Which points and Articles, together with all that is contained in every one of them, have beene treated, concluded, and past betwixt the said Deputies in their names, the which by vertue of their authorities have promised, and doe promise vpon bond of all the present and future goods of their said Masters, that they shall be inuiolably observed and kept, and to cause them to ratifie, and to give authentike Letters one vnto the other whereas all this present Treaty shall be inserted, and that within one moneth after the date of these presents, in regard of the said most Christian King, Cardinal, Archduke, and Duke of Sauoy: which Cardinall shall promise to cause like Letters of ratification to be given within three months by the Catholike King. They shall solemnly swear vpon the Crosse, the Holy Euangelists, the Canon of the Masse, and vpon their honors, in the presence of such as they shall please to depute, to observe and accomplish, fully, really, and faithfully the contents of the said Articles: and in like manner the Catholike King shall take the same oath within three months after, or when hee shall be required.

In witness of which things the said Deputies subscribed the Treaty, at Veruins the second day of May, in the year 1598.

All which Articles contained in the Treaty: and all that had beene concluded, agreed, and passed by the said Deputies in their Masters names, they promise shall be inuiolably observed and kept, and to cause them to ratifie them, and to deliuer one vnto an other authentike Letters, signed and sealed, containing the whole Treaty, and that within one moneth after the date of those presents, in regard of the most Christian King, the Cardinall, Archduke, and Duke of Sauoy: and that the Cardinall should promise, to procure within three months after, the like Letters of ratification from the Catholike King, Archduke, and Duke of Sauoy: They should solemnly swear vpon the Crosse, the holy Euangelists, the Canon of the Masse, and by their honors, in the presence of such as they should depute, to observe and fulfill really and faithfully, all that was contained in the said Articles: and the like oath shall be taken by the Catholike King of Spaine, within three months after, or when it should be required. In witness whereof the Deputies subscribed the Treaty, at Veruins, the second of May 1598.

He that desires Peace cannot buy it at too deare a rate, no though he pay as much as King Antigonis did vnto the Romans. The King of Spaine, who desired a peace at what rate soeuer, found no condition in this Treaty of Veruins, that might disswade him from ratifying it: although his Council held the restitution of townes, so happily taken, and so hard to recouer, dishonourable and prejudiciall. He prest to haue it sworne and executed, witnessing the contentment he receiued in his soule, for the good which Christendome should receiue by the concord of these two Crownes. The Archduke, who did second his desire, sent Deputies to assist at the French Kings oath, the D. of Alfort, the Count Arrenberg, the Admirall of Arragon, and Lewis de Velasco, being followed by four hundred Gentlemen Spaniards, Italians, Bourguignons, and Flemings. The Count S. Paul receiued them vpon the frontiers. The Confitable feasted them at Amiens, and pacified some quarrells growne among them for place. The Marshall of Birn with a great and goodly troupe of Noblemen and Gentlemen, appointed by the King, receiued them

A them a quarter of a league without S. Denis gate, conducing them vnto their lodgings, which were prepared in S. Anthonies quarter. The next day they went vnto the Louure, with all their traine, in rich and stately equipage, to kisse the Kings hands: who receiued them graciously, giving an attentive care vnto the discourse which Richardot made vpon the merit of this action, and the common profit and necessity of a peace, the which, hee said, was to be preferred before a iust war, and al hope of prosperity. The King answered, That he had desired peace, not for that he was tired with the discomforts of war, but to give all Christendome meanes to breathe: That his armes fell out of his hands when as they represented vnto him the teares which fell from the Popes eyes, for their reconciliation, which might greatly aduance the quiet of the Church of God: That he should neuer be taxed to be ill affected to the preservation of the peace as he neuer wanted zeale nor iustice to seeke it, hauing alwaies preferred it before the vndoubted assurance of all the good successe, which the happinesse of his armes, and the reason of his defence promised him: beleeuing the aduice of them which hold, that we must neuer for the hope of any fauourable successe, refuse a good peace, and ground the expectation of the euent vpon the apparence of present things.

The most solemne forme of a treaty is, the oath which binds them that treat. It was not sufficient, that the Princes had signed it, and engaged their faithfull promises to maintain it: they would make the God of heauen the Iudge and witness of their intentions, engaging their faith in the hands of his Iustice, for an assurance of their promises. And therefore the King did swear the obseruation of the peace, in our Ladies Church at Paris, in the presence of the King of Spaines Ambassadors. The Archduke did swear it in the name of the King of Spaine, in the great Church at Brussels, in the presence of the Marshall of Birn, Belleure and Brulart, Counsellors to the King and his Ambassadors. The Duke of Sauoy did also swear it at Chambery, in the presence of Guadagny, Lord of Boutheton, Knight of both Orders. The Oath was ministered in this manner: We promise vpon our faith and honour, and in the word of a King, and swear vpon the Crosse, the holy Euangelists, and the Canon of the Masse, for that which concerns vs: That wee will observe and accomplish fully, really and faithfully, all and every point and article contained in the treaty of Peace, reconciliation and amity made, concluded, and determined at Veruins, the second day of May last past, &c. and will cause all to be observed, maintained and kept inuiolably on our part, without any breach, or suffering it to be broken, in any sort or manner whatsoever. In witness whereof we have signed these presents with our owne hands, &c.

The King would haue the sincerity of his intentions knowne to all the world, and Paris a witness of the oath he should take, to observe the peace as religiously, as hee had made wariously. The ceremony was performed in our Ladies Church at Paris, with great pompe: Monsieur de Villeroi did read the articles of the Peace, the King did swear the obseruation thereof, signed the Act, and embraced the Ambassadors of the King of Spaine, wishing his Brother along life, that he might long enjoy the fruits of this peace. E This ceremony was ended with great ioy and acclamations of the people. From thence the King went to dine at the Bishops Palace, where he feasted the Ambassadors, the Duke Montpensier supplying the place of Lord Steward. The feast was royall and magnificent, and all things were answerable to so great a Ceremony. That ancient custome of drinking to the health of Princes, which came from that of the Greekes, who offered to every one of their gods a glasse of wine, and since hath beene vsed, to shew our deuoted affection to great personages, was not forgotten. The King dranke twice to the health of the King of Spaine. This ioy was continued at night at the Louure, in dancing, and the daies following in feasting at diners great mens houses, by the Kings command.

All this did not hinder the execution of the Treaty, neither did the Deputies forget the interest of priuate persons. The Spaniards treated the King for the returne of some that were absent, especially for the Duke of Aumale. The King answered them, That if they restored vnto Antonio Perez his children and goods, he would give the Duke of Aumale contentment, whereby he should enjoy the fruits of the peace: the Spaniards replied, That Perez, who was then out of Spain for matters concerning the Inquisition, might not be equalled with the Duke of Aumale, who was absent but by reason of the troubles. Euery one was content, either with that which was done, or with that which reason did not allow to be done.

After

After that the Ambassadors of Spaine had obtained what they desired for the execution of the Peace, and admired the Kings houles, and the wonders of Paris, they returned with a remembrance of his Maiesties bounty, who gaue them Jewells, and Cupbords of plate. There remained foure principall men as Hostages, for assurance of the restitution of the townes, as it was concluded by the Treaty. All should be performed by the second of August: they began by the townes of Picardy so faithfully, as the King without expecting the full satisfaction of the Treaty sent backe the Hostages, relying onely vpon their word.

It was also concluded by the Treaty, that the Archduke (who had approued the peace in the name of the King of Spaine) should also swear the obseruation thereof in the same name, and in the presence of such as it should please the King to send: His Maiefty would not employ any other then such as had serued him so worthily in the conclusion thereof, as Belieure and Brulart, two of the chiefe of his Councell, and him whose valour in the recovery of Amiens, had much advanced the end of this war. This honour was accompanied with another, that was greater and more durable, vpon the chiefe of this Ambassage. The King doth neuer forget to recompence great and generous actions, he would haue the Marshall Biron as well a president of his fauours, as of the loyalty of his seruice: and therefore he erected his Barony of Biron into a Duchy, and made him Peere of France. He was receiued in the Parliament with a general applausie and testimony of all the Assitants, that these honours, although they were great, did not equal the greatness of his merits. He made a solemne least for this new dignity. The King went from Saint Germaine to honour him with his presence: witnessing that this was not the end nor period of the honours wherewith he would reward the peruerse of his seruices, and the constancy of his affection. At that time there was nothing in him that was lesse to be admired then imitated. Slander could not cause any corruption in a body inspired with the life of honour and valour (as flies breed not wormes but in dead bodies) and hee that had spoken ill of him, should haue gotten no credit. He had not yet receiued that pestilent infection which corrupted his blood, and deprived him of all judgment. Reprehension had no power ouer him: but when as he spake vnreuerently of the King; one of his Friends was then the Oracle of his fortune, who told him plainly, That if he did not forbear his licentious speeche, he would repent it. What can they do, answered he? The other replied; That which you feare not. And pressing him to speake more plainly; his friend (knowing that Princes are very apprehensieue and sensible; and that the offences which they dissemble most, they pardon least) said vnto him, halfe in choler, & halfe in least, That the King would cut off his head. This threat was so vnlikely, as he made a least of it. The bad intentions which began to seize vpon his soul in this Ambassage of Flanders, haue verified the prediction. Nothing could make him vnhappy, but the excess of his happines, which deprived him of all government and modesty. If he had beene lesse fortunate, he had beene more wise. It was no strange thing, to make the sonne of the Marshall Biron, Marshall of France. An ancient house might well be honoured with the title of a Duchy, a great Captaine, who had to great a share in the restauration of France, deserved the honour and title of a Peere, but this was to recompence him in the midst of his course, for all that he might expect at the end of his carriere.

The first seruice the Duke of Biron did after this new dignity, was the voyage of Flanders. He made his assembly at Peronne, from whence he went to lye at Cambray. In the mid way, the Earle of Sore, Lieutenant Generall of that Country, met him, who (after he had saluted him with a long and respectiue discourse) told him, That he had commandement from his Master to doe him seruice in that voyage, and to accompany him vnto Bruxelles. They of Cambray feasted him in their Towne-houise. He had the like entertainment at Valenciennes and at Mons. Being arriued at our Lady of Halle, three leagues from Bruxelles, he found a Steward of the Archdukes, and fifty of his guard to attend him. The next day (which was the first after his departure) hee was met vpon the way to Bruxelles, by the Earle of Mansfield, the Duke of Aumale, and the Prince of Orange, with about two hundred horse in the Archdukes name, and so conducted through the city vnto his lodging.

Hee rested the Friday, and the next day hee went to haue audience of the Archduke. Hee was accompanied by Count Mansfield: Belieure by the Duke

A Duke D' Aumale, and Brulart with the Prince of Orange. Thus they entered into the Arch-dukes chamber, whom they found alone without any one but the Bishop of Antwerpe, and the President Richardot. The D. of Biron began to discourse, and Belieure continued it halfe an houre after. On the Sunday following, the Duke of Biron went to the Cathedral Church, the Arch-duke hauing sent him twenty Carosses for himselfe and his traine: There did the Arch-duke solemnly swear the obseruation of the peace in the name of the King of Spaine. From thence the Duke of Biron went on horsebacke to the Archdukes palace, where he dined. At the Arch-dukes table sat the Duke of Biron, Belieure, Brulart, the Count Mansfield, the Duke of Aumale, the Prince of Orange, and the Bishop of Antwerpe. At another table were some twenty French Gentlemen, chosen by the Duke of Biron, and eight or ten Spaniards and Wallons. After dinner the Arch-duke caused them to see a gallery full of goodly pictures of the country, and from thence he led them into the Parke, in the midst whereof is the house whereas the Emperour Charles the first retired himselfe, when as he resigned his Empire and other Estates. The next day the Earle of Mansfield invited the Duke of Biron with some dozen of French Gentlemen to dinner: after dinner they put themselves in a round, euery one with a glasse full of wine in his hand, and in this order, the Earle said: Seeing we haue begun our folies in wine, it is fit wee should leave them there: and so he spilt the wine, and brake his glasse; the which was imitated by all the rest.

C So after some dayes spent in feasting, the Archduke hauing presented the D. of Biron with two faire horses, gold, plate, a rich iewel, and a rapier, with girdle and hangers set with precious stones, (all which were esteemed at ten thousand crownes) hauing also giuen to Belieure and Brulart rich fures of Tapistry, and chaines of gold, and to euery one of the French Gentlemen, a rapier blade, and a paire of Spanish gloves, they returned home very well satisfied. But the Duke of Biron did not so much respect what was giuen him, as the esteeme they made of his valour, if hee would employ it for the King of Spaines seruice. Picard did first infect him with this poison, (which caused a feuer, and proued incurable, but by that shameful effusion of his blood) whereof the King was presently aduertised by a true-hearted Frenchman, who remained at that time in the Arch-dukes Court. The Duke of Saouy, who enjoyed the same benefit of the Peace, was bound to the obseruation thereof by the like forme.

The King sent to Monsi de la Guiche Gouverneur of Lions, that he would willingly haue giuen him that charge, but that he feared his absence might somewhat preiudice the good of his affaires, and his indisposition not suffer him to performe the voyage. Hee therefore commanded Guadagnes Seneschall of Lyon, and Knight of both Orders, to vndertake this charge. The oath was taken in the Friars Church of Chambray, on Sunday the second of August, where the Duke was assisted withall his Knights of the Annunciado and to witness the content which he had of this peace and reconciliation with his Maiefty, hee said vnto Guadagnes, that hee held this day the happiest of all the dayes of his life, and that all E which remained, should be to maintaine and honour the memory thereof. That it were not onely an indiscretion, but a blindness and a madnesse for him to change the felicities of peace, for the miseries of warre. The D. gaue vnto Guadagnes; and to the chiefe Gentlemen of his traine, Jewells, horses, chaines of gold; and to all, so many good words, as there was not any one but did wish him more profit by this peace then he reaped. He refused not any thing that was demanded of him in the execution of the Treaty, for the deliuerie and ranfome of prisoners, but onely the liberty of the Admirall Chastillon wife. He made answer to the instance which Guadagnes made in the Kings name: That the respect he bare vnto his Maiesties commandements, was so great, as to please him he would restore her goods, and giue her some more liberty, whilst that he might giue his Maiefty to vnderstand the iust causes of her restraint.

F That whatsoever had beene decreed at Rome, for her absolution, was rather in fauour of his Maiefty, then for any reason, for that he was seized vpon books and writings that were execrable and damnable. The afflictions of this Lady did moue the hearts of the chiefe Officers of this Crowne, and of many great Noblemen of the Realme, her kinsmen and allies. The King had commiseration of her: for her misfortunes, her imprisonment, losses and disgraces deserved pity. She was so transported with the good successe of the Kings affaires, that although she were among her enemies, yet the fire of her desires could could neither be smothered vnder the ashes of affliction, nor vnder the fume of dis- simulation. If he could haue done that whereof they accused her, shee would haue made as sudden alterations on the earth, as Henry King of Sweden did in the ayre, and as admirable : as her will was absolute to desire that the King might overcome his enemies, and haue satisfaction for Nice and Salusses.

Vpon the hope that this peace should giue her some content, and that the Kings commendation by his Ambassadour should giue some truce to her miseries, she wrote a Letter of the pitifull course of her misfortunes, whereby appeared the excellency of her spirit, in these words : Although (saith she) the comparison be as different as betwix an Elephant and a Gnat, yet are they both vegetative and sensitiue creatures. My fortune, and that of B my house, hath alwayes followed that of France and the Kings : for as since his marriage, I haue alwayes scene my Estate declining, euen vnto the period of a totall ruine, by the ill successe of his affaires : so now when as God hath powred his blessings vpon him, that hee hath reuenged him of his enemies, euen by his enemies ; and that against the conspiracies of the wicked, and the iudgement of the good, hee doth enioy his inheritance, I will hope there shall be some change in my condition. I desire it may be good : but if it proue otherwise, I will not alter my resolution, to receive both good and euill as from the hand of God. I haue this aduantage ouer fortune, that hereafter her iniuries how violent and sudden so euer, shall not be strange vnto me. I am inured to my afflictions, as a gally-slave to his oare. Necessity teacheth me to suffer constantly, and custome makes my C sufferance easie.

The King also gaue Guadignes charge, to let the Duke vnderstand, that he had receiued three severall complaints from the Citie of Geneva ; that his troopes which hee entertained thereabouts, vsed insupportable hostility, tooke prisoners, chopt and changed them, and that his Maiestie desired the towne might reape the fruit and safety which the common good of the peace did promise them, and that the Dukes troopes might be retired, to the end all ialousie and distrust might cease. The Duke would not answer hereunto by writing, lest (saith he) he should preiudice the pretensions which hee had to that towne, for aboute foure hundred yeares : saying onely, that he did not thinke it had been comprised in the Treaty of peace, for that all other townes and Prouinces had bene particularly named, and not that of Geneva. That he could not free his neighbors from feare and distrust, but in retiring his troopes that were about the towne, to refresh them in Lombardy, he should take away the cause, having no intention to prefer warre before the happinesse of peace. He therefore commanded D. Iuan de Mendoza a Spaniard, to draw his regiment, which consisted of 1200 men, out of the territories of Geneva, and to passe to Milan.

A peace being proclaimed in France, the King applies his thoughts to reforme all disorders, and to administer Iustice to all his subiects : and for the better assurance of the publike tranquillitie, he did as his predecessors had done in the like occasions: prohibiting, by the aduice of his Princes, Officers of his Crowne, and Lords of his Council, the carriage and vse of Harguebuzes, Petronels, Pistols, Pistolets, and other weapons, which carried fire, vpon confiscation of Armes and horse, and two hundred Crownes fine for the first offence, and to be kept in prison vntill the money were payed : and for the second, losse of goods and life, without hope of remission. Allowing all men to flay and arrest all such as should carie such prohibited armes eight dayes after the publication of the Edict. None were excepted, but the foure hundred Archers, and the foure Companies of horse, of the guards of his Maiesties person, when as they waited in quarter; the Archers of the Prouost of his household, of the Constable and Marshalls of France, and they of the company of Light-horse belonging to the Duke of Vendosme, who by the Edict might carie Pistols when as they were in seruice. And to free his subiects from the oppression of souldiers, and to accustom them to obedience, to whom it is troublesome in the secur- est peace, hee cut off the companies, as well of horse, as of the regiments of foot : but this restraint was onely that which they might well forbear. It is dangerous to leaue in Estate long without armes. A disarmed peace is weak. The King therefore reserved the places vpon the frontiers, which remained still fortified with ordinary guards. The guards appointed for Governours and Lieutenants generall of Prouinces were suspended, and the companies of men at Armes were reduced to a lesser number. Such whose spirits could

A could not liue in the cessation of armes, and which were good Capitaines in the time of warre (like vnto Marius) but ill Citizens in peace, and leaue to goe seek the exercise thereof in Flanders and Hungary.

Peace doth change the exercise of Warre into hunting : the King made it his dayly exercise. Being one day hunting in the great Forest of Fontainebleau, there was heard about halfe a League off, a great cry of hounds and the winding of hornes, and suddenly all this noise which seemed to be farre off, came (to his iudgement) within twenty paces of his care. He commanded the Count Saiffons to set out, to see what it was, thinking that no man durst presume so boldly to interrupt his sports : the Earle aduancing, heard the noise, yet could not discern whence it came. A bigge blacke man presented himselfe in the thickest of the bushes, crying out, Doe you vnderstand me, and then hee suddenly vanished away at those words. They which were discreet, thought it great indifferency to stay longer there hunting. The Heards-men thereabouts say it is a spirit, which they call the great Hunter, who hunts in this Forest : others hold, that it is S. Huberts chafe, the which is also heard in other places.

Many Noblemen, and Gentlemen retired themselves now vnto their governments and priuate houses : the King having said long before, that hee would force euery man to liue of his owne, and not to importune him any more. Neuer any Edict was better obserued then this speech, for euen then hee refused to employ the remainder of his reuenues in C publike necessities, and not in the prodigalities of Vittellius, nor for the enriching of priuate men, saying, that he would ease the poore, & giue example vnto the rich to content themselves with little, and to liue accordingly. The Constable went to his government of Languedoc, hauing obtained of the King a reuerfion of his government for Henry of Montmorency his sonne. The King in his wisdom, thought he could not sufficiently grace a house which hath brought forth so many Governours, Admirals, Marshals, and Constables : and which vnder the name of Montmorency comprehends that of Horne and Laual, which hath giuen wiues to Kings of France and Dukes of Britany. The Letters Patentes were read and registred in the Court of Aydes, as Montpelier, the Duke of Vantadour being President, and the Bishops of Agde and Nismes assisting.

D The order which the King did kittle for the affaires of his House, was a president to all France, shewing the religious desire which he had to see his subiects enioy the fruits thereof. His iustice would not suffer them to be charged and surcharged with impossible duties, seeing that the violence of the warre had left them nothing but their tongues to complain, being like vnto askinck laid vpon a dead maans bones. Yet notwithstanding they were forced to pay the publike charges for the fruits which they had not gathered. And therefore the King did vnto his subiects, as Constantine and Theodosius did vnto them of the Empire, by a generall discharge of the remainder of their Taxe and Tributes. He also sent, according to the resolution of the Estates held at Roan, many great personages, as well of his Council, as of other companies, to examine the necessities of his people, to order the Taxes and Tributes, and to protect the weak from the oppression and violence of such as during the ciuill warres had scene no light of iustice, but through the flame of Harguebuzes : hauing so abused the time, as to enioy the priuledge of Nobles, they would be so esteemed rather by their shew, then by the vse and seruice of the sword : and when as the Law (which doth chiefly binde Noblemen by reason of their tenures and titles of Nobility, to the duties of Armes) hath conuined them to succour the necessities of their Prince and Country, they haue thrust themselves among the people, liuing idly in townes, or in the delights of their houses, so long as fire and danger was in field. Men unworthy of the name of men, of Gentlemen, and of Frenchmen. The Commissioners forced these kind of gallants to pay, who by pretended Letters of their Gentry, and abuse of the Priuileges, had laid their Taxes vpon the people.

While the King labours to reforme all abuses, and to root out disorders : the Deputies of the Clergy of France (being assembled together at Paris, with the Kings permission) beseech his Maiesty to reforme the disorders of the Church. Which speech was delivered with great reuerence before his Maiesty, by the reuerent Francis de La Guesle Archbishop of Tours, accompanied with many of the said Deputies of the Clergy. The Summe whereof was :

That it would please his Maiesty, that the holy Council of Trent might be receiued.

The King with the reſpect which his predeceſſors haue alwayes borne to the firſt of the three Orders of his Realme, thinking that the honor which is done vnto the Clergy, hath a reference vnto God, and that Biſhops, although they be his vaffals and ſubiectes, are no leſſe then the Miniſters and Ambaſſadors of the liuing God, and Interpreters of his holy will, he anſwers them in this manner.

"I confeſſe that what you haue ſaid is true, but I am not the author of theſe innouations: theſe miſchiefs were brought in before my coming. During the Warres I haue run to the greateſt fire to quench it: I will now doe what is needfull in time of peace. I know that Religion and Iuſtice be the foundations and pillars of this Eſtate, the which is maintained by piety and iuſtice. But if they were not, I would plant them by little and little, as I doe all things. With the helpe of God I will ſettle the Church in as good Eſtate as it was an hundred yeares ſince, as well for the diſcharge of my conſcience, as for your content: but Paris was not all built in one day. Let the people be as much perſwaded by your good examples to doe well, as they haue beene heretofore diſſwaded. You haue exhorted mee of my duty. I doe admoniſh you of yours: let vs all doe good. Goe you one way, and I will goe another: if we meet, wee ſhall ſoone haue done. My predeceſſors haue giuen you Words, but I with my gray Iacket will giue you Deeds. I am all gray without, but I am all of gold within. I will write vnto my Councell to ſee your complaints, and will provide for you as fauourably as I may.

"During theſe admonitions of the Clergy, the Cardinall of Florence moued the King for the reſtitution of the Leſuits. The 7 Article of the Treaty of peace at Veruins did ſuffer the ſubiectes and ſeruants of either ſide, as well Clergy-men as Lay, to returne and enioy their Offices, Benefices, and Reuenues, obtaining permiſſion and Letters Patents vnder the broad ſcale from the Prince. Many thought that the Leſuits ſhould be comprehended in this Article, and that if by this peace the Spaniards were held Allies, and as it were couſin germanes to the French, thoſe whom the Kings Adoucate had the yeare before in open Parliament termed Emiſſaires to the King of Spaine, ſhould now returne to their Colledges, from whence they had been expelled by a ſentence giuen in December, in the yeare 1594. But the light of peace ſhines not vpon them. The new world which it doth produce hauing caſt the cinders of Warre, Rancor and Reuenge into the aire, allows them no retreat within the iuriſdiction of Paris. The Decrees which had baniſhed them, are grauen in Marble, the Water of Prayers, Fauours and Teares, although it pierceſt ſtones, preuailes nothing. Their enemies had taxed them with the making of certaine writings which offended the Court, whoſe authoritie is alwayes wronged in the offences which concerne the Princes honor. A any youth to the Schooles of their Order, as to Tournon, to Pont-au-Mouſſon, and other places, both within and without the Realme, and to declare, that ſuch as ſhould be inſtructed & taught in their Colledges, ſince the Decree made the 29 of December 1594, ſhould not enioy the priuiledges of Vniuerſities, as incapable of the degrees thereof: Neither might they by vertue of any Degrees obtained, teach publicly, nor be aduanced to any Offices or Benefices, ſit for Graduates, nor receiued Adoucates in any Courts or Seates of Iuſtice.

The Court had giuen commandement to the Earle of Tournon to expell them his country, vpon a great penalty contained in the Decree, and for that he had not performed

B it, his goods and Iuriſdiction were put into the Kings hands, and his Office of Senefhall of Auvergne declared void. But although the Parliament of Paris may terme it ſelfe the onely Parliament of France, and the Court of Peeres: that it is the fountaine, and the reſt but little riuers, yet her Decrees preſcribe no lawes to other Parliaments: That of Thoulouſa prohibited the Earle of Tournon to obey that of Paris. The Leſuits are yet there, their Colledges are frequented, their returne deſired, and the exerciſe of Sciences as famous as euer. The defendes to goe thither haue but augmented the number. The Kings Adoucate pleading vpon this ſubiect, ſaid they were the Authors of ſome execrable Pamphlets which he named not. It was a booke printed in Flanders, for the apology of a miſerable Parricide, a prodigious Aſſaſſine, and a wicked Martyr, written with a pen of ſteele, and with inke of blood. Some ſay, the Author hath aduowed it, and iuſtified the Leſuits.

C When they ſaw that this new ſtorme began to threaten them in the calme of publique tranquillitie, and that they had obtained letters from the Parliament of Bourdeaux, to chaſe them out of all Guienne, they had recourſe to the Kings Iuſtice: there is nothing that doth more aduance the greatneſſe of the Soueraigne, nor aſt of greater reuerence, then to demand Iuſtice. Many things may be obtained from others, onely Iuſtice comes from the Prince. One equal may doe good to another, but the Soueraigne onely can doe iuſtice: wherefore in demanding iuſtice by their petition, they ſaid it was a right due vnto them; yea, were they the moſt guilty men in the world, it ſhould bee granted them ſo much the more freely, for that their Iuſtification concerned the good and reputation of the Realme.

D Since that time they haue been incountred both in Verſe and Proſe, and they haue defended themſelues learnedly. The more they fought to make them ſeeme unworthy of their returne, the more they defended the iuſtice and neceſſity of their re-eſtabliſhment.

At the ſame time was concluded the mariage of Madam Katherine Princeſſe of France and of Nauarre, the Kings only Siſter, with the Marquis of Pont, Duke of Bar, and Prince of Lorraine, after many iourneys made by the ſaid Prince vnto the moſt Chriſtian King: in which accord there were great difficulties, as wel by reaſon of the diuerſitie of Religion (the ſaid Princeſſe reſuſing to leaue the reformed, wherein ſhe had been bred) as alſo for that ſhe could not be perſwaded to goe out of France. She had beene formerly fought by many great Princes, to whom ſhe would not conſent, for the one or the other of theſe

E two cauſes, and ſometimes for both together. Francis Monſieur Duke of Alençon deſired her in the yeare 1582, but the difficulty was then greater for matters of Religion. And before that, King Henry the third coming out of Poland did aſſect her: and it was thought, that if he had ſeene her at Lyons at his returne, he would haue married her: but Katherine de Medicis the Queene-mother deſcribed her to bee a dwarfie (the which was moſt falſe) for ſhe was of a meane ſtature, and of a good countenance. It is true, ſhe had one legge ſomewhat ſhorter then another (which is a marke of the houſe of Albrecht: for ſo had Alain Lord of Albrecht, Father to King Iohn, great Grandfather to the ſaid Princeſſe Katherine.) The Queene-mother did this good turne for her God-daughter, ſeeking to diſgrace the K. of Nauarre, whom ſhe hated from his youth, vpon an imagination, being told by an Italian Sooth-layer, that he ſhould ſucceed her children. Then the D. of Lorraine (who ſince was her father-in-law) fought her. The Prince of Conde ſought her. The K. of Spaine ſent to ſee her, in the yeare 1580, promiſing great aduancement to the King of Nauarre.

This failing, the Duke of Sauoy ſent twice in the yeare 83, promiſing no way to im- peach her religion. The King sick at Monceaux,

The King at the conclusion of the Treaty of Veruins, was desirous that his good Sister the Queen of England should be comprehended therein. But it was an accord which the King of Spaine would make apart : for the effecting whereof, the King did offer the Towne of Boulogne for an interview of the Deputies, where they met of both sides : but the Ceremony for Precedence made it fruitlesse. For whereas the Deputies of England would not give place to them of Spaine, they returned without doing any thing : neither was there any of them that thought it reasonable, to purchase a peace with such prejudice to his Princes service : They say, that the peoples health is the Soueraigne law : but that which concerns the respect of the Prince, and the ranke which hee is to hold before others, is alwayes immutable. There are some lawes mortall, and others which neuer dye. Those have their continuance according to the time : Necessity makes the other allayes durable, for the perpetual good they find in the obseruation, as Lucius Valerius said, pleading against the Opian law. Of the condition of these mortall lawes is the right of Precedence. He that shall suffer the diminution, as not worthy of the increase.

During this dispute for the Precedence, the King was at Monceaux to take the diet. The Physicians had given him so great liberty to eat Melons of Chenonceau and Lyons, as he felt it, and paid dearly for the taste of his delights : for the third day of his dyet walking in his doublet in his gallery at Monceaux, a fever took him, which turned his dyet into speedier remedies, and brought him to that estate, as many built their hopes vpon the despaire of his health : and there were posts attended, ready to carie these bad newes. But the dignities of troubles and factions dyed, when as they saw him recouer his former health. Th: Duchesse of Beaufort serued him in this sickness, with an affection and care equall to the loue which makes the lower feeble the same griefe that the beloued doth. It was the same time when as she hoped to be as well Queene of France, as she reigned in the Kings heart. They said that our Dauphins should be Cesars or Alexanders, and that that which had bin but a sport or pleasure, should now be made a contract of necessity. Being recovered, he came to S. Germain in Lay, there to end the yeare, and to resolute vpon his expences. Hee would haue the aduice of the Princes and Officers of the Crowne, to acquaint them with the estate of his affaires, to the end that if euerly man did not obtaine what he demanded, he should impute the cause vnto necessity. The great tables charged with vnknowne superfluities (more esteemed for the price and rarenesse, then for the taste or necessitie) were then cut off by the Kings example, which hath alwayes more force, then either law or correction. Excesse was conuerted into frugalitie, so necessary is an Estate, as the Romanes were so lefse bound to the Figs and Carrots of the Fabricii and Curi, then to their swords.

Then was there scene a new order in the disposition of the Kings Treasure, by the care and inductions of the Marquis of Rhofny, vnto whom his Maiestie gaue the charge of Superintendant. From the first day he let them know, how hard it was to draw money out of the Kings coffers : and for his many dealers in it as were wont to be, there should now be but one. His humour seemed frange : he cared not for all the petty gods, so as he pleased Iupiter, as Apuleius saith. He refused many things, to the end that the grant might be referred for the King, and all fauours recieued from his Maiesties only hand, and not from any other, the which hath purchased him many enemies, who envying his prosperitie and condition, desire the ouerthrow of his happinesse, and yet are constrained to admire the force and soundnesse of his vnderstanding. Those who raised to the Sollicite of their greatnesse, must confinde, that Princes fauours are alwayes perillous. It is a difficult thing to stand long time vpon this Ice : and the fall, how gentle so euer, will neuer suffer him to rise againe : the which is proued in Tiberius to Sciannus, Charles the sixth, so Iohn Montaigne and many others.

I have learned of a great personage, Ambassador to a Prince of Germany, three words which hee caried grauen in a clocke. Hee said them once a day, and did thinke of them

A continually, Favour may turne into disfaour, and grace into disgrace. But he that serueth his master according to his owne heart, that doth nothing against his conscience, and that governes his intentions according to law, iustice, and equity, and neuer abandons the helm, although the wind beat his Barke, he needs not to feare any thing. Fortune must alwayes yeeld vnto Vertue.

They talke of nothing at Court but feasts and triumphs. The King maries in the end of the last moneth of the year, and Katherine his only filster, had beene promised to the Marquis of Pont, Prince of Lorraine, and Duke of Barr. The Contracts were, That the presence of the Duke of Lorraine, who came into France. The conditions were, That the said Lady should be entailed Duchesse of Albret, Countesse of Armagnac, and of Rhodiz, Vicountesse of Limoges, and should haue for her yeerely portion an hundred thousand crownes : and in case she had any children, they should cary the same titles, and be provided for. And in case she did suruive him, she should enioy the Duchy of Barr in Barrois, with a yeerely pension, taken out of the reuenues of Lorraine. This done, the ancient alliances which had bin betwixt these two Houses, were renewed, and the mariage was consummated : but there was first some question touching the Reformed Religion, in which the had beene bred, the which she would not change, by reason (as she said) of her deceased mother, Queene Iane of Navarre, whose life and actions were held worthy to be imitated. She did with all her heart affect that which did concerne the liberty of conscience throughout all France, beseeching the King often to let her see the assurances thereof whilst she was in France, and not to suffer his Edicts to remaine without execution being proclaimed, & without a durable obseruation being executed. She was daughter to a mother who preferred safety of conscience before assurance of honours and greatness, yet then life it selfe, being accustomed to faye to them of her part, that armes should not be layd downe, but with these three conditions, either an assured peace, an absolute victorie, or an honest death. Moreover, she apprehended the reproach of inconstancy at that age, if she should change her religion, having returned vnto it after shee had bene a while Catholicke: yet she promised her future husband to suffer her selfe to be instructed and to doe what he pleased.

D The King seeing his sisters resolution, did what he could to reclaim her by mildness, propounding unto her his owne example, and giuing her to vnderstand by some words, that the most otherwife looke for no fauour at his hands. Seeing he could not preuaile, before he signed the said contract (which was at Monceaux, a Castle belonging to the Duchesse of Beaufort, whom the King loued) the common brute was, that shee did greatly preesse this marriage, by reason of her pretensions: about the end of the yeare, the King told her, that his meaning was not to force her, neither for her religion, nor for her marriage. He aduised his future brother in law to doe his dutie, and to discharge his confidence: He also advertised him of one expedient, which was, to remove certaine women, and other persons, from about the said Lady, for that her traine consisted of Catholikes, and others, E and amongst those others, there were some willfull and contentious, in whom the said Lady trusted much, for that they had bene bred vp in her seruice from her cradle: but all that proceeded but from the poyntie of the said Lady.

The said Prince of Lorraine accompanied with his brother the Earle of Vaudmont, and other Noblemen of Lorraine, with three hundred Gentlemen well appointed, a little before January, this year 1599, arrived at Paris, in which month the King had appointed the day of the marriage. He entered by Saint Denis gate, the King doing him the honour to enter with him, having met him in the field as he came from hunting. The king led the said Duke his brother in law (calling him commonly brother) to the Louvre, where they supped together, and Madam his sister with them. The time was spent in dancing, and other exercises of recreation and pastime among the great Princes. The Kings sister for her part shewed all the contentment that might be, as she had good reason, having attained to that which she was accustomed to say, Grata superueniet que non perabitur hora: the said Lady being well instructed in the Latine tongue: and she did the more apprehend this Latine verse, for that some had given it forth, she would never be married.

According unto that which the said Lady had promised, to suffer her selfe to be instructed in the Catholike religion, it was resolved by his Maiesty, that there should be a conference betwixt some Catholike Doctors, and some Ministers of the Reformed religion, in the presence of his sister: but they prevailed nothing for her conversion. The King foreseeing some inconveniences, resolved (as well to satisfy her conscience, as to avoid scandal) to have this instruction deferred until another time. And in the mean time they should proceed in the marriage. Hereupon there were some practices by the Ministers of the pretended reformed Religion, who would have the honour (said they) that the Kings only sister should be married by them: and that the Prince of Lorraine should seek his Spouse where she was, and that it was not convenient she should seek him in his Church. In truth this was plausible, and it seemed the Lady had a great interest in it. But the Prince on the other side, protested never to be married by a Minister: so as there was much arguing in what forme they should be married. But the King, by his accustomed wisdom, shewed the effects of his authority.

The thirtieth day of January being Sunday, in the morning, the King having advertised his sister over-night of his intention, and entreated the Prince of Lorraine to be ready, he goes and takes his sister at her rising, and conducts her by the hand into his cabinet, where her future Spouse was already. He commanded the worthy and reverend Archbishop of Roan his natural brother, to marry the said Marquis, Prince, and Duke, with the Princess and Daughters his Sister, by words of the present. Whereunto the said Archbishop at the first made some refusal: saying, That his accustomed solemnities must be therein observed. Whereunto he replied most learnedly, That his presence was more than all other solemnities, and that his Cabinet was a sacred place. And therefore having commanded the said Archbishop to go on, notwithstanding all difficulties, he proceeded then to the nuptial blessing of the said parties present, that were there conjoynd in marriage, even as if they had been in the greatest Church in Paris, which done, every one went to his devotion. Afterwards the King commanded his Sister to attire her selfe like a Bride: and so the feast was solemnly celebrated. All the great Officers did assist and serve there in their degrees, with all the grace and honour the King could devise to give unto the Prince of Lorraine his brother in law. This marriage was honoured with all kinds of sports and dancing.

About the end of February, the said Princess went with her husband into Lorraine, whereas the Duke gave her the greatest entertainment he could devise, embracing her as his owne child. There had been great heart-burning and discontentment, by reason of the diversity of Religion. The Kings intentions were, to drowne the remembrance of the bitterness of fore-past reigns, in the mildness of his government, and that the common feeling of so many miseries which they had suffered, and which had continued, should persuade them to grow familiar and friendly together, and to have no more occasion to remember things past, then his Majesty had meaning to remember his owne wrongs. Warre is not dead in an Estate whereas consciences are divided: it doth but sleepe, a small matter awakens it: there is nothing more apprehensive, or that doth pierce more violently into the persuasion of men, to bandy them one against another, then religion. Every man thinks his owne the better, and so judgeth of it, more by his owne zeale and passion, then through knowledge and reason.

The King, during the warre, had runne to those things which did most presse him, and to the dangers that did most import: he had deferred to reconcile this division, being grieved in his soule that the impiety of the warre would not suffer him to make shew of the fruits of his piety.

They of the reformed Religion, made many and great complaints, that the Kings Edicts were not observed nor kept: that they were not provided of all things necessary for the exercise of their Religion, the liberty of their consciences, and the safety of their persons and fortunes. They said moreover, that they desired not that the order of government of State should be changed to their profit, or of any foraine Prince: nor to have the State torne in pieces, to please the ambition of some few men, but onely to enjoy their consciences with peace, and their lives in safety. That so many iust requests granted unto them by the Edicts of Kings, predecessors to his Majesty, demanded and defended by himselfe, with so great zeale and vertue, had not bene hearkned unto vnder his reign, when and vnder whom they should best hope: and had it not been for the affection which they had unto his Greatness, and the foundation which they layd on his good wil towards them, they might lawfully and profitably have praised the wayes which they were forced to hold vnder Kings his predecessors. But they could not despaire any thing of him, A whom God by the protection of his Church had brought unto the succession of the Crowne, nor obtaine life then liberty and life, having spent their bloods so freely for him. They complained, that Preaching was banished from his Majesties Court, to banish them consequently from his House, where they could not serve him without serving of God. No good man might remaine there, but he was daily in danger of murdering, or to be hurt, without hope of comfort, or assurance of grace. That they practise daily to exclude them of the Religion from all charges and offices in the State, Iustice, Treasure and Policy, which they did neuer greatly affect, as his Majesty can best witness. They beseech him to iudge, if it be reasonable they should doe wrong unto their children, to deprive them by their dullness, to be held in future ages for Lewes within the Realme, in stead of the honourable ranke which their progenitors had left them, and which their service done unto his Majesty should have purchased them. That it was more tolerable to live vnder the truce of the deceased King, who was an enemy to their profession, yet he did grant unto them the exercise of their Religion, both in his army, and in his Court, allowed the Ministry at his owne charge, and gave them a towne of retreat in every Bayliwicke.

His Majesties good servants knew not what to answer to these generall complaints, knowing that it is more troublesome to be deprived of that which is promised and allowed, then of things but hoped for, which makes troubled minds to passe from the hope of good, to the expectation of ill; from long and fruitlesse patience, to seek for remedy. They knew well his Majesty was not without alarme: that hee would take no delight to see a Protector, and would be iealous they should address themselves to any other but himselfe. This Petition ended with bolder speeches then were fit for an obedient Estate, and for men that will seeme moderate and staid, who desire nothing but what shall please the Prince, and who should referre all their wils to his discretion. We cannot speake too humble, too reverently, to Kings. We must vie words of filke, as Parisius said: Sir, will you take from them all desire to have a Protector, free them of the necessity, beaen one to them your selfe, continue over them this first care, this first affection; prevent their supplications by a full motion, their iust demands by a voluntary grant of necessary things: when they should see you have care over them, they will not have it of themselves. But pardon him that should tell you, that they all doubt whether you have enough of your selfe. You know what hurts them, and what helps them: the petitions you presented for them to Kings your predecessors, for their liberties and safeties, take them now to your selfe. Doubtlesse since that time they have left nothing of their doctrine, they have done you great services, and should have purchased an increase in your authority, who may both report and fully satisfy their iust demands, and without any Deputies, and with more thanks, if you please, be both Iudge and Advocate.

Such were the discounts wherewith the King was daily importuned. The disposition of men, & above all of men of that sort, of Frenchmen of that religion, is to have a due spirit, the which are hardly stayed: to day a complaint, to morrow a petition, after that a Synod. This publike agitation profits them: they assemble, and dissolve not their Assembly before they know where they shall assemble againe.

The end of all these assemblies, was to obtaine an Edict from the King, so cleare and plaine, concerning all their necessities, as they should not be constrained to sue for any other: as they did not cease until the King had signed it, being at Nantes, after that he had reduced that Province unto his obedience, containing a Declaration of the Edicts of Pacification, and of the troubles growne in France for matter of Religion: the which was not allowed in the Court of Parliament at Paris, until the 25 of February this year 999, by reason of many oppositions and difficulties that were made. At Saint Germaine in Lay, Berthier, one of the Agents for the Clergy, made many petitions unto his Majesty, and did greatly importune the Lords of the Councell to consider of them. In like sort, the Bishop of Modena, who was then the Popes Nuncio in France, dealt in it, beseeching the King to deal for his subjects that were gone astray, as the honor of God might remaine whole, and the Church receive no prejudice: in so doing, his Holiness would endure all things for the peace of France.

Berthier demanded, that his Majesty would not suffer the Ministers of the reformed religion, to have any other liberty on this side the river of Loire, but to live quietly, and not not to be fought after. That the Catholike Religion should bee generally restored in all places, and Churchmen doe their offices without any danger. And thirdly, that the Clergy-men should be wholly freed from the vexations which they had suffered vntill that day, in townes and places held by them of the Religion, where they had taken away their pensions and reuenues, and in some provinces had forced them. His Maiesty granted the second and third Article: and as for the first, the King not being able to make any such prohibition without some trouble, it was let alone.

Contentation eliciting their Synods with strangers.

There was also great contention in particular, betwixt the said Berthier, and some of the Reformed religion, touching the assembly of their Synods: the which they would haue free, without demanding leave from his Maiesty: maintaining that they might goe freely into foraine countries, and assist at their Synods and other Acts: and in like sort receive strangers into theirs, the which the Marshall of Bouillon had managed with some, who perhaps had not foreseen the danger: but Berthier contested it so vehemently against the Marshall in the Kings presence, as his reasons being heard, and the importance of the thing considered, that it was a meanes to continue their Leagues and Intelligences with strangers, to be ready to take armes at their pleasures, the which could not be but with the ruine of the State. The King having heard their contentations, and finding of what importance it was, he presently caused that article touching foraine Synods to be razed: forbidding them expressly to goe to any Assemblies without his permission, vpon paine to be declared traitors.

The Rector for the Vniuersity of Paris was also a sutor vnto his Maiesties Council, that none of the Reformed religion, nor their Schoolemasters and Tutors, might be admitted into any Colledges of the Vniuersity: but to be excluded from all priuiledges. Whereupon there was great debate, especially for the faculty of Physicke. But it was answered, that they should not be admitted to teach: And as for Humanitie and professions of Faculties, they should be admitted as the rest. And although the difficulties were great, and the conditions in some cases more beneficiall then in the first Treaties of peace: yet the common quiet of all France, shaken and almost ruined with the tragique violence of Schismes and Diuisions, hath made all to be held necessary that was iust, and just whatsoever was profitable. Although it were to be wished, that there were but one exercise of Religion, for that in this vnity consists all truth. But seeing the reparation of the Church is the work of God, as well as the building of it, we must be content with that which may be, and leaue the triumph and conquest of soules, to his eternall Wisedome: who alone makes and frames the heart as he pleaseth, and giues the signe vnto many soules that are gone astray, to make them enter into saluation, being impossible for man to impose any necessity to things which God hath left in liberty, as the conscience, the which should be as free in Estates as in our thoughts.

Our consciences should be free.

The Church hath alwayes detested Heresies, but they neuer employed the rigour of their iudgements, but against the Arch-Heresitikes, and but when they had shewed themselves obstinate in their errors: their punishments were more shamefull then cruel, more medicinall then mortall, desiring rather to see their faces blush for shame, then wet with blood. Neuer Prince well-advised, did put his subjects to death to force belief, destroyed his Provinces by Warre, to instruct their consciences by the sword: knowing well that Religion is an act of Vnion, of Concord, and of Instruction; and Warre is nothing but Sedition and Destruction. And those which in this world haue troubled both heauen and earth, to force their subjects consciences vnto one Religion, haue in the end been constrained and forced, to suffer them to liue free and in rest, rejecting and refusing the aduice of those bad Physicians, who applied nothing but Antimony and Phlebotomy to all diseases.

Private & Infidels Princes
doe hurt.

By these reasons, the King (in whose person God hath done so many miracles, and poured forth a sea of blessings) seeing that the continuance of the warre had produced no other fruits but the ruine of Iustice and Pietie, which be the two vertues which doe cano- nize Princes, the two Pillars vpon whose firmnesse great Clouis was assured of the continuance of this Estate, he doth now confirme the Edict of Pacification of the troubles for matters of Religion, and wils that which he may, lest he should incur the note of such as seeke to correct things that are incorrigible, and shew that the fore is greater then the remedy, that some things haue taken such deepe root, as they cannot bee pulled vp. A Truth and Reason haue proued, that this Edict was most iust, most necessary, and most profitable. Yet the Court of Parliament could not allow of this fraternity and communication of Offices: saying, That they should not be transported with the ambition of honours, but content themselves with the tranquility of conscience: that it is not convenient in one estate, to haue great offices executed by men of diuers Religions, being a thing vnusult, to haue the new intreated as well as the ancient. They found a great difference betwixt this Edict and the Precedent, and refused to allow it. The King sent for the chiefe of them, and spake vnto them in this manner.

You see me in my Cabinet, where I come to speake vnto you, not attired in any Royall ornaments, nor with cloake or rapier, as my predecessors: nor as a Prince that comes from receiuing of Ambassadors: but apparelled like a Father of a Family in his doublet and hose, to speake familiarly to his children. That which I haue to say vnto you, is to desire you to confirme the Edict which I haue granted to them of the Religion. That which I haue done, is for the good of the peace. I haue made it without, I desire to settle it within my Realme. You ought to obey me, if there were no consideration but my quality, and the bond whereby all my subjects are tied vnto me, and you especially of my Court of Parliament. I haue restored some to their houses from whence they are expelled: and others to their credit, which was lost.

If obedience was due to my Predecessors, there is as much or more deuotion due vnto me, who haue settled the State. God hath made choice of me to put me in possession of the Realme, which is mine owne, both by succession and acquisition. The Iudges of my Parliament should not sit in their seats but for me. I will not bragge, but I dare boldly say, that I haue no example to imitate, but my selfe. I know there haue bene factions in the Parliament: that they haue stirred vp seditious Preachers. But I will take good order for such people, and will not attend your pleasures. In former times they haue punished them with great severity, that haue preached lesse seditiously then they doe now. It is the course they tooke to make the barricadoes, and by degrees to murder the deceased King, I will cut vp all these factions by the roots: and will shorten all them that shall nourish them. I haue leaped our towne-walls, I will easily passe our barricadoes. They should not obiect vnto me the Catholike Religion, nor the respect of the holy Sea. I know the duty which I owe the one as the most Christian King, and the honour of the name which I carry, and the other as the first sonne of the Church. Those which thinke themselves to be in good termes with the Pope, are deceived. I am more then they. When I shall undertake it, I will make you all to be declared Heretikes for disobeying of me.

The Maiesty of Kings is alwayes wronged by the contempt of their decrees: but the offence is alwayes greater, when it comes from them that should see them to be obeyed. Those which deny the execution of my Edicts, desire warre. I will proclaim it to morrow against them of the Religion: but I will not make it my selfe, I will send them: I haue made the Edict, I will haue it obserued, my will should serue for reason, the which is neuer demanded of the Prince in an obedient State. Their wils should be put in execution, and not interpreted: And yet I say vnto you, that necessity and profit hath drawne mee vnto it. I haue done it by the aduice of all my Council, who haue found it good and necessary for the estate of my affaires, and the good of my seruice: to settle concord, and to disperse all the miseries which discord doth bring forth.

Some haue complained, that I would make leaues of Suisses, or of other troops. If I did, they must thinke it were to some good end, by reason of all my actions past. Witnesse that which I haue done for the recovery of Auiens, where I haue employed the money of the Edicts which you would not haue passed, if I had not come my selfe vnto the Parliament. Necessity hath forced me to make this Edict: by the same necessity I haue heretofore played the fouldier.

They haue talked at their pleasures, and I haue not seemed to regard it. I am now a King, and speake as a King, I will be obeyed. There is not any one of you that finds me not good when he hath need of me. And there is not any one but hath need once in the year, and yet you're bad to me that am so good. If other Parliaments (for that they haue impugned my will) haue bene the cause that they of the Religion haue demanded new things, I would not haue you the cause of other innovations, by your refusal. In the year 1594 and 95, when I sent vnto you a Declaration vpon the Edict, for the promouing of Offices, I did

"Talk not so much of the Catholike religion. To all these great criers, Catholikes and Ecclesiastikes, let mee giue to one a thousand crownes a yeare in Benefices, to another foure thousand Liures of rent, they will not speake a word more. I haue the same opinion of all others that shall speake against the Edict. There are some which hate the sinne for feare of punishment, but the good hate it for the loue of vertue. For Gods sake let me know that you hate sinne for the loue of vertue, or else I will chastise them that hate it for feare of paine: and afterwards they will thanke me, as the son doth his father. The Preachers deliuer words in their Sermons, more to nourish, then to destroy sedition, yet no one of you saith any thing: these faults which concerne me, are not regarded. But I will foresee that this thunder shall bring no storm, and that their predictions shall proue vaine. I will not vse their remedies, which being out of season, will but increase the euill. Consider that the Edict wherof I speake, is the deceased Kings Edict: it is also mine, for it was made with me, and I doe now confirme it. I will say no more, but aduise you to imitate the example of the obedience of the Duke of Mayenne. Being perswaded to enter in some factions against my will, he answered, that he was too much bound vnto mee, and so were all my subiects, amongst the which he would be alwayes one that should expose his life to please me, for that I had restored France in despite of them that fought to ruine it. And if he that was the head of the League, hath spoken in this manner, how much more ought you, whom I haue restored to the place from whence the League had expelled you, yeeld vnto my request, that which you would not doe for threats: you shall haue none of mee: doe that which I command you, or rather what I intreat you, you shall not doe it onely for me, but for your felues, and for the good of the peace.

This speech was well vnderstood by the Parliament, and the difficulties which were found in the allowance of the Edict, were held tolerable, by reason of the Kings will, and the necessity of his affaires. Yet they continued forty dayes after, before they would resolue. The Duchesse of Barr, the Kings sister, would not depart out of Paris, before it was confirmed. She had shewed her selfe burning in zeale and affection in that matter, as in all other affaires in that nature: and it was not without reason, that after the Kings entry into Paris, when as the Deputies of the Churches of Poictou beseeched his Maiesty for something depending vpon the execution of his Edicts: hee said vnto them, A dresse your felues vnto my Sister, your Estate is now fallen vnto the Disasse. The Articles and Edict are as followeth.

Edict of Pacification.

HENRY by the grace of God, &c. Amongst the infinite blessings which it hath pleased God to bestow vpon vs, that is the most remarkable, to haue giuen vs vertue and courage not to yeeld to the fearful troubles, confusions, and disorders, which we found at our coming to this Realme, the which was diuided into so many parts and factions, as the most lawfull seemed to bee the least: and to haue so fortified vs against this storme, as in the end we haue surmounted it, and doe now touch the gate of this Estates rest: whereof the glory belongs to him, and to vs the bond and thanks, that hee would vse our labour to finish this good worke: wherein it hath been visible to all men, whether we haue done that which was our duty, and in our power, yea somewhat more, the which it may be in another season had not bene so fit for the dignitie which we hold, hauing not feared to expose our life often and freely therein. And in this great concurrence of so great and dangerous affaires, not being able to pacifie all at one instant, we haue bene forced to hold this course, to attempt those first which could not be ended but by force, and suspend the rest for a time, which ought and might be treated by reason and iustice: as the generall differences betwix our good subiects, and priuate grieuances of the founteyne part of the State, which we held, might more easily be cured, the principall cause being taken away, the which was in the continuance of the ciuill warres.

This hauing by the grace of God well and happily succeeded, and all armes and hostility

A sility ceasing throughout the Realme, we hope our successe will be nolesse in other affaires, which remaine yet to compound: And that by this meanes we shall attaine vnto the establishment of a good peace and tranquility, the which hath alwayes been the end of our vovues and intentions, and the prize which we desire of so much paine and toyle, wherein we haue past the course of our age. Amongst the said affaires, to the which we haue bene forced to giue patience, and one of the chiefe, haue bene the complaints which we haue receiued from many of our Prouinces and Catholike townes, that the exercise of the Catholike Religion was not vniuersally restored, as it ought by the Edicts heretofore made for the pacification of the troubles by reason of religion, as also the supplications and remonstrances, which haue bene made vnto vs, by our subiects of the pretended reformed religion, as well vpon the not executing of that which hath bene granted by the said Edicts, as vpon that which they desire should bee added for the exercise of their said Religion, the liberty of their Consciences, and the surety of their owne persons and fortunes: pretending to haue iust cause, to haue new and greater apprehensions, by reason of these last troubles, wherof the principall pretext and ground was made vpon the ruine. Wherefore not to ouer charge our felues with too much businesse at once, seeing that the fury of A mes cannot agree with establishment of Lawes, how good fociuer, we haue from time to time deferred it.

C But now seeing it hath pleased Almighty God to giue vs some rest, we haue thought we could not better employ our time, then in that which might concerne the glory of his Holy name and seruice, and to provide that he may be worshipped by all our subiects: And if it hath not pleased him that they should bee all of one forme and religion, yet at the least of one intention, and with that order, as it might breed no trouble nor tumult amongst them: and that both wee and this Realme may enioy the glorious title of The most Christian King, which hath bene by so many merits long since purchased: And by the same meanes to take away the cause of trouble, which may happen for matters of Religion, which is the most sensible of all others. For this occasion knowing this businesse to be of great importance, and worthy of good consideration, hauing receiued the complaints of our Catholike subiects, giuing also leaue to them of the pretended reformed Religion, to assemble by their Deputies, and to make their remonstrances, and hauing thereupon often conferred with them, and viewed the precedent Edicts; we haue now thought it necessary, to giue vnto all our said subiects, a generall, plaine, and absolute law, by the which they may bee ruled in all differences which haue heretofore happened amongst them, and which may happen: wherewith all our subiects may haue cause to rest contented, according to the quality of the time.

The cause which makes vs to enter into this deliberation, is the onely zeale wee haue vnto the seruice of God, and that it may be hereafter duely performed by our subiects, and to settle a good and durable peace amongst them. Wherein we employe and attend E the same protection and fauour of his diuine bountie, which he hath alwayes imparted to this Realme since the first beginning: And that of his grace he will make our subiects conceiue, that in the obseruation of this our Edict, consists (after their duty vnto vs) the chiefe ground of their union, concord, tranquility, and peace, and the restoring of this Estate to her first beauty, wealth, and force. And wee for our part, promise to cause it to bee exactly obserued, without suffering any thing to be done to the contrary.

For these causes, hauing with the aduice of the Princes of our blood, other Princes and Officers of the Crowne, with great and notable personages of our Council of State, being neare vs, well and diligently waighed and considered all these busineses, we haue by this perpetuall and irrevocable Edict, said, declared and ordained, and say, declare and ordaine:

That there shall bee an abolition and forgetting of all things past on either side. That the remembrance of all iniuries shall be suppressed, and that they shall liue louingly together like brethren and fellow Citizens. That the Romish Religion shall be restored in all places of the Realme where it hath bene intermitted, and that no Clergie-man shall be molested in the celebration of Diuine Service, but shall enioy the fruites and reuenuues of their benefices, and haue full possession of whatsoever hath bene detain-

That no Clergie-man, or any other, shall demand any ground which is employed for the fortification and reparation of Townes and places, but when they shall be ruined by the Kings Decree. That they of the Religion may liue in all the towns and places of the Realme without feare, vexation or molestation, nor be forced to doe any thing in matter of Religion contrary to their consciences. That Noblemen and Gentlemen hauing high iustice, may haue the exercise of the reformed religion in their houses. That they may continue the exercise of the religion in all townes & places where it had been publicly vied in the years 1596 and 97. That they might not vse the exercise of the reformed Religion, but in such places as were allowed by this present Edict. It was also forbidden in Court, or beyond the mountains, within the Citie of Paris, or within five leagues thereof: notwithstanding they which dwelt there, should not be molested in their houses, nor forced to do any thing contrary to their consciences, carrying themselves modestly according to this Edict. That they should not haue any publike exercise of the Religion in any army, but in those quarters where the chiefe Commanders were of that profession; except that where the King should be lodged. That they might build houses for the exercise of the religion, in all Townes and places which were granted them. That all Preachers and Readers should cary themselves modestly, and not speake any thing which might tend to sedition. All men of what quality soeuer were forbidden to take any children by force, and against the will of their parents, to haue them baptised or confirmed in the contrary religion. That they of the reformed Religion should not be molested for any aburiation, promises or oaths which they had formerly made. That they should be bound to obserue the Feast, appointed by the Romish Church, and not worke vpon those daies, nor sell or detaile any thing in open shops. That no bookes concerning the reformed religion should be printed or sold, but in those townes where the exercise thereof was allowed. That there should be no distinction in regard of religion to receiue Schollers into Vniuersities, Colledges, and Schooles, and the poore into Hospitalls. That they should be bound to obserue the lawes of the Romish Church, touching marriages in degrees of consanguinity and affinity. That they of the reformed religion shall be forced by all due meanes, to pay their Tythes to Clergie-men, or any other to whom they shall belong, according to the custome of the place. That excommunications or deprivations made in hatred of Religion should be void. That all they which made profession of the reformed Religion, should be capable to exercise all estates, dignities, offices, and publike charges, and be indifferently admitted vnto them. That they should haue prouision made in all townes and places of the Realme for the interring of their dead. That the Kings officers should foresee there should be no scandall committed at the same, and should bee bound within fifteene daies (vpon request) to provide them sufficient place for their burials, and not to exact any thing for the conduct of their dead, vpon paine of confiscation. That there should be a Chamber erected in the Court of Parliament at Paris, consisting of one President, and sixteene Councellers, and called the Chamber of the Edict, which should not onely take knowledge of the causes and suits of them of the reformed religion, which shall bee within the iurisdiction of the said Court, but also in the limits of the Parliaments of Normandie, and Britany, vntill there should be a Chamber erected in either of them. That there should be two Chambers erected for the Parliaments of Grenoble and Bourdeaux, as there was at Castres for that of Thoulouze: and for the reception and entertainment of all the Presidents and Councellers of the Religion, which were to be admitted vpon these new erections, there was prouisions made at large by the Edict.

All Sentences, Iudgments, Seizures, Sales and Decrees made against them of the reformed religion, aliuie or dead, since the death of King Henry the second, by reason of the said Religion, were reuoked and disannulled, and to be taken out of the Registers of all Courts, and the markes and monuments of the said executions against their persons, memory and posterity to be defaced and taken away: And generally he reuoked all proceedings and informations made for enterprises pretended to bee treason, ordaining that they of the same Religion, and others which had followed their party, and their heires, should retorne into the actual and reall possession of all their goods. In all enquiries for any ciuill cause, if the Inquisitor were a Catholike, the party should be bound to chuse an assistant of the reformed religion, and the like should be practised if the Inquisitor were of the reformed Religion. All foueraigne Courts, and others within the realme, were forbidden to take knowledge of any causes belonging to them of the religion, the which by the Edict, are referred to the said Chambers, if the reuoy be demanded. That all titles, papers, instructions and documents should be restored on either side to them to whom they should belong. That the children of such as had retired themselves out of the realme since the death of King Henry the second, by reason of the religion and troubles, although they were borne out of the realme, should be held for naturall Frenchmen and Denizens, and not be bound to sue for any letters of naturality, vpon condition that they should retorne within ten years after this Edict, and liue within the realme. That all townes and places within the Realme should enioy the same liberties, priuiledges, freedome, faieres, markets, iurisdic-tions, and seats of Iustice, which they did before the troubles begun in March one thousand five hundred eighty five, notwithstanding all letters to the contrary. That all prisoners detained by the authority of Iustice or otherwise, yea, in the Gallies by reason of the troubles, or of the said religion, shall be set at liberty. That they of the reformed religion, should not be ouerburthened with any charges, but according to the proportion of their goods and faculties. That they of the said religion, or any other which had followed their party, and which had remained in any townes or places held by them, and had contributed vnto them, should not be pursued for the payment of any taxes, subsidies, or other charges imposed during the troubles, and before the Kings comming to the Crowne.

D That all Commanders, Noblemen, Gentlemen, Officers, Corporations and Commonalties, and all others which had assisted them, should bee discharged of all such sums of money as had beene taken and leauied by them and their appointment, as well of the King, as of Townes, Commonalties, and priuate persons, and of all other things, tending to benefit of any other nature, taken by them by reason of the troubles, begun one thousand five hundred eighty five, vntill the Kings comming to the Crowne: And they were also discharged of all acts of hostility, leauies of men, coyning of money, casting of Ordnance, making of Gunpowder, building and demanding of Townes and Castles, enterprised vpon them, burning and ruining of Churches and houses; and generally of all which had beene done and negotiated during the said troubles, since the death of King Henry the second.

That they of the Religion should also be discharged from all generall and prouinciall assemblies held vntill that day, and also of the Councells erected by them throughout the Prouinces, with the orders made in the said assemblies and Councells, touching the maintenance of the war; and generally for all which had beene done, refused and ordained by the said assemblies and Councells. That they of the reformed Religion should presently desist from all practices, negotiations and intelligences, as well within as without the realme: and the said assemblies and Councells made within the Prouinces to be presently dissolved.

That all prizes at Sea during the troubles, and those which had beene made at land vpon the contrary party, should remaine suppressed vnder the benefit of the Edict, and for the which there should be no pursue made. That they of the reformed Religion should not be called in question for any opposition they had made since the troubles, to the execution of any decrees, made for the reestablishment of the Romish religion in diuers parts of the Realme. That all execrable facts should bee exempted out of the general Pardon, as the forcing of Wiues and Virgins, burnings, murders, and robberies, done by treachery, and not in hostile manner, and such like. commanded by the heads of either party, according to necessity, and the order of the war: And that all exactions of money, carrying of armes, and other exploits of warre done by priuate authority, should be prosecuted by course of law. That Townes dismantled during the troubles, might be repaired at the Inhabitants charges. That all former Edicts, secret Articles, Letters, Declarations, Decrees, and Records made heretofore by himselfe, and the Kings his predecessors, concerning matters of religion, and the troubles past, should be void and of no force, expressly declaring, That this Edict should be inuolubly kept and obserued by all his Officers and Subjects, notwithstanding any thing which might seeme contrary.

And for the better assurance of the obseruation thereof, his pleasure was, That all Gouernours and Lieutenants of Provinces, with other inferior Magistrates and Iudges, should sweare to cause it to be kept and obserued, euery one in his iurisdiction: and that they should cause the chiefe Inhabitants of their Townes, to sweare the obseruation thereof, presently after the publication.

This was the substance of the Edict of Nantes, containing ninety two Articles, besides some other which were secret.

And for the resolution of many other difficulties, for the chiefe government of them of this Religion, by the which many things were granted, whereof it is not lawful for subjects to demand the reason, being most certaine that the Prince doth not any thing but for the good of his people. It sufficeth that they know it which deserue to know it. But the more the secrets of an Estate are lookt into, the more carefully they are to be concealed. This Edict which heretofore had bene the cause of ciuill diuisions, is now the true ciment of peace, the which shall poure forth from all parts streames of heavenly blessings. But as it is made for publike and generall respects, so must it haue priuate effects, in smothering all teeds of partialities and factions: and that we may finde among the French, that which the Emperour Maximine desired vnto the Romans, a forgetfulness of things past, and assurance of loue to come.

The Edict was made at Nants in April 1598, but it was not verified by the Court of Parliament at Paris, vntill February the yeare following.

The Edict was sent, by the care and diligence of the Kings Attorney General, vnto all the Bayliuicks depending vpon Paris: and yet his Maiesty had deputed in euery Province, certaine Commissioners for the execution thereof. The exercise of the Catholike Religion was restored in Rochell, and in aboue a hundred walled Townes, and a thousand Parishes and Monasteries, where the said exercise had bene interdicted aboue fifteene yeares: and in Beaine for the space of one and thirty yeares.

This yeare death strucke a great stroke among men and women, who shewed their generous resolutions against the feare and terrors thereof. Peter de Pinac the last of that name, Primate of France, Archbishop and Earle of Lions, died in the beginning of Ianuary: whose life was so famous, as it deserues to bee briefly set downe in this History. The reputation which he had gotten at the Estates at Blois, made King Henry the third (a great Prince, as well in iudging as in recompensing of good wits) to call him to his Councell, after the death of Antonie Bishop of Valentia: whereas he shewed himselfe to be of that iudgment, as he was in short time employed in the greatest affaires in Councell. At that time the Court was in a manner all Gascon, there was no entry into the Kings fauours, nor bounty, but at the Duke of Elpermons pleasure, who was the Hephestion of our Alexander. Peter de Pinacs heart could not submit it selfe to that of Iohn Lewis of Nogaret, he was too much his owne to be any other mans, and thought, that if he must needs serue, it was enough to serue the Master, and not to submit himselfe to the will of the seruant.

A He did not affect the tedious seruitude of the Court, nor did much care for that forced kinde of life. Writing vnto his friends, long before the trouble of the League, hee said; That amidst the greatnesse and honour of charges wherein the King did employ him, he did not leaue to desire the content of a happy retreat. But things fell out otherwise then he expected. The League burst forth in Champagne. The King sent him to pacifie the Duke of Guise. In this negotiation he had a quarrell with Elpermon vpon certaine words which blemished both their honours. He had written a Poeme against the Mignons, wherewith the King was offended, commanding him to leaue the Court: so as he retired himselfe to his owne house, after the treaty of peace made at Nemours. But as the Kings blowes were but threats, so knowing well that this Prelate was not to lie idely in a corner of the Realme, and that this great deligne of the League (like vnto a bill of snow) did encrease in many rownes, whereas the Kings obedience was grown cold, and that the Princes enemies to this Crowne, prepared to gather the Flower-de-Luce, he neuer ceased vntill he had called him againe to Court.

This returne was the beginning of his miserie. Many others before him hauing fallen into disgrace with the Prince, haue not bene raised againe but for a greater fall. It is seene in the Courts of all Princes, such Tragedies are vusual. Hee was presently called to the helme of affaires, and was followed and respected more then any other Nobleman in Court. But as we may not iudge of the day by the morning, nor of the felicity of man by the good daies of his life, this happinesse was but the entry to misfortune, which did attend him. He embarked himselfe in the same Ship with the Duke of Guise, the which being broken at the Estates of Blois, he had no other meanes to saue himselfe but through the fauour of the Baron of Lux his Nephew. He was giuen in ranfome to Gas, who kept him seuen or eight moneths in the Castle of Amboise, and then let him at liberty for thirty thousand Crownes. He went to the Duke of Maine, and seeing that the affaires of his party tended too much to confusion, and to a popular government, he perswaded him alwaies to retaine the forme of a Monarchy, to the end he might oppose a kinde of Royalty against the King, and not be blamed to haue broken the bonds of the Estate. So through this aduice, they made Officers of the Crowne, and gaue him the D Seales. He neuer engaged himselfe vpon the promises of Spaine, but said alwaies, that he was a true hearted Frenchman.

The faction of Spaine knowing him to be such, hindred Pope Sixtus the fifth from giuing him a Cardinalls hat: and they disswaded Clement the eight, who had said, That at the first promotion he would remember his meritis. He required them well: when as the Spaniards came to Paris to propound the Coronation and marriage of the Infanta Isabella of Spaine, letting them know that the Flower-de-Luce could not spin. He returned to Lions, leauing the Duke of Mayenne, intending to settle his affaires, and to accommodate himselfe with the peace and generall good of the Realme. At his returne grew that tumult against the D. of Nemours, the which he viewed ill, for his wisdom did not second the occasion. Great vnderstanding failes sometimes in the perfection of iudgment and discourse. He saw himselfe forced to depart the City, and neuer to returne againe, vntill the King made his first entry. The King (who had shewed effects of his bounty and clemency to his greatest enemies) could not loue him, hauing this impression in his soule, that he was the onely instrument to crosse his fortunes. Speaking one day of the peace of Nemours, in the yeare 1586, he said vnto him, That in that negotiation he had giuen good testimony that he loued him not, and that he had done him bad seruice. "My Liege (answered he) I could not doe better for the seruice of the King my Master. I had done otherwise if I had bene your seruant, as I am now. When as the Duke of Elpermon returning out of Prouence, went to visit him at his Palace, amongst other speeches of the remembrance of things past, he said vnto him, That he did not thinke there was any one in France whose Fortunes had bene so crost as theirs: the Archbishop answered him, As for mine, it was neuer crost but by you.

After the reduction of the City of Lions to the Kings obedience, this great spirit borne to action, grew discontented to see himselfe no more in the honour and reputation that hee had bene. Hee then resolved to apply his minde onely to the affaires of his charge, to chooseth the time most conuenient for the tranquillitie of the haueu whereunto hee approached. Pierre-anize, he said, that he would not use his liberty well: he writes vnto his friend A in this manner.

Remember that I haue alwaies said vnto you, that Monsieur de Nemours will find himselfe much entangled with the Spaniards, who haue led Monsieur de Maine into an inextricable Labyrinth, and will bring Monsieur de Nemours vnto a miserable Estate: and I dare in a manner prophesie, That in the end the Duke of Sauoy will finde himselfe deceived as well as the rest. The Spaniards thirst is nearer vnto him than his doubler, and hee will rather seeke to preferue his owne, then to vsurpe an other mans estate for an other.

The King sent for him to the Estates of Roan: but the necessity of his affaires would B not suffer him to goe. He said, That he was not fit for this age, and that hee was like vnto the Adamant, which serues not for all seas. In the end of his last yeare, he complained vnto his friends of the shortnesse of his life, saying, That he was not to liue about ten or twelue yeares, when he liued not twelue daies. His Physicians disagreed vpon the cause of his griefe: he had bene long troubled with the Emoroyds, the which had so emptied his body, as there was no blood found in him when he was opened. His lights were much altered. And for that his Physician said vnto him, that his griefe was the gout, hee replied, Is it possible that any one should die of the gout without a fever? I see well what it is: seeing men vnderstand nothing, wee must haue recourse vnto God. The third day of his sicknesse his body was called to the earth, and his soule to heauen. He withstood C the terrors of death with as great a courage as when it was presented vnto him at the Estates of Blois. Four or five houres before his decease, a Capuchin came to visit him and to comfort him, exhorting him to free his last passage courageously, and to let him know that the issue of this life is equall. Death disrobing man of his titles and dignities, as Stage-players doe their attire: he called him simply by his name: when as hee vnderstood this new manner of complement, and that they called him Peter de Pinac without any other ceremony, he lifted vp his head and eyes, to say vnto him that spake, What art thou? They found that this speech did somewhat amaze him, and that he did take it as a watch-word of his departure, which was about midnight.

The D. of Biron did see him in his sicknesse, and assisted at his Funerall. No man li- D uing did better iudge of the nature of men by the consideration of their villages: he did diuine of the Marshall Birons fortune by his countenance, and the proportion of his visage, for hauing considered it somewhat curiously, he said vnto his sister after his departure; He hath the worst Physionomy that euer I obserued in my life, as of a man that would perish miserably.

The Archbishop of Lions had profited so little by the troubles, as had he liued longer, necessity had forced him to feele great discommodities: his Sisters estate was engaged, the fruits of his benefices were seized on, and yet his table was as sumptuous as in the best daies of his prosperity. The Leagues had cost him fifty thousand crowns, the Doubtles of Spaine had left him nothing but Doubles.

Those which haue read the publicke actions of this Prelate, may iudge of this doctrine, E but no man can represent the grace and force of his action but those which haue seene them. He had in him a concurrence of all things necessary for an eloquent discourse. A graue pleasing countenance, a goodly personage, a facility of words, and an action that did charme his Auditors. The Duke Ioyeuse Marshall of France, being at Paris in March, hauing heard father Lawrence Sermons in Saint Germain L'Auxerrois, being moued in conscience, after that he had taken his leaue of the Ladies and some other friends, he returned againe to the Capuchins: where being received by the fathers he did a hard penance, and submitted himselfe to all the duties of a religious man. All men were amazed to see him returne the second time to his couent, being plunged (in shew) vp to the eares F in the delights of the world: but his conscience tied him to returne by the bond of his vow, perswading him, that it were better not to vow, then not to keepe a vow made freely, & without constraint or compulsion in his maiory. The first motiue of being a Capuchin came into his heart by inspiration, when as the deceased King Henry the 3 went on foot in procession to Chartres to haue issue, if it pleased God. He was then called Earl of Bouchages, he made choise of this order among all others, the better to doe his penance. And the rather, for that hee vnderstood that he was dedicated by his deceased father, to

A to be of the Church. When he was first a Nouice, hee applied his study with so great a courage, as he was blamed for his great diligence, wearing the haire continually. Hee had his shoulders all torne with wounds.

In this Estate he continued vntill the hottest of the late miserable warre: when as after the death of his father, his yonger brother, who was a Knight of Malta, and Grand-Prior of Languedoc was called Duke of Ioyeuz (for the Duke of Ioyeuz, brother-in-law to King Henry the 3 deceased, his eldest brother, who was slaine at the battell of Coutras with Saint Sauour his yongest brother, died without children) the said Duke of Ioyeuz being acknowledged by them of Tholouze, Narbone & others of the league, B for their head, he made an enterprize vpon the towne of Villemaur in Lauragais, where hauing planted the siege, for that it was held by the Royalists, even as he thought to haue forced the towne, the Lords of Themines, Chambaut and Misillac came to relieue it, who charged him with such aduantage, as they put all his army to rout, so as the said Duke retrying to the passage of a riuer, he was drowned with many others. By this meanes the house of Ioyeuz was reduced to the Cardinall of Ioyeuz his brother and to the Earle of Bouchage a Capuchin (whom then they called father Angelo) the Tholousians and Nobility of their party being much amazed, had recourse vnto the Cardinall, whom they intreated often to take the charge of leading them: the which hee would neuer accept. And in the end, at their instant sute, that in raising his house, hee would succour them by the means of the Earle of Bouchages his brother, who was then more then capable of such a charge: but he was a Capuchin. This difficulty was propounded to the counsell C of the Diuines, who concluded that by reason of the vrgent necessity they should withdraw him from thence: the which was propounded vnto himselfe, and he refused it. But after they had layed before him the example of his owne father, who being Grand Prior of Languedoc was yet dispenced withall to marry and to raise his house, the which remained onely in him, and whereof God had approved his blessing by the effect, so many braue Noblemen being borne of that marriage, hee consented to returne vnto the world, vpon two conditions. The one was, that it should be with the consent and leaue of the General of the Order. The other by the dispensation of the Holy Sea, and that he might D returne againe when God should send rest to the Church and State. This obtained from the Pope and his Generall father Angelo is againe of the world, and doth all acts of a worldling, of a Capaine and of a souldier, applying himselfe to the humours of the time. After that he had pacified many popular seditions in Tholouza, and bene a meanes to reduce it to the Kings obedience, being at Paris, hauing with the Kings good liking and pleasure married his only Daughter to the Duke of Monpensier a Prince of the blood, hee be thought himselfe of his bond contained in his dispence, and went and yielded his obedience vnto the Holy Sea and Order, whereas hee is now one of the chiefe conductors, hauing referred all his domestick affaires to the Cardinall his brother, and to the Duke his sonne-in-law.

E His mothers teares preuailed much for his returne. Shee was more afflicted for this change, then for the death of all her other children, and neuer ceased vntill he had drawn Friar Angelo (for so the still called him) out of the deserts of Egypt, to Mount Caluarie, and that hee had seene him in the habit which he had left. These bee mighty effects of grace, which reforms that which is deformed, and conformes that which is reformed, confirms that which is conformed, transforms that which is confirmed, and makes the soule to liue more in Heauen, whither it aspires, then in the body, where it breathes. The King went to visit him, and commended his resolution, saying that hee did sometimes thinke to speake vnto him of it: and had done it, but he doubted that hee would mistake his meaning, and thinke he did it to berid of him. Dying one day in a place whereas there F was only his Majesty & three other Noblemen, hee sayd vnto them, that in the world there were men of all conditions & qualities to be found, but they should hardly assemble foure so different, and that in these foure whereof he was one, there was a sinner conuerted, a Leaguer repented, a Capuchin diuerted, and a Huguenot peruerred.

This amazement in Court for the Duke of Ioyeuz, was increased by the sudden death of Schomberg, who was taken with an Apoplexie returning from Consians, whereas Villeroi had feasted the King and all his Counsell. It gaue him no respite to speake French nor Dutch. Warre dying, had left no quarrell in France, but for the Marquise of Salusses, which which the King demanded as depending vpon Dauphine, and the Duke of Sauoy A sought to vnterit vnto his house, from the which he pretends the Dauphines had wrested it. The difference of this restitution must bee determined by the Pope, who was named Arbitrator, by the treaty of Veruins. It is the most important sute that hath bene long time in Rome. The parties send their Ambassadors to Rome, to sue vnto the Arbitrator for Iudgement. President Burlet goes for the King, and the Count d'Arconas for the Duke of Sauoy, and they come to Rome in the beginning of the yeare. In the meane time the Duke beseecheth his Maiesty, that he will giue him leaue to visit him. The King answered, that he would gladly see him: but resolving to accompany his sister when she should goe into Lorraine, he should not make any long abroad in any one place during the B rest of the winter, and therefore hee desired him that hee would deferre his voyage vnto the spring, thinking that hee should not bee troubled to seeke him any farther, then in the City of Lions, where he meant to be about the same time. They pursue the Arbitrement at Rome: the Arbitrator (the best of good Popes) shewes as great integrity, as the parties did passion.

He was free from all affection that was contrary to Iustice, and would do nothing contrary to his conscience. He was carefully instructed by either party, concerning this controuersie. You may read the whole processe at large in the Originall. The Duke of Sauoy (having kept the Marquise of Salusses some yeeres, whilst that France had turned her own armes against her selfe) considered, that so soon as the King should overcome his other affaires, the recovery thereof would not be the last of his enterprises, for the restitution of that to his Crowne. He was therefore one of the first that sought to reconcile himselfe vnto the King: and the first propositions were made by Sebastian Zamet. The King could hardly beleue that the Duke of Sauoy would separate himselfe from the designs and counsels of the King of Spaine (who had a vaies a body of an army in France) being so strictly tied vnto him. He therefore sends to Sillery, his Ambassador in Switzerland, to enter into conference vpon this matter with the Dukes Ambassador there, and to sound his intention. The Duke had sent the Marquis of Aix into Spaine, to know how he should treat with the King. At the same time they surprized a Pacquet comming from Spaine, the which being deciphered, they found the Duke desired to treat in good earnest: for his Ambassador writing from Madrid, sent him word, that touching the forme of the accord, for the which he desired to haue counsell, the King of Spaines Ministers would neuer tell it, but with many conditions, and secretly, although it were a thing which they desired, that they might retire their forces, and in-employ them in Flanders, where as all things went to wracke. That if his Highnesse, whom it did import, could find the means to effect it, he was assured in the end they would find it good, as they had done many other designs, reiected by them in the beginning, and afterwards allowed, according to the success, many conferences were made concerning this cause, before the peace of Veruins, but nothing could bee concluded. His Holinesse being made Iudge and Arbitrator of all controuersies, betwixt his Maiesty and the Duke, the parties produce all their E pretensions. The Ambassador of France demanded restitution of the possession, saying: That it ought to bee iudged before the Propriety, and that the possession of above a hundred yeeres, should serue for a good title to France, if they had nothing else. The Dukes Ambassador answered, That power may giue possession without right, and that his Master had preferred his interest with the possession.

After many difficulties and much dispute, the French that were resident within Rome, gaue it out, that they had pleaded too much: that there was no reason the Pope should ouerthrow the right of a great King, to please a petty Prince: that they must end this quarrell with the Cannon in the plains of Piedmont. As these men braued it in words, the others published their reasons in writing, shewing that the rule of the law which will haue the dispossessed restored to his possession, is not practised among Princes, nor for principalities. The French insist vpon the contrary, and vige an end of this businesse with great vehemency, desiring rather to be presently dispatched, then to languish in the tediousnesse of the remedy. The Spaniards delayed the decision of this processe all they could, holding the dispute more auailable to them then the resolution, & the disease more profitable then the cure.

The time appointed for the Arbitrement was almost spent in tedious difficulties, as vnpleasing

A pleading vnto the Pope as to the French. And although hee had no lesse zeale to maintaine concord, then he had shewed affection and care to suppress discord, yet would he gladly haue bene freed of this iudgment, for the bad effects which he did apprehend, and whereof the coniectures were easie by the consideration of things past. Hee desired not that the Iudgment which he should pronounce, should giue any cause to the one or the other, to complaine of his Iustice, being troubled what hee should pronounce, for that it was a thing without example, and was dangerous to determine of that which had bene decided. In these two extreames, either to iudge the possession of the Marquise to the King, or to ioyne to the Petitory to content the Duke: he finds a means to haue the Mar-
B quise sequestered into his hands as a Newer, to remaine in deposito, vntill it should be adjudged vnto the one or the other. To this end F. Bonaventure Calatagiron, Generall of the Friars, and newly made Patriarch of Constantinople, was sent into France with Roncas the Dukes Secretary: vnto whom the King not onely granted (against the aduise of his C Council) that the Marquise should remaine in deposito in the Popes power, as one who had no pretension nor title vnto it: but also a prolongation of the Arbitrement for two moneths. The Duke was well pleased, that this sequestration should maintaine the hope of his possession. The French desired rather a definitive sentence, then a sequestration: for although they had no cause to doubt of the Depositors fidelity: yet through too much trust, men do often fall into great inconueniences. The Kings Ambassador freed them of those apprehensions, and managed this Sequestration so politickly, as they found it in better estate, then the Kings Council did expect. He caryed himselfe herein like a man of great Iudgment, neither could he serue his Master meanelly, in a subject of so great import.
The Duke grew in some ieaiousie of Arconas, for that he was a Milanese, beleeuing that he did rather follow the Spaniards intention, then his: whereupon he called him back to Turin, vnder colour to send him into Spaine. He that succeeded Arconas in that charge, marred all, receiuing the Instructions that were giuen him too lightly, and deliuering them too indifferently: for visiting the Cardinals, which he thought did fauour the intentions of the King of Spaine, and the Duke his Master, he drew nothing from them, but that the issue of this businesse would not be as he expected. The rest of the Cardinals which had other D designs, blamed the Dukes counsell, who had engaged him in the expectation of a iudgment both doubtfull and of small honor: that the best he could hope for, was the haire of a great Prince, who would alwaies remember this iniury: and that they had caused him to plead so long for his owne. The French vsed other subtilities, to make them counsell the Duke to breake off the Arbitrement. And for that this engagement in anothers hands, was not pleasing vnto them, they held it little for the reputation of France, to follow such tedious formes by the way of Iustice, seeing there was a more speedy course by the way of armes.

They gaue it out, that the Depository would hold things in that Estate, as when it pleased him he would make it knowne, that the thing engaged belonged vnto himselfe: that E he had good correspondency with the King, and that his intention was to make one of his Nephewes Marquis of Salusses, and Feudatary of France. This feare, or rather in-differention of the Ambassador, imbarqued him to saile in this ieaiousie, as hee holds the Iudge for suspect, and sends to his Master, that hee should dislike of the Depository, as much as of the King. And although the Popes intention was not to bee corrupted, yet he beleueed it to bee true by the Popes coldnesse, and hee did not onely beleuee it, but thinking it a vainesse to dissemble it, and treason not to speake it, hee told the Pope.
That his Masters Highnesse did expect an assured Iudgment from his Holinesse, to bee maintained in possession of the Marquise, as a thing which he held of his Predecessors, whereof he had bene spoiled by the violence of the stronger, and had recovered it F by the good hap of an occasion. The Pope said vnto him, that hee desired not to leaue these two Princes long in this dispute, nor to breake the course of happinesse which their subiects promised themselves by the continuance of the peace. But the Ambassador, who was transported, added: That if his Holinesse gaue sentence in fauor of his Master, hee should dispose of the thing adiudged, and finde him as full of affection as any other, to second his intentions, when it should please him to haue the Marquise for one of his Nephewes. The Pope who marcht vprightly, being offended at an offer so contrary to the integrity of his intention, said vnto the Ambassador, that hee neuer had any such thought, and to free him from all feare, hee would desist from the Iudgement, and A deale no more neither with the Arbitrement nor Sequstration.

All men thought at Rome, that the Arbitrement was broken, and the consent for the Sequestration revoked: the French cared not, & the Duke was content that things should passe by other formes then those of the Consistory. The Ambassador of Spaine residing at Rome would not have the duke of Sauoy doe his businesse alone, nor the controuersie for the Marquitate of Salusses, to remaine at his disposition: the King his Master was interested therein, it was reasonable he should be the first Mouer of all his motions. Hee therefore intreated the Pope, not to leaue things imperfect, and not to refuse to end a worke so happily begun for the general good of all Christendome, greatly interested in B the concord of two Kings, who could not long continue, if all occasions of warre, that might grow vpon this question for the Marquitate of Salusses, were not taken away. The Duke had already found in many occasions, that the counsels of Spaine were not alwaies put in execution to his content: that he fastened his hopes to a rotten cable, trusting to their resolutions: and that their deceipts (though covered with goodly shewes of loue and affection) were so much the more odious vnto him, for that he which deceiues vnder the name of friendship, is more to be blamed, then he that is deceiued. He therefore propounded to do his busines without them, and from many great discontents, he tooke a resolution to goe into France: so as from that time he neuer slept quietly, vntill hee was assured of the Kings word.

The Duchesse of Beaufort had alwaies fauored his intensions, and desired to assure her-selfe of such a Prince, who offered vnto her all his meanes to support her fortune, hauing sent vnto her the goodliest Iewell that was in the cabinet of Madam Marguerite his Mother. She also considering, that whatsoeuer is done by men, may be vndone by them again: that Princes fauours are inconstant, and that humane things haue nothing firme nor constant, no more then the Sea; she willingly gaue eare to the promises which hee made her for the good of her hopes. Hee could not haue found a better solicitor: but death tooke her away. She parted from Fontainebleau in the beginning of the week before Easter, to come to Paris, and there to passe the feasts. The Disiners, whom idleness and curiosity entertaines commonly at the Court, said, that a child should hinder her from attaining to that whereunto she did aspire. She had heard something, and in this apprehension, she tooke her leaue of the King at her departure, as if she had been assured neuer to see him more, recommending her children vnto him, the finishing of her house at Mon-ceaux, and the rewarding of her seruants. This recommendation of her children did chiefly concerne the Duke of Vendosme, whom she loued dearly, and whom she intended to bring vp in the most perfect imitation of vertue.

Being at Paris, she went on the Wednesday to S. Anthonies Church to heare the Mustick, where she was seized with extreame paines, which neuer left her vntill that life had left her. They killed the Infant in her, and tormented her with such cruell convulsions, as they drew her mouth to the nape of her necke. She was first lodged at Zamets house, E neere Saint Anthonies gate: but being fallen into this extremity, she was carried to the lodging of Madam de Sourdis her Aunt, in the cloister of Saint Germain l'Auxerrois, where on the Saturday she ended her life. Vpon the first aduertisement of her sicknesse, the King went from Fontainebleau to see her. The Marshall d'Ornano met him, and beseeched him to returne, for that sight could not prolong the life of the sicke, and would but increase his griefe. Presently after arriued Belieure, who brought the newes of her death, into whose Carrosse the King went, to euaporate more at ease his sighes, the which hope of recovery had somewhat restrained. Words are not able to charme such sensible blowes: and it is an error to thinke, that griefe is driuen away by exorcismes, that it regards words, or is slayed by discourse. Yet this first violence of the Kings affliction, was calmed by the wife and graue admonitions of this Nestor, who said, that France had acknowledged him for her Hercules, and as he had bene like vnto him in many labours equally glorious and admirable, so now hee should be vnlike him in that hee did abandon the Argonautes, for the griefe hee had for the death of Hilas whom hee loued.

This death did much trouble the Court, for the sorrow and lamentation which the King made for her. Her beauty and good behaviour had moued the King to loue her, for the long absence of Queene Marguerite (whose place she was in hope to possesse absolutely)

A (olutely) She left him three children: Cesar Monsieur Duke of Vendosme, Alexander
Monsieur, who was named Earle of Armagnac, and at this time is appointed Grand Prior of France: and one Daughter. She was more lamented of priuate persons, then of the publike, who found her hopes more insupportable then her cariage. Shee offended few, and bound many vnto her. A great personage said: That shee was of such an humor, that seeing the King must needs loue, hee could not loue an obiect, whose loue would be lesse preiudiciall to himselfe, nor to his people, so as shee continued in the first condition of her birth.

This great beauty, neare vnto the which the most esteemed beauties had no light, (as B great bodies seeme small in respect of greater) vanished in an instant. This flower against the order of others which last vnto the seuenth day, and sometime twice as long, did wither, dry, and fell downe dead within two or three houres. Shee died too soone for them that had made triall, that her fauour was a step vnto the Kings: many did write vpon her death, which shewed that she had offended few, & bound many vnto her. Death took her at such time when as those that desire to be reputed faire after their death, should desire to dye, before the failing of their beauty. For when as they dye old, and that there re-maines nothing in the vessell but lees, they remember no more what they haue been, and speake no more of them, but as of a torch which fells to ashes, when as all that intertained it is molten and consumed: or as flowers which the more pleasing, liuely, and well grow.
C ing they be, displease and stinke the more, when they are gathered, withered, and haue lost their colour. She was one of the three beauties, which being seene together, they said of the first, that she was faire: of the other, that she had bene: and of the younger, that she would be.

The Duke of Sauoy was much grieved for her death. But as Domesticall afflictions, which chance to Princes, although they be separated from the publike, are not lesse feeling and violent; his griefe to see his affaires to croise on all sides, was augmented by the death of D. Philippin his bastard brother, whom Creguy due in combat: It is a great paine to purchase honor, a greater to preferue it, but greatest of all to recouer it when it is lost.
Speaking of honour, I meane the reputation of goodly and vertuous actions, whereof D honour is the recompence, and the sweetest nourishment. Of those things which doe blemish the lustre of honour, the first and most base is, to speake or doe any thing for feare of death. The second is, to endure and suffer a word of contempt, iniury or affront. The third is a lye. This rigorous obseruation of the point of Honour, doth now countenance a Combat, as memorable for the condition of the persons, the forme and circumstance of the combat, and the cause of the quarrell, or any other of this age. Quarrels haue not alwaies reasonable grounds: this had nothing but despight, which D. Phi- lippin had conceiued, being told him that Creguy had wanted hee had gotten his scarfe, at the taking of the little Fort, built by the Duke of Sauoy, neere vnto Chamouffier, to fa-uour the passage of his army. D. Philippin some moneths after, thinking that this was E spoken to the preiudice of his honour, sent him a Challenge. Creguy comes to the place appointed by the appeale: but the appellant was kept backe by the Dukes commandement. The Earle of Brancix (who seemed also to haue a desire to fight) sent word to Des Diguieres General of the army, that if hee had any minde to see the combat betwixt D. Philippin and Creguy his sonne in-law, hee should not returne without his part of the sport, but he should find one to exchange a thrust with him. Hereupon Creguy was taken prisoner going to succour Charbonniers. During his imprisonment the quarrell grew that point, as if he had bene at liberty, it had bene ended in Turin. After that the Treaty of peace had sent him home into Dauphine, D. Philippin sent to challenge him at Grenoble, and they met neere vnto the Fort at Barrault, where the appellant was F thrust through the thigh. This combat, which had bene sufficient to haue ended this quarrell, was the cause of another, for it was told the Duke, that Creguy had wanted, that he had of the blood of Sauoy. Wherewith hee was offended, and gaue D. Philippin to vnderstand, that he would esteeme him no more as hee had done, nor euer see him more, if he were not auenged of those words. Whereupon, another challenge was sent, the which was accepted as cheerfully as the first.

The prohibition which the King had made of single combats, vpon paines not onely preiudiciall to their Estates, but shamefull to their reputations, would not suffer them to fight in Dauphine: that the example of the Gouvernours son-in-law should not draw others to the contempt of the Law. It was therefore resolved, that they should fight in the Duke of Sauoy's Country, vnder S. Andrew, a place belonging vnto the Countesse of Antremont, vpon the banke of the riuer of Rhofne, on foot, and in their shirts, which is the most resolute kind of combat. That they should fight with Rapier and Dagger: That the Baron of Attignac should second D. Philippin, and la Buiffe should second Creguy. That none but they should come into the field, and they should not part the combatants, vntill that one of their deaths had ended the combat. That there should be 12 Gentlemen on Dauphine side, and as many on that of Sauoy, who should be ready to receive the body of the vanquished, or to resist any violence that should be offered vnto the victor. That the 12 of Sauoy should be so farre from the place of combat, as they of Dauphine might passe the water, and come at the same instant to the place of fight. It was long disputed whether the Seconds should fight: for la Buiffe said, that he would not be one, vnlesse he might giue or take, and that he which goes in such actions to be a simple spectator, wants affection or courage. But the Combatants thought it good that the Seconds should not meddle with the decision of their fortunes.

The day appointed being come, all came vnto the place. De Morge passed the Rhofne, and scoured vp and downe the fields, to see if there were no ambush nor greater assembly then was set downe in the Accord. The Seconds visited the armes of the two Champions, and searched them, if they had any Charmes or Inchantments about them. La Buiffe did importune D. Philippin much to part, saying, that he had a desire either to drue it off till night, or to defer the triall till the next day. He told D. Philippin by the way, all the brauities he could of Creguy's valor, to the end he might dant him: and seeing Creguy a far off in the meadow, he cryed vnto him, he is ours: but Philippin carying an eye without trouble, and a heart without teare, said vnto him, why haue you so bad an opinion of me? Not so, replied la Buiffe, I know you are braue and generous, but you haue to doe with one of the most furious men at armes in France, and that makes me foretell you losse. La Buiffe forgot nothing in this action, that might shew the office of a friend. And it is well known, that if Creguy had not returned, la Buiffe would haue stayed to haue slaine D. Philippin and D'Attignac, or to haue bene slaine by them. Du Belier his brother, knowing his humor, and that hee had too much courage and honour, to returne without his friend, was vpon the banke of Rhofne, attending the issue of the combat, meaning to passe through the riuer on horse back, and to haue had his part of the glory or perill of this action. When as D. Philippin entred the field, he had his iudgment so cleare, as obseruing his enemies guard, and the aduantage which he had, turning his backe to the Sun, hee said Monsieur de la Buiffe divide the Sunne: and seeking himselfe to make the partition, he thrust at Creguy with such violence, as the lookers on doubted of the issue of the combat, seeing him still in his danger. This first fury did but thrust Creguy out of the meadow, and Philippin out of breath. Creguy being resolved to thrust, not according vnto the iudgment of choller, but of occasion, attended vntill this fury were past, thrusting him into the body with such force, as he ouerthrew him, and nayed him to the ground. He then willed him to aske his life of him: but he was not in case to humble himselfe to that demand, neither was it in Creguy's power to giue it him: for his wounds were mortall, and all those that were of his side cryed to him: Dispatch him; neither did Attignac's request preuaile any thing. Creguy repassed the Rhofne with the twelue Gentlemen which came to fetch him, leauing D. Philippin vpon the place. The Duke repented of the commandement which hee had giuen, or it may be his religion (by the aduice of his Confessor) counselled him to reuoke a commandement, in the execution whereof there was hazard of two liues, and the losse of two soules. He sent a post to forbid them to fight, but hee arriued two houres too late. Creguy thanked God for his victorie, and would not suffer his friends to vife their accustomed congratulations, intreating them to speake no more of it, although the glory were great, to haue vanquished his enemy in a foraigne Country. D. Philippin was caryed to his lodging. The Religious of Pierre-Chastell refused to bury him according to the holy Constitutions of the Church-gouernment, which holds them that dye in this sort desperate, and murderers of themselves, and makes the paine to continue after death, that the flame which follows them to the graue, might diuert them from this liberty.

A As the Kings enemies at Rome laboured that he could haue no reason of the Marquise of Salaffis, so there wanted no practices to hinder his affaires in Suisseerland. It is a long time since the King of Spain discovered his ielousie for the generall alliance of the crown of France with the thirteene Cantons, hauing long practised to haue his share. Our Kings hauing alwayes hindered it, he could neuer get any footing there, as King of Spaine, but hee hath had an hereditary alliance for the reuenues of the House of Austria. So in the reigne of King Charles the ninth, when as the King of Spaine demanded to bee receiued into alliance, Belieure Ambassador of France, seeing the Catholike Cantons almost perswaded to prefer new amities before ancient, laid before them the great succors they had receiued of the Crowne of France for the feeding of their libertie: whereas contrariwise the House of Austria had done all they could to suppress them. That they should be wary not to trust in the alliance of a House offended, in the which the wounded did yet bleed, by the death of three Princes defeated by their armes. That hee was not ignorant, that the K. of Spain, as descended from the House of Austria, had hereditary designs vpon them, by reason whereof, the greatness and prosperity of his affaires should bee suspected vnto them: for as we ought neuer to feare nor suspect the prosperity of friends, so must we alwayes doubt that of enemies. These admonitions were of such force, as for that time the Ambassadors of Spaine returned as they came.

B But since the troubles of the last ciuill warre in France, the King found himselfe charged with so many affaires within the Realme, as he could not possibly prouide for all abroad. His owne subiects did so trouble him, as he could not answer the hopes of his allies. This was a goodly occasion for the King of Spaine to worke his will with the Suisses, and to winne the game, seeing that no man played against him. And as mercenary friendship vanishest, when as money failes, the French Crownes appearing no more in Suisse, the enemy caught his ducats to be dispersed among the petty Cantons, so as they choaked all the first seedes of the Flower-de-luce. Then might you see in France, Suisses against Suisses, and Cantons against Cantons, the one shewing their duties vnto the King as his allies, the other armed against his seruice, as hirelings to the King of Spaine. When as they see that they were not payed their pensions, and that their Captaines and Colonels receiued no

D thing of that which was due vnto them, the few petty Cantons tyed themselves more straitly to the King of Spaine: and Colonell Pfister, who had great credit among them, taught them not to cast their eies but vpon the Sunne which riseth at the Indies. The greater Cantons continued still firme in the Kings friendship. The wisdom of Brulart shewed it selfe in this bad season, as good Pilots are best knowne in the greatest tempests: for hee entertained the Kings seruice beyond all hope, in the greatest of his troubles, when as the King had for his Scepter a Lance, for his Loure a Tent, and for his credit, hope, and the lawfull right of a Kingdome. It may iustly be sayd, that he did great seruice to France in this charge, and the wisest haue wondered, how he could maintaine the affections of this people, when they were entertained onely with the words of his wisdom, and how he could so long continue this hope amidst the common despaire of the affaires of France.

E But when as the Suisses did see that all France was reduced vnder the Kings obedience, their patience was turned into complaints, and they gaue it out, that if they had not effects for words, wherewith they had bene fed so long, as they saw the King could giue them nothing else, they had courage enough to come and demand it themselves. During the siege of Amiens, there was a Captaine of one of the petty Cantons, who seeking to make his profit of the time, and of the extremity of the Kings affaires, propounded a bold counsell to get their pay.

F The Realme was yet so full of trechery, the King so ill serued of part of his subiects, the forces of Spaine so great, and so farre entred into France, as if they had done what he propounded, our Cesar had not sent them backe with so good a composition as in former times: he had done what he could to giue them money. The Court of Parliament had confirmed certaine Edicts, the profit whereof was appointed to content them: as that of reuision of the Registers to the Reuenues, that of the sealing of Lether, and the Companies of Handicrafts men. Whilest that the Captaines and Colonels laboured for the execution, the Ambassador entertained the rest with good words and great hopes, which serues much to temper the impatency of the most violent, and the languishing weariness of attendants.

dants. He imparted vnto them the Kings counsels for the re-establisment of his affaires, A and the payment of that which was due vnto them.

The King sent them money: but as there was not so much as they expected, and that the greatest part was appointed for such as had served in the last occasions: so it did but increase their discontentes and complaints of the rest; so as in the beginning of this year, Morfontaine the Kings Ambassador left his charge to come into France. Such as thought to make their profit of this retreat, gaue it out, that it was forced: but it was freely of himselfe, who thought it expedient for the Kings affaires to make offer of this voyage, and to charge himselfe with their demands: but the Suilles stayed not long to demand his returne, after the which he died, and was solemnly buried at Solleure in a rich tombe. The King doth husband the peace well. He employs all his thoughts for the profit of his subjects, to restore them to those commodities whereof war had deprived them. And therefore considering that a great multitude of his people remained vnprofitable, for that they were not employed in trades and occupations most necessary for trafficke: for that the workes which should be made within the Realme by Frenchmen, were bought and sold by strangers, namely, silkes, and cloths of gold and siluer: hee did therefore forbid by an Edict, the entry into his Realme of all stufes, made of silke, gold, or siluer, pure or mixt, vpon paine of confiscation: to the end the French might be employed in the making of all those merchandizes which were forbidden to be brought in.

As the Merchants of Tours did sollicite these prohibitions, so they of Lions made great C sure to hinder it. They alledged, that prohibiting the entry of Merchandize made by hand, they must of necessity be made in France, the which being well planted, would yeeld sufficient commodity to nourish 1000000 Frenchmen, and the gold and siluer which goes out of the Realme in specie, in great abundance, should continue there still. Those of Lions did shew, that this prohibition made the King to lose halfe of his Custome at Lions: that it would ruine the Fayres, and this ruine would draw after it the ruine of the City, the which had bene built for the commerce and trafficke of all Europe, and was neuer seene more flourishing then since strangers frequented it, by means whereof, it did for a time so abound with money, as our Kings haue found great succours in the necessity of their affaires, and sometimes were indebted six or seuen millions of gold, as well to the inhabitants, as to Merchant strangers. That the whole State was interested in her preservation, being one of the bulwarks of the weakest part, and lying open to the enterprises of his enemies. That many strangers, being ready since the peace, to come and make their bank at Lyons, were held back vpon the brute of the prohibition of strange wares, and if the citie should continue dis-inhabited of Merchants of that quality, it would be dangerous to leaue it in the hands of poore Artisans, who are insolent in the time of peace, impatient in troubles, and alwayes desirous of innovations: hauing nothing more vnpleasing vnto them then the present. Notwithstanding all these reasons, the King would haue the Edict passe, and the Duchesse of Beaufort was greatly affected to it. The deceased King would haue done it; and it was found reasonable by his Council: but in the end, time did let E him know, that it was no time to vse such prohibitions, and that before they hinder the entry of foraine stufes made of silke; they must haue where-withall to make it within the Realme. And therefore this Edict was reuoked at the Quenes entry into Lions.

This year there was a notable imposture, which ministred matter of discourse to the Kings Council, to Preachers in their Pulpits, and to the Court of Parliament. A young Maid of Romorantin, named Martha Brosier, hauing curiously read ouer the Discourse of the deuill of Laon, she was so transported with the imagination of that which he read, as imitating the motions of her folly, she seemed to haue the fits and passions of one that were possessed with the deuill, although nothing be so hard to counterfeit as the deuill. F James Brosier her father, a man of himselfe buisie and factious, desirous of new things, hauing obserued in his daughter furious motions, with such a stupidity and feare, as it did moue commiseration and dread in the most resolute, and feare in the weaker, hee seemed to beleuee that which he would haue the people beleuee, who came running to see this new deuill, publishing euery where, that his daughter was possessed with an euill spirit. He presented her to the Theologall of Orleans, who beleueed something: & seeing that his designe grew into credit, he led her to the most famous places of all the Dioecesse for deuotion: so all the people beleueed certainly that she was possessed: which must be verified by

A the iudgement of the Church. But the Bishop of Angiers, a graue and wise man, disco- uered her to be a counterfeit, and sent her away, threatening to punish her, if she returned into his Dioecesse. The Official of Orleans did also find out her imposture, forbidding the Clergy of the Dioecesse to exorcise her, vpon paine of suspension. After that she had runne fiftene moneths vp and downe the Country, and being growne perfect in her counterfeit trickes and deuillish motions, her father thinking fhee knew enough, and that it was now time to present her vpon the great Theater of France, he conducts her to Paris, and leads her to all the Churches to gather almes: the people cry out presently to haue the deuill conuired, holding it an impiety to suffer one of Gods creatures to be so tyrannically tormented by the Deuill. The Bishop assembles the learned Diuines and Physitians of the Vniuersity of Paris, to haue their aduice about the continuing of this deuill: the Physitians say plainly, that it was but counterfeit. A Capuchin grieved to see the incredulity of the Physitians, said with some passion, if any one beleuee not: if he will but stay the deuill will cary him away. Marces fearing not to be caried away by this kind of deuill, answered, that he would abide the hazard: and setting his knee vpon Martha's breast, and his hand to her necke, he commanded her to be quiet, whereupon she stired not, saying, that her deuill was gone.

The Court of Parliament seeing that all the people did runne after Martha, and fearing that superstition (which goes before, and is alwayes the forerunner of impiety) C should diuide their opinions and affections, and cause some dangerous sedition, they commanded that Martha should be deliuered into the hands of the Lieutenant Criminal. The Clergy sayd, that those that were possessed, did not belong vnto the temporall iurisdiction, and that the Church had power to iudge thereof. Yet she is committed to prison. They haue recourse vnto the King, who commands that the Parliament be obeyed. So as by a decree of the great Chamber, and the Tournelle, the Lieutenant of the short Robe was in- ioynted to conduct Martha with her sisters, and James Brosier his father to Romorantin, forbidding her to depart out of the towne, without leaue from the Iudge of the place. And so the deuill was condemned by a sentence.

Another deuill possessed the soule of a miserable wretch, who made an execrable attempt D against the Kings person. A Capuchin of Milan, called Father Honorio, gaue intelligence thereof, and the party that was described in his letter, was found and apprehended at Paris. The King did thank this good religious man by expresse Letters, and did witnesse by his Ambassador resident at Rome, that he would preserue the remembrance of so good a turne, to make it knowne vnto all his Order, that he had bound him vnto him. God would not call a Prince so necessary for the earth, so soone into heauen, before hee had settled his people in that rest which their long paines and calamities had deserued. It was the Kings only care to settle euery thing in his order, with the aduice of the Princes of his Houe, and the Lords of his Council. They found that the subjects could not fully enjoy the benefit of the peace, nor be eased of their charges, so long as the Crowne was indebted, E and that that which should serue to maintaine his royall Estate, was not sufficient to pay the rents and pensions, which amounted to two millions of gold: the fees of Officers came to eightene thousand crownes, and many other charges, which were not discharged for lesse. This extreme necessity made them to seeke out many rights and duties belonging to the crowne, the which had bene morgaged and aliened during the last troubles, which suffered all that could not be amended.

This was most apparent in Languedoc, whither the King sent de Maissi, one of his Council of State, and Refugea Councillor of the Court of Parliament of Paris. And although it be a hard thing to draw a multitude compounded of mutinies and factions vnto reason, yet through their perswasions, the country did grant vnto the King the summe of F two hundred thousand crownes, to be payd in foure years, with an increase of the Gabelle or Custome vpon Salt vnto two Crownes, which came to fifty thousand crownes a year at least, more then the King received. So as the assured succours from that part, encreased the Kings treasure a hundred and fifty thousand crownes yearly. But it encreased much more by the continuance of the imposition of a Solz vpon the Liver, the onely remedy to supply the Kings affaires, the ground whereof is necessity, which makes that seeme iust which is profitable to the Common-weale. The Commissioners appointed to establish this leuy of a Solz vpon the poore French, were not received without opposition, nor executed without murmuring, vsuall in such innouations. There was no towne which found not it selfe ouer-burthened, to shew that they were not able to beare any more. This body was growne so weake with this long disease, as euery little thing, how light soeuer, did seeme to oppresse it. But they complained not alone of this imposition: other Subsidies were the cause of more ordinary grieuances, and grounded vpon more reason. Traffike is one of the Elements of a Realme: when that crafter, the subiect fees it presently: nothing hath so much hurt it, as the augmentation of Customes and Imposts, nothing hath made it so contemptible, as the couetousnesse of such as had the charge to gather it, and no man hath more felt the difcommoditie of it, then the Merchants of Lyons, who complained chiefly, for that they had erected a new Customs-house in the towne of Vienne, B which stayed all Merchandize that came out of the Leuant. These complaints were so common, and so often reiterated to the Gouernor of Lyons, as hee thought it good to send some one, when as the twelue townes in Dauphine should assemble their Estates, to intreat them to take away this Customs, which made the Merchants to keepe from Lyons, lest they should come nere vnto these Gulphes. The Deputy made an excellent speech vnto the States of the Prouince assembled at Grenoble: The which I haue thought good to insert.

If things (said he) which are vniuersally good, are better and more perfect then those which are good but to some, this good of peace must bee esteemed so much the better, and the more perfect, for that it is common and generall to all men, for that it hath restored to France her soule, and made it a new body. But this good is not so dispersed ouer the whole body, but there remaines some members tied, the which during the fainting and generall conuulsion, did not feeble the mischief so violently as at this present. For although the Prouinces be discharged of souldiers, and that euery one finds both in Towne and Countrey that order and safety which he desired, yet the liberty of traffike being not restored, and merchandize likewise fauoured in peace, then in the violence of iniustice, and the liberty of warre, this good remains vnperfect, if it may not yet vnprofitable. Wherefore the towne of Lyons finding it selfe deuiued of the fruits of this peace, by continually les in the liberty of their traffike, would not let passe the Assembly of your Estates, without coniuering you by the inseparable interest to the good of both Prouinces, to seeke with her the perfection thereof. She hath giuen you heretofore to vnderstand the increase of this mischief, you know the exccesse, I am now onely come to intreat you to seeke for the remedy. This mischief is the continuation of a Subsidie imposed vpon the riuer of Rhosne, and the passage by land from Vienne. The cause was first the publike good, which since hath degenerated into a priuate interest; the effects, the ruine of traffike; the remedy, to obtaine abolition from the King.

This Impost was first erected for the reduction of the Towne of Vienne, and for the considerations which were so much the more iust, because they regarded the Kings seruice, the which precedeth all others, and for the common good of either Prouince. And although the towne of Lyons did then foresee the dangerous consequence of this erection, E with the ruines and difcommodities of the leauy, yet did shee the more willingly consent therunto, for that she thought the yeares whereunto the continuance thereof was limited, would passe insensibly, and that they should sooner see the end, then any occasion to complain. Moreover, the Princes will, being a Soueraigne Law, they could not take that ill which pleased that great King, whose valour exceeds admiration, and admiration furmounts all praise, hauing drawne France out of the bonds of tyranny, as Perseus did Andromeda, and had in his heroical actions made vse of his seruants goods to assure them the possession, as Scipio in opening the publike treasures, was the cause they were shut againe.

Times arguments or diminisheth
every thing.

But as things which in the beginning seeme sweet and easie, in time grow sharpe and F intolerable: this Impost passing from one extreame to another, is growne a selfe against the which no man strikes but he suffers shipwracke. It hath had its birth growing like vnto that of the Crocodile, and in few dayes is growne a terror to them that goe by water, and the ruine of Merchants which trauell by land. The yeares of her continuance are past, and now it begins to grow perpetuall, hauing like vnto the ancient customes, her Farmers and Committees, and retaines nothing of the cause of her first institution and ordinance, but the pretext and the apparent semblance.

The

A The Farmers are so rough and seuer, in exacting, not that which is ordained, but many times what please them: that as it is the nature of men to loue that which profits them, and to abhorre that which hurts them, the Merchants flee from it as from a shelle, and speak of it as of a snare which strangles them. They cause them to languish whole weekes before they compound for the paiement, and cease not vntill they haue scene the bottom of their packes and purses, so as that which in a lesse corrupted age, and not so couetous as ours is, was giuen rather by way of a gift or present, then of a duty of necessity, in acknowledgement of the publike protection, and the safety of the passage, is now exacted by heretofore vnheard of extortions, and punishable concussion.

B Thus the towne of Lyons sees it selfe bereaued of the benefit and commoditie of trading, in the preservation whereof Dauphine hath a sensible interest, these two Prouinces being like two neighbours which are not diuided but by a gutter which runneth through the middest of the street. And this commerce is the chiefest support of this towne, from whence as from a Spring, which long peace may make perpetuall, flow infinit benefits to all other Prouinces, but most abundantly to her neighbours, wherefore those which haue considered the situation thereof, as in the center of Europe, that for seuen leagues crossing the Ocean and Mediterranean seas, impart vnto it all the Merchandize which may be brought from any part which hath bene discovered by man, to distribute them to other Prouinces, they haue reason to call it the Magazin and Store-house of Europe, as Strabo C saith, that it is seated in the middest of Gaule like vnto a Citadell.

But since that the passage of Rhosne hath bene decreed, and that the Merchants had rather adventure any other hazard then to passe by this iniustice, hauing bene so famous and flourishing, we shall see her become a desert, if the liberty of traffike be not restored. All Merchants that were wont to come from the Leuant to Marseilles, haue abandoned their ancient passage, and sought other longer courses but more safe, as by the Countie of Auignon, Sauiy, Bresse, Geneva, and the Franche Countie, to passe into Germany: and others by Languedoc, Viaretz, Forets, Auergne, Maringues, to passe by the riuer of Allier, into that of Loire, and from thence to Orleans, and so forward. So as breaking (as they doe) the ordinary course of the Leuant trade, they cut the veins which bring blood D to nourish the body, the which in short time we shall see consumed to skinn and bones, and the calamities so to increase, as besides the grieue, to be no more the eye of Gaule, as Athens was of Greece, she shall haue nothing perfect remaining, but the remembrance of her first felicity, and the cogitation of her by-past flourishing estate.

Wherefore she coniuers you to ioyne your prayers and pursuits with hers: to beseech the King to pull this thorne out of the foot of Lyons, and this moar out of the eie of Dauphine: she hopes to obtaine it by the wise resolutions of this Assembly, consisting of men who can iudge of the importance of this petition, and are not ignorant, that as publike buildings are made of the best stufte, and erected of another forme and fashion then private edifices, so publike pursuits for a generality, require different and contrarious resolutions E to those which are necessary and commodious for priuate affaires.

Think not, my masters, that Lyons is so badly instructed in the knowledge of obedience (which is the best and most happy possession of the subiects) that shee means to contradict the Kings intentions, or to diminish his tributes. She knows well that in an obedient Estate, whereas the iust commandements of a good Prince make the subiects prompt to obedience, such thoughts are criminall. The burthens which the people beare, although they be grievous & insupportable, are called holy, & alwayes reputed iust. They are in the Estate as sayles in a ship, not to charge & overload it, but to conduct and assure it. Tributes are the sinewes of an Empire, we must beware that in leauing them it fall not in pieces. But that which we demand doth not prejudice the Kings reuenues, which draweth no F thing from this customs.

Priuate men onely should lose by it, and should learn, that they must not make their profit of publike difcommodities. The interested are such good men, as they will neuer hinder the lesser good from yielding to the greater. They be Noblemen which haue neuer preferred their priuate considerations before the publike profit: They enter into the Kings Council as the Ancients did into Temples, and whose interest are like vnto Rivers, they which haue not one and the selfe same Spring, and the same course, and yet in the end they come into that great sea of publike profit, whereas they lose their name, and haue the same taste and favour with the same sea. They themselves which have means to find more lawful assignments to recompence their services, will not only excuse, but commend this pursuit, which informs them of the abuse which is committed vnder the title of the Kings commandments, and they shall see that we haue had the courage not to suffer our selues to be drawne head-long into this seruitude, from the which there is no issue, for that it is a violent prejudice to suffer things which are established, and get footing more by sufferance and permission, then by reason, and that the posterity of Princes is but too constant to maintain these ruinous inuentions.

The Kings bounty and iustice shall make vs hope well of this pursuit, and beleue that as he is full of piety and clemency (the true Character of that Soueraigne power of Heauen, which hath placed him ouer vs here on earth) so he will not suffer these two Prouinces to be deprived of the fruits which they haue promised vnto themselves, hauing not yet tasted the perfect good of peace, for the purchasing whereof they had as much as any other contributed their goods and affections, and haue not bene the least instruments for the restauration of this Estate.

This discourse full of reason and truth, had not the power to make them of Dauphine redresse the complaints of Lions, but only to beseech his Maiesty to moderate the cause. His affaires would not suffer him to give that ease, which iustice and his Maiesties clemency desired. Whilest that the Commissioners trauell throughout the Prouinces, about the execution of the Kings Edicts, as well for the good of the peace, as to supply the necessity of his Exchequer, he passeth the greatest heat of Summer at Blois. There the King of Spain came him to vnderstand by his Ambassador, that he had great reason to complaine of the French (especially of the Lord La Noue) who against the conditions of the treaty of Veruins, were gone to serue Cont Maurice, and the States of the Low Countries: and if the public faith did not maintaine these reciprocal bonds, the peace would be more iniurious then war, being impossible to auoid the decits of hostility, of him who shewes himselfe a friend, and is an enemy in effect. The king hauing protested that his intention was to haue the contents of the Treaty truly obserued, he commanded La Noue and all his subiects, to returne home within six weeks, vpon paine of losse of life, forbidding others to goe thither vpon the like penalty. The Archduke sent the Prince of Orange to visit the King, and to give him intelligence of their ariall into the Low countries: and Andrew the Cardinal hauing resigned vp his charge, takes his way through France, to see the King.

About this time, the yeare granted for the arbitrement of the Marquise of Salusses, was expired, with the prolongation of three moneths: yet would not the King attempt any thing, but commanded his seruants onely to stand vpon their guards, whilest that hee approached neerer to the D. of Suoy, to know what he would say. The brute notwithstanding of an army which the King of Spaine had caused to embarke in Portugal, staid his voyage untill he might see what way it would take. But this great army which had no reputation but as farre off, and was not knowne by reason of the distance, proued in the end but few vessels, the which were encountered by the States, and beaten neere vnto Dunkerke. Nothing did hinder the Kings exercises and sports at Blois and Males-herbes, where hee spent his time with the Marquis of Vernueil: in the meane time, his good seruants watched both within and without the Realme, for the good of his affaires: all laboured in diuers actions, but with one will, and to one end, to make the State as flourishing as it had bene, and the Maiesty of the Prince to be respected as it is, sacred and holy. Out of this number of good seruants, and officers of the Crowne, Death tooke away Philip de Hurault, Earle of Chienury, and Chancellor of France. He had bene at the first Comptroller of King Henry the thirds house, being Duke of Anjou, and King of Poland, and by him made Keeper of the Seales, in the life of the Cardinal of Birague, and after his death Chancellor, and by him dismissed to his house at the States of Blois, when as the Seales were giuen to Monthieu Aduocate in the Court of Parliament. In this change he made triall, that Princes officers are in his hands, as Counters bee in an Auditors, who raise them to the greatest and highest number, and suddenly brings them downe to the lowest. And although it bee not spoken why the King commanded him to retire, yet as soone as they saw him disgraced, the friends of his fortune, and the seruants of his fauours, abandoned him. He continued a while like an old cast ship which lies in the harbor, & serues to no vsc. He returned to his charge, and serued the King stoutly in the most troublesome time of his affaires.

A Afterwards hee had many crosses. There were so great complaints exhibited against him in the Assembly at Roan, as he was in danger to haue lost the keeping of the Seales, or not to haue a Cardinals Hat demanded of the Pope for him. He did not affect the second, and the first hee prevented, considering that they could not take away any thing, nor diminish his great dignities, but with shame and disgrace.

Pompe de Bellieure succeeded him after his death, he restored the Seales (the sacred instruments of Soueraigne Iustice) to their honour. All corrupt practices which made friends to the prejudice of the Common-weale, were banished. There is no other fauour then that of Iustice; no other expedition but in publique, and by order. Nothing is seized extraordinarily but by the Kings expresse commandement, or for the good of his service, which may not be deferred vnto the scaling day, and that in the view of all the Officers of the Chancery. Nothing is presented which hath not bene examined and held iust by the Masters of Requests that were present. The King hauing receiued newes of the Chancellors death, he commanded Villeroy to dispatch his Letters before he demanded the place: which done, he presented himselfe to take his oath betwixt his Maiesties hands, kneeling vpon a cushion of Veluet, the which the Chancellor and Constable onely doe, and no other Officers of the Crowne. His Maiesty would not binde him, but to doe what hee had alwayes done, for the good of his service and of his Crowne. To conclude, hee was not preferred to this high dignity before any one that exceeded him in the ranke of seruite, or in merit or experience, hauing vndergone the chiefe charges within the Realme, and happily performed abroad important and weighty Ambassages for the King.

This yeare tooke away some Princeesses in France: amongst others Madamoiselle the onely daughter of the Prince of Conde, the which hee had by his first wife the Princeesse of Neuers, and Marques of Lisle. Her obsequies were made at Saint Germain des Prez with great pompe, as it was fit for a Princeesse of the blood. Loyse de Budois, the Constables wife dyed also (a little before the Duchesse of Beaufort) hauing left one sonne and one daughter, whereby the famous house of Montmorency is renewed, the which was like to fall to the distaffe. The Marques of Belle-Ile (widow to the Marquis the eldest sonne to the Duke and Marshall of Raiz, a younger daughter of the house of Longueuille, hauing passed five yeares of her widowhood, and brought vp her sonne in all vertue and piety) departed secretly out of Britany, not quertifying any one of her kindred, and went to professe her selfe a Nun, in the Monastery of the Feuillantines at Tholoufa. Her brother and her husbands brethren posted after to diuert her, but she was already in the Couent, and refused to end her dayes there. A generous resolution of a Lady, issued from that noble house of Longueuille, which holds one of the first places in France: It is Soueraigne of the Countrey of Neuf-chastel in Suisse, and allied to the House of Bourbon in diuers branches.

The Commissioners which were employed for the execution of the Edict of pacification, found some difficulties in those places, whereas the Bishops and Pastors of the Catholike Church, had neither Temple nor place of retreat: yet the Masse was restored in those places where it had bene banished fiftene or twenty yeares: and the preaching appointed onely in those places that were allowed by the Edict. They found in all places aduice and violent spirits, very hard to be dealt withall, which inuited idle quarels, when as they wanted iust cause of complaint. The Commissioners exhort either party as well to concord as to piety, and alwayes to contain their wils within the bounds of obedience, and not of rebellion, and to forget the factious names of Papists and Huguenots, the which hath bene no lesse fatal to France, then those of Guelphes and Gibellins in Italy. They aduised the Preachers to take heed that their discourses were not streames of sedition, as they are sometimes of Eloquence: for they that make profession to teach the Word of God, may doe as much harme in fauouring a Sedition, as they shall gather profit of his Ministry when he shall preach Peace. The Commissioners did admonish the Magistrates and chiefe of Iustice, to prevent the first motiues of Sedition: which getting credit with the simple, is the cause of great disorders.

So the Edict was executed throughout the Realme, and the most sauage began to liue louingly together, burying the remembrance of things past. Things done cannot be recalled. We must grow more wise hereafter by the consideration of what is past: we must haue have our eyes open, to distinguish the causes from the pretexis, and discover the cuill A which is hidden vnder a shew of good, holding for an infallible Maxime, that there is no iust occasion to arme against his Prince, nor to trouble the quiet of his country: wee have beene so abused, as wee have taken the maske for the face; slander for innocence, and falsehood for truth: and vnder these false impressions, we have left an assured peace for a doubtfull: we have beleueed those Empericks of State, who desirous to continue our languishing, and to prolong our diseases, haue fro that Principle of truth, that civil war ruines both Estate and Religion, drawn this Proposition: That France cannot line in peace with two Religions. The which hath cost the lues of those that haue maintained it, and the ruine of others that haue beleueed it. Being then reconciled for that which is past, and well aduised B for that which is to come, haue escaped shipwracke beyond our owne hopes, let vs remaine in the port of this concord, where the King doth guide vs, after so many stormes and tempests, we shall be there assured. The sea doth no harme to ships that haue good anchors: Obedience is the anchor which doth assure our Ship against the fury of winde and waues. It is that which giues life and motion to all the members of the body: and there is not a more certaine signe of the life of an Estate, then obedience. It is the eye of the body, which liues last, and dies first: it should bee the heart, which liues first, and dies last.

This yeare the Princeesse of Antoinette, daughter to the Duke of Lorraine, was conducted by the Earle of Vaudemont her brother, to the Duke of Luilliers, who had C married her: shee was attended with a goodly traine, and came to Collen, where shee was honorably receiued by the Senate: and after some dayes, she went downe to the riuier to Duisseldorp. The nuptiall ioy was great and stately, although it were somewhat disturbed by the infoleny of the armies, as well of the States, as of the Admirall. The marriage of Sibille, Sister to the Duke of Luilliers, and of the Marquis of Bourgondy, brother to Andrew of Austria the Cardinall, caused a peace in the country of Cleues, and all the Spanish pretensions went to smooke.

When as after the death of the Duchesse of Beaufort, they saw the King falling into a new shipwracke, from the which he was lately escaped, and that loue (mourning yet for his first Venus) led him to another, you might heare the sighs of the most modest; D the murmuring of the most turbulent, and generally, prelates of some approaching storme. This was the onely droppe of oyle which did pierce through the glorious actions of this Prince: who superiour to all other in courage and valour, and alwayes equal to himselfe, made himselfe subiect to this passion. Truth will not suffer mee to suppress that which cannot be hidden. It is good to coneele that which is doubtfull in his actions that hath no other Iudge but God: but to keepe secret that which is knowne and seene of all men, is a basenesse. It imports to know things truly, which not being written, shall passe to posterity according to their passions, which shall begin and continue the tradition. Ancient Histories (as full of simple truth, as void of affectation) haue not coneealed the loues of Princes, whose vertues they haue written. Of all the follies of men, there is none more E excusable, nor of the which fewer doe excuse themselves, then of loue. All fight vnder this banner. If then it was necessarie for the King to loue, hee could not loue any thing more worthy of his loue. But when as death did see that the lower grew blind in the thing loved, & that this blindness had brought France into confused darknes, he separated them.

Vpon this consideration, the Court of Parliament finding, that there is nothing that doth more preserve France from falling into fore-past miseries, or more assure the present, and continues their prosperities hereafter, then the Kings issue: therefore they beseeched his Maiesty to marry, and to giue to himselfe a Sonne and a Successour to his Realme, there being no army more powerfull, either by sea or land, to assure an Empire, F then many children. La Guesle the Kings Attorney Generall, made the Speech. He represented vnto his Maiesty, how much he was bound to God. He discovered the publike difficulties of his Estate: shewed the remedies: and in the end let him see, that the enioying of all the felicities which peace (purchased by his victorious armes) could promise him, was weakly grounded: France was not assured to see it durable, the which depended on the lawfull birth of a Dauphin. That although by the law of State (a sacred and immutable law, and an originarie law of the Crowne) the succession belongs to the nearest kinsman, yet France is too full of those turbulent spirits, which in the calme of peace, watch carefully

A fully for occasions of warre, which in the midst of rest, breathe after troubles: and freed from the perill of armes, hold still (like mad-men) their hearts and their courages armed to moue new contentions another day against the law and order of the Realme: whereof the King himselfe had made such tryall of their bad intentions, as without the verue of heaven infused into him, his Right had bene vanquished by force.

That although his Maiesty by his wifedome, accompanied with a singular bounty and charitable affection to the quiet of his subiects, hath declared his successour to the Crowne, yet France hath alwayes obserued, that when the Crowne did leape from one branch of a Family vnto another, and that the Sonne did not succeed the Father, it was disquieted B with new factions, and the fields bathed with the blood of her Citizens, and the fire of civil warre so kindled, as two ages was scarce able to quench it.

That to take away these iust feares and apprehensions of these publike calamities, the succession must not change the branch, for where there is no change, there is no strife, and the children succeeding in the fathers Realme, it seems that hee that reigned, is rather C growne yong againe then changed: there is nothing new, the Crowne continues in the same house, the fathers face is noted in that of his Sonne. That the shining of the Sunne is pleasing, as a calme sea, or the earth couered with his greene tapistry. But there is nothing so goodly, nor so delightfull to the eye, as the sight of children newly borne in a family that wanted this aduantage. That to attaine vnto this happinesse, they must begin by the dissolution of the marriage betwixt his Maiesty and the Queene, Duchesse of Valois, being no lesse easie then that of Charlemagne with Irmengarde, and Theodora daughter and sister to Didier, King of Lombards, for indisposition and sterility: of Lewis the 7, with Eleanor Duchesse of Guienne for some discontentments set downe in the History, and couered with the pretext of Consanguinity: of Lewis the 12, with Isane of France daughter to K. Lewis the 11 constrained by force, and want of consent.

That they should not be troubled to seek lawfull causes of this dissolution: for besides the want of issue, in the which consists the second end of matrimony, and the preservation of the State, they should not need to inuent the degree of consanguinity, being knowne to all men, that the King and Queene are in the third degree, a blemish which hath alwayes D accompanied the marriage since the solemnization thereof, and the which was not taken away by the brieve of Pope Gregory the 13, for that the necessary and essentiall formes were not obserued. After that he had shewed the necessitie and profit of this separation, he beseecheth the King to chooseth his second wife, in a chiefe and Soueraigne Family, and which had bene heretofore honoured with the like happinesse, and to consider that so great a Realme flourishing in Princes and many Noblemen, and ancient houses, cannot easily submit themselves to the command of those which by both sides shall not bee of the blood Royall or Soueraigne, halfe Princes, halfe simple Gentlemen. And if at any time we must respect the distinction of births and races, it must be when as they that come, are born to command our others.

E That they could not giue Heires to a Realme of too worthy a House: and if hee be not equal by the fathers side, yet at the least, that he come neere vnto it: for men being by nature high-minded, doe not willingly submit themselves to them whom they thinke to be inferiour to their fathers, vnto whose command they haue bene inured.

The King was well pleased with this discourse, and aduertised Queene Marguerite thereof by L'Anglois, one of the Masters of Requests of his Maiesties household, to vnderstand her resolution touching the nullity of her marriage. Shee (who vpon the like demand during the life of the Duchesse of Beaufort had made request for some reasons) returned him answer, that she would deliuer her minde vnto Berthier, Agent for the Clergy, and Intendant of her affaires. The Kings intentions were imparted vnto him, and he sent vnto her, who returned with this answer vnto the King and his Council: That she desired nothing more then the Kings contentment, and the quiet of the Realme: and withall, she sent a priuate Letter vnto his Maiesty, beseeching him, To grace her with his protection, vnder the shadow whereof she would passe the remainder of her yeares. The said Queene sent a petition vnto the Pope, containing, That her brother King Charles the 9, and the Queene her Mother had married her against her will, to which marriage her heart had neuer consented: That the King and shee being in the third degree of consanguinitie, shee beseecheth his Holinesse to declare the marriage void. The King made the like request. This businesse was managed very seriously by

by the Cardinall of Oſſat, and by the Lord of Silery, the Kings Ambaſſadour at Rome A (who at the ſame time purſued the Iudgement for the Marquieſſe of Saluſſes:) they be- ſeeched his Holineſſe in his Maieſties name: That for that which ſhould concerne the nullity of the ſaid marriage, he deſired no other ſauour then that of Juſtice.

This buſineſſes was imparted by the Pope to the Conſistory, and many reaſons ſet down to proue the nullity of the marriage. All the difficulty was, that Pope Clement the eight thought it ſomewhat ſtrange, that he ſhould declare that marriage void, which Pope Gregory the thirteenth had approued, and who by his abſolute authoritie had taken away all lets and hindrances. All which was answered at large. And although it were true, that Queene Marguerite had continued long with the King: yet this cohabitation was alwaies B forced, and the fame feare which was in the beginning of the marriage, had continued during the life of her brethren, and the Queene her Mother: and the time was to bee regarded ſo long as the feare continued: for mariages contracted by force and conſtraint, without conſent are void, and time doth not extinguiſh the nullity, if hee that is forced hath not liberty to doe that freely, which they have made him to doe by force.

In the end, it was reſolved on in the Conſistory, that a Commiſſion ſhould be granted to certaine Prelates, to take iuſt conſideration of the cauſe vpon the place, and to iudge of the nullity of the ſaid marriage. His Holineſſe ſent his Commiſſion vnto the Cardinall Ioy- ceuze, to the Biſhop of Modena, his Nuncio in France, and to the Archbiſhop of Arles, a learned Italian Prelate, and well praſticed in thoſe affaires, who being aſſembled at Paris, C after that they had obſerved all ſolemnnities that were requiſite, and cauſed information to be taken of his Maieſties age, hauing viewed the requiſition of the three Eſtates of France, containing the great intereſt they had therein. All being well examined and conſidered, they declared the ſaid marriage void, and ſet the parties at liberty to marry where they pleaſed.

The King ſent d'Alincourt, Gouverneur of Pontoife, and Knight of his Orders, to to thank the Pope for his good iuſtice: and the Earle of Beaumont to Queene Margue- ritte, to let her vnderſtand, that the Popes Delegates had giuen vp their ſentence. And ſeeing that God had ſuffered that the bond of their coniunction was diſſolued, the which his diuine Juſtice had done as well for their particular quiet, as for the publike good of the Realme, he deſired no leſſe to cheriſh and loue her then before, reſolving to haue more care of that which did concern him, then he had had, & to let her vnderſtand, that hereafter he would not be a brother to her onely in name, but ſhe ſhould find effects worthy of the truſt which ſhe had repoſed in the ſinceritie of his affection. Shee made anſwer vnto the King. That although it were eaſier to receive comfort for the loſſe of any worldly thing, yet the onely reſpect of the merit of ſo perfect a King and ſo valiant, did by the priuation thereof cut off all conſolation, being the marke of the generoſitie of ſuch a ſpirit, to make her griefe immortal as hers ſhould be, if the fauour which it pleaſed his Maieſtie to doe her by the aſſurance of countenance and protection, did not baniſh it.

At the ſame time ſhee taſted the effects of the Kings liberalitie by the encrease of her penſions, living happily at Veſſon neere to Autillac, in the tranquillitie and ſilence of her fortune. This change is no leſt, but ſhe ſhal be alwaies one of the firſt Princeſſes of Europe. No man can take from her that which Heauen and Nature haue giuen her. It is a Theater, which although it hath been beaten with lightning, is ſtill admired. And to ſpeake the truth without affection or flattery, ſhe her ſelfe hath ruined the greatneſſe of her fortune, in that ſhe would be what ſhe is.

This marriage is no ſooner diſſolued, but they treat of another. In the bleſſings whereof the French promiſe vnto themſelues the increaſe and continuance of thoſe of Heauen. The great Duke of Tuluſe did carefully keep Mary of Medicis his Nece to increaſe the honour of his houſe by ſome great alliance. It was in a ſeaſon when as the Soueraigne houſes of Europe had no daughters ready to marry, or there was ſome diſparity for their Age, or Religion. Great and important conſiderations, which Princes ſhould not paſſe over lightly. It ſeemes, that the eternall wiſdomde, which concludes the mariages of Princes in Heauen, and bleſſeth them on earth, would not marry this Princeſſe vnto the Empe- F rour, but reſerued her for the good of greater Empire, not being pleaſed that France ſhould ſeek the meanes to continue the Crowne in the Kings poſterity, any where elſe but at Florence, one of the eyes of Italy, and in the houſe of Medicis, which goeth equally with

A with the firſt in Italy. The hiſtory of which houſe you may read at large in the Originall. Coſmo furnaſhed by Pius the 5, the great Duke of Tuſcane, had by Madam Eleonor of To- ledo, daughter to the Viceroy of Naples, Francis, Ferdinand, Peter, Garcia, Iſabella and E- leonor. Francis married Ioane of Auſtria, daughter to the Emperour Ferdinand. Of this marriage came two daughters, Eleonor and Mary: the firſt is married to bee D. of Montoua, the happineſſe and good fortune of the other is referred to the Queene of France. And the King being now ſet at liberty, fixt all his thoughts vpon her marriage.

The D. of Sauoy had ſent many of his Miniſters into France, to treat vpon the difference for the Marquieſſe of Saluces, without expecting the Popes ſentence. All the voyages B which Iacob, the Preſident Rochette, the Marquis of Lullins, the Cheualier Breton and Ron- cas his Secretary had made, brought him no other fruit then to haue obſcured the State of the Court, pierced a little into the Kings deſignes, the which is alwaies the firſt of an Ambaſſadors inſtructions, & noted the countenance of ſome ſpirits impatient of reſt, and deſirous of change. And although the Patriarke of Conſtantinople had by his perſwaſions drawne more from the King then the Duke of Sauoy hoped for, and made knowne how much a diſcourſe full of affection and perſwaſion may preuaile, there being nothing that doth more ſubtilly ſteale away the opinions of men, then the eloquence of Mercury, yet could he neuer change the reſolution which the King had taken to haue the Marquieſſe againe. He was at Lyons whereas ſickneſſe ſtayed him for a time: the King hauing com- manded the Gouverneur of Lyons to lodge him, feaſt him, and ſupply all his wants: Ronsas attended vntill he was recouered, to conduct and accompany him according to the order which the Duke had giuen him. But as things went on more ſlowly then hee deſired, hee thought that this purſuit required a greater preſence and action: that hee himſelfe muſt doe his owne Ambaſſage, promiſing more vnto himſelfe by his onely ſhadow, then by all the ſoliciting of ſeruants. Hee therefore prepared himſelfe to goe to the King, although the chiefe of his Councell diſſwaded him.

The onely thought of this voyage made him irreconcilable to the King of Spaine, although it had not paſt the tearmes of a ſimple poſſeſſion, ſo did hee make ſhew to bee deſirous to breake wholly with him: hee had in ſhew great occaſions to complaine of his D friendſhip and ſuccours, who did but entertaine his griefe, and made the cure deſperate. It is good for a Prince to know the humour of many Nations. Hee knew the Spaniards well: their manner of liuing, the ruinous conditions which they lay vpon them whom they aſſiſt: the length and languiſhing of their promiſes were odious vnto him. Hee did conſider the iniuſtice, & inequality in the portion of the Infanta his wife, who of ſo many Scepters and Crownes which the King her Father had, receiued but ſixſcore thouſand Crownes of yearly penſion, whereas the eldeſt had the Low-countries, and the Franche country in marriage. Hee could not forget, that at the treaty of Veruins, hee had bene in a manner forgotten, and that a Peace was almoſt concluded before they thought of him. Hee beſeaged that if the Spaniard would, the queſtion for the Marquieſſe of Saluces had E been ended, the which might haue been left to him in exchange of Calais, Dôlans, Ar- dres, and other places. That the King of Spaine did thinke (that to prevent that all theſe diſcontentments ſhould not cary this Prince to ſome dangerous party) it was neceſſary to tie him vnto the Crowne of Spaine by ſome ſtrong bond. They therefore demand the firſt Prince, and the firſt Infanta, vnder colour to bring them vp after a royaſt manner, and in a Court whereas they might one day hope to raigne.

The Duke was diſcontented with this demand, perceiving well that it proceeded more from diſtruſt, then affection. His Councell aduiſed him to giue this content vnto the King of Spaine, that he could not lodge his children better, and that that was the vaiting and very cymment of perfect friendſhip. Yet he reſolved to keepe his children, and to ſend the F Count La Motte to make his excuſe, that the preſent eſtate of his affaires would not ſuffer him to ſend them, nor to provide them a traine and furniture fit for the voyage.

The King of Spaine to take away all excuſe, giues order to haue money provided for him at Milan, and perſwades the Duke to ſend the Count La Motte as Gouverneur and conductor of the Prince. The D. takes the money, and keeps the ware, ſaying that the ayre of Spaine was not proper for his children, that their indiſpoſition and the tendreſſe of their age, would not ſuffer them to hazard them ſo ſoone in ſo long a voyage.

This reſuſall offended the King of Spaine, and makes the Duke to reſolue vpon that which which he held most profitable. From that time he could no more looke on a Spaniard. He then left the Spanish Ambassador at Turin, and came to Chambery : when as hee did see any one as farre off in his Councell of the Spanish Faction, hee lookes on him with such a disdainfull eye, he shewes himselfe no more in his presence : hee scornes the Spanish fashion, and commends the French, saying, That there is no such felicitie as to conquer ones selfe, and to yeeld himselfe absolutely vnto himselfe.

The King was long before he would yeeld vnto the Dukes comming into France, saying, That it was not necessary he should passe the mountaines without the Marquisate of Saluces. But the Cheualier Breton and Roncas did presse the King, that he would be pleased to give their Master leave to see him assuring him that he would giue him all content. The first was framed to the fashion of that Court, and did beleue that when they should see a Prince great in Iudgement, admirable in liberallitie, and indued with many excellent qualities, they would grant him all without any difficulty. Many dissuaded the Duke from this voyage, laying before him the dangers in trusting a great enemy, wanting no examples, whereof one in such remarkable accidents were sufficient to make him to change his minde, and to ground his iudgement vpon experience.

Roncas returned from the Court, he found the Duke at Hautecombe, and brings him Letters from the King, fuller of desire to see him, then of any hope that this enuie should yeeld him any great profit. This Letter well considered, was not sufficient to make the way for such a passage, shewing that although the King desired his comming, it was always without prejudice, to haue reason of the Marquisate. It was imparted to the Councell: whereof some said, that this voyage would giue an offence which Spain would neuer pardon: others said, that the end of this game would be the losse of friendship of the K. of Spaine, which would be profitable to the Duke, and necessary for his children. The Duke answers, that the Mariner is ill aduised that strikes often against the same rock where he hath many times suffered shipwreck. That the hatred of Spaine would make the conditions of the treaty more easie and beneficiall, and would lay open that which none but himselfe could expresse, carying in his brest certain designs which hee could not trust to any but himselfe. There was no reason of force to make him change this opinion. He said, that as soone as he had seene the King he should be content. They had much adoe to persuade him to send (not an Ambassador, but a simple Post) vnto the King of Spaine, not to aske his aduice, but to cary him assurance of his going into France: the which he undertook when as they could not beleue it in Court, thinking that he had changed his resolution.

When as all doubts were taken away, the King gaue order for his receiuing, commanding the Governour of Lions to prepare the Archbishops lodging for his owne person, and the nearest houses for the Noblemen of his Court : That hee should accompany him in the best sort he could to doe any thing that he desired to see within the towne. That he should goe and meet him in the mid way of the last post, with all the Nobility of his gouernment. That they of the towne should attend him at the gate when hee should enter, and that the Prouost of Merchants should tell him, that he had commandement to do him the same honour that was to be done to his Maiesty, and visiting him in his lodging, to present vnto him the goodliest & rarest fruits that might be found in the country, and that they should feast him, and deffray him with all his traine. This was executed with such order and state, as the Duke hath said often since, that this entertainment had bound him. The Earles of the great Church of Lions were in doubt whether they should receiue this Prince as they had done the Duke Emanuel Philibert his father. The Dukes of Sauoy, as Earles of Villards and Soueraignes of that county in the country of Brefre, haue had place as Chanoin of Honour in that Church, the which is represented vnto them the first time they enter. The same honour should haue beene offered vnto the Duke passing by Lions, as had beene giuen vnto his father when he came after the peace in the year 1559, if things had beene in the same estate, or if they had not found a greater difference. The Chapter of this Church had great reason to intreat the Prince as they had done his predecessors, seeing the King would haue him receiued like vnto his Maiesty, and giue him that testimonie of honour, the effect whereof did honor them as much that gave it, as he could find himselfe honored that receiued it. But for that through the Kings conquest the country of Villards was no more vnder his obedience ; that things were yet in suspence of war or peace ; that Princes are alwayes offended with the communication of such honours ; they

La Guide Governour of Lions, adu. telch the King of the Duke of Sauoy reception. The King demands what a Chanoin of Honour is.

A they resolued not to doe any thing therein, but what it should please the King to appoint. They aske the Governours aduice : whereupon La Faye, one of the Earles of that Church, was sent to Court, to know the Kings pleasure touching this difficulty.

The King demanded of him, what a Chanoin of honour was, and if the Duke of Sauoy reception had beene like vnto his. La Faye answered, that the great and famous Churches of Europe had Chanoinnes of honour, who were either Soueraine Princes, (in whose dominions they were founded) or foraigne Princes, who by their piety haue bound the Church to this acknowledgement of honor. That the place of a Chanoin of honour, is neither for the office, nor for the charge, but onely for reuerence and priuiledge : for as the Prince who is a Chanoin of honour, is not bound to any other thing, but to sweare the protection and preseruacion of the rights of the Church, so he reapes no other profit, but is partaker of their praies which they make there.

That this honour should bee of small import, if the greatnesse of Princes which had desired it, did not make it great in a great Church, the which being one of the chiefe of France as well in Antiquity as in Dignity, the reputation thereof hath beene spread in farre nations, who haue founded their Churches after this modell. That this honour had beene giuen in ancient time to the most Christian Kings, to the Dukes of Sauoy Earles of Villards, to the Dukes of Bourgundy, Dukes of Berry, and Dauphines of Viennois, which haue beene receiued Chanoinnes of Honor in that Church, but those receptiones did differ from that of the Kings.

The King asked the opinion of his Councell in that case, and by their aduice hee answered, that the Duke of Sauoy holding no more the County of Villards, should not pretend the rights that depended thereon : that comming into France, to reconcile himselfe vnto his Maiesty, hee would make so small an aboad in Lions as hee did not thinke that hee would stay for so simple a ceremonie. That if hee should demand that place of a Chanoin of Honour as they had giuen it to his deceased father, the Chapter should excuse themselves, vntill they knew the Kings pleasure, to doe their duties at his returne.

The Duke was much offended with the refusal of that was due to him, and the which D they had giuen vnto his deceased father. Neither did he dissemble his discontent, for he would not goe into this Church, although he were lodged in the Archbishops palace, nor passe ouer the place, which is before the principall doore : and when as the Deane with the whole body of the Church went to salute him, hee said that hee had alwayes honoured that companay, as hauing the Honour to be of it. Being receiued into Lions according to the Kings order and command, hee had many presages of discontentment in his voyage. His seruants in Court aduertised him that if hee came without other designe then to offer the Marquisate of Saluces, hee would repent his comming. One sayd vnto him that hee should not get any great matter of the King, seeing hee was not pleased that the Cathedrall Church at Lions should afford him a little honour and E ceremony. A man at armes of the company of the Marquis d'Yrfe, was put in prison vpon a false aduice that came from Geneva, that he followed the Duke with an intent to doe a bad act at Paris. It was strange in Court that the King had not sent any other vnto him then the Controuler generall of the Postes. But nothing troubled him more, then when as Varenne (among other discourses which the Duke offered, to found their opinions touching his voyage) sayd vnto him, hee should be welcome so as hee restored the Marquisate. A speech which toucht the Duke vnto the quicke, who esteemed not all the Estates of his patrimony, as the Marquisate alone. It is true that they loue that better which they haue gotten, then that which hath beene purchased by their Predecessors. He went by post from Lions to Roane : from thence hee went by water to Orleans, whither the King sent the Duke of Nemours to receiue him. Betwixt Orleans and Fontainebleau he was met first by the Marshall Biron, and then by the Duke Montpensier, being followed by many Noblemen.

The 13 of December at night (a memorable day for the Kings birth) hee arose when hee knew his traine to bee asleepe, and departs secretly to get to Fontainebleau before his people were awake. Varenne who had commandement from the King to come before and aduertise him, had much adoe to follow him, and if the Duke had found horses ready at the first post, they had not caried the first newes of his arrival.

The King and his Nobles were stirred in red, the Duke and his traine in blacke.

The Dukes prauiſes.

Duke of Mercœur's voyage into Hungary in October. 1599.

He found the King coming from Maſſe, with all the Noblemen of his Court, attended in red, and ready to goe to horſe backe to meet him: they did walke long together after their first embracings and excuses. Then the Duke told him the occasions of his voyage, the which hee had kept ſecret from his Councell: but hee could draw nothing from the King by this first parlee, but hee should haue him his friend in yielding him his Marquifate. It is a difficult thing to feed a King that hath a white beard with words. The King said alwaies that hee desired nothing but his owne. And the Duke of Sauoy being in the Louvre spake as boldly as if he had bene in the Citadell at Turin, that no power in the world should euer make him yeeld to this restitution. A free and courageous speech in another Country, not amongst his owne people, but to Villersy the Kings chiefest and most confident Secretary of State. From Fontainebleau hee went to Paris with a goodly traine, hee was lodged in the Louvre, and spent the Christmas in Nemours house. He admired this great Court, where hee fees the chiefest Noblemen of the Realme, and noted that L'Escligueres who had so much troubled him, was not so great in Court as in Dauphine. The Dukes presence did increase his reputation, he gouerned his actions in such sort, as he freed them from the scorn and mockery of the Court. His wisdom, his discretion, and his courtie, made them to forget the tales which were yet told of the good Duke Charles his grandfather. They did obserue in his actions courtie and courage, bounty, discretion and policy. This yeare ended with all sorts of pleasures and sports, familiarities and proofes of true friendship, so as many beleued that the two hearts and the two Courts of these Princes were but one, but there was alwaies some mark of constraint, and amidst these embracings there alwaies past some gird or quip. The King who is sudden in his answers, gaue him alwaies some touch to thinke on. There was too great difference betwixt their humours to make a long and good harmony. But whilst the Court abounds in pleasure and delights, the Duke Mercœur is in Hungary, in the midst of many discomforts, which hee holds pleasing for Gods cause: but before hee goes hee giues them occasion to talke off him in the Court of Parliament. Hee had a cause plaied there, and his Advocate gaue him the quality of a Prince: Seruin the Kings Advocate (holding it a base preuarication to bee silent at that which ought to be spoken for the Kings seruice and the Law of State) did shew that that quality did not belong to any, but to Princes of the blood. The Duchesse of Mercœur (who was then in presence) said that they could not take from her husband a quality that was due vnto him by the right of his birth, and that the King held him so.

The Duke Mercœur, holding that which the Kings Advocate had sayd, in discharge of his duty for a brauado and a contempt, went the same day vnto his house, and gaue him iniurious words. The King being aduertised thereof, held it a bold act. The Court esteemed the injury done vnto them, and desired the more to repaire it, for that the honour of the Kings seruice was wronged, and that it had bene done in sight of the Parliament of the capitall City of the Reame, and in his house that was wronged, the which should bee to euery man an inuoluable Sanctuary. The Court decreed that hee should bee personally adorned, and had proceeded further if the Kings commandment had not stayed them. It was a great vertue in the President Lizer, when hee decreed that the quality of a Prince (which the Cardinall of Lorraine tooke) should bee razed out of his Advocates pleadings. The Cardinall complained vnto the King: but the President Lizer answered with such courage and constancy before the King, being in councell, that the Cardinall was no Prince nor equall to Princes, and if you will faith hee vnto it, shew vs the place of your Principality. A free speech which purchased the old man much reputation, and yet within two yeares after hee made him resigne his place vnder another pretext. There was no Nobleman in France that vied the benefit of the peace more worthily then the Duke Mercœur, for disdaining the idleness of the Court and the ease of his house, hee employed himselfe to succour the Christians, against the greatest enemy of their Religion. Hee leads with him the Count of Chaligny his brother, with some Gentlemen at his owne charge, resolving to imploy his goods as well as his life in this holy warre, hauing vowed to serue Christendome two yeares at his owne charge. He shewed himselfe a great Captaine as well to defend as to assaile, hauing kept the enemy with an Army of a hundred and fifty thousand men from

A from besieging of Strigonia: this was in his first voyage before whose returne the Emperor desired to see him, and intreated him to take his way by Prague.

In the beginning of the yeare, the Duke of Sauoy sent the King two great Bafins, and two Ewers of Chryſtal, the rarest peeces of the Cabinet of Beatrice of Portugal his grandmother, and of Lady Katherine the Infanta of Spaine and his wife, the which could not bee valued neither for the matter, nor for the workemanship: and the King returned vnto the Duke alewell of Diamonds, in the midst whereof there was one Diamond Transparent, which discovered his Maiesties portrait, the which hee esteemed so much, as hauing lost it once in dancing, he gaue five hundred Crownes to him that found it. The Duke was not to bee imitated in his bounty, and when as they thought that hee had giuen all, hee invited the King and the Court to a dancing, where he shewed himselfe in Jewels, as they were esteemed to bee worth about six hundred thousand Crownes. Hee gaue Presents to all the Court, who accepted them with the Kings permission: Only the Duke of Biron refused the horses that hee sent vnto him: but the King had nothing the better opinion of their intelligences, nor the Duke lesse assurance of his affection by this refusal, for it was chiefly for his sake, that the Duke of Sauoy had made his voyage, to draw him wholly from the Kings seruice. It was that great occasion which hee carryed secret in his breast, and would not reueale vnto his Councell, when they dissuaded his going into France: the Marquifate of Saluces was the pretext of his voyage, but the finishing of this great conspiracy was the true cause. It was a goodly foyle well set out, but covered with a false stone.

La Fin was employed as a Truchman of the Wills of the Conspirators and Confederates. The first time that hee had any speech with the Duke of Sauoy, was the night after the feasts of Christmas, when he was brought into the Dukes Chamber in Nemours house, by Seigneur Jacob, without the priuity of any other. The Duke of Nemours (coming to giue the Duke the good night) was intreated not to enter, for that the Duke would take his rest. They would not haue him acquainted with any thing, fearing lest he should aduertise the King, hauing obserued what hee sayd the first day of the Dukes arrival, that nothing should draw him from the Kings seruice, and that excepted, hee would doe any thing for his Highnesse. There was not any night but La Fin spent a good part of it, to acquaint him with the State of the faction. Those that were of this intelligence, met at the most remote Churches, to acquaint one another with that which past. Nothing was said in the Kings Councell, but the Duke of Sauoy was presently aduertised thereof, by them that were at his deuotion. But he had not yet spoken with the Duke of Biron of their designe, but by a third person: it was necessary they should ioyne to knit the knot of their vniou. They had both sought the occasion, but there was still some obstacle, or some spie that hindred them. They encountered a fit opportunity at Conflans, being all alone, the King hauing commanded the Duke of Biron to entertaine the Duke of Sauoy vntill his returne: they left no time, in plying it but in three or foure words of trust, and assured intelligence, referring the rest to the mediation of La Fin. Their discourse was broken off, by the coming of the Count Solfons, and the Duke of Montpensier.

The Dukes proceeding therein, was very cunning and iudicious, for often-times hee would begin a discourse of the valour and courage of the Duke of Biron, to found the Kings opinion, who did not alwayes giue him the glory of those goodly executions, whereof hee wanted. The Duke did still aduertise the Duke of Biron of any thing the King had sayd of him, that might any way alter him, which made him to breake forth in the bitterest words hee could, against all respect of the Kings seruice, being very sensible of any thing that was spoken against the reputation of his valour, in regard whereof he esteemed nothing: and when hee entered into the History of his life, hee would speake contemptibly of all the world, not sparing the King himselfe, whose valour and experience in military actions, hath obscured others, and forced them to confesse, that hee hath not bene advanced to the Royall Throne by the benefit of Fortune, but by the merit of his vertue. The Duke of Biron committed great errors against the rules of such as desire to raise and aduance their fortunes. No man must euer enter into comparision of valour and sufficiency with his Prince: hee may not dispute of his aduice, contradict his opinion, nor affect to seeme more advised, more iudicious, nor more capable. Many haue bene cast away vpon this shelve. A The Duke of Biron was of this humor. The excess of his courage made him to disallow with disaine, all that was not done or inuented by himselfe. He sayd sometimes vnto the King, that he would not haue them write in the History of France, that other then he had done such and such a thing.

The second day of the yeere, the King went to Saint Germaine in Lay, leading the Duke with him, to shew him his buildings, his Grots or Caves and his Chafes, and with all hee shewed him his other houles, and all the goodliest places about Paris. In the meane time hee dissembled his discontent, with so great wisdom, as hee seemed alwaies one, at the table, at hunting, at play, and at dancing: the King though he refused what he demanded, yet did he still shew him new sights, to recompence the fained repentance his voyage.

The king leads the Duke to the Court of Parli-ment.

After that he had seene all that was rare about Paris, the King would shew him his Court of Parliament, for all that hee had seene was nothing in respect of the admirable greatness of that reuerent Court, whereof in former times, many Emperours, Kings, and Princes, coming to Paris, had more admired the Iustice that was administered there, then any thing else that they had seene. The King aduertised the chiefe President Achilles de Harley, that hee would goe see and heare them. They prepared the lodging of the golden Chamber, whereas the King and Duke might see and bee seene. There was a most tragical cause pleaded, whereof the first President made choise: The subiect C was a of one Iohn Prost a practitioner of the Law, who had bene murdered at Paris, and the authors could not be discouered. His mother accused a Baker where he was lodged, vpon some apparant presumptions of certaine money which shee had lent vnto him. Whereupon the Baker was condemned to be rackt with all extremity, after the which hee was enlarged for a time, putting in Caution for his appearance againe in Court.

It happened afterwards that three Gallions were taken for robbing of a house, and condemned the next day to be hanged. At their execution, the last of the three said, that the Baker was innocent for that whereof hee had bene accused, for the murder of Iohn Prost, and that it was he with his companion La Sale that had slaine him, thinking that he had money: and that after they had slaine him, they did cast him into the Priuy, whereas D he was yet. The which was found true. Whereupon the Baker being declared innocent, hee presents his petition vnto the Court, and demands reparation of honor; with his charges, damage and interest against the mother. The mother defends her selfe, and saith, that her accusations were not calumnious. Master Anne Robert pleaded for the Baker, and for the mother Master Anthony Arnault, and for the Kings interest Master Seruin his Maiesties Aduocate Generall.

Anne Robert Aduocate in the Court, pleading for the Baker being Plaintiffe, said thus:

May it please yee:

THE ancient Poets taking pleasure to discourse of many combats happened at the battell of Troy, report that Telexphus (the sonne of Hercules) received in an encounter a fore wound with a Lance by Achilles: who seeing his paine to encrease dayly, fled to Apollones Oracle for Counsell, who answered, that nothing could giue him cure or cure, but the same Lance wherewith hee had bene wounded. A Lance called Pelias of Mount Pelion in the top whereof Chiron gathered it, to present to Achilles: so as in Telexphus accident, the remedy and the cure, came from the same Lance, which gaue the wound and did the harme.

A wound giuen
by Intence, cannot be cure
red but by fencence.

The Plaintiffe with some like consideration, hath reason to say, that hauing bene by the authority of a sentence miserably tormented, and exposed to the rigour of the racke and torture, by the wilfull slander and importune rafhnesse of a woman, hee hath recourse vnto the same Lance of Achilles which did wound him: seeing that he doth now appeale vnto the Authority and Iustice of the same Court, which hath heretofore giuen the first sentence of condemnation against him, hoping that by the exemplary punishment of the rafhnesse and slander of this woman, the soueraigne

Iudex.

A soueraigne Iustice of this Parliament, guided by the conduct of an Achilles, which doth preface and hold the chiefe place, shall giue cure to his wounds, and bring consolation to his griefes.

The estate of the cause that is now in question, and to bee iudged, is not whether the Plaintiffe were falsely and slanderously accused or no: for the accident of two murderers hath auerred and discouered the slander without any doubt. But the question is, if this Defendresse (after so false and calumnious an accusation) shall passe unpunished: and whether her pretended excuses shall be receiued and countenanced by Iustice. For one of the chiefe points which shee pleads for her excuse is, that the criminall Proccesse hauing past through the hands of the most famous Iudges of Europe, if they haue bene deceived, (saith this woman) if by presumptions and probable coniectures, they haue found cause to condemne this man vnto the racke, if so many worthy Iudges haue bene surprised, will you not excuse the simplicity of a woman, and the extreme sorrow of an afflicted mother for the death of her sonne, hauing had no hatred nor malice, in this accusation. It is a great abuse to measure the action of Iudges, with the actions of parties: the pursuit and proceeding of parties is meere voluntury: no man is forced to plead or accuse: the Plaintiffe should be well aduised before he begin, and not to draw any man into the danger of a capitall condemnation, if hee bee not first assured, that he whom hee calls into question hath done the deed and is Author of the crime: but the charge of a Iudge is tyed to a necessary duty, bound to certaine Maxims, and subiect C to rules, established by the Lawes to condemne necessarily vpon presumptions and proofes, and vpon the testimony of witnesses, examined at the instance of the party. Antiquity doth teach vs, that Tirestias that great Sooth-sayer, foretold things to come by the flying of birds, not that hee did see the birds, for hee was blind, but (say the Poets) hee had alwaies his daughter Manto neere vnto him, who told him in what manner the birds did fly, and thereby hee diuined. Iustice may rightly bee compared to this excellent blinde man, and the comparifon cannot seeme bad, seeing that the Egyptians thought good to paint their Iudges with their eyes blind-fold. For Iudges cannot rightly see nor know what doth passe. Iustice deceites nothing but according to the report and testimonie of parties and witnesses. If any inconuenience happen in the condemnation, the mischiefe is to bee imputed to the parties, and not to the Iudges or Iustice.

Iustice doth induce of that which ap-peareth.

They report that the Greekes hauing put Palamedes to death, his father Nauplius to bee reuenged, obserued the time when as the Greekes after the sacke of Troy, returned by sea, in a great tempest. Nauplius being vpon a Rocke in full sea, held a burning torch in his hand, as if that place had bene a safe Port for the descent of ships: the Greekes abused with this light, ranne against the Rocke, and suffered shipwracke. In this misfortune if there were cause to complaine, it was against the malicious inuention of Nauplius: but as for the Pilots and such as gouerned the ships, they were not to bee blamed, in following the direction of a Lanthorne in a darke night, being usually set at safe E Ports. So in accidents like vnto this in question, all the harme, all the complaints, and all the wrong, is to bee imputed to the accused, which kindles the fire of slander, and from whom proceedes the practices and subornation of witnesses, and the search and disguising of presumptions and circumstances. Who doubts but the complaints and malicious teares of this woman were false directions, and sufficient inductions to circumsent the wisdom of the best Iudges, who in the midst of the night, that is to say, in the darknesse of hidden crimes, haue followed the ordinary formes of Iustice.

Slander is the cause of false iudgement.

It was with reason that a Greeke Author discoursing of the criminall proccesse of Orestes, who to reuenge the death of his father, slew Chremys his mother: said, that F when hee was brought before the Parliament of Arrispage, Minerva Goddess of wisdom was President in Iudgment. The Ancients by such fictions would teach vs, that in the iudgment of criminall causes, if a celestiall power doth not assist, there doth many times inconueniences happen, but the fault must then bee imputed to accuse, who giues the first cause, by an information framed expressly to afflict and condemne an innocent. Appian in his History reports of Julius Caesar, that seeing a mutiny in his campe, he commanded the authors thereof to be apprehended. A souldier was brought before

M m m m ; him

him as one of these mutines, and yet it was presently auerred that hee was none. Caesar A caused him that brought him to be severely punished, iudging that although hee did it not maliciously, yet hee defected punishment, for that he had drawne an innocent souldier in danger of his life. We read that Martian hauing found a dead body in the night, and through piety (which was then greatly recommended among Christians) seeking to bury him, was taken, led before the Iustice, and condemned vpon suspition: but at the same instant, when as they caried him to execution, it chanced happily that the murderer was taken and executed, hauing confessed the fact, to the great happinesse of Martian, who was deliuered, and within few yeeres after chosen Emperor. As also the Ecclesiasticall History doth teach vs, that Saint Athanasius was accused to haue slaine Arsenius, B and was ready to be condemned, if by good hap Arsenius had not beene found, being hidden by the enemies of Athanasius. A late writer curious in the search of the singularities of the History of Venice, reports an aduerture somewhat like vnto this: Fuscarius sonne to the Duke of Venice, had a capitall quarrell with another Venetian Gentleman called Hermolus Donat. This Gentleman was found dead, and the Author of this murder not knowne. Fuscarius vpon suspition of their quarrell, was called in question, condemned, and sent into exile, where hee dyed for griefe to see himselfe banished from his Country. Within three months after his death, a thiefe was executed, who amongst other crimes, confessed, that it was hee and not Fuscarius, which had slaine that Venetian Gentleman.

The punishment of talic accusations.

In such and the like inconueniences, were it reason to giue absolute impunity to him that was the calumniator, be it that malice or indiscretion hath drawne him to this slander? Scipio sayd, that a Generall of an Army must be well aduised what he doth, for in matters of warres there is no meanes to erre twise, the first fault being sufficient to ruine an army. Euen so in Iustice, it must be very exact, when there is any question of a capitall accusation, for seeing that the life depends thereon, there is no meanes to erre twice, the first being irreparable. It is an approved distinction of all those that haue treated of the punishment of false accusations, whether a informer bee induced to accuse slanderously and wickedly, or by indiscretion and without malice.

The one differs from the other, so haue they diuers effects: the one hath some excuse, the other is punished severely: the one ciuilly, the other criminally: for where there is malice and slander, the Law of God doth punish the calumniator with the like paine, Lege Talionis: and at Rome the calumniator in crimes that were not capitall, was beaten with a hot iron, and branded in the fore-head, for a signe and perpetuall marke of his slander. And the Emperour Macrinus did punish those accusers which did faile in their proofes with death. Pliny speaking of such men, called them abominable sacrifices, which should bee offered vp to the publike quiet. And the good Emperour Traian did so detest calumniators, as hee caused them to bee put into a ship without sayle or tackling, abandoning them to the mercy of that mercilesse element, which would haue no pity of them, no more then they had had of many poore innocents.

But as for the slander which proceeds from indiscretion without malice, the severity in truth should not bee so great, yet is it fit there should be some punishment. No severe or capitall punishment, but at the least pecuniary and ciuill, of damages and fine. If thee were not excusable as a mother, forced to accuse by extreme griefe without malice: what racke? what punishment? what torments were sufficient to punish her, which hath drawne an innocent man in question, and in danger to be broken vpon the wheele? The Poets saie, that the Goddess Ceres by the supposition of Tantalus, did eate Pelops shoulder. This Goddess finding her owne error, although vnadvisedly, condemned herselfe to make Pelops shoulder of Yuory. You are the cause of the cruell torments which the Plaintiff hath suffered vpon theracke, but you say it was by indiscretion, and without malice. At the least by an award of damages and fine, make some pecuniary recompence, to releue the misery of this poore man, and to helpe him to finish the remainder of his dayes, languishing after so many torments. And if this woman represents vnto you the pity and griefe of a mother, imagine I pray you the miserable sighes of this innocent, in the midst of the cruelty of most violent tortures, hauing no other feeling but his paine and griefe,

In

A In one houre a thousand deaths without dying, a body tormented, stretched, halfe torne in peeces, his sinewes dried and strained, his members broken, and his whole body in a pittifull estate, being bound, and miserably rackt. And to speake truth, it had beene a great happinesse for this poore man to haue died, for what remains is no more a perfect body, but peeces displaced and disioyned, members broken, lame and feeble, hauing his body reduced to that miserable estate, as hereafter he shall hardly by his labour get a lining for himselfe, his wife and five children. It is the clamor and sighs of these poore young Infants, whose cry pierceth vp to heauen, and their complaints come vnto you, to moue you vnto pity. He in the meane time seeing himselfe miserable in his body, and his family reduced to beggery, liues and dies altogether. It is a paine which still encreaseth, a griefe which euer doubles, and a death which hath neuer end.

That great Painter Apelles meaning to paint Slander, set him forth in a mourning weed, The pictured Slander. hauing two wiues, one of either side, Ignorance and Suspition: what reason were there to take for paiement and available satisfaction the indifferencie of the Defendresse, and the excuse of Ignorance (an ordinary companion to Slander) and to pardon so notable a fault, vnder pretext of an afflicted mothers griefe, for the death of her son: and hereafter when any murder is committed, shall it be lawful for a Father, a Brother, or a neare kinsman, with all impunity, vnder a pretext of Iustice, to accuse whom he pleaseth, and to bring in question of his life, or of some cruell torments, and in the end to be quiet, excusing himselfe vpon his griefe or ignorance? The rules of Iustice and Law doe not allow it. Titus Livius said excellently, that the Law was inexorable, deafe, without pity, and without passion. Why doth that worthy Author say, That the Law is deafe, but for that it doth neuer giue eare vnto the vaine discourse of pity and commiseration? The property of Iustice is to be strict and severe. The Surgion that is pittifull and doth not lanch deepe, makes the wound incurable. An indulgent and ouer mild father, makes the child incorrigible: So a mercifull Iudge doth nourish and increase vice, and betraies the lawes and maiesty of Iustice.

The Law inexorable.

This cause doth therefore import the publike, for examples sake: for although the Plaintiff hath no other quality but of a simple Bourges and handy-crafts-man, yet to ob- D taine reason in Iustice, and to hope for reparation of the wrong which hath bene done him, he thinks himselfe great enough, seeing he hath the happinesse to liue vnder the peacefull government of the best King in the world, who hauing heaped all happinesse vpon France, maintaines equally in his protection, and vnder the safeguard of his Maiesty, the life and health of all his subiects, poore and rich, great and small. The Ancients held, that Themis, which is the Goddess of Iustice, was the daughter of the Sun: and as the Sunne may be seene in a glasse by them which cannot behold his beames; So the Maiesty of our great King, the true and comfortable Sunne of this Monarchy, the eye and heart of France, would giue authority to this famous Parliament, as the true seat of his greatnesse, to the end that therein, as in a Looking-glasse, wee might admire the beauty, light, and beames of his iustice. An Historian saith, That the Emperour Augustus had fiery eyes, Ignis oculos, inferring thereby, that he had such glistering eyes, and such a piercing sight as it was impossible or very hard to looke stedfastly on him.

And we in like sort must content our selues that it is lawfull for vs to admire the beauty of this soueraine Court, and to beleue that our weak sight is not strong enough to enioy fully the presence of our great Prince, sitting in his seat of iustice, nor to endure the glistering beames of the Maiesty of our great French Augustus, whom God hath leading through so many dangers, as it were by the hand, to the height of all greatness, and hauing endued him with the valour of Caesar, the fortune of Alexander, the bounty of Traian, wee can with no more vnto him but the happinesse, the many yeares, and the continuall prosperity of Augustus, to the end that all wee his subiects may liue happy and content vnder the raigne of so great a King, and the assured iustice of this famous Parliament.

So the Plaintiff hauing recourse to this soueraine Iustice, as to the last Port of health, beseeching the Court to allow of his request, and that hee may be absolved of the slanderous accusation laid against him, that the enrolement of his imprisonment may be razed, and hee discharged of all condemnations which heretofore haue 1600 haue bene giuen; and moreover, that the defendresse may be condemned to a pecuniary reparation, such as it shall please the Court to decree, and to all charges, dammages, and interest.

Anthony Arnaud for the Defendresse, said:

May it please yee,
Violations
free of earth in solaces.

YOV shall vnderstand in this cause, how true it is; That ordinary afflictions speake with indignement, and that extreame calamities doe quench or confound the spirit. The Plaintiffe hath represented his griefes vnto you in an eloquent discourse, full of Art and the force of eloquence: and contrariwise of our part, you shall heare nothing but the sobes and sighes of a mother, transported with griefe, and reduced to all sorts of despair. I would to God the torments wherof you speake, and all the cruelties that may be imagined, had bene executed vpon me poore mother, who haue one foot already in the graue; and that the death of my son (and the kind of death more miserable then the death it selfe) had not minished the mournfull subiect of this miserable cause: so as on what side sooner you turne, there is nothing to be seene but teares and defolation: But there is this great difference: that the griefe of the aduerser party (if there yet remains any) may be mollified in time, by a thousand remedies which excellent wits haue inuented during many ages, to ease the discomforts of the body. But contrariwise, the extreame affliction (which finds no words of force to represent it) for the losse of a sonne, of an onely sonne, the only support and comfort of the trembling age of an old mother, hath neuer found consolation in all the most excellent discourses in the world, being the most excellent Physicke of the minde. The griefe is so violent as it exceeds all remedy, and bleeds afresh every day. The older it grows, the more grievous it is. It doth hourly master the resistance which it found in the beginning, and doth continually vanquish the forces of the body with them of the minde.

It is a strange thing, that my poore sonne hauing bene thus cruelly massacred, you who see him returne no more into your house, instead of aduertising me thereof, went into his chamber to take his money, you transported it out of your owne house, and hid it in your brother-in-lawes. And which is worse, being examined by the Iustice, you denied it constantly, and often, vntill that your sonne (too young to conceale the truth) discovered the place where you had laid it. All this is iustified by the processe, the which remains in the hands of the Kings Council.

So as it was not in you that these murderers were not vn timerely, but the peering eye of diuine Iustice, which neuer sleeps: for a robbery committed two moneths after hath brought them to the execution. It appeares by the informations, that the very day of the murder, these two murderers went vnto your lodging and brake open my sons cofer, if you had fled vnto Iustice they might haue bene instantly apprehended. Alas! peradventure my poore child was not then fully dead. How many are left for dead which are not so? How many haue bene taken out of the coffin, yea, out of the graue, which haue suruiued their fune all fifty yeeres?

At the least, you cannot deny but you were the cause to moderate their punishment: What know I what they would haue said vpon the wheele? You neuer attempted any thing against mee, but when as they which slue my sonne could no more accuse you: What did then hinder you, why you did not speedily aduertise the Iustices? At the least it was faine to restore the money which you had taken, in committing a dishonestie theft, the which was alwaies punished with death: and wherein the lawes of hospitality (the which are holy among all nations) were also violated. Whom should I sooner challenge for the death of my sonne, then him who had his spoiles? Nature hath hidden in the earth both gold, silver, and iron, but the malice of man hath drawn them all forth, that it might want no instruments for murders, nor reward for Murderers. No man sheds blood to die his hands therein; there must be some other violent passion to thrust him on: Couetousnesse is the most ordinary. All coniectures, all presumptions were and are found true, that my Sonne had bene slaine by some one that desired his money, whom then might I better call in question then him who was found seized thereon?

Desire and covetousnesse the cause of murders.

If

A If treading vnder foot the murder of my sonne (as some mothers doe) I had onely demanded his goods of you, you could not haue auoided an infamous and rigorous condemnation. But for that I haue sought reuenge of the murder, I am this day in danger to be condemned, what recompence? Caius Antonius was accused for the conspiracy of Caeselin: wherof he was found innocent, but his arraignment was intermixt with other thefts, which he had in former times committed in Macedonia, for the which he was condemned. And yet the one of his accusations had nothing common with the other. In this cause murder and theft haue great affinity. How many be there in this great Citie, which being murdered like to this poore young man, should remain three months vnknown, if their Host wanting them did not presently aduertise the Iustice. Suffer them to take their money without punishment, that is to say, declare him innocent that hath hidden it, and you shall helpe to hide the murderers.

It is a strange thing, that in the head City of this Realme, and in the face of the Parliament, there should be such furious Tigers found, to murder men as boldly as in the most hidious Forest in the world. The more these wicked spirits are determined to contemne the Lawes, the more must you endeavour to force them to feare them. All that may serue to punish such detestable crimes, must be earnestly embraced, nothing can so much aduance it, as to aduertise the Iustice speedily: whilst it is fresh these wicked spirits are terrified and amazed. If all be like vnto the Plaintiffe, a poore man may be rotten before they know he is dead. There be some that are incident to the suspicion of a crime although they be very innocent, as he that is found neare vnto a man that is newly murdered, he may happily be put to the Racke, this is a meere mischance, or rather (laying aside all fatality obserued in this case by the heathen Lawyers) lets say with the Doctors of the Church, that it is a secret iudgment of God, the which we must admire, and not curiously search into. The thunder is worshipped even by them that are stricken with it: punishments ordained by Iustice are the chastisements of Gods hand, whose power is represented here below by the Prince, and his, by his Magistrates. The Philosopher Crator said, That he which suffers ill without desert, is much eased in this accident of fortune: but in this fact which is now in question, the Plaintiffes theft, and not his misfortune, hath with great reason, made this suspicion to fall vpon him. Doe you not consider that the paine which you haue suffered, is the cause you shall bee this day absolved? Without it your theft could not remaine vn timerely: your demand of damage and interest, belongs onely to them that are meere innocent: if you be accused of two faults, and are found guilty of one, you must implore the mercy of the Iudge, and not blame his rigor. It was then impossible to free you from the Racke, by all the Maximes of Lawyers and their Interpreters, followed by a decree which needs no other defence then reason. And not to stray from this cause, shall I let you plainly see, that you need not bee so fearefull to come to the Racke. If these Murderers had not bene tortured for the robbery for the which they were executed, they could not haue bene condemned, for want of proofe. The one of them confessed it vpon the Racke. As the Racke tormented you, so the Racke relieved you, hauing discovered your innocency in regard of the murder. And in easing you, it hath brought before mine eyes my murdered son, who presents himselfe euery night vnto me with stretched out armes, whilst the murderers kill him.

So as one and the selfe same thing hath filled me with heauinesse and with ioy. Content your selfe then with your good fortune, and insult no more ouer my misery: do you not feare that they will lesse pittie you, and the paine you haue endured, when they shall see you haue none of me, nor of my distresse. I will not say vnto my Masters, that it is cruell and barbarous, to adde afflictions to the afflicted, why should I say so? seeing that all the condemnations which my aduerser party demands against me, can adde no more calamity, then small brookes doe vnto the sea? It is the onely comfort which remains in my misery, that it can haue no encrease. I will not therefore spend any time to cite the texts of Lawyers, which hold the violent passions of so miserable a mother excusable. They be lawes which are borne with vs, wherof no man can be ignorant, seeing we haue sucked it with our mothers milke, and which we cannot abrogate but in spoiling our humanity. I will not strue to represent vnto you that affection to the children, or to the Parents, (euen as the loue of good subiects to their Prince) consists not in any mediocrity or temper, but in excessse, that excessse which in other motives of the minde is vicious, is here-

A mothers passion excusable.

in the full of all perfection. Why should I come to these excuses, seeing that if I were to A begin my accusation, I would doe no less then I haue done? I had rather be condemned to all sorts of damages, interests, and reparations, then to repent me of the pursuit I haue made for the death of my sonne.

A goodly pretext for those mothers, which doe euery day sell the deare blood of their children, when they shall heare that I haue bene condemned, shall they not then haue reason to say that they feare damage and interest, if they open their mouths? Dion observes, that they were reduced to that point at Rome, hauing so much discontented accusations, as they were forced to promise impunity to him that should conuict another of a greater crime then his owne. Columniators and false accusers are to be feared vnder bad Princes, which enrich themselves with the confiscations of their subiects, and not vnder the iust and flourishing government of our great King, which hath erected so many euerm-lasting trophies of his clemency and bounty, equalling at this time by the glorious effects of iustice (which shines throughout all this great and mighty Estate) the victories and the statly triumphs of fearful war: shewing by the effects, that the same vertue, and the same magnanimity carries great Princes, and excellent Captaines into the midst of the most bloody and furious battels, and doth conduct them also to the holy and sacred actions of most happy and blessed peace.

Talio is law wholly abrogated.

We haue then no neede amongst vs of these Talio punishments, the which were as soone abrogated as they were enacted. If they were in force, not two crimes among an hundred should be punished: at the beginning wee must necessarily follow coniectures C and presumptions: if they may lead vs to the certaine knowledge of the truth, they condemn the culpable: if not, they forbear: God onely walkes in light, and men in darkness. But I beseech you to consider what power I haue had in all this criminall proceeding. The Plaintiff begins his action against me, because I am the most weak. If he durst challenge the Iudges he would do it much more willingly, all the instructions of the Proccesse comes from the criminall party. It is not I but the Kings Atturney generall. Alas! I brought nothing but my sighs, therein consists my crime. Oh I may well double my tears, seeing it is not lawfull for me to weep: it were more then a second losse of my sonne to lose my teares.

The Plaintiffs intent is, to haue a gaine for his damage and interest: the money which Iustice hath forced him to yeeld, I haue it not, I haue employed it in praying vnto God for my sonne, who was murdered, and had no time to thinke of his soule, which was a double cruelty. Houses shake before they fall. The smoake forerelt the fire that will consume vs. A tempest is discouraged a farre off, but the murdering hand of man strikes suddenly, when we least thinke of it. If you condemne me in damages and interests, you may iudge, that remembering his paines, how rigorously he will entreat me. I haue nothing left to pay it: that little which I had was employed in the education of my son, holding it to be the richest and chiefest treasure that I could desire: O deceitfull hope! By vertue of your sentence he will confine me into a prison; but I regard it not, so as he make choise of a darke and an hidious one, that it may soone shorten my miserable life, the which shall neuer finde ease but in death: for I am resolu'd to passe the remainder of my daies, like vnto those mothers which accompany their children vnto the graue. All that makes me desire liberty, is to the end that I might liue among the Rocks, in deserts, and the most solitary woods, and that I might neuer see mothers that make much of their children. Alas, my son, my poore son! I shall call on thee night and day, although thou answerest me not. If this extreme misery doth not satisfie the Plaintiff, let him feare and apprehend the wrath of God, and a second punishment. Let him not abuse the grace which he hath done him, in making manifest the gruth of this murder. Let him liue happily to see his innocency knowne, and I alwaies vnhappy to haue lost my poore child. F I conclude, that it would please the Court to absolve me from his request.

The Defen-
dents conclusion.

After this the Kings Solicitor generall, Master Seruin, did rise to plead and conclude for the Atturney generall, vpon that which the Aduocates had deliuered for the parties: the opinions of the hearers were in such suspence, as they knew not which way to incline. Hee that had first heard the Plaintiff, said, that he had reason: but as Iudges must alwaies reserve one eare for the defender, being vnpossible to iudge definitively vpon the discourse of one party: when the second had pleaded, there was such an equality and concurrence of 1600

A both a good cause. The Kings Solicitors discourse, was the powder to separate the truth from that which had some apparance of truth: but let vs heare this other Demonstration of France, whose pleading followeth.

L. Seruin, the Kings Atturney Generall, said thus:

May it please yee;

IF it be true, according to the worthy saying of Statius Caelius (vled by Apuleius) de- B tending himselfe against an accusation of impiety: That innocencie is the true eloquence. It might satisfie the intention of the poore Plaintiffs, and might promise them an honourable issue, for that a poore and vntainted life speaking for them, surmounts in the opinion of good men, the richest eloquence of them that are guilty. For he may well defend, that can purge himselfe from crimes, hauing done nothing but what he dare publicly auow. But if it be more true, that the art of speaking be vertue and wisdom, as the Stoickes haue defined it: signifying thereby, that the vertuous and wife haue subiect enough to talke. It is most certaine, that God which giueth wisdom, and out of whose mouth proceeds all knowledge and vnderstanding, hauing not endued the Plaintiffs with such graces, seeing they haue neither the knowledge nor word, which is drawne out C of the holy Scriptures, nor the perswasive speech of humane wisdom, hauing not the refined discourse of reason, they had great need of the assistance of their Aduocate: who as he doth not yeeld in eloquence and knowledge to any one of his profession, hath made prooff by this present action, how well he can defend the innocent, the which is so much the more commendable, for that Dionysius Halicarnassensis (a great Iudge of Orators) did hold Plato worthy to be blamed, for that he had written the Apologie of Socrates in a flat and cold stile.

On the one side, Master Anne Robert hath liuely represented vnto you, the miserable estate of the Baker and his wife, lately accused, and now Plaintiffs: how they haue bene pursued in the Chafselet, iudged, appealed, and condemned by sentence, the husband put D to the torture: and the Racke presented to the wife and to the maide: and to conclude, all the family in distresse, by the accusation of a horrible murder, pretended to be committed vpon the person of his guest: a crime which God hath made knowne by the reuelation of the murder, that the hearts and hands of these poore people were innocent. By reason whereof they demand reparation of honour, with damage and interest against the accuser. You haue on the other side, heard Master Anthony Arnaud, for the mother of the deceased Iohn Proff, miserably murdered, being before Plaintiffe, and now accused of slander, who may well defend her selfe by the simple colour of piety, which cries and is intercessor for her, for her, I say: A mother whose affliction is such, as there is no tongue but the mothers, or rather the voice of God that can well expresse it: neither E can any Aduocate or Orator how excellent foeuer, vnlesse he be possessed with a diuine spirit, represent the passions of a mother: witness the Prophet when hee deliuiers what God had said: Can the mother forget her child, but she must haue pittie of the fruit of her wombe? and if she should forget it, I will not forsake him, saith the Lord. It is God, our common father, God, who is charity it selfe: for so he is called by one of his Apottles: God, of whom the Greeke Poet Aratus (honoured by the allegation of S. Paul) said, That we are his offspring. God, of whom the same Apottle doth teach vs, That he is father of heauen and earth. It is he by whom all mothers haue their affection to their Children: it is he by whom the Defendresse (a miserable mother) was encouraged to seeke and pursue reuenge for the blood of her child. Behold persons of diuers qualities in our cause, who F pretend their innocencies by different reasons. The Baker and his wife demand reparation, being ignorant of the murder of Proff: and the mother (of Proff murdered) seeks to be freed from the imputation of slander. But there is yet an encounter in this controuersie, which regards the authority of things iudged, wherein the publicke hath an interest. To deliuer what is fit vpon euery one of these qualities, it seemes expedient to obserue what hath past in the accusation and proceeding: the first iudgment in the decree, the execution, and what followed since.

That which appeares by the proceſſe iudged, is, that the deceased Iohn Proſt, ſonne to A the Accuſer, hauing beene lodged for a time in the Bakers houſe : about the beginning of February 1599, Katherine Cordier the wife of the Baker, ſent for a Lock-Smith by her husbands ſonne, and cauſed him to open the chamber of Proſt, being abſent, the which ſhee hath confeſſed after much diſguiſing of the boyes name, whom ſince ſhee knew to bee her ſonne-in-law. After this ouerture, there was another maide in the view of two vnknown men, who brought the keyes which the ſaid Proſt had giuen them; the which is a ſecond charge: for theſe two men entred into the chamber in the preſence of the hoſteſſe, and tooke what they pleaſed of that which Proſt had left: and yet afterwards there was a third opening made by the Lock-Smith, which was brought by the ſonne of the Baker, and by B his wifes commendement. This being thus aduowed and iuſtified by the ſon, the chamber being opened the fourth time by a Commiſſary of the Chatelet, there was ſome money found belonging to Proſt, but not all, for that the Baker and his wife had taken, and promiſed ſome to their maide, if ſhe ſaid nothing. Moreouer, Proſts apparell being in his coffer, and among the reſt a doublet, the hoſteſſe being examined, ſaid that Proſt had none other. In the end, the proceſſe hauing beene made perfect by interrogatories and confrontations: One of the chief allegations made by the husband and the wife for their iuſtification, was, that the accuſer, although a mother, did not loue Proſt her ſonne, whereof he had oftentimes complained. By a ſentence giuen by the Prouoſt of Paris, it was decreed, that the Baker, his wife, and ſeruant ſhould be put to the Racke. They appeale. C There followed a ſecond decree in regard of the Baker: and as for his wife and ſeruant, it was ordained they ſhould haue the Racke preſented vnto them, the which was done. And after the demaill of the Baker, his wife and maide, there followed another ſentence, allowing the reception of the ordinary Proceſſe, and yet reſtrained that in caſe no greater proofes being found on the ordinary Racke, the accuſed ſhould preuaile, yet they ſhould haue no charges, damages, nor intereſt adiudged vnto them. In Iune following, God hauing ſuffered that two theues, whereof the one called Iohn Baſana had murdered this Proſt, were apprehended by the Juſtice, and by the teſtimony of Baſana the act was confeſſed. So as the Baker and his wife pretend themſelues freed by this teſtimony, and demand an honourable reparation, with ſome recompence from the mother of him that D was murdered, ſaying, That the accuſation being falſe, ſhe ought to be iudged a Slanderer. Wherein it ſeemes, that innocency preſents it ſelfe at the feet of Juſtice, and cries out for them, as Dauid in the ſeuenth Pſalme, entituled Siggaion, that is to ſay: The ignorance of Dauid, the which is his defence againſt the ſlanders of Semei, where he exclaimed in denying and forſwearing the Impoſtures of his aduerſarie, and in ſaying, that he knew not what it was, he ſpoke theſe words: If I haue committed ſuch a fact, if there be iniquity in my hands, that I may fall before mine enemies. Excellent words, and deliuered in the kinde of an oath. In like caſe a poore Hoſt Plaintiffe complains, and may ſay with Azur the Sonne of Iake, Truly I am more brutiſh then any man whatſoeuer, I haue no vnderſtanding, neither haue I learned any wiſdome, nor attained to the knowledge of holy things. The wit of man will maintaine the inſimity thereof, but who will ſupport a grieved mind? E The Accuſer at the firſt ſeemed iuſt in her cauſe, but the Accuſed came to purge themſelues, and haue found out the truth. The words of Slanderers (ſaith the wife King) are ambuſhes of blood, but the mouth of truth ſhall deliuer them. You ſee an Hoſt and Hoſteſſe accuſed of inhospitality, of infidelity, and of the murder of their Gueſt, a crime to farre from the manners and hearts of the French, as if Euripides ſaid among the Grecians:

That it was not for the Achæans to murder their Gueſts.

Wee may ſay with the Plaintiffs, with as much or more reaſon, That it is not vſuall among the French to murder their gueſts: for among ciuill people, our Celticke Nation hath beene moſt renowned for hospitality, a vertue proper to the French, and recommended by many Strangers; yea by Parthenius a Greeke Author in his booke of the Affections of Love, where he ſaith in the Hiſtory of Eurippus, that at what time the Gauls made roads into Ionia, the Celtes receiued their gueſts willingly, and entreated them courteouſly. The which is confirmed by Saluſtius a Prieſt of Marſeilles, in his

A his booke of the prouidence of God, where among the vertues of our Nation, hee tearmes them Francos hospitales. It was therefore a great crime, vnſit for the Plaintiffs: a crime for Barbarians, Pagans, and Infidels, worthy of extraordinary puniſhment, and ſo much the more puniſhable, for that it had beene committed in Paris, the chiefe City of the Realme, the ſeat of our Kings, the place of Soueraigne Juſtice, whereas the moſt holy and reuerend Senate of the world is reſident: the Court of Peeres, and the great Parliament of our great King.

The Husband accuſed in this Parliament, and not only accuſed, but iudged and tormented in body and mind, comes this day in Iudgement as a man reuiued againe by his innocency, he brings his wife with him, and ſaith againſt the Accuſer, That he which ſlandereth his neighbour, is like vnto a falſe witneſſe, which is as a hammer, a ſword, and a ſpeare arrow. Although he be borne poore and miſerable, yet is he of a pure and innocent life. That his ſoule and that of his Wiues are no leſſe precious before God then the richſt: that they haue not wronged any man: that they haue liued content in their pouerty (Pouerty which is a ſingular gift of God, and vnknowne of men) and yet they being poore and innocent haue beene afflicted: a thouſand feares haue ſeized on them, and the life both of the husband and wife haue beene in danger. The Sonne hath been heard againſt the Father, all the family deſamed, fearing to loſe their credite, and to ſee no more good dayes: to haue no meanes to get their liuing, nor to ſhew themſelues. The troubleſome griefe of a mourningfull priſon, deſtroyed of light, and caſt into an obſcure dungeon ſit for Murderers: to liue offeſtences, and to dye as often. The Racke giuen vnto the husband, and preſented to the wife: all danger, all grieſe: their eyes dried vp, their minds oppreſſed, apprehenſion of Nakedneſſe, Hunger, and death, yea and of an ignominious death. They demand this day, that which the men vniuſtly tormented in the Juſtice of Athens demanded: that the Altar of mercy might be adorned with a Monument, carrying a declaration of their innocency. They doe moreover pretend reparation againſt the Accuſer, and this demand is not new nor ſtrange, there are many Preſidents of the like, among the which there is one very famous in the Declamations of Marcus Seneca the Rhetorician.

A Father hauing two Sonnes, goes into a farre country with one of them, the ſonne D returns alone: his brother accuſeth him of Parricide: he is condemned, but by reaſon of ſome ſeſſiuall dayes the execution is deſerred: the Father returns, the brother condemned accuſeth his brother of falſe witneſſe, obtaines iudgement, cauſeth him to bee bound, and detaines him according vnto the Law, which ſaid, that a falſe witneſſe ſhould bee priſoner to him whom he had falſely accuſed. The innocent Brother ſaid, that the Accuſer was the cauſe of Parricide in the perſon of his Father, and had committed one in that of his brother: the Miniſter of Juſtice had giuen notice vnto the condemned Brother of the comming of his Father: the expected puniſhment was more grieuous then death. It was more troubleſome for the condemned man to apprehend it, then to endure it: he laid before his eyes all kinds of Death. And what can I leſſe doe (ſaid the innocent) then keep him in E my bonds, that might haue taken away my life? In another famous example, we ſee another controuerſie in the ſame Author. A Father hauing two Sonnes, deliuereth the one into the others hands, vpon ſuſpition of Parricide, whereof his Mother-in-law accuſed him. The accuſed Brother is caſt into an vnrig d ſhip: God preſerues him from danger: he ſals into the hands of Pyrats, and is made their Captaine. The Father makes a voyage by ſea; he is taken by the Sonne, whom he had ſo ill intreated, and the Sonne ſends him home into his country. Ceſtius Pius an eloquent man ſaith for the innocent brother: That innocency is a ſtrong fort, and a faithfull ſaueguard in danger. The Sea compaſſed in the ſhip, the waues toſt it, the tempeſt draue it, yet innocency did aſſure him: O Sea more iuſt then their Iudgement! O waues more mild then the Father! what a ſoule haue you caſt into the Port! and you haue not only ſaued the Son, but you haue deliuered him into the hands of Pyrats: it was diuinely decreed that the Father ſhould undertake a voyage; that the Iudge ſhould be taken to repent him of his iudgement. A Mother-in-law might accuſe, yea and cauſe her husbands ſonne to be condemned of Parricide, but ſhee could not make him a Parricide; no not in condemning him. The Sonne hereupon ſaid vnto the Father; Behold my innocency, O father, in the ſea, which you would not know in your houſe. And then turning vnto the Iudges, he ſaid, I had rather haue mine innocency iuſtified vnto you, then vnto my father. Hereupon Ariſtotele ſaith; that by the law of Greece they gaue the right ſide to the accuſed:

cused : and by the Romane lawes, Iudges are taught to be more inclined to absolue, then A to condemne.

If this be requisite in ciuill causes, how much more in criminall : And the mother which was the Accuser, whom the Demanders say was ill-affected to her sonne when he liued, could the without feare of punishment slander the Complainants, charging them with the vncertaine suspicion of a murder committed vpon the person of her Sonne, so much hated, or at the least not much beloved of her: That if the Demanders bee not exempt from fautes, whereunto all men are subiect: yet they may iustifie themselves free from the crime imposed vpon them by the Accuser, being this day purged by a testimonie which God hath caused to be given by a man, the which is so much the more credible, for that he depose it neare vnto his death, not speaking to discharge himselfe, but accusing himselfe, and confessing the Murther. These (in summe) be the griefes which the Demanders can propound. It being hard, yea impossible in such cases to speake words that may equall the sorrow.

Contrariwise, the Defendresse a poore mother, saith, or cries out in that fort, as it is not well possible to represent her passion : but wee must paint it out, as Timanthes did counterfeite Iphigenia, with her face covered, a low voice, and a languishing speech. We cannot make you vnderstand what she hath suffered, and doth yet suffer. She hath lamented her absent Sonne, euen when as she accused the Complainants : she thought him to bee dead : her feare was grounded vpon presumptions, the which not onely the first, but the last Iudges haue held to be pregnant. A voice was heard from an high, the mother weeping for her Sonne, and would not be comforted. Doubtlesse no kinde of affection of commiseration is like vnto that of a Woman ; but amongst women, none so great as that of a Mother. So as God hath compared the remembrance which he hath of Man to that of a Mother. And in truth, mothers haue more then a fatherly remembrance.

Our Defendresse in this case is assisted by the suffrages of Nature : she sighs vpon earth, and fills Heauen with her complaints: her lamentable cries, and her abundance of teares, are her onely defences : the which are so much the better, for that they are natural. A mother who knows not whither to goe, who finds no place to rest in, who seeks her child as if he were yet liuing : who would haue endured his wounds, and dies twice for that she dyed not before her sonne: she implores heauen in lamenting her misery, and desires her end : her sighs moue all men to compassion. Griefe hath seized vpon her soule, and her vnderstanding is nothing else but sorrow. Nothing is more constant then the loue of the Father to his child, and especially of Fathers that haue the instinct of Nature. But mothers haue their affections more violent. If any thing happen vnto their children, it breeds a great alteration in them. Witnesse the iudgement of Salomon, seeking betwixt two women, to know the right Mother. So you may see the passion of David when he called his Sonne, My sonne Absalon, my sonne: he was much troubled. But mothers are much more, feeling the same paine they suffered at their birth. And that which afflicts the Defendresse much more, is that the Complainants obiect against her, that she loued not her child. That without doubt is insupportable to a Mother. The latter times are miserable, foretold by the Prophets : That Inhumanitie, Inciuillitie, Astorgie (that is to say, want of loue in the Parents vnto their children, and of children vnto their Parents) should enter into the hearts of men. What say I of men, who are no men, seeing they proue inhumane, cruell, brutish, and vnatural.

But can it be, that two such contrary passions should iumpe in our Defendresse : Could she hate her sonne, and not seeing him any more, complain that hee was dead ? Could she accuse his Host and Hostesse, if shee loued him not ? Iosephus in his first booke of the Iewish warre, reporting the accusation of Herod against his children, saith, that Saturninus would not condemn the accused, saying : That it was not lawfull for him who had no children to give sentence of death against another mans children. A speech worthy of a graue Romane, but had bene better spoken by one borne in Iudaea : for in former times the Iudges giuen by God vnto the people, were chosen out of the fathers of Families, who had, or had had children, and who by this means knew best the iust affections of fathers loue. The History addes, that an old man at Armes of Herods called Tyron, was so transported seeing a cruell father, as he became almost mad, going from place to place, exclaiming, that Iustice was troden vnder foot, Truth was perished, Nature confounded, and all was full

A full of iniquitie : with such like speeches as passion made him to vtter. So strange this good old man held this malice, not beleeuing that such neere kinsmen should conspire against their own blood. And therefore it is not to be presumed that our Defendresse being a mother, was otherwise then well affected to her sonne : and what greater prooffe of her loue can be giuen, then her accusation against the Complainants ? And who can represent the tender affection of Fathers and Mothers, which seale the resemblance of bodies & minds, in the little admirable scale of the Infant, the mothers being much more affectionate to that which proceeds from them then the fathers ? What then may be said of the obiection made vnto the Defendresse ? Doubtlesse false allegations must concur with naturall, as L. confessions. D. de interrog. ad.

B Paulus the Lawyer saith of Confessions : and it is not lawfull for Iudges, especially for such as are Fathers to beleue that a Mother would hate her sonne to the death : especially this poore woman, who making her complaint of the murther, did note one notable circumstance, saying, that her sonne had complained vnto her, that the Demanders were froward Hosts. The which shewes a wit in her complaint, and the loue which she bare to her deare Sonne : remembering the first yeares of his infancy, being young and the onely child of his Mother. A Sonne whom shee (being his Mother) seeing no more, cried out with the Mother of Lamuel, What my Sonne, what the Sonne of my wombe, what the Sonne of my vnombe ? Pro. 31.

This poore mother was perplexed : she sought her sonne, and found him not. A sonne which was but simple, and might easily be wronged, for he went alone: he had money, he left it in his chamber, which was a bait for theecues, his Host and Hostesse laid hand on it, they suffered men to enter into his Chamber : men whom they knew not. What might the mother thinke of this ? Had he not reason to say, that they had slaine him. Truly it was said in the booke of Wisedome, That the iustice of the righteous shall deliuer them. It is also written, That the disloyall shall be taken for their iniustice, and the wicked shall be the ransom of the iust, and the disloyall for their righteous. May not then this poore woman thinke with reason, that you are not to haue any regard to the demanders, vnder colour of their base condition, seeing that for a piece of bread they would haue committed the deed, hauing taken their guests money who trusted them. These be the reasons by the which the poore Mother may iustifie her selfe, that shee hath not attempted any accusation, for the which she should be charged with slander. Pro. 28. 22.

Let vs now come vnto the Iudges. They need no other excuse, nor defence of their Decree, then the authoritie of the soueraine iudgements : yet we may say, for the truth which they had of the proofes, if not full and cleare as the noone day, yet they were such as the presumptions were vehement. If the accused suffered, it came from themselves, for they obserued not the precept which teacheth man : Above all to keep his heart pure, from whence life proceeds. They haue applied their hearts to desire an other mans goods, remembering those that erre either through want of instruction, or by their great indifferencie, or hauing their hearts pierced with the dart of conuentionesse. And therefore it is no wonder if they haue not appeared in iudgement with a constant countenance. For blessings are vpon the head of the iust, but extortioners stop the mouth of the guilty. Doe you not see, that God was not with the accused ? they were confounded in their owne speeches. Life and death are in the power of the tongue, he that loues it shall eate the fruits thereof. They haue said too much charging the Mother, of hatred to her Sonne. And who will not beleue but the Iudges (seeing the Proccesse) made their prayers vnto God to open their vnderstandings. The doubt which they had of the circumstances of the charge, hath bene fortified by examples, the which are the first encounters that come vnto the minde. In this City, a Woman dwelling neere to Saint Opportune, was slaine with a hammer, which two theecues had taken in a Smiths shop. The Smith being condemned, hee was put to the Racke. Afterwards the theecues were apprehended for other crimes, and freed the Smith who was already executed, Iudges in conicaturall causes, erre against their wils : being bound to follow the probable, for that which may happen, or hath happened. Sometimes there are bad Hosts, and murderers. It is dangerous faine Phadrus to beleue, but it is more dangerous not to beleue.

There is no reason then to heare the complaints of the accused, against the Iudges: Witnesse that which that wise King hath written, whose words are like vnto deepe springs which cannot be dried, and from whence we draw profit for all affaires, and especially cially for iudgements. To condemne the iust is not good, nor to strike Princes that haue caried themselves iustly. An excellent sentence, and agreeing with our cause. Hee called Iudges, Princes: and in another place they are tearmed Gods. That if God making his iustice to shine, hath since discovered the murder, yet hath not the Baker nor his wife any cause to complaine of the Court. The eye of God insuseth his knowledge into the spirits of men, in such measure as he pleaseth, giuing vnto some a nearer light, and (as Synecius Bishop of Cyrene said) more approaching vnto things which he doth reueale, to others farther off. We take moisture from the water, heat from the Fire: firmesse of the body from the earth, and spirit from the aire: but iustice comes from God, who is the only founaine of all good. We haue not this iustice in vs, be it for the good of our selues, or for the perpetuall and constant duty which wee owe vnto our neighbours, to doe euery man right. God onely knoweth all things, and all is hidden from vs, but what hee pleaseth. There is none but he, which knoweth hidden things. It is he whose admirable name is about all other names. It is he whom Daniel calleth a Certaine, (by the word Palmoni), of whom the admirable name of Iesus the Sauiour of the world, was not reuealed, before that hee was made man. That Sunne of iustice whose glory is incomprehensible. It is hee, who by his light doth open the Iudges eyes when it pleaseth him: to the end they should take care of the innocent, and looke vnto his estate.

It is written in the booke of the wise King: That euen as in the water one face is opposite to another, so doth the heart of man vnto man, so as oftentimes the Iudge discouereth the truth of a crime, by the countenance, as well as by the mouth of the accused. And to that purpose the same King saith: That Counsell in the heart of man is like to a deepe water, the which a wise man shall draw forth. But this doth not often happen, but vnto the King: of whom the wise man saith: There is no prophcing but in the Kings lips, and his mouth shall not fray from iustice. God giues this priuilege to a iust King. There are many thoughts in the heart of man, but the onely Counsell of our Lord God is firme. And therefore Saint Augustine in his booke of the Citie of God in the Chapter which he hath expressly made, touching the errors of humane iudgements, makes a complaint of the perplexities whereunto Iudges are reduced: when to saue an innocent they are forced to condemne the accused vnto the racke, and for an vn certaine fact, they cause him to suffer a certaine paine. The which he excuseth faith: That a wise Iudge doing not things with a will to hurt, but by necessity to iudge that which he knoweth not, must cry vnto God: deliuer mee from my extremities and cares. The which hee speaks not to blame the racke: for hee knowes it to be necessary. But if it be not (as wee cannot rightly say) done by malice, yet it is a great misery. And doubtlesse if it be a mischief, yet is it ordained by good lawes, praiged in all countreys, whereas iustice is well administred, whereof there are so many Statutes, not onely in this realme, but in the Estates of Italy, and in the neighbour Countries, as in Piedmont, in Sauioy, and other parts of Christendom, as there is no reason to doubt thereof. Neither is it lawfull to argue the Iudges of rigor in this cause: for besides the presumptions which might moue them, who knowes whether the accused had committed some other crime, whereof God would suffer this accusation, (whereof they now complain) should be the punishment: There are some generation which thinke to be free, and yet they are not cleansed from their filthinesse. And what is he that can say, I haue purged my heart, I am cleansed from my sinne. If thou sayest, we did not know it, hee that weighs the heart shall not be vnderstand it: and reward euery man according to his works. In another place the wise man saith, that, He which walketh innocently shall be saved, but the peruerse, walking by two ways, shall fall. Aristotle speaking of the Iudges of Greece, said that they were accustomed before sentence, to sweare that they should iudge, by the best aduice they could conceiue. The which Demosthenes in his Oration against Aristocrates hath said by the most iust aduice In which case although the Acropagites did sometimes iudge against the law, yet F could they not bee reprehended to haue gone against the oath taken by them to iudge well, whether it were in the Senate, or in the assembly which they call Heliea: no man being able to answer but for his owne conscience. And for this reason by the lawes of Charlemagne, and of Lewis the gentle: It was not lawfull to blaspheme, that is to say, to accuse of false iudgement, and to blame the Earles, (which was the title of Iudges in France) if it did not appeare that they did iudge either by enuy, or by some bad occasion. To conclude, the Iudges which those Princes called Fidels: were held for good, and without blemish, when

A when they were onely guided by the zeale of true iustice. So the Demanders do not complaine of the iudges, but of the accuser, against whom if she had framed her accusation maliciously, she were then subiect to that which was decreed by the Capitulary, which saith, That they which haue accused innocents, either before the Prince, or before the Iudge, if they were spiritual men, they are to be degraded, if they be lay-men, they must bee condemned to the like punishment, which they should haue suffered that were accused. But this is to bee vnderstood of accusations wherein there is malice, in which case the false Accusers deserue that which the accused suffered: for the slanderer resembles the wicked, which are represented by the wife man: watching secretly for the innocent, and persecuting him without a cause. In which case such as slander to vex, and to get money, by the Constitutions of the Roman Emperours, were punished with the same punishments.

It is therefore no reason that the Complainants should trouble the defendresse for the accusation, seeing it was not with any intent of slander: but they must take their troubles as an accident sent of God. We must not vse the inhumanity of Gneus Piso although hee were an vpright man; but hauing not the true rule of reason, he tooke rigour for a resolution of feueritie, who being aduertised that two Souldiers going forth together, the one was returned without his companion, he condemned him as a murderer of him that was absent: and as the condemned man was in the hands of the Executioner at the place of Iustice, his companion (whom they held to be dead) returned. This rigorous Iudge hearing that the Officer had prorogated the execution, he caused him to be apprehended, and to be brought vnto the Scaffold, and with him the companion, taking for a pretext that he was the cause of this mischief by his absence, and to him hee added the Officer, iudging him worthy of punishment, for that he had brought backe the first condemned, whom he should haue presently executed according to the sentence. It is not fit in all causes to stand so strictly vpon iudgements, as Alexander the Great did, who had rather pay a fine for Athenodorus then remit it: for sometimes a tempter of humanity is commendable, as in this case: Imitating the example of Prince Titus; the sonne of Vespasian, when he deliuered Iosephus out of prison, laying vnto the Emperour his father, after that hee had commanded the prisoner to be vnbound: It is reason, O Father, that with his bonds the dishonor should be taken from Iosephus, for hee shall be as if in the beginning he had not been bound. But if we vnbind him, we must cut the chaine, for so they vse them that are vnjustly bound. A speech of a worthy Prince, witnessed by the History of Iosephus, worthy to be spoken before a great King, and well approued of by the Emperour: As true lips please Kings, and they loue him that speaks iust things with a pure heart.

And therefore to make an end of the plaintiffs misery with that of Iosephus; the Court if it please, hauing in some sort regard vnto their request, shall set them at Liberty declaring them innocents of the crime of hospitalitie violated, and of the murder whereof they haue bene accused, without adiudging vnto them any Reparation, Charges, Damages, and interest against the Accuser, seeing the hath not, nor cannot be iudged a slanderer. So E either party obtaining what they may hope for by reason, things iudged shall remaine in their authoritie, and God who holds the Kings heart in his hand as little brookes of running water, inclining to his will, shall make him raigne happily, and his posteritie after him, as all good Frenchmen and true Christians doe wish by a happy marriage, so as our great Henry the fourth, sitting in the throne of Iustice, or represented by the Councillors, maintaining his Countreies, shall disperse all danger by his looke: and euery one will say with Salomon, the blessed of God: That the seat of the King iudgeth the poore iustly Ibid. 34. 14.

The sentence of the Court vpon these pleadings pronounced by the first President, on Monday the 17 of Ianuary, was conformable to the conclusion, taken by the Advocate for the Kings Attourney Generall. The King and the Duke tooke great pleasure to heare them; Both gaue their opinions on them that had best pleaded, but aboue all, they commended the equity of the Court, which dismissed the parties free from further suit. The King at the Dukes request granted a pardon to a poore woman an Adulteresse that was condemned to die, whose Adulterer had bene executed for that hee had abused her being a house-hold seruant, and so had the beene in like sort, but that she was found with Child.

This Pardon was granted by the King vnto the Duke, notwithstanding any opposition tion made by the Court and the Kings Council, shewing the Kings consequence thereof. A His Maieſtie would haue it paſſe of his abſolute authoritie: Yet vpon condition that he ſhould liue in perpetuall priſon, and nouiſhed at her husbands charge. All theſe good receptions, all theſe excoſes, all theſe paſſtimes, did not make the Duke forget the care of his affaires, he had ſaid vnto Monſ. de Villeroi, That hee was not come to yeeld vp the Marquiſate. The King on the other ſide being at Fontainbleau ſaid vnto him, That hee ſhould bee alwayes his friend, but he would haue his Marquiſate. The Duke was aduertified that the King had ſaid priuately in his Cabinet, That the Duke was a brave and gallant Prince, yet he kept his Marquiſate. Theſe wordes made him preſume that the report which the Chancelier Breton and Roncas had made vnto him (that the King was deſirous to ſee him, and that B they ſhould agree) was not true, for whenſoeuer the Duke ſpake to the King in priuate touching that buſineſſe, hee deſired him to referre it to their Councils.

And though this was a very important buſineſſe, yet the King had one which did preſſe him neerer, which was his marriage.

Being aduertified (as we haue formerly ſhewed by Sillery his Ambaſſador at Rome, that the Pope had granted his deſire touching the nullity of his marriage, hee ſent Alincour (gouernour of Pontoife) to thanke him, and to aſke his aduice vpon the alliance hee deſired to contract with the houſe of Florence. Hee came to Lyons, to paſſe to Auignon by the Riuer of Rhosne, and ſo to Antibio whither the ſtate of Genoa ſent him a Galley well appointed to conduct him to their Citie, where hee was receiued withall C the honours, fit for the greatneſſe of the Prince that ſent him, and worthy of the credit and reputation which the name of Villeroi carries among the friends of this Crowne. They did caſt lots there where he ſhould be lodged, which fell to the Palace of Grimaldy, where he was deſtayed two dayes at the charges of the ſtate.

The Ambaſſadour of Spaine went to viſit him. Hee went to the Senate, was ſeated in the Dukes place, and ſaw the order they held in their Councils and deliberations, where they granted him libertie for two Gallies ſlaues Frenchmen, that were in the Gallies of the Seigneury; the one was a Pariſian, and the other a Lioniois, which they attempted a ſit fauor to gratifie a Prince. He went on his voyage in poſt to Rome, the Ambaſſador met him with a great number of French Gentlemen: hee lodged him in his houſe, and the ſecond day of his arriual hee had audience of the Pope. Hee continued in Rome vntill Eaſter: during his aboad, hee did ſee the Viceroy of Naples make his entry into Rome, comming to doe homage vnto the Pope for the Realme of Naples, preſenting vnto him a white ſteed, for an acknowledgement of the fee, for the inueſtiture of Naples, for that it is one of the Realmes which holds in fee and doth homage vnto the Church of Rome, and for that reaſon (beſides the eight thouſand Ounces of gold which they owe yearly) they are bound to take armes for the defence of the Church. They had their part alſo of the fruits of the Holy year, during which time many Frenchmen and others of the religion went to ſee for curioſities ſake, without any feare of the Inquiſition, whole inſiſtition doth ceaſe in the year of l'ublie: many great perſonages from diuers parts E of Europe went to this l'ublie; among the chiefe was the Duke of Bar, who went in a diſguiſed habit, to get abſolution, for that he had bin married againſt the rules of the Church, and without diſpenſation of the degrees of conſanguinitie that were betwixt him and the Kings Siſter; for which cauſe the Biſhop of Lorraine reſuſed him the Holy Sacrament, and held him for excommunicate. The King aſſiſted this Princes humilitie and ſubmiſſion with his Letters of fauour to diuers Cardinals. The Duke of Sauoy was not pleaſed with the long delays of the Court, hee complained that hee was intreated with too great rigour. The Duke thought to finde a King of Complements: And the King a Duke more eaſie to reſtore that which he held. The Duke couered his diſcontent with ſilence and diſcretion. In the end they agree to treat of their affaires and differences by F Deputies: For the King were named the Conſtable, the Chancelor, the Maſſhall Biron, the Marquis Rhoſney and Villeroi. For the Duke, Bely his Chancelor, the Marquis of Lullins, Iacob the Earle of Morer, and Alimes. The Kings Deputies demand reſtitution of the Marquiſate of Saluces, in the ſame eſtate it was in when the Duke ſurprized it. The Dukes firſt propoſition was to haue the King renounce the protection of Geneva, the which was not (ſaid they) comprehended in the Treaty of Peace, in ſpeciall words, as other townes. This did much offend the King and his Council. The Duke in-

A treated the Popes Nuncio to make this propoſition who (hauing his ſoule as free from craft and diſſimulation, as it was full of zeale and integrity) found meanes to ſpeake vnto the King without trouble or alteration. He ſaid that there was a meanes to vniue the extremities of their wils: for the ſame reaſon which required the Duke to reſtore the Marquiſate, did not hinder his Maieſtie from the enioying of that which did belong vnto him. It is true (ſaid the King.) There the Nuncio replied: The towne of Geneva belongs to the Duke, and nothing hindres him from ſelling the authority which his Predeceſſors had there, but the power of your protection.

Is it not then reaſon that if you will haue him reſtore the Marquiſate which is yours, B you ſhould ſuffer him to inioy the towne of Geneva which is his? the King to be ſpedily freed of this argument, answered, That things were different, that hee had not made the protection of Geneva. It was a treaty whereunto he was bound by faith, for the reuerence hee did beare vnto his Predeceſſors, who had made themſelues Protectors of that Common-weale, from whom they had receiued ſeruiſe in their neceſſities. And he would neuer oppoſe himſelfe againſt the firmeſſe of their promiſes. The Nuncio ſayes preſently vnto the King. As you will not leaue the protection of Geneva, for that it was made with your Predeceſſors, in like ſort the Duke is not bound to yeeld you the Marquiſate of Saluces, for that hee tooke it not from you, but from the deſceaſed King. Your difference, replied the King, although (for my part) it conſiſts of many points, is reduced only to that C which concerns the Marquiſate of Saluces. The viſtper muſt reſtore: the Duke of Sauoy hath viſtper my Marquiſate, there is nothing that doth free him from reſtitution. I hold nothing of his, and therefore muſt not reſtore him any thing. I will neuer hinder him from hauing reaſon of Geneva, ſo as he get it without armes: for when hee ſhall come thither with force, I will alwayes reſolue of that which I ought. He thinks that if I ſhould abandon that towne, he might force them to acknowledge him: but I ſhould purchaſe in abandoning them much blame, it being againſt the honour of this Crowne, and the firmeſſe of a Kings word.

The Duke had reaſon to affect this place: hee might make a great Bulwarke thereof againſt the Suiffes, to recouer that which they did hold from the ancient Houſe of Sauoy, D and to make all things difficult for the French, among the Cantons: This propoſition of Geneva was razed out of the Dukes articles, and no more ſpoken of in the Aſſembly of the Deputies. They did preſſe the reſtitution of the Marquiſate, or the exchange of the Countries of Breſle, Pignerol, and Sauillon, with ſome valles of the paſſage of Piedmont. The Deputies aſſembled but once. The Duke foreſeeing what the iſſue would be, and hauing vnderſtood that the Chancelor ſpeaking of the reſtitution of exchange, had ſaid that they muſt paſſe that way or by the ſword: he let the King vnderſtand, that too many deale in the buſineſſe, and that it ſhould be ſooner ended, if but one did faithfully report the intentions of either part. The Patriarke of Conſtantinople was employed therein, but the Duke diſliked thereof.

E He reſolued to free himſelfe of theſe difficulties, and to runne the hazard and ſhame of the reſuſall. Then hee preſented his firſt propoſition of the Empire and Duchy of Milan: giuing him very pleaſible meanes, if they had bene as eaſie in the execution as in the diſcouſe: ſhewing, that for all the fruit of the conqueſt, hee deſired nothing but to hold the Marquiſate of Saluces. Whereunto the King answered: That he was neither of that age, nor his affaires in that eſtate that King Francis his were, when he aſpired to the Empire. That there was not a Duke of Saxony nor a Landgrauſe priſoner, to giue him the title of Protector of Germany, and of the Princes priſoners, as vnto King Henry the ſecond. If a King of France ſhould be ambitious of any thing greater then his Crowne, it might be an Empire, but not in the eſtate that it is now: the title of an Emperour being little more then that of a Duke of Venice, but as it was vnder Auguſtus when as Rome (which commands both land and ſea at his command to hinder him. Beſides, it was the nature of adions of warre, ſtill to produce vnexpected difficulties. You alone (added the King) cannot ſuc-

As for the Duchy of Milan, the King ſaid that the enterpriſe was tedious, and the iſſue vnertaine, as of all other deſignes; and for the meanes which the Duke diſcouered vnto him, there was nothing ſo eaſie which the King of Spaine might not make difficult, hauing both land and ſea at his command to hinder him. Beſides, it was the nature of adions of warre, ſtill to produce vnexpected difficulties. You alone (added the King) cannot ſuc-

cour me, I know not how my men will agree with yours. And if things should succeed according to your desire, I know not what should become of the fruit of the conquest. I have enough to doe in my Realme without thinking of others. The peace is but in the flower, the vent of such a designe would wither it. I will haue no warre with the King of Spaine, vnlesse he be weary of peace. Brother, you haue no need of my counsell, but affection commands vs sometimes to giue it to him that doth not aske it. I would counsell you to liue in good termes with him. If there were any troubles betwixt you, I would not meddle but to reconcile you. I haue too much care of the honour of my word, to breake a peace so iust and so necessary, without a precedent iniury. If I did it, I should make my selfe the argument of all the complaints of Christendome, the discourse of other Princes, the cause of a foraine warre, and the renewing of infinit calamities. It were an indiscretion for me vpon a vaine and imaginary hope, to lose the assurance to recouer mine owne, wherewith I content my selfe without seeking anothers. The desires which are infinit, are vnworthy of a iust Prince, they are proper to tyrants, who reigne without law, and liue without feare: If I had any will to that which you propound, there should not need so many words, but hauing no will to it, it is in vaine for me to speake of it.

None of these words could content the Duke, but dissembling his discontent, he answered: If I should reape no other good by my voyage but to haue seene so great a Prince whose valour and greatnesse is greater then the report, I should not be grieved. True it is, that the estate of my affaires should not haue perswaded me to haue come without the assurance of my Ambassador, that I should recieue more of your Maiesties free will, then I could expect of the Popes sentence, and that you would not so much presse the restitution, but would be satisfied with a more gentle composition. I haue offered you the meanes, which lead to so great and so worthy effects, as the Marquise of Salusses is nothing in comparison of them. You find difficulties therein. There is no great enterprise, can bee without them, but being well resolved, it is halfe executed. A courage like vnto yours finds nothing difficult, and all Europe admires your actions, hauing made that which was impossible possible. And seeing that I must attribute it, not vnto the violence of reason, but to my vnapprehensibility, that I cannot perswade a thing, which in his glory and profit carries his owne perswasion: I beseech your Maiesty to intreat mee, as your most humble seruant and kinsman, who desires no greater happinesse for his then to bee yours. They are already by the lawes of nature, they are by my will; and shall be more by the fauours of your bounty. For one Marquise, you bind many Princes, and by the inuicting of one of my children, all the House of Sauoy shall be bound vnto you: your Maiesty will say, that you make not such large gifts: but you must consider if you please, that many vertues are common to men, but this belongs onely to Kings. As it is more royall to giue then to take: and they wrong the greatnesse of their courage, if they should not giue great things: and to giue a thing that is litigious and doubtfull, you shall purchase an immortal right of Soueraignty.

He added many reasons for the execution of the enterprise, with such vehemency, as he seemed to haue some secret to make mountaines remoue and dry vp riuers. The King considered that there was no profit but for the Duke, and that the fruit which (at the least) he promised himselfe in keeping the Marquise of Salusses, would be more certaine to him, then the conquest of Milan vnto the King. If the Duke of Sauoy could haue engaged the King, he knew well how to crosse him in the execution. All the danger he could apprehend, was the King of Spaines indignation: but hee might as easily returne into fauour without speaking a word, as he came away without bidding him farewell, for what should haue hindered him, when as the French had bin farre engaged in Italy, to haue ioyined with the Spaniards to expell them, and to breake the bridge of his assistance, whereby hee had made them to passe.

The Duke seeing that he could not obtaine any thing of the King, but that he must make a double recompence for the Marquise, he continued a while in doubt of his returne, as he alwayes repented him of his coming. The King desirous to free him of all cause of distrust and apprehension, that should force his will, to promise that which he would neuer hold, sent him word, that he should not trouble himselfe with the resolution of his Council: for he should neuer be forced but by the right of armes, and that hee should alwayes haue time to thinke of it, and to returne to Turin with his will as free, as when he came

The Duke of Sauoy perplexed.

A came to Paris. The Duke not able to see clearly with his owne eyes, nor to distinguish of these difficulties, aduised thereof in his Councell. But as the eyes troubled with those diseases the Physicians terme Hypofragma and littera, haue the operation of the sight so troubled as they cannot well iudge of colours, all objects seeming vnto them yellow or red: Euen so when Princes Councells are subject to any passion, they giue counsell accordingly; nothing presenting it selfe vnto them, but through the false sight of opinion and choller, which doth alwayes make the bodies seeme bigger then they are. So in the Councell of this Prince, those which desired warre, sayd: That neither the restitution of the Marquise, nor the exchange of Bresse, might be accepted, and that a good warre should bee more honourable, then a shamefull composition: others hauing no other passion then peace, aduised him vnto it at what price soeuer, fearing, that if the King should not recieue that satisfaction from them which he expected, hee would stay them. The Duke grew into choller, and would haue departed without taking his leave. The most aduised of his Councell told him, that his departure in that sort, would make him a scorn to all the Princes of Italy; Spaine would laugh at him; France would be scandalized, that all Europe would hold him the cause of this warre, and in this war of a world of miseries. That there needed no other Herald to proclaime warre against him; which would be in the midst, and in the foure corners of his Estate, before that he passed the riuier of Rhoeane. That he shewed the greatnesse of his courage to vanquish all these difficulties, and wisdom to dissemble his contents. That wisdom should make the entry to a business, seeing that repentance is fruitlesse in the end. That if he had not foreseene the end of his voyage, he should by his constancie mitigate the feeling, and represent vnto himselfe, that to come into a goodly plaine all couered with flowers, he was forced to passe ouer a narrow and vneuen plancke.

The Duke answered, I will neuer passe it. Leaving his Councell in suspence, that he would make as dishonourable a departure, as his arrival had beene honourable, yet through the prayers and perswasions of some of the Kings good seruants, the Duke resolved to depart as he came. But it was not without complaining that they intreated him with too much rigour: that there was no courtesse in France for him: that friendships were rare, finding least in them where he thought it did most abound: that they did force him to formes that were too preiudiciall, and that they had made him to hope for things which they now refused him: and that his Ambassador had deceived him. The King knowing that Chenaultier Breton had let the Duke of Sauoy his Master vnderstand that his Maiesty desired he should come vnto him: hee said vnto him, That hee was mistaken, and that hee did neuer speake it.

True it is, that he had said, that he hoped the Duke should not return, but they should be agreed. The Duke seeing that wisdom must moderate the rigour of necessity, he tooke another course, and resolues, seeing hee could get nothing else, to make his profit of the time, and of his abode: that he might haue meanes to vnit that which he had disioyned with Spaine. Foreseeing they would soone giue him leave to bee gone, for already they E sayd in iest in the Anti-chamber, That they must send him away by an Edit. Hee had therefore found a fauourable pretext for his stay. He was (or made shew to bee) in loue with one of the rarest beautes in the Court, and seemed not to care for all other affaires in respect of her. There were two solemne Feasts at Paris, which followed one another, Saint Germaines fayre, and Shrouetide. It was giuen out, that hee would see them before his departure. In the meane time he makes no haste, although hee did not much aduance in his affaires. There were daily new propositions, and the last were more vnpleasing vnto him then the first.

The Kings seruants were of opinion, that they should giue this Prince as little cause as might be to distrust him of his voyage, and to giue him time to consider whether he should consent to the exchange or the restitution: for that it was a thing (as he sayd) which hee could not doe without conference with his Councell, and the aduice of his Vassalls. The King hauing had the opinion of the Princes of his blood and others, and of the chiefe officers of the Crowne, would no longer forbear to acquaint him with his resolution, commanding Sebastian Zames (one of his Maiesties confident seruants) to tell it him: the which he did so artificially, as before he left the Duke, he drew from him a writing of the principal conditions of the Treaty by the which were drawne the Articles of the restitution of the Marquise, or of the exchange. But to the end that the Duke should not thinke that the King should precipitate his Councils, he gave him three months time to choose either of the two conditions of the treaty, either by restitution or the exchange. Whereupon the Duke signed the Articles following.

Articles of the Treaty of Paris.

1. That the Duke of Sauoy should restore the Marquise of Salusses vnto his Maiefty by the first day of the month of Iune next following, to vie and enioy it as the Kings his Predecessors had done, when it was in their hands, without any delay or difficulty, grounded vpon any colour or pretext whatsoever.

2. And his said Maiefty doth promise and grant vnto the said Duke, not to giue the Charge and Government of that Country, to any one that he shall haue occasion to hold for enemy.

3. In like sort to employ Suisses in the guard of the Townes and Places thereof, except in the Castles where his Maiefty will place French Captaines and Souldiers, or such as he shall thinke good.

4. Notwithstanding, his Maiefty doth not meane to be bound to continue the Suisses in the said townes, but for the time that the compromise shall continue, made in the person of his Holiness, hereafter declared and specified.

5. Or else the said Duke shall yeeld and deliuer to his Maiefty, for a recompence of the Marquise of Salusses, by the first day of Iune next ensuing, all the country of Bresse, lying from the riuer of Saone vnto that of Dain, which riuer of Dain shall remaine in common betwixt his Maiefty and the said Duke, either of them to enioy it of his side, comprehending in the said Country the towne and Citadell of Bourg, and other places that depend thereon, Barcelonnette with his Vicariate or Deputiship, vnto Argentiere, the Vale of Sture; that of Perouse, with all that depends thereon; with the towne and castle of Pignerol with his territorie, vpon condition that his Maiefty shall transport vnto him all his right and interest to the said Marquise, provided notwithstanding, that he suffer the inhabitants of the said Marquise, which haue serued his Maiefty, or shall serue him hereafter, to enioy their goods freely and safely. And in like sort, those that haue serued, or shall serue the said Duke, shall in like manner enioy their goods, as well in the said Marquise as in any other places that shall be deliuered to his Maiefty by the said Duke, without any alteration before the said delay nor after, to the preiudice of the one or the other, according to the rule which shall be set downe by his Maiefty and the Duke.

6. Moreover, the towne of Cental, Emont, Rogues, Peruiers, Castle. Dauphin, and others held by the said Duke, belonging vnto his Maiefty, and in like manner those which his Maiefty holds in Bresse, Sauoy, Barcelonnette, & others belonging vnto the said Duke, shall respectively be restored, at such time as the Marquise shall be yeelded vp: and in case of exchange, those of Bresse and Barcelonnette shall remaine to his Maiefty, as hath bin said, and the rest shall be restored on either side.

7. All which places shall be restored in the same estate they are at this present, neither his Maiefty nor the said Duke be bound to pay nor satisfie the charges made of either part, in the fortification and repairing of the said places.

8. In like sort the Fort of Beche-Dauphin built by the said Duke during the warres, shall be dismantled at the same time.

9. The Inventories duly certified of all the peeces of Artillery, Powder, Bullets, and other munitions of warre, which were in the townes and places of the said Marquise, when the Duke entred it, shall be faithfully deliuered vnto his Maiefty when as the Duke shall choose the one or the other of the said two offers, whereupon his Maiefty shall declare his will for the restitution thereof, which shall be performed by the Duke, as well in their kinds, as in money, according to the price, which shall be concluded betwixt his Maiefty and the Duke.

10. All Sutes, Iudgements, and Sentences giuen in iustice, on either side before this present accord (when the parties haue contested voluntary) shall stand and take effect, whether restitution be made or an exchange of the Marquise: yet shall it be lawfull for the parties to relieue themselves by prouision according to the order of the lawes.

11. That no search should be made of any impositions, contributions and leauies of money or victuals in the said Country, against such as had appointed, receiued, or disposed thereof on either part, vnto this present Treaty.

12. And to the end that the inhabitants of the townes and country which are to be restored

A stored, may not be ouer-charged nor vniuolly vexed, with leauies of money, during the respite granted vnto the said Duke, to make choice of, and to effect one of the said two offers, vnder colour of payment, as well of arerages of the said impositions, imposed before, and since the peace of Veruins, as for the pay and enertainment of Captaines and men of warre, appointed for the guard of the said Marquise. It is decreed, that there shall bee no leauy of money made vpon the inhabitants of the said townes and countries, conformable to that which was agreed vpon, as well by the treatie of Veruins, as by the orders and accords made since, for the payment of the said arerages and money, by the Deputies of his Maiefty and the said Duke, in the beginning of the year, for the ordinary entertainment of garisons, appointed for the guard of the said townes and places, and of officers employed in the estates of the said garisons, without any new impositions of either part. And we declare all that shall be done and attempted to the contrary, subiect to restitution and reparation.

13. And whereas the said Duke hath requested his Maiefty to allow and confirme the feoffment made by him, in the Marquise, in case he shall choose to restore it: his Maiefty doth declare, that being informed of the quality of the feoffments, he would haue that respect to gratifie the Duke, as his seruice would permit him, without being bound to restore that which had bene paid for the said Feoffments, but as it shall stand with his good pleasure.

14. And for as much as the said Duke hath intreated his Maiefty, to giue him time to confer with his vassals and subiects of both parties, before that he accept of the one or the other, his Maiefty desiring to witness vnto him, as well in this, as in all other occasions his good will: doth grant vnto the said Duke his choice, so as he choose and effect the one or the other of the two offers, by the first day of Iune above-named, without diminishing or altering of any thing, or vsing of any euasion, delay, or difficulty grounded vpon any colour or occasion whatsoever.

15. Whereunto the said Duke hath bound his faith and word, and his Maiefty doth the like for accomplishment and execution of all things, granted by these present Articles which depend thereon.

16. In like sort it hath bene agreed betwixt his Maiefty and the said Duke, that they shall consent, as they doe at this present, after the restitution shall bee really and fully accomplished. If the said Duke makes choice thereof, that our holy Father Pope Clement the eight shall iudge of all Controuersies that are betwixt his Maiefty and the said Duke, according to that which hath bene agreed vpon by the Treaty of Veruins, and that within three years.

17. Promising to accomplish and performe, faithfully on either part, whatsoever shall be decreed by his Holiness within the time prefixed, without any delay or difficulty, for what cause or pretext soeuer, as it is concluded by the Treaty of Veruins.

18. And for the greater assurance of the execution of the Treaty, and euery point and article therein contained, the said King and Duke of Sauoy, humbly beseech his Holiness that as by his good and fatherly exhortations they are entred into this way of accord, that it would please him as a common father, to continue the care which hee hath formerly shewed to nourish peace, and to assure a firme friendship betwixt them, and in all occasions that should be offered to interpose his authority for the full and real execution of things promised of either part, as it is contained in this present Treaty.

Made at Paris, the 27 day of February 1600. Signed Henry and Emanuel, and sealed with his Maiesties seale and the Duke of Sauoyes.

Three or foure dayes after this treaty, the Duke tooke his leaue of the King, who being followed by all the Court conducted him to Pont Charenton, and gaue him the Baron of Lux to attend on him out of the realme, with commandment to the Gouvernors of Champagne and Bourgondy, where he should passe, to receiue him as his Maiefty.

Whilst he was neere the King he shewed such outward content, and concealed his griefe so cunningly, as his owne people did iudge that nothing could better please him, but being retired, his countenance bewrayed his discontent and the repentance of his voyage. The further he went from the King, the nearer he approached to Spaine: being resolute to reconcile himselfe; and to that end he presently dispatched Bely his Chancellor. Being in Carosse, he said sometimes, that he had bene deceiued, that the words which they had giuen to perswade him to come into France, were ill interpreted: and that as soone as A h should come to Chambery, he would send to beseech the King to prolong the time, in the which he would make choice of the restitution or the exchange.

The Baron of Lux obserued his discourses, and aduerted the King of the Dukes intention, wholly inclined to warre, rather then to performe any part of the treaty. Being vpon Saint Iulians bridge, the Baron of Lux, hauing commandement from the King not to go any further,ooke his leaue of the Duke, and assuring himselfe that his words should be as pleasing vnto him, as he seemed to haue beene content with his conduct, he beseeched him not to transport his heart out of France as he did his body, but to cherish the friendship of so great a King dearly, who loued him as his brother. That hee feared, that such as had B shewed so great discontent, for the voyage, which his Highnesse had made into France, would reape the profit which he himselfe might enioy. That he would hold their counsels not onely suspect, but dangerous: as passionate men, whose perswasions were sugred poison: who being more ialous of his greatnesse, then desirous of his quiet, would not cease vntill they had diuerted him from the execution of his promises. That if it pleased him to thinke of what was past, and compare it with the present, hee should find that peace was the inextinguishable rampier of his Estates: and that it was a great misery for a Prince to submit himselfe to anothers discretion, beseeching him to beleuee that the counsell which he gaue him, was the same which he would giue him, if it had pleased God that he had beene borne his vassall, or one of his Councell.

I take (answered the Duke) that which you say vnto me as of a worthy Nobleman, and C thanke you: I acknowledge my selfe so much bound vnto the King, as I would sacrifice my life in exchange of the duty which I owe him: and doe promise neuer to giue him any occasion, to esteeme me other then his most humble seruant and louing kinsman. Men are knowne by their words, as mettall by the sound, and flowers by the smell: but commonly Princes words serue but to disguise their inward conceptions, holding dissimulation for a great vertue. Such was the issue of the Duke of Sauoyes voyage. The yeare shall not passe before hee taste the fruits. His presence did procure him the condition of exchange, the which the King would not haue granted to his Ambassadors. But hee continued not long in this opinion to performe the one or the other. Going out of the Citadell at Bourg, D they found that sorrow troubled his soule, to leaue a place, esteemed one of the strongest in Europe. His outward shew bewrayed his inward discontent. This Prince who could well couer his passions, could not concale the griefe of this exchange, no more then the discommodity of the restitution. Being arrived at Bourg, he sent one poste vnto the King, to thanke him for the honour he had receiued in his voyage, and for the good entertainment which Pradin had giuen him in Champagne, and the Baron of Lux in Bourgundy.
He wrote by the same Poste to the Gouverneur of Lyons, imparting vnto him the contentment which he receiued by the treaty of Paris, and that he went to Chambery, and soone after the feasts, into Piedmont, there to resolue what the King should expect of him.

But he stayed not long before he gaue care to their perswasions, who sought to deprime E him of all happinesse, which hee might promise vnto himselfe by this voyage, assuring him that the coming of the Cont de Fuentes would giue him meanes to free himselfe from the necessity of the exchange and restitution. He dissembled the discontent of his voyage with great art, yet still he did vent out some vapour which made the most iudicious to beleuee, that he would be glad to preiudice the King in any thing with the hazard of his owne.

The Commons of France hauing not yet recovered their ruines growne by ciuill wars, and now groning vnder the heauy burthen of taxes and subsidies, and complaining of the abuse of officers in the collection thereof: they were humble supors vnto his Maiesty to set downe a generall order concerning the taxes, and to reforme the abuses: whereupon F the King made this Edict which follows, for the reliefe of his poore subiects.

HENRY by the grace of God, &c. As soone as it pleased God to settle peace in this Realme: we haue cast oureyes with pite vpon our people growne poore and almost ruined by the wounds and calamitie of long warre, and haue employed all our care to find out the meane, to abate the taxes, and other impositions which are leauiod on them; with an intent to make them enioy the fruits which peace is accustomed to produce vnder a good King, when as warre is ended: being more desirous to purchase the name of Father

A of the people doing them good, then to leaue any remembrance vnto posterity of other more glorious titles which our perils and dangers might make vs merit: but being not able to effect it so speedily as their miseries required, by reason of the exccesive charges of this Estate, which could not be diminished but by little and little; nor the ordinary reuen-ues to furnish it restored to their value, but in giuing some time to the peace established in the Realme, by the speciall grace and blessing of God, to change the face of this great delolation which warre hath left: we haue vpon the complaints often made vnto vs in our Councell, of the abuses in quality, and exactions, which are committed in the leauy and perception of the said taxes, deputed Commissioners, men of quality and known integritie, to informe and punish the offenders, proceed to the reforming thereof, and to giue vs aduice of the meanes which they shall thinke most fit and conuenient to suppress these disorders hereafter, being by their report informed that our subiects haue suffered much oppression by reason of the said abuses and disorders, namely, that equality had not been obserued by the Esleuz in the diuision of Parishes: and much lesse by the seffors in the taxes of priuate men, whom they haue gratified, surcharged, or exempted at their pleasures, according to their passions and interest: and also by reason of the many tedious and chargeable suites growing amongst them; and the violences, exactions, and thefts, committed by Sergeants employed for the recovery of the taxes, which desiring to preuent as well by good orders, as diminution of the charges, vntill that God giue vs grace to make
C them feel more abundantly of our fatherly bounty.

Whereupon there were many articles set downe by his Maiesty, for the reliefe and ease of his poore subiects vpon these taxations and cessments.

The Lords of Sillery and Alincourt by the Popes aduice, and the Kings commandement, went from Rome to Florence, to treat a mariage betwixt the King and the Noble Princesse Mary of Medicis, the which had beene propounded before. This demand was so pleasing vnto the great Duke, as he made no difficulty. The Articles of which Treaty are as followeth.

First, The great Duke doth promise in the name and faith of mariage of the said Princecesse, with her will and consent, as she hath declared vnto the said most Christian King, D who in like manner doth promise by the said Lord of Sillery, to take for his loyal Spouse the said Princeesse, as soone as might be, according to the Lawes and holy Constitutions of the Church, and doth presently promise to appoint some man of quality with sufficient authority in his name, and as Proctor to his said Maiesty, to wed by words of present the said Princeesse, vntill by the presence of the parties, the mariage might be confirmed and solemnized in the face of our mother the holy Church. In fauour whereof, the great Duke, as well for the singular affection which he beares to the Princeesse his Neece, as for the greatnes and dignity of the House into the which she is receiued, doth promise to giue in dowry to the said Princeesse, the summe of six hundred thousand crownes of gold, euery one being seuen Liuers, foure Deniers, of the money of Florence, whereof the said King E hath already receiued two hundred and fifty thousand crowns payd into the hands of his Treasurers. And as for the three hundred and fifty thousand Crownes remaining, they shall also be paid in ready money, in the towne of Marcellle or Lions, when as the said ma-riage shall be confirmed and solemnized in the Church, as hath beene declared in the premises.

The said great Duke doth also promise to cause the said Princeesse to bee conducted and honourably accompanied at his owne cost and charges, and as is befitting a Princeesse of that quality, honour, and dignity, vnto the towne of Marcellle, and moreover to giue her jewels and other precious moueables, fit for the dignitie of the said Princeesse, and the House from which she is descended.

F In regard whereof it hath beene accorded, that the said Princeesse shall renounce the succession of her father and mother in the best forme that may bee for the contentment and satisfaction of the said Duke her vncl: and to this end the said Princeesse shall haue authority, and the said renunciation shall be confirmed by the said King, when it shall bee required. And at this present the said Princeesse acknowledging freely, that in regard of the said Dowry and Jewels which shall be giuen her, shee is bountifully satisfied for all that which might belong vnto her for her portion, in the succession of her father and mother, and that of her owne free-will shee doth renounce, to the profit and commodity of the said great Duke, and of his descendants males, or of those which shall have interest by reason of the said great Duke, of what degree or quality soever, to all rights, names, reasons, and actions, which he may have, or in any sort pretend, to the said successions, whereof as much as need shall require, the said Princeesse shall make session and transport to the said great Duke and to his descendants.

And to assure the said summe of six hundred thousand crownes given in dowry, bee in case of restitution or otherwise, it hath beene agreed vpon and confirmed, that certaine lands shall be assigned, granted, and given in mortgage, for the assurance, confirmation, and restitution of the said summe of six hundred thousand crownes, which no obligation shall make void : so as by this meanes the said money may be deliuered vnto the said great Duke, or to them that shall have charge from his Highnesse, to bee restored to the said Princeesse or to her heyres, as shall be said hereafter : with the interest after due in the hundred, the which shall begin to haue course, and to stand firme & effectual from the day that the said money shall be restored.

The said most Christian King shall assigne vnto the said Princeesse for her Iointer, twenty thousand crownes by the yeare, which shall be payed out of Lands with iurisdiction, whereof the chiefe place shall haue the title of a Duchy, and the rest next vnto it : which places thus assigned to the said Princeesse, she shall enioy by herselfe or by her officers, with the said iurisdiction : And she shall haue the gift of all offices falling voyd, as the Queenes of France haue accustomed : alwayes provided, that the said offices bee given to naturall Frenchmen. And the said Princeesse shall begin to enter into possession of the said lands, as soone as her dowry or ioynter shall haue place, to enioy it during her life, whether that the remaine within the Realme of France, or retire elsewhere. The said King shall also giue vnto the said Princeesse, iewels befitting the dignitie of the Queenes of France, the which shall remaine proper vnto her selfe, as things belonging vnto her, and not otherwise. And for the entertainment of the said Princeesse, future Queene of France, during her marriage with the said King, there shall be officers and seruants appointed for the seruice of the said Princeesse, in such number and quality as shall bee convenient : and for her charges there shall be a convenient summe appointed, the which shall be payd euery three monthes out of the treasury, according to the order which hath beene obserued by the Queenes. And in case of the dissolution of the said marriage, by the death of the said Princeesse without any children, the said King shall restore vnto the said Duke, or to him that shall haue charge from him, the iewels which haue beene giuen her, according to an inventory that shall bee made, vnto the which she hath otherwise disposed thereof : and withall four hundred thousand crownes, which are two third parts of the six hundred thousand crownes giuen in dowry, vnto the said Maiesty he desirous to enioy the whole summe during his life : In which case the said summe of six hundred thousand crownes shall be fully restored after his Maiesties death. And if the said Princeesse leaue any children, issued of the said marriage, the said children shall succeed in all the goods, moueable and immoueable which shall be left by her, and that may belong vnto her, the which shall be diuided according to the vse and custome of France. But in case of the dissolution of the marriage bee by the death of the King, the said future Queene furnishing him, whether she haue children or not of the said marriage, the said Princeesse shall haue againe all the money, dowry, and iewels brought by her : and moreover, those which shall be giuen her by the said King, excepting alwayes the iewels of the crown, the which are left as it were in guard with the Queenes of France. And in this case the said future Spouse shall also enioy her dowry, and all about mentioned, whether she remaine in France, or make her residence elsewhere at her pleasure.

All which Articles and Conventions haue beene treated and concluded in the name of the said King, by the said Lord of Silery, and by the said Duke as well in his owne name, as for the said Princeesse, the said parties promising faithfully to keepe and obserue them in euery point, without any contradiction directly or indirectly : and they haue promised to furnish all letters, prouisions, and expeditions necessary for the accomplishment thereof. And so they signed, Silery and Ferdinand Duke of Tuscany.

A greater portion then that of the Lady Elizabeth married into Spaine, who had but 400000 crowns in dowry. The Queen mother had but 30000 crowns of Lewis D. of Vrbain her

A her father: but her mothers inheritance, among the which was the Earldome of Languois, was valued at a million of gold, and the Pope in consideration of the greatnesse of the House, whereunto she matched, gaue her an hundred thousand crowns, and many iewels. She had for her Ioynter but a thousand pounds ayeare.

The Contract was past in the Palace of Pity, the five and twentieth day of April, in the presence of Charles Anthony Putei Archbishop of Pisa, and Virginia Duke of Bracciano. All Florence shewed great ioy thereat, and the Princeesse was presently declared Queene of France. She dined publicly vnder a cloth of Estate, the great Duke sitting far beneath her. The Duke of Bracciano gaue her water, and Silery the Kings Ambassador the towell.

B The rest of the day was spent in all kind of sports. Soone after, Monsieur Alincourt went to cary these good newes vnto the King, with the Queenes picture, which the great Duchesse sent him. The King sent Frontenac to serue the Queene as her chiefe Steward, who presented vnto her his Maiesties first Letter, and withall he sent his Portrait to the great duke. The King refused to effect the promises of marriage, as soone as the Duke of Sauoy had performed his, touching the restitution or the exchange of the Marquise of Salusses, and to goe to Auignon to receive the Queene : but the Duke was much perplexed what he should doe.

After the Duke of Sauoyes departure, the King went to passe the Lent at Fontainebleau, where there was a great conference betwixt the Bishop of Eureux, and Philip de Mornay Lord of Plessis Marly, Gouvernour of Saumur, Intendant of the House and Crowne of Nauarre : in the presence of the King, Princes, & Officers of his Crowne, Councillors of State, Prelates, and other Noblemen of marke. It was touching a booke which Monsieur du Plessis had published of the Institution of the Lords Supper, and against the Masse, wherein the Bishop did taxe him to haue falsified many authorities. Whereupon du Plessis presented a Petition vnto the King, that his Maiesty would bee pleased to appoint Commissioners to examine euery passage of Scripture cited in his booke.

The King yielded to this conference, that the truth might be made cleere against the darknesse of slander, referring the care thereof to his Chancellor. The Commissioners appointed for the Catholikes, were Augustin Thibaut, President of the Court Parliament at Paris : Pithen, Advocate in the Court, and Feure Schoolemaster to the Prince of Conde, in whose absence came Martin the Kings Physitian. And for the other, the President of Calignon, Chancellor of Nauarre, in whose place entred de Fresnes Canay, President of the Chamber of Languedoc, and Casaubon, his Maiesties reader of the Greeke tongue. All singular men in learning and tongues.

This conference beganne the fourth day of May, in the Hal at Fontainebleau. In the midst thereof was a Table of a reasonable length : at the one end sat the King, on his right hand, the Bishop of Eureux, & on the left, right ouer against him, du Plessis Pasquier, Vasfant, and Merier, Secretaries of the conference, were at the lower end of the same Table. Somewhat higher on the Kings right hand, sat the Chancellor and the Commissioners. E Behind the King stood the Archbishop of Lyons, and the Bishops of Neuers, Beauvais and Chastres. On the Kings left hand were the four Secretaries of State. Behind them which conferred, were the Dukes of Vaudemont, of Nemours, of Mercure, of Mayenne, of Neuers, of Elbeuf, of Aiguillon and Joinville, the Officers of the Crowne, Councillors of State, and other Noblemen of quality. After that all were commanded to keepe silence, his Maiesty hauing said, That the dispute was not betwixt party and party, but particular betwixt the two conferrers ; not for any question of right and doctrine, but for the littell truth of some passages : and that he desired they should treat with all mildnesse and moderation, without any bitterness or passion, but that of the truth. Declaring moreover, that he did not meane that this dispute should in any thing alter or disquiet the peace of his subiects, as the Chancellor did then declare vnto them at large by the Kings commandement.

My Masters, said he, all things worke to worke good in them that are good, if in the businesse which presents it selfe, wee bring spirits of peace and charity, the God of peace and charity, will assist our good intentions with his graces. The question is now vpon that which Monsieur du Plessis hath giuen the Bishop of Eureux to understand that he will verifie before the King, and such Commissioners as he shall please to depute, all the passages quoted in his Bookes. Whereunto the said Bishop had answered, That he

" euery one of vs in particular, may not be in any thing altered, but rather increased by the " mildnesse and modesty which shall be vsed on either part, and that we may finish this dis" putation with a good resolution to cary our selues and to liue peaceably together, like " good brethren, friends, & fellow citizens, as his Maiesty now commands vs by his Edict,
" whereof he hath euen now renewed his commandement vnto vs. These words were confir" med by the King, who commanded the Bishop of Eureux to speake and to begin the con" ference, the which he did in these termes.

" Sir, I present my selfe here to obey your Maiesties commandements, and to appeare at " the assignation which Monsieur du Plessis hath giuen me. The offer which I haue made was C " to shew him 500 false Allegations in his booke against the Masse. Your Maiesty according " to your singular wisdome hath very well concluded that this offer might well bee accep" ted without offending either spiritual or temporall lawes, which forbid all priuate persons " to dispute publicly of Religion. For here the question is not to call in doubt the faith of " the ancient Fathers of the Church, or to examine if they haue written well or ill ; but " whether Monsieur du Plessis hath cited them truly or not. Heretofore Huneric King of " the Vandales hauing called the Catholikes of Africa to enter into disputation with the Ar-
" rians, Engenius Archbishop of Carthage answered him, That he might not accept of that " combat without the consent of other Bishops, and namely of the Church of Rome, which D " was the head of all the Churches. If I at this day forbear to make the like difficulty, it is " not that I cary lesse respect to the Apostolike See then that holy Bishop did, about twelue
" hundred yeares since : But for that the question now is for some priuate passages of Mon" sieur du Plessis booke, and not of the generall doctrine of the Church ; whereunto the mo" desty your Maiesty hath pleased to vife in this action hath imboldened me. For you would " not take the incense as the King of Iuda did, who was stricken with a Leprosie, that is to " say, you seeke not to vsurpe any Priestly authority, nor to make your selfe a Iudge, or to " appoint Iudges in Ecclesiasticall causes : But onely to call learned winnes and worthy of " credit, which may testifie the truth of this conference, and in case of difficulty ; vpon the " version of words and edition of examples, giue their aduice : imitating therein the piety of " those good Emperours, Constantine, Valentinian, and Theodosius the first and second, who E " would neuer attribute vnto themselves the iudgement of controuersies of the faith, but " alwayes referre the decision to them whom God had appointed Pastors and Rectors of " his Church. And therefore vnder the authority of his commandements, I will enter " cheertfully into this conference, hauing first protested that I am not prick forward by any " spleene against Monsieur du Plessis, whom I respect and honour for his good parts, neither
" doe I pretend to charge him with any falsehood in his booke, but onely them vpon whose " faith and instructions he relied, as shall appeare by the mildnesse and modesty I promi" sed your Maiesty to vife towards his person.

" Du Plessis declared, That he was come thither, seeing it had so pleased his Maiesty, to F
" answer for his booke, which ambition had not caused him to write, but should rather
" haue diuerted him, to preferre his good fauour : but zeale to serue (during his reigne) for " a holy reformation in the Church, after which many good men haue so long sighed. If it " might any way serue, he should hold himselfe happy, though it were with his great losse ;
" if not, that he would haue burnt it, yet with his owne hand. Yet his hope was, that when " he should be equally examined, all men should find that he had caried himselfe faithfully
" and diligently, although it were not to bee held strange, if in five thousand passages or " more, they haue found some wherein his eye, his memory, or his iudgement hath waue-
" red :

A red : yet so, as they did not impugn the truth of that whereof hee treated.

Oh said he, that the bookes of the Doctors of the Roman Church, which haue written within these hundred yeares, were examined with this rigour, how many should you find that could endure this trial? Finally, he protested with his Maiesties leave, that this act was particular, and could not prejudice the truth of the doctrine of the reformed Churches of that Realme, which had bene before him, and should be after him. And so they entred into the matter.

After the first dayes conference, Monsieur du Plessis fell very sick, as they could proceed no further. The King did write the same day vnto the Duke of Elpemon, what had past in this Conference, and shewed by his letter what his iudgement was. My friend, the Bishop of Euireux hath vanquished that of Saumur. Wherewith Monsieur du Plessis was discontented ; so as in a discourse which he (or some of his friends) had printed soone after, touching this conference, he termed this Letter, A spark of fire, and that the Bishop of Eu-reux Fly was made an Elephant.

Some moneths after this conference at Fontainebleau, Canay, one of the Commissioners, and President in the Chamber of the Edict at Caftres, a man learned in Physlosophy and the tongues, and well read in the History of the Church, left his profession of the Reformed Religion, and became a Romish Catholike. Many thought that Cafaubon the other Commissioner would haue followed the same course : but hee left not the world long in this opinion, hauing written vnto the Synod of Ministers assembled at Gargau, that hee was not so wretchedly instructed in piety, as for want of knowledge of the truth he should suffr himselfe to be caried away with euery humour of doctrine. As the Synod reioyced at the constancy of Cafaubon, they grew in choller against the exchange of Canay, who answering the first Letter, they added this exclamation against the second: Oh miserable man, who hath purchased with the losse of firme felicity, the disguised wretchednesse of this world, the which shall hereafter perishe both in his life and sight, vnlesse that in the end of this feeling he acknowledge that he hath not with reason lost his iudgment, but rather without reason is become foolish, God of his mercy take pity of him, and giue him grace so to weepe for that which he hath committed, that he commit no more that which he must weepe for.

The King had particular aduice that the Duke of Sauoy was irresolute what to doe, and that he had sent vnto the Pope, and to diuers Princes and Common-weales in Italy, to let them vnderstand that he had bene forced to the Treaty of Paris : and how much it did import them if this treaty were effected : but he found not their intentions to iumpe with his, neither had he the answer he expected. His Maiesty had also intelligence of his deepe dissembling, saying sometimes, That he would not restore the Marquisate but by force ; sometimes, That he had rather deliuer Bresse then the Marquisate ; and most commonly he would say, That he would restore the Marquisate ; and that with a double designe. The one was that the King (thinking he proceeded faithfully) would grant him some delay for the restitution of the Marquisate, during the which, and before that the King should leauy an E army, winter should come, the which would hinder the French from attempting of any thing against him this yeare. The other was, to the end that the King of Spaine and his Counsell (who apprehended aboue all, the restitution of the Marquisate, for the neighbourhood of the French to the Duchy of Milan) should grant vnto Bely the Dukes Chancellor and his Ambassador in Spaine (whither he had sent him expressly to pacifie the Spaniards, who were offended with the Dukes voyage into France) succours of men and money, in case the King would force him : or else that he might draw some recompence from the Spaniard for the exchange of Bresse with the Marquisate. Bely complaines to the Counsell of Spaine, of the little time which there remained for the restitution of the Mar-quisate to the French. To whom they answered : That armies were not so soone leauied F in France ; that he should assure the Duke his Master, that the Cont Fuenter should bee at Milan by August (whereas two millions of gold attended him) with so many men and other prouision, as whosoeuer should seeke to force him, should haue enough to doe to defend himselfe.

The King being well aduertised of all these practises : the first of Iune being past, by the which the Duke according to the treaty of Paris should restore the Marquisate, his Ma-iesty came to Lyons, where the Duke intreated him by his letters to giue him some daies of respite, and that he would satisfie him by his Ambassadors. Whereupon the King yielded.

Then the Archbishop Tarantaite, the Marquiss of Lullins and Roncas his Ambassadors came to Lyons, the sixteenth of Iuly; who said vnto the King: That the Duke their master did complaine of the Treaty of Paris; That he durst not refuse any thing to his Maieſtie, when as he was in the chiefe City of his Realme; That he might be more blamed for holding of the Accord, then in breaking it, for the great interest of himselfe, his children, and his countries: notwithstanding, he was ready to yeeld the Marquissate, but hee beseeched his Maieſty to grant him the iustifurture thereof for one of his sonnes.

The King answered them : That the Duke had written many Letters vnto him from Chamberly and Thurin, aduertising him that hee was very well pleased with the Accord which he had made at Paris, promising to effect it, as he was bound to doe. As for his demand of the inueſtiture of the Marquitate for one of his ſons, there was no likelihood he ſhould vſe any ſuch bounty, hauing fo ſmall caule. To conclude, he was much diſcontented with the difficulties which the Duke made vpon their accord, the which if he did not performe by the firſt day of Auguſt, hee ſhould prepare to defend himſelfe. Roncas the Dukes confident ſeruant returnes to his Highneſſe, to let him vnderſtand the Kings diſcontent and reſolution, but eſpecially to giue him time to thinke of his affaires. At that time Foffene returning out of Piedmont, aſſured the King, that he had heard the Duke of Sauoy ſwear, that he would neuer yeeld vpon the Marquitate, and if the King did attempt to make warre againſt him, hee would ſlew him ſpoort for forty yeares, with ſuch like words which were vnplicable to the King. Roncas returnes ſpeedily, bringing newes that the Duke was content, ſeeing the King would haue it ſo, to reſtore the Marquitate of Saluſſes, according to the Treaty of Paris. The King ſeemed well pleaſed with this reſolution, giuing the charge to Brulart and Lapin to treat with the Dukes Ambaſſadors, how the reſtitution of the Marquitate ſhould be made. The Articles were agreed vpon, and being ready to ſigne them, Roncas ſaid vnto the Ambaſſadors, that his Maſter might take it ill if they ſhould ſigne them before he had ſeene them : that there were ſtrange humours about his highneſſe, and that it would be more eaſe for him to get him to approve the articles when they were not ſigned. Roncas takes vpon him to carie the articles, the King hauing giuen him leaue to goe, and know his maſters laſt reſolution, ſhewing that he was determined not to ſuffer himſelfe to be entertained any longer with words ; but in ſtead of returning, he ſent backe a Letter whereby they found that the Duke did nothing but diſſemble, and entreatine the King with delays, vntill that the Count uentas came out of Spaine, and that he had aſſembled his forces and provided for his ſafety.

But the Archbishop of Tarantaise and Lullins entering againe into conference with the sayd President Sillery and Ianin, they propounded foure difficulties.

- 1 Vpon the restitution of places in the Marquifate by the Duke, and of Pont de Vaux in Breffe by the King at the fame time.
- 2 Vpon the restitution of the Buiwicke of Gex.
- 3 Vpon the restitution of the artillery and munition that was within Carmagnola.
- 4 Vpon the nomination of a Gouvernor in the Marquifate.

All which being refolued, the Dukes Ambaffadors befeech the King to giue them time to aduertife their Mafter thereof: the King answered them, that if by the 16 of Auguft all his places in the Marfquie were not refitted vnto him, he would feek to recouer that by force which he could not haue by reafon. Before the Kings departure from Paris, the deuill had perfwaded a wretched woman called Micelle Mignon, to pofion him, who had fome meanes during the forefaid warres, hauing had the fauour to talke priuately with the King who is as full of bounty, as the liberty of armes, in time of warre, giues fuch familiarities: and Princes fometimes frame themfelues vnto it. Being kept backe from the Kings prefence, with whom the would needs fpeake in priuate, being full of indignation, & hauing refolued this cruell attempt againft the King, he addrefseth her felfe to the Count Soiffons a Prince of the blood & Lord Steward of France, that he might giue her husband fome place in the Kings kitchen, and fo in going to fee her husband, the fould haue meanes to effeet her damnable enterprife. In the end he had acceffe, and faid vnto him, that fhee was refolued to doe an act, which fould make him the greateft Prince, and her the moft contented woman in the world. He defired to vnderftand of her the meanes in particular, wherat he was much amazed. And for that it was a matter of importance, he wifhed her to come againe the next day, for that it deferred to be well confidered of.

The

A The Count of Soissons goes presently unto the King, and tells him what he had heard of this woman, beseeching him to give him some confident man, who being thus vp in his cabinet might heare the same, when as she should come at the time appointed. The King commanded Lomeny Secretary of his Cabinet to goe. She returns full of courage and resolution to effect this wicked designe. She speaks more, and profits to doe worse then she had done the day before. He preit her to tell who had counselled her, and why she attempted so dangerous a thing. He could draw nothing from her but that it proceeded from the diuell, from whom comes all damnable inspirations, and whose actions are murders, sacrileages and impieties. When she had all said, shee was apprehended by the Prouost, and led vnto the Court. Being examined, she denied the accusation and reproached the accuser as audaciously, as she had shewed her selfe furiously resolute to the execution. Lomeny was produced against her, and her conscience (although very desperately wicked) could not deny that which she had before time depofed, but confessed the truth, and was condemned to be burned quicke.

She is burn
aliuc.

It is miraculous what hath past in diuers conspiracies against the King, and how diuinely God hath deliuered him. It was one of the causes, which made the Duke of Sauoy seeme so resolute to hold the accord which hee had made with the King at Paris for the Marquise of Saluces, hauing vnderstood that the King had bene so often threatened by the attempts of such murderers, presuming that it was not possible but some one would hit: and about the same time there was one taken, come out of Piedmont to kill the King, whereof there was great rumour and suspition. And three others which had vndertaken to kill him, when as he was in Sauoy, whereof they had certaine intelligence, with their pourtraires, the which were well knowne. And as they would haue taken them, his Maiesty would not suffer them saying: Let these wicked wretches alone, God will punish them without my doing.

Four enterprises against the king.

The feuenth of Auguft the King was aduertifed, that the Duke had refufed the laft conditions agreed vpon by his Ambaffadors, whereupon he countermanded the Count Paf- fage, whom he had lent with five hundred men to command in the Marquifate of Salufes, and to enter the towne and caſtle of Carmagnoles, which the Duke ſhould yeeld vpon the fixteenth of Auguft, according to the laſt accord. And withall the 21 of that month he publiſhed a Declaration how he was forced to take Armes againſt the Duke of Sauoy, to haue reafon for the Marquifate of Salufes, ſurprized by him, and viſperped vpon the Crowne of France, in a time of Peace, during the life of the deceaſed King, Henry the third, Predeceſſor to his Maieſty, and a benefactor to the ſaid Dukes father: giuing all men to vnderſtand, that he was unwillingly drawne to this remedy, for the ſingular deſire hee had to raigne in peace, and to loue in loue and friendſhip with all his neighbours, having done as much to auoid it, as his honour, and the duty of a Prince which loues the publicke quiet, and the good of his Eſtate did require: taking into his protection and defence, all Clergy-men, and places, which ſhould not fauour, nor ſerue for a retreat or aſſiſtance vnto the ſaid Dukes armies: and all Inhabitants of townes, which ſhould open their gates vnto his Maieſty and to his ſeruants: Meaning, that no acts of Hoſtilitie ſhould be vſed, but againſt ſuch as ſhould carry armes, and fauour the ſaid Duke of Sauoy and his adherents. Forbidding all ſacrilege, rauifhing all women and maids, and burning of houſes, places and caſtles vpon paine of death. Commanding all Frenchmen his ſubiects, being in ſeruiſe with the ſaid Duke, to retire themſelves, and returne into his Realme within fifteen dayes after this Proclamation made in his armies, vpon paine to bee declared and puniſhed as guilty of high treaſon.

The King finding that all the Dukes temporisings and delays proceeded from a bad intent, was forced at one and the same instant, against the precepts of warre, to proclaim warre, and to prepare for meanes to make it. He gaue out Commissions for the leaueing offoor: in the neighbour Provinces. He sent the Duke of Guise into Prouence, to looke to his Government , having intelligence that the Duke practised some surprisles. The Marshall of Biron had charge to drag downe all his forces out of Bourgundy, he cauled bullets to be made in Niurnois, Dauphine & Bourgundy, and sent out Commissions for to leauey Pioners. The Marquis of Roigny great Master of the Artillery, was sent to Paris, who returned within fiftene dayes to his Maiestie, with incredible speed, fo as in lesse then three weekes, the King had men, money, Cannon and Munition. He sent Monsieur

The King who knows that in warre, nothing doth so much aduance the execution as the presence of the head: being resolute to assaile the Duke on two parts, by Bresse and Sauoy, he parted from Lyons the same day that he proclaimed warre, and came to Grenoble to goe to the enterprize of Montmelian in Sauoy, and to bee ready at all occasions. The Marshall of Biron vnderooke the surprize and taking of Bourg in Bresse, the which was as soone knowne as conceived. The Marquis of Lullins the Dukes Ambassador being at Lyons, aduertised the Count of Montmaior Gouverneur of Bresse, and Bouvens Capitaine of the Citadell of Bourg of the enterprize, and that they should stand vpon B their guards.

A Gentleman of Bresse which had been amongst the Marshall of Biron's troopes, scene the Petards, and numbred the souldiers in passing the bridge at Macon, went before, to giue notice to Bouvens Capitaine of the Citadell, that the Marshall was within a league of him. But neglecting all these aduertisements, and trusting to the force of their walls and gates, they found, that the Marshall of Biron with twelue hundred men onely and two Petards, forced the first and second Port of the towne, and entred it without any resistance, or the losse of one souldier. The troopes entred without disorder, and marched directly to the place before the Citadell, and came not away, till ten of the clocke, whilst that they did capitulate with two hundred Suiffes, which had shut themselves into a Bastion, whom they suffered to depart free with what was theirs: and also to attend if Bouvens would fallly out of the Citadell, as he made shew. The Marshall of Biron left the Baron of Lux at Bourg, and went with sixe Cannons to finish the conquest of all that which lyes on this side the Riuier of Roiffe, taking at the same time Pont d'In, Poncin, Saint Denis, Saint Rumbert, Bely and Pierre Chastell. Some yeelded at the reputation of his presence, others would see the Cannon. There was no garison in all the country, but at Seizel. A strange humour of an enemy, not onely to make warre vpon bad grounds, and to imbarke himselfe in a rotten ship, but also to refuse peace, and yet to haue no man in his country to make warre. Those which made any resistance, shewed themselves in the end more valiant in tongue then with the sword. So as the King being at Grenoble, receiued in one day and in lesse then six houres, newes of two memorable exploits: the taking of Bourg with seuen ensignes, and one Cornet, which the Marshall sent him, and the taking of the towne of Montmelian by Les Dignieres. Cregny offered a scalado to the Curtaine of the towne of Montmelian towards the Castle, and the Petard to the Port of Arban with such fury, as the souldiers retired themselves into the Church, and the Inhabitants into the Citadell, leaving their houses to the discretion of all that warre allows in a towne that is either forced, or surprisid. The King commanded Grillon to lodge with the Regiment of his guards in the suburbs of Chambery, all which was done, without any great resistance.

The Souldiers did not defend themselves without feare and amazement, and the people were so lulled asleepe with this opinion of peace, as nothing was more hatefull vnto them then the remembrance of warre, holding all care of armes to be vaine and vnprofitable.

The Duke past his time amongst the Ladies at Thurin, attending the pleasing affects which his Diuines had promised him, as we haue said. He is aduertised that the King is in Armes, his Country in prey, the meanes to defend himselfe farre off, and Hannibal at the foot of the Alpes: That onely Montmelian is left him on this side the mountains: That his chiefe towne had acknowledged the King for Soueraigne Lord, and that all his subiects yeelded willingly to his obedience. Yet he continued his sports: And esteeming little the losse of all his Estates, so as he might haue Montmelian, hee holds it but losse of time for his enemies; that hee would make them abandon what they had taken, and of their victories they should carie backe nothing but Trophies of straw: to conclude he seemed for a time (as one would say) to consent to any thing which the King did.

But when he came in the end to consider of the abuses and deceits of his Soothsayers, to whom he had giuen too much credit; that so many proiects laid with the Marshall of Biron tooke no effect; that his Ambassadors had commandment to retire (yet full of griefe that their masters inconstancie had drawne his Estate into apparant ruine, and too much

A much incensed the Kings patience) that his country was in prey, that the great meanes of resistance which were promised him, from beyond the Pirenean mountains were yet farre off: He awakes at the thunder of the Cannon: He casts his eyes and thoughts on all sides, and finds no Mediator capable to repaire that which hee had ruined; no friends to support his quarrell, no neighbours which stirre for him. Euery one blames him, euery one cries out that he is in the wrong, he is the sole instrument and cause of his owne misery, and he alone must seeke the remedy.

The Patriarke of Constantinople is at Turin, a man of a great spirit, and much prazied in affaires of this world. The King sees and heares him willingly. Yea, but the Duke had suspected him at the Treaty of Paris. He had commandment from the Pope not to depart from thence, before his Highnesse had performed his promises. He thought that hee was there onely to obserue his intentions, and to presse the effects of his words. Hee had well obserued that the Duke did not shew him so good a countenance, nor did so willingly see him as when he past for the Treaty of Vertins. He is offended at this contempt, and it may be will be reuenged when opportunitee serues. He knowes also that the Duke did not like of them that did conferre with him; and that hee had encouraged the King to continue the course of his victories, and not to trust vnto the deceits of the Sauoyfid. What likelihood was there then in so urgent a businesse, to imploy a great Prelate incensed, a great spirit offended?

C Yet must hee conuie this French tempest, and by some meanes stay the exploits of so rude an Officer. The Patriarkes quality binds him to mediate the reconciliation of Princes diuided in Christendome; and his presence, to bring water and not Oyle to the combustions which deuoured the Dukes Estates. Hee intreats and conuies him to goe vnto the King. They say that (in despite of the bad reception hee had had at Thurin, or well acquainted with the Dukes intentions) he lent a small note vnto the King, aduising him to continue the course of his Armes, and not to desist for any propositions or offers made by the Duke, who fought but to deceive him, and withall he accepted of the charge.

The Patriarke came vnto Grenoble the fifteenth of August, and spake vnto the King D comming from Euenlong: Hee giues him to vnderstand how much the Pope would be discontented with this warre: hee conuies him in his name to resolute to a peace, and to returne for that effect to the Treaty of Paris: for that in demanding his owne, both the Pope and all the Potentates would fauour his demand: but in seeking to retain the ancient inheritance of the D. of Sauoy, he had no reason to hope for any fauour.

The King answered him, That he was infinitely grieved the Pope should be any way discontented with his taking Armes, the which hee did not vnderake vntill it was apparant to all the world, that the Duke deluded him. That being the person whom his Maiestie did most honour, and to whom hee acknowledged himselfe so much bound, as he could not deny him any thing, yet hee held him so full of Iustice, as he would neuer aduise him to E any thing that should be against reason, and the dignity of his Crowne. That the Duke hauing refused to performe the Articles of the Treaty at Paris, hee was not bound to obserue them.

The Patriarke laid before him the miseries which this warre would bring, the ruine and desolation of the people, and the aduantage which the common enemy of Christendome should get by it. The King answered him in this manner. You exhort me like vnto a great Diuine, and one of the chiefe Prelates of the Church, to desist from this warre, to avoid the mischiefe that may fall vpon Christendome. I know not so much Diuinity as you doe, yet am I not ignorant, that I haue a soule to saue, and that one day I must giue an account of my actions, and that God will impute the miseries that shall happen by this warre, vnto him that giues the occasion. Let the D. of Sauoy lay his hand vpon his heart, and iudge if it be not his obstinacy and couetousnesse to hold that which belongs to another, which is the cause of all the oppression which his poore subiects doe now suffer. He hath presuaded with too great contempt of me, to hold that which is mine, by cunning, against my will. He that detaines an other mans vniustly, may iustly be deprived of his owne. Hee that denies vnto the stronger that which belongs vnto him, abandons vnto him by the same meanes all that he hath: as it is no honour for him to be obstinate to warre, for the desire he hath to hold an other mans Estate, so shall hee reape no other profit then the ruine of 1600 " of his owne. I cannot conceale it reuerend Patriarke, that although I haue euer found all " intrigue in your Negotiations, yet am I troubled how I shall cary my selfe with you,

 " touching that which you propound; for in truth I hold you for a very good man, a most
 " vertuous Prelate, and a wise Negotiator.

The Duke demands
 two Legats

" On the other side I can let you see in writing how the said Duke hath giuen Authori-
 " tie to Jacob and the President Roche to treat with mee, with a Declaration that neither
 " you nor his Ambassadors, that are within my Realme, are priny to his intentions. He hath " made them propound, that I should moue the Pope to depute two Legats; one of them " should cause restitution to be made of that which I hold on this side the Mountaines, and " the other should make him restore that which he detaines from me on that side the Alpes. B
 " I finde his manner of proceeding to be very bad. To conclude, reuerend Patriarke, I will " beseech the Pope to take my answer in good part, who holds that I cannot be urged by " any reason to lay aside those Armes which the Duke hath forced me to take, hauing runne " headlong without any necessity into this warre, in the which I am engaged against my " will. I meane not to bee irreconcilable to him, but I will tell you that hee hath caried " himselfe in such sort towards me, as I will no more rely vpon his words. After so many " breaches, he must finde some other meanes to warrant that he saith, or some others then " my selfe to beleue him. His former cariage makes mee iudge what the future may be.
 " It is euident that in a full peace, he vsurped the Marquisate of Saluces from the deceased
 " King his benefactor, alledging no other reason, but that hee would keepe it more safely C " for him, then the Huguenots, who would vsurpe it, promising to doe as hee pleased. I " can shew his Letter written vnto the King. But when there is any question to keepe his " promise, hee then no more remembers it. Iudge also how I can be assured of the loue of " this Prince, who during the miseries of France, fought to vsurpe Dauphine and Pro-
 " uence, where with his friends hee hath caused infinite ruines, and where hee pretended
 " no other right but neighbourhood and conueniencie, and to make himselfe great with " his neighbours losse, so as his Ambassador in Switzerland in an open dier at Bade (excus-
 " ing his matters couetousnesse to the thirteenth Cantons) said that his children which " were many, were isfued from Kings and Emperours, and that it was natural for fathers
 " to seeke all meanes to make their children great, and to thinke of it in time, seeing that D
 " no man knowes what time hee hath to thinke of it. The which should giue occasion " to all his neighbours, to foresee how they shall keepe their estates vntill his children bee " provided for. The warre which I make shall not trouble the quiet of Christendome, I " am ready to desist, when hee shall doe mee right, for many iust pretensions which I haue
 " vpon his Estates and Countries, the which hee detaines from me, to the preiudice of my " Crowne. Let no man doubt of my resolution to obserue the Treaty of Veruins, but it
 " doth not binde mee to quit mine owne. The Patriarke seeing that hee would allow no " other reasons then his owne, beseeched the King to grant a cessation of Armes; but his " request was not granted, the King being vnwilling his army should rest, vntill it had ta" ken Montmelian and Bourg, being dangerous to remaine in an enemies country, and not E
 " to bee assured of the chiefe places of strength, the losse whereof strikes terror into the " rest. The King sent the Patriarke to Lions, to treat with his Councell more amply of his " proposition.

The Spanish Ambassador considered the course of this warre, yet hee made no shew that the King his master desired for all this to alter the publicke peace, notwithstanding he could not forbear to say, that besides the naturall affection which he bare to the Duke of Sauoy and to his children: he held it the duty of a mighty Prince, to lend his helping hand to them that were vnjustly oppressed, yet hee made no protestation which might make them doubt of the obseruation of the Treaty. The King also said, that hee would cherishe the loue of the King of Spaine, so long as he should make account of his, but he would neuer trouble himselfe with so difficult a thing as to keepe a friend by force. Hee commanded the Marquis of Lullins to retire, for if an Ambassador be alwayes suspected during an assured peace, there is no reason to trust him in time of warre.

The King offers mercy to the inhabitants of Chambery

The King being resolute not to lose any time in a season which was so precious, parted from Grenoble, dined at Baraut, visited his troopes which were at Montmelian, and from thence went to the Marches, viewed Chambery, and being come vnto the suburbs, he commanded Villeroy, to speake vnto Jacob, who commanded in the towne; and to lay before

A before him the danger whereinto he thrust himselfe with all the Inhabitants, if they attended force in so weak a place. That the King desirous to prevent the ruine of so many poore innocent creatures, offered mercy, and fought to vanquish them by mildnesse, before hee employed any other meanes. Jacob, accompanied with the President Roche, thanked the King, and beseeched his Maiestie to suffer them to aduertise his Highnesse in what Estate they were. The King granted them three dayes to resolue & to send to the Duke, but the people not attending his resolution, being desirous to free themselves from the apprehensions of the misery which follows them that are obstinate, forced him to enter into parley, so as the town was yielded to the Kings obedience. Those within the Castle promised to yeeld within six dayes, if they were not succoured with sufficient forces to raise the siege. The King left La Buisse a Gentleman of Dauphine there for Governor. Hauing effected so great a matter with so small forces, hee was well pleased to see his army augmented, by the troopes which La Guiche Governor of Lions brought vnto him, being about three hundred horse, of the Nobility of his government, and of his company of men at armes. Being master of the field, he resolved to haue the chiefe fort, he seized vpon the two approaches of Tarentaise and Maurienne.

Chambery
 yielded the 27
 of August

He parted from Chambery the 26 of August, lodged at Saint Peter d'Albigny, and the next day came to Confians, where he found that Des Dignieres had by maine force drawn two Cannons to the top of a mountaine, battered a Paullion, and made a small breach in C a curtain. The place was sufficient to haue assured women, but they that were within shewed not themselves men, being one thousand five hundred in number, amongst the which there were a hundred all armed, and three hundred more which caried Cuirasses.
 They had scarce made fifty shot but they yielded through feare, and demanded no other composition but their liues, thinking themselves very happy to redeeme their liues with the losse of their armes, horses and baggage, the which the King gaue them out of his bounty, well satisfied with the place, their enignes, and the promise which they made him, not to carie armes for twelue dayes.

The king comes to Confians, and battert

As Confians commands the passage of Tarentaise, so Charbonniers holds that of Maurienne, being seated at the entry of the mountaines, which makes the valley ioyning to D Mont-Cenis. This place stands vpon a rocke, at the foot whereof runnes the riuer of Arc, inaccessible of all sides, but only a narrow way to goe vnto the Port; This Tower of Charbonniers serues them as a dungeon and is all that remains of the first fort and retreat of the Earles of Sauoy. Bernalde Duke of Saxony, the first Earle of Maunene made it his Palace in time of peace, and his fort for the warre. It is also remarkable for the birth of Thomas sonne to Humbert the third Earle of Sauoy, and Prince of Piedmont. The towne of Aiguebelle is at the foot of this Rocke, the King caused it to be firmified by the Seigneurs of Creguy and Morges, not giuing them of the Castle any leifure to burne it.

The description of Charbo-
 niers.

His Maiestie knowing that this place was well furnished to resist an army, caused his E troopes to march, and then he battered the tower with nine Canons, and two small pieces, from the break of day vntill noone. The besieged (hauing endured six hundred thirty and seven Cannon shot, without any hope of succours) did capitulate the 10 of September, to depart with their baggage, and their Matches out: the King sent their enignes to the Marquesse of Vernuel being then at Lions, the which are now in the great Church of S.
 Iohn, and so they departed to the number of two hundred. The King returned to Grenoble, to purge himselfe by the aduice of his physician, commanding Des Dignieres to passe with the army into Tarentaise, the which hee did, the enemies quitting the passage of Bri-ançon, retiring themselves into a Rocke which was inaccessible of all parts, the which did so bridle the passage, as it might stay any force: Des Dignieres hauing intelligence that F the port being but two foot wide, was not well rampared, and that the place was better furnished with Pefants then with souldiers, hee planted two Cannons against it, the which in six volleys made a breach, the souldiers grappled vp courageously to the top of the Moun-taine, to enter in at this hole, the Capitaine within it was hurt with a shot, and all the rest were taken prisoners. The army lodged at Montiers the Metropolitan of the whole country, hauing conquered the vallies & mountaines of Maurienne and Tarentaise, where they found nothing so difficult, as the season, being more troubled with the weather, then with men: onely Montmelian remained, which was held impregnable.

The King of Spaine Ambaſſador in Swiſſe commiſſion of the King.

2 Ambaſſador in Swiſſe commiſſion of the King.

A strange impoſture.

The King deſirous to haue the cauſes of this warre knowne to all the world, commanded his Ambaſſadors to aduertise his friends thereof. The Spaniſh Ambaſſador in Swiſſerland was not mute in this occaſion which miniſtered matter for all the world to talke of. His diſcourſe was, that the French King (having taken armes when as euerie one thought to enioy the ſweetneſſe of peace) put all the world in iealouſie, bound thoſe that were neereſt to runne to quench this fire, and in oppoſing themſelues to the oppreſſion of the Duke, preuent the deſignes of the ſeruitude of Italy. That to this end the Count of Fuentes, had commanndement from the King of Spaine his Maſter, to leauey men to aſſure the Duchy of Milan, and to inreat that valiant Nation of the Swiſſes to grant him a leauey of fix thouſand men.

Monſieur de Vie the Kings Ambaſſador, made it knowne in an open aſſembly of all the Cantons, that the King had had more patience, then the injury done vnto his Crowne did permit, being vnwilling to take armes vntill that all Europe had iudged, that the Duke of Sauoy proceeded not ſincerely, and that he vrged his Maieſty to repell by force the injury of the detention of the Marquiſſe of Saluces, yet could he not keepe the petty Cantons from granting a leauey vnto the Duke, the which notwithstanding was by him made vnprofitable. We may not here omit a particular accident. Amongſt the chiefe Gentlemen which La Guiche Governor of Lions had drawne out of his gouernment to ſerue the King in his armie of Sauoy, were Chazent and du Bourg, both well known for their valour and experience in armes. The King made good eſteeme of them, and gaue a Commiſſion to the laſt, to raiſe a regiment of a thouſand men. Being gone to make this leauey, Enuy (which doth alwayes oppoſe it ſelfe to the merits of vertue, and which is inenitable in the beginning of proſperitie) was grieued that a Gentleman which had folowed the League, ſhould be choſen among ſo many others to ſerue the King in this warre, and forged an impoſture ſufficient to ruine him, if it had incountried a Prince as apt to choller as hee is to Iuſtice and Clemencie. They caſt alſo read tickets in the Kings Chamber and withdrawing chamber, that theſe two Gentlemen, having failed in an enterpriſe vpon his Maieſties perſon at the paſſage of the riuier neere vnto Chamouſſet, had referred the execution thereof to Morliers, and that his Maieſtie ſhould remember that vpon the way to Chamouſſet, one of them (his courage fainting) drew back from the King to talke with a Knight which marched on the one ſide. This was enough to kindle the Kings choller, and to make it paſſe like vnto a thunder-bolt, which breakes and wounds before wee ſee the lightning, or heare the cracke. But this Prince (who all his life had followed the precept, which the Emperour Caſilius gaue vnto his ſonne, not to giue care to ſlanderous and enuious reports) found that this billet proceeded from a wicked and malicious paſſion, for that hee remembered well, that to ſpeake, with du Bourg, he had cauſed Chazent to change his place, whereof mention was made in the billet. Hee ſhewed it to La Guiche gouernour of Lions, who preſently conceiued that it was an impoſture: Hee called Chazent vnto him, more to confirme the good opinion hee had of his Loyalty, then to ſhew him that this note were able to giue him any ſigne of iealouſie or diſtruſt. And for that the brute of this treacherie could not be kept ſecret, he cauſed a Letter to be written to du Bourg, commanding him not to diſcontinue the leauey of his regiment, for any thing hee ſhould heare ſpoken againſt his Loyalty, whereof hee would haue no other prooff but his courage, and the execution of that which he commanded him. Du Bourg being at Lions, and hearing there were things ſpoken of him which he neuer thought, hee takes poſt & comes to the King as hee roſe from dinner, being enuironed by all the chiefe Noblemen of his Court. As ſoone as hee perceived him he asked why hee was come. Sir answered Du Bourg, it is ſaid at Lions that Elpinall would kill you, Du Bourg brings you his head. The King replied, that hee held him too honeſt a man to haue ſuch a thought, and that ſuch as had giuen this intelligence where wicked Impoſters. They did ſee that I meant to imploy you, as I will alwayes when occaſion is offered for my ſeruiſe. They could produce no other effects of their enuy but in writing of this Billet, but they haue not found me ſo tractable and credulous as they thought. Princes Courts were neuer without them, but hee hath ſeuell that doth leaſt beleuee them, I doe not as Kings my Predeceſſors, who kept in minde, while they liued what two or three had told them. No man knowes my Realme better then my ſelfe. I haue found three faſtions. That of the decaſed King hath troubled mee. Of three I haue made one: there is no more any diſtinction. I am King of the one

A one as well as of the other, and hold them all for my ſubiects. I make no difference among them for their affection to my ſeruiſe, but I know how to make choiſe of them that are capable of charges, and for your regard you ſhall neuer be forgotten when any is offered. Du Bourg having thanked the King for the confidence it pleaſed him to haue of his loyalty, ſeemed notwithstanding much afflicted for this ſlander. The King ſaid vnto him, That he had already told Chazent that it pitted him to ſee him afflicted for a thing which he had neuer beleueed, and which he held incredible: hee asked him if hee ſuſpected any one, aſſuring him, that if he did name him, hee would of his abſolute power put him to the racke; and if any one ſhould accuſe them, he would alwayes hold the accuſation ſeant. Du Bourg, being far from the thought of Gentlemen of their ſort; and if he ſhould beleuee billets, there were no ſafety for good men in his Court. But the King adds (to encreaſe the hearts grieſe of theſe ſightfull ſpirits) goe and raiſe your Regiment, and beleuee me, that if you bring ſpeedily the number of men which you haue promiſed, you ſhall puniſh them more rigorouſly then iuſtice would if they were knowne: for there is no ſuch torment to an enemy as to doe well. That which was ſaid of theſe two was very falſe, but that which was ſaid of two others, was very true. The King had intelligence that two deſperate men, by one motion, and diuers meanes, had an enterpriſe vpon his perſon.

Two deſperate men ſent to kill the King.

The aduſe was accompanied with a deſcription and the portraits of theſe wretches. One of them was knowne, and ſeene two or three times neare vnto the King. One to whom Villery had giuen a copy of the portraits to watch and obſerue this villaine, ſeeing him one day neare vnto the King then he ſhould be, wiſhed his Maieſty to take heed. Hee contented this aduſe, ſaying, That his life depended of God, and not of the practiſes of his enemies. He would not ſuffer them to apprehend him, ſaying, Let him alone, he is a wicked man. Such villaines ſhall not goe unpuniſhed, God will puniſh them without my doing. The Caſtle of Montmelian was held one of the ſtrongſt places in Chriſtendome, and thoſe which haue ſeene the portrait, with the order of the Kings Campe, and the forme of his battery, haue wonderd that it did ſo ſuddenly yeeld. The King himſelfe ſaid it was impregnable. It is ſeated vpon the top of a mountaine, the ditches be precipices on euerie ſide, the deſences, ſix great battions well flanked: there is but one paſſage to it from the towne, but ſo vnealie as is not to be won, being ditcht, retrencht, and flanked with aduantage: but there is no fortreſſe that may not be learned ſtrong if it be not aſſailed, and they meaſure the ſtrength or weakneſſe of a place more by the quality of him that doth beſiege it, then by her owne forces. The King (whoſe reputation aſſured a happy end) reſolved to beſiege it, being informed of the ſtate of the place, and confirmed in his reſolution by Des Diguieres, who ſaid theſe words vnto him: That he would ſubmit himſelfe to pay the charges of the army, if that ſort were not taken within one month.

The ſiege of the Caſtle of Montmelian.

It was furniſhed with munition, and many ruines neglected, diſblemiſht that ancient reputation, by the which it was held one of the ſtrongſt in Chriſtendome. The Capitaine and ſouldiers had equally need of courage. It is better to haue ſleepe commanded by a Lion, then Lions commanded by a ſheepe. The Earle of Brandis, of the houſe of the Earles of Montmaior had the gouernment. The execution of a Councell is neuer better performed then by him that giues it. Des Diguieres had been the chiefe author to make the army paſſe out of Maurienne into Tarentaiſe. The King therefore iudging that he could not be better ſerued by any other in his armie of Sauoy, he commits the charge vnto him of the execution of that which he had aduſed.

The French army marched to beſiege the Caſtle of Montmelian, which the Lord of Crequy (commanding in the Towne ſince the taking thereof had blockt vp) as well as he could, his Maieſty being aſſured, he ſummoned the Count of Brandis to yeeld, and to receiue his commandements, threatening him with the fury of forty Cannons: the Earle answered, That he would neuer yeeld the place but to his Sovereigne Lord the Duke of Sauoy, and if they did beſiege him, Montmelian ſhould be the ſtupature of the French. Some thinke that this answer proceeded onely from feare.

The Caſtle ſummoned to yeeld. The Earle of Brandis answer.

In the meane time the Marquis Ruſſy, great maſter of the Artillery, loſt no time to plant his batteries, drawing vp ſeuſen cannons by the force of mens hands, to command the Caſtle, and to batter it at random: then in the ſame plain at the foot of the hill, hee cauſed two batteries to be made by de Bordes (Lieutenant General of the Artillery) as well against the Bastion of Mauvoisin, as other places which they held easiest to be battered, especially that which was before the Bastion Bouillars, the which might also batter an old tower or dongeon, being foure square, and almost ruined, hauing bene battered in former time by the army of King Francis the first.
